bolt the party because the national convention had failed to satisfy the demands of the southern delegates. On September 28, the Atlanta Constitution reported that seven of Mississippi's nine Democratic electors had pledged only qualified support to party nominees. On November 1, 1944, Governor Thomas L. Bailey called a special session of the Mississippi Legislature to "consider legislation protecting the voting rights of Mississippi citizens in the selection of presidential electors.... (and)..... to force electors to vote for the party nominee of face disqualification."

No records in the Atlanta press with regard to the Negro vote in the Mississippi Democratic primary.

South Carolina

The Washington, D. C. Post on March 2nd denounced a resolution passed by the South Carolina House of Representatives which affirmed its belief in "white supremacy" as being "so close to the Hitlerian doctrine of Nordic or Aryan supremacy as to be indistinguishable from it." The resolution brought about immediate and heated protest: the Negro Citizens' Committee of South Carolina assailed the action on the part of the House, and asked in a public statement among other things that the electric chair in South Carolina be retained not for Negroes alone, but for all murderers alike when guilty; twenty white men and women in the state released to the press "A Statement on the Race Problem in South Carolina," in which they said "We do not believe that disenfranchisement of all Negroes in South Carolina can endure indefinitely, and we hope that a careful study of this problem may, in the end, result in a plan of suffrage for the State that will be to the better interests of both races..... The only white supremacy which is worthy of the name is that which exists because of virtue, not power. Good morale, to say nothing of religion or democracy, requires that there shall be drastic revision in our attitude toward our colored citizens."

Manifestly the situation in South Carolina at the time of the release of the Supreme Court decision was a tense one. The 1943 Legislature had acted to wipe out of the state code all party rules as of June 1, 1944 -- evidently foreseeing the implications of the Lonnie E. Smith case which was pending. On April 13, Governor Olin D. Johnson issued a proclamation calling a special session of the General Assembly to wipe from the code all laws pertaining to Democratic primary elections in order to "maintain white supremacy in South Carolina."

The Legislature convened on April 14, 1944. Governor Johnson addressed the body and called for white control. In speaking of Reconstruction days he was quoted as saying, "They left a stench in the nostrils of the people of South Carolina that will exist for generations!" More than 200 state code sections were removed from the statutes in hurried action in order to complete the work before the April 22 precinct meetings which would set the Democratic primary machinery in motion.

Under the uncontrolled system, the Democratic Party will continue to furnish its ballots at ~~general~~ primary elections, but without the sanction of state laws which had never provided for a state-printed ballot. An Associated Press story from Columbia, South Carolina, carried in the Atlanta Constitution on April 22 quoted Governor Johnson as saying that if the repeals "prove inadequate, we South Carolinians will use the necessary methods to retain white supremacy in our primaries."

Negro leaders in the state deplored the action of the Legislature and announced plans to hold a state Negro convention to form a South Carolina Colored Democratic Party to nominate candidates to the national convention. Subsequently the Progressive Democratic Party of South Carolina (Negro) was formed and did send delegates to the national convention. On April 21, one hundred doctors attending the Palmetto Medical, Dental and Pharmaceutical Association's ~~22~~ 48th annual meeting endorsed the work of the Negro Citizens' Committee, and denounced the action of the South Carolina Legislature by resolution.

The feature article written by Tarleton Collier on the subject of the uncontrolled primary in South Carolina, carried in a number of southern newspapers on April 28, outlines the involvements clearly. The information contained in the article is of such value that it is included herein for the record:

South Carolina Tries to Get Around Negro Vote Decision - written by Tarleton Collier, Columbia, South Carolina, carried in the Atlanta Constitution April 28, 1944

"It goes without saying that other states of the South hellbent on keeping the Democratic primary strictly a white man's affair are watching intently the details and effects of South Carolina's formula for bypassing the supreme court decision that Negroes may not be barred from voting in primary elections.

"Consequently, there is no time like the present to tell them what they are in for if they would resort to the same action which the general assembly of this state, in special session to resolve the dilemma, has just completed. They may as well know that the experience will be dizzying and in spots embarrassing, the same as here, and the result very likely will be chaotic, with no certainty that it will stand the inevitable test, even at that.

"What the legislature did, in brief, was to take out of the state laws every discoverable reference, or intimation of reference, to primary elections; and thus to make the selection of Democratic nominees, who are elected all but automatically, a kind of town meeting process within private clubs of controllable membership.

"Everyone seems to agree that it's either this or an attempt to maintain the status quo by main strength and awkwardness, meaning intimidation, force or manipulated rules of registration -- or, a thought appalling particularly in areas of heavy or predominant Negro population, simply give up and let 'em vote.

"Primaries

"Fifty years or so ago, South Carolina began writing laws to regulate primary elections. These laws were necessary to stop the old evils of rule-or-ruin political conventions, in which might made right and special interests found a happy hunting ground. Today it is back where it started, the laws rooted out and the convention system or its equivalent in the offing.

"Some effects of the new arrangement are grotesque and a bit disconcerting. For one thing, the groups all over the land who have been crusading against that old southern custom, the poll tax as a qualification for voting, may find themselves with victory at last in their hands, a victory, as it were, by default.

"For it is obvious that if you insist on payment of a poll tax for voting in a primary election, you are recognising the legal existence of that election, and the idea in the south's present scramble to circumvent the supreme court is to avoid any and all such recognition, expressed or implied.

"True, different from the process in other southern states, South Carolina, in one of its numerous unique political customs, for some time has not insisted upon the poll tax as to primaries. Membership in the Democratic party has been the only qualification. You have to pay a poll tax there to vote in general elections, but nobody cares particularly about that, the fun having ended and the issue having been decided in the primary.

"The legislators gulped a bit when they found that in wiping out all primary elections laws, they had perforce to repeal the law against vote fraud, in that connection! The gulped, but they swallowed it. As between the danger of boodle and "letting 'em vote" they didn't hesitate.

The Ballots

"They found too, that where they had proudly passed at the recent regular session a bill permitting service men to vote, they had to undo that enthusiastically states' rights action pronto. You see, the fresh law had provided that the secretary of state was to send ballots to the men in uniform, and this was an official tie-up, making the government a party to the primary. In the hastily revised version, the service man who would vote as between "Cotton Ed" Smith and Olin Johnson must apply to the party official for his ballot.

"The ballots themselves provided another contretemps. Another of South Carolina's unique arrangements has been distribution of ballots not by state election officials but by the party organizations. There have been traditionally as many separate ballots as there were parties in the contest, and so a South Carolinian can't split or scratch his vote.

"But manifestly you can't keep this up, because if you recognize a party ballot in a general election, you have to accept legally and officially the action of the party primary which selected the nominees. And there you are again, face to face with the supreme court decision in the Texas case which says that a primary in which the established government has any part of a hand must be opened to all citizens and taxpayers, black or white.

"This one still has them bothered. Whether state or party provides the election ballots, there's a loophole for a suit.

"And South Carolina has plenty of warning that there will be suits, by Negroes and friends of Negroes' civil rights. A Negro Citizens' Committee here has announced that it has a war chest of $3,400 to fight the issue in the courts.

"The greatest irony of all, and a thing which has many an old-line Democrat red in the face, comes out of an announcement in a local Negro newspaper, the Lighthouse and Informer, that there will be a colored Democratic party, which will put its ticket in the field to resist the "lily-white" Democrats in election and in being seated at the national convention.

"Now for generations, good southern Democrats have been poking fun at the clash of "lily whites" and "black and tans" among Republicans. Now look who's talking about whom.

Confusion

"First and last the new arrangement leads to prospect of confusion of split delegations and disputed delegations, of convention rows even when none but white factions are involved -- and, naturally, the evolution of machines to resolve the disputes in favor of the right boys.

"All these are but the high spots of the problem involved in the desperate effort to "keep 'em from voting" in South Carolina. But you must have a rough idea by this time of what the other white supremacy states will encounter if they try the same strategy. The supreme court is hard to beat."

The statement of State Senator R. M. Jeffries, carried in the Atlanta Constitution of April 22, is an interesting side note. He charged that "Cotton Ed" Smith was responsible for the racial troubles in the state, and was quoted as saying, "Anyone continually making the addresses he (Smith) makes on the floor of the senate is enough to picture South Carolina and the people of the South as an uncivilized race that is depriving human beings of human rights .... the South must stop 'Negro baiting and Negro petting'."

Both Senator Maybank and Senator Smith had opposed the Supreme Court decision.

The 46 county Democratic conventions which were held in South Carolina on May 1st emphasized white supremacy, states' rights and anti-fourth term declarations. The Richland county convention received a request from the South Carolina Negro Citizens' Committee for full participation in Democratic party affairs - which was undoubtedly ignored or refused, although the papers do not report the action taken.

At the meeting of the South Carolina State Democratic convention on May 18, the New Deal was denounced for seeking to force racial equality upon the South. The convention resolved to uphold states' rights; oppose Federal anti-poll tax legislation, anti-lynching laws or interference with racial segregation. The body voted to send an uninstructed delegation to the national convention. It refused to recognize the South Carolina Progressive Democrats, which group announced that it would contest the seating of the "all-white" delegation at Chicago. (The all-white delegation was seated by the national convention.) Senator Maybank was reported as saying that the white supremacy fight would be carried to the convention floor in Chicago.

There is no record of Negroes voting in the South Carolina Democratic Primary.

* The State convention also resolved to oppose "socialized medicine" and the FEPC.

Texas

According to a statement carried in the Atlanta Constitution on April 5, 1944, Governor Coke R. Stevenson said that Texas would ask for a rehearing of the Smith vs. Allwright case by the United States Supreme Court. (The Supreme Court rejected two requests for rehearing of the case on May 8.) Representative Nat Patton was quoted as saying, "Let the Negroes form their own primaries if they like." A press story on April 4 said that Mr. Patton had stated that he had faith in the great Democratic hordes of Texas to control their primaries and that Negroes would not vote in white primaries! Chairman George A. Butler of the Texas State Executive Committee was quoted as saying, "we'll find a way out of this." Senator W. Lee O'Daniel called the decision a "purely ~~political~~ political decision dictated by the political dynasty in Washington responsible for their appointment." He said further that the Constitution guarantees white people the right to organize into a party and hold primary elections.

The Democratic delegation in Texas split into two factions in June: a pro-Roosevelt group and an anti-Roosevelt group. The State Executive Committee refused to recognize the pro-Roosevelt group, and voted to send the anti-group to the national convention, their only instruction being to vote for the party nominees only upon the condition that "certain requirements" were met.

Both factions attended the national convention. Half of each group was recognized by the convention, whereupon the rebel anti-Roosevelt group withdrew.

The Negro Vote in Texas

Texas didnot "find a way out of this." Negroes voted in the Texas Democratic Primary for the first time. The primary was held on July 22. The State Democratic Executive Committee had left the decision as to whether or not they would receive ballots from Negroes up to local election officials. Indications were that, by and large, Negroes voted where they had paid poll taxes and registered, although the Monthly Summary of Events and Trends in Race Relations, July 1944 issue, prepared by Fisk University reported that some precinct chairmen in Texas prevented Negroes from registering.

At Silsbee in East Texas the Negro vote was reported heavier in proportion to the population than the white vote.

On September 23 the Texas Supreme Court directed Secretary of State Sidney Latham to certify the names of the pro-Roosevelt Democratic electors for printing on the general election ballot. No motion for rehearing was entertained.

The September 28 issue of the Atlanta Constitution reported that Texas voters would have a choice of two slates of Democratic electors because of two court decisions. Further information for clarification was not located.

Conclusion

All clear-thinking people have recognized the far-reaching implications of the Supreme Court decision in the Texas white primary case, Smith vs. Allbright. However, there has been wide spread confusion as to what is necessary or what will follow in order to translate the decision into action which will bring about unrestricted participation in primary elections. Three basic questions have been upper most in the minds of the advocates of freedom of the ballot: First, what is the applicability of the Texas decision to other states which have controlled primaries; secondly, what will be its effect in those states which have unregulated primaries (such as South Carolina); and thirdly, what action can be taken to expedite the matter and bring about the quickest possible observance of the Supreme Court ruling?

In an effort to find the answers to these three questions, contacts have been made with a number of lawyers and with the United States Department of Justice. The principal findings are set forth herein.

1. It is believed that the provisions set forth in the Supreme Court decision on the Texas white primary case apply to all elections where any type of state control is involved and that it will apply to the election of any public officials right down to municipal elections - school boards, etc. The decision is based upon the 15th Amendment to the Constitution.

2. It is impossible to tell just what action will be necessary in those states which have unregulated primaries. However, it is the concensus of opinion that it will be impossible for any state to completely divorce the primary from the general election. For example, how is a candidate's name to get on the general election ballot? Or, if there is no official certification of names for a general election ballot, how willthe successful candidate be certified? How is registration to be controlled? The involvements are endless, and it is believed that at some point in the election process the state must come into the picture, in which event it is likely that it would be held that the state does in fact exercise some control which affects the primary. There is no doubt but that it will be necessary for court action to be taken in those states which have unregulated primaries, and it is likely that it will be necessary for a case to be heard by the Supreme Court before a precedent can be established.

Aside from the legal aspects of the problem, it is the opinion of many people that a review of history will prove that uncontrolled primaries will not last. They open wide the gates for all kinds of fraud, and present the outlaw groups with an unobstructed field. There seems little question but that a system of unregulated primaries would prove the death of the one party system in the South - and an end which might be welcomed, but probably by means which would be painful indeed.

3. There are two procedures which can be followed in bringing about Federal court action in order to bring about observance of this law. The first is by bringing a civil suit in the District Federal Court; the second is by filing a complaint with the Department of Justice and asking the Federal Government to bring about criminal prosecution. For future action, the civil suit process is considered advisable. In such cases, any qualified Negro who is refused a ballot brings a civil action against one or more state or party official on the ground that he was denied the right to vote solely on account of race or color. Such a suit involves damages. If a civil suit is lost in the District court, it can be appealed to the Supreme Court. Such is not the case in criminal prosecutions which are brought by the Federal government.

We are informed that the Department of Justice received only thirteen complaints from Negroes in the entire South following the 1944 primary elections. If that were not delay known, there is no question but that it would be interpreted as indifference on the part of southern Negroes.

A course of action seems very clear: Throughout the South, qualified Negroes who were refused the vote should file civil suits. Care should be exercised that all legal technicalities with respect to qualification have been observed and that an orderly procedure was followed in requesting a ballot. Damages, over and above legal fees, should be kept at a low figure - sufficient to represent a large sum of money where numbers of cases are involved, but small enough to indicate that the complainant is interested in VOTING - not in making money. Expert legal advice should be had and will be difficult to obtain in certain areas. In certain places it would seem advisable for influential and liberal white citizens to ~~[illegible]~~ assist in persuading competent attorneys to handle such cases. This procedure should be followed in the next election. If Negroes are not permitted to take part in any public elections, which will undoubtedly happen in many places in the South, there should result a volume of civil suits.

The Department of Justice in Washington should be informed in writing by the complainant, or by his attorney, when such suits are filed.

Inasmuch as the FBI has been conducting an investigation in Atlanta preparatory to the bringing of a criminal action by the Federal government, it may well be that civil suits should not be brought in this District court at this time. However, it would appear that action should be taken elsewhere by the bringing of civil suits where the legal requirements can be met.

The Department of Justice has been subject to a great deal of criticism because it has not acted on any of the complaints it has received. It should be pointed out that the Department has had very meager information upon which to proceed. Of the thirteen complaints received from the South, a number had to be disregarded because certain legal requirements had not been met. In other cases it is likely that investigations involving much time and care have been necessary. There is no question but that the Department of Justice is prepared to enforce the law when bona fide complaints are filed. If we are to learn lessons from the past, it would seem that in the future it would be well to secure expert legal advice and to follow through on the establishment of cases which are clear-cut and which will furnish the type of evidence which will allow for prompt action.

Building public opinion in support of any law is important. When the next and all following cases, civil or criminal, are brought in the South, every effort to secure a sympathetic press and widespread public support should be made.

The Problem of the Races

By
T. M. N. LEWIS

Before The Knoxville, Tenn., Torch Club

There is probably no subject which interests a human being more than himself. This includes everything with which he identifies himself, and extends to the whole human species to which he belongs.

During the many thousands of years since Homo sapiens began to apply his intelligence to the utilization of the earth's resources he has improved everything, including methods for fighting bigger and bloodier wars. Therein is civilization's greatest paradox.

The intense aggression which we have witnessed since 1914 can hardly be regarded as the evolutionary force which biologists and anthropologists call the survival of the fittest. No nation today is any more capable by reason of innate superior intellect or physical energy than any other nation. The United States makes more and better automobiles because of the local demand. Germany and Japan have shown great military efficiency because of a demand set in motion by militaristic leaders while other nations were devoting their efforts to developments of products and philosophies intended to increase the comfort and security of life.

Before the start of the present war the Nazi leaders prepared agenda which included a "master race" propaganda device that has proved to be as effective a weapon as those made of German steel. The Japs have employed a somewhat similar device in that they have emphasized that angle of their religion which makes them the cream of the world's human crop, on the basis that their Emperor is supposed to be the direct descendant of the Sun Goddess. This propaganda is, of course, based upon religious traditions, whereas the Nazi race propaganda is based upon very badly distorted anthropological facts. The tremendous success which the Nazi leaders have had in hoodwinking the German people into the belief that they are a master race has made the world population more race conscious than at any previous time, and this tendency can easily become a serious stumbling block to rational thinking on many critical postwar problems.

By race anthropologists we mean a large group of human beings who resemble one another in their physical appearance. It is not quite so simple a matter as the present-day breeds of domestic animals which are the result of artificial selection and inbreeding, but the process is essentially the same. Human races have acquired their special traits because in bygone days matings took place between persons living in the same locality, and isolation tended to perpetuate the physical characteristics present in the early groups. Scientists are not in complete agreement as to the extent of the influence of environment upon the development of physical characteristics, but that it has played some part has come to be accepted.

A nation, on the other hand, is a quite different thing from a race. Nations are political and social units which have come into being as the result of historical events. It is incorrect, therefore, to speak of a German race because the Germans who differ from one another in appearance, are composed of different racial stocks. The Germans are a nation. One also hears of the Jewish race; but the Jews are a religious sect and include people of a number of racial stocks.

When mention is made of the yellow race, most people think immediately of people having a yellow skin color. The term is very misleading, because those who employ the term "yellow race" have in mind one of the three grand divisions of the human family—the Mongoloid division—and this division includes a range of color varying from a pale cream to a rich

Java brown. The physical characteristics which really distinguish the Mongoloid peoples from those of the other two divisions, the white and black, are broad cheek bones, broad heads, straight black hair, little beard, and slanting eyes.

But, we must call attention to the fact that these characteristics are not invariably present. So, when we speak of the yellow race or division, we are really speaking of something which is rather indefinite. There are other people in the world who possess some of the same physical traits as the Mongoloids. For example, a broad-headed strain occurs in nearly all of the European populations. Most of the Indian tribes present in North America when the white man arrived were good Mongoloid types—broad heads, broad cheek bones, straight black hair, brown skin and little beard. But, they lacked the slanting eyes to a large extent. So we repeat, it is impossible to set up a standard classification into which the so-called Mongoloid or yellow peoples will fall. All humans are essentially alike beneath the skin, and outwardly the differences are extremely few.

From the standpoints of potential mental and physical ability, neither the white nor the yellow is superior to the other. Give the Chinese Mongoloids more and better food to supply greater physical and mental energy; give them the advantages of schools, introduce an industrial economy, and they will eventually be able to compete with the Euro-American civilization on an equal basis.

Now, let us examine the white or Caucasoid division. This division was first known as Caucasian because the people of the Caucasus region at one time were thought to be typical of that division. The geographical distribution of the Caucasoid division is world-wide. In color, the people range all the way from blonde to brunet, with skin color varying from white to as dark as some Negroes; the skull ranges from narrow to broad; cheek bones are generally narrow but may be broad; they are generally heavily bearded. Climate, environment and other natural forces have through thousands of years encouraged differences in this Caucasoid group. Certain peoples of northern Europe who have lived for centuries under less intense sunlight, tend toward tall, raw-boned statures and blonde complexions. They are long-headed, narrow-faced, and their noses are long and narrow. In attempting to classify human populations, anthropologists call them the Nordic race.

In Central Europe we find another Caucasoid group known as the Alpine race. They are broad-headed, of short, stocky stature, and brunet coloring. In southern Europe and around the Mediterranean Sea and to the eastward, including India, is the region of the predominance of another Caucasoid subdivision known as the Mediterranean race—a slender brunet people with narrow heads, narrow noses and wavy hair. But these three races, Nordic, Alpine and Mediterranean, have become mixed and there is great variability in the physical features of white individuals, since the mixing process has been operative for thousands of years.

Now, is the Caucasoid group any more capable from a mental and physical standpoint than the Mongoloid group? Not if we apply the proper yardstick. The Caucasoid civilizations of Egypt, Mesopotamia and India, and the Mongoloid civilization of China received their beginnings from the same sources. They built upon the same bases, and although they diverged in their separate developments, all represented high achievements. In many ways, the ancient civilization of China has endured with more continuity than the others. While Western European civilization found its leadership under successive peoples—after the Egyptians succumbed to the Roman conquest, and after the Romans fell before the barbarians of northern Europe—there is one outstanding feature of Western Europe civilization, namely, it has continually broadened the base on which it rests; that is to say, a greater proportion of the population of Western civilization participates in its achievements. That is the essential spirit of democracy and the source of its greatest strength, regardless of temporary setbacks.

Next, we have the third great division of Homo sapiens that we call the black or Negroid division. It takes in a variety of colors from high yellow to blue black. Other biological traits are narrow heads, kinky black hair, thick protruding lips, receding chin, narrow hips, broad nose and sparse beard. Pigmentation, of course, is the result of evolutionary development in a branch of mankind which has lived for thousands of years in a tropical climate. The heavy lips also appear to be the result of a gradual biological mutation, since the thin membrane of the lips when moist, aids in cooling the blood. The broad nose admits more oxygen to the lungs in a rarefied tropical atmosphere. Outside of those few outward differences the black division is entirely similar to the other two divisions.

The study of fossil man indicates that all three of these grand divisions of mankind probably came from a common ancestor. If we examine the earlier forms of man which resemble the anthropoid apes almost as much as they do modern man, we can discover no grounds for the conclusion that any one of the present divisions of mankind is any closer in appearance to the earliest ape-like man than any other division. The Negroid peoples have thick lips —the ape has thin lips like the Caucasoid. The Negroids and Mongoloids have little beard or body hair—apes have plenty, and so do the Caucasoids. The Negroids have kinky hair—the apes, Caucasoids, and the Mongoloids have straight hair, or occasionally curly or wavy among the Caucasoids.

Potentially, the Negroid peoples are capable of contributing as much toward human progress as either of the other two divisions. Science has been unable to demonstrate any innate inferiority or superiority between the three major divisions of human kind or between the subdivisions. The greater progress which the white division has made in arts and sciences must be attributed to historical accident. Such factors as race pride and prejudice, competition, and population minorities are responsible for the restricted role which the Negroid peoples have played in the pageant of civilization.

Now, what is it that gives rise to these occasional proclamations about racial superiority and inferiority? Sometimes proclaimed differences are prompted by political interests. Under the Nazi regime, scientific anthropological facts have not been taught in the schools, so it was a simple matter for Dr. Goebbels to hoodwink most of the German people into the belief that they stood out from the rest of the world as a master race. The official Nazi dogmas regarding race have served as tools of power politics in justifying interference with other countries.

The present racial distribution of mankind has come about as a result of history and can only be understood by delving into the past. An anthropological map of the world gives a fair impression of the way in which peoples are related, judging solely from evidence of physical appearances. On such a map we see that nearly all the differences between neighboring peoples are small, and at the same time a fairly gradual overlapping can be seen, passing from any point on the map to any other. In other words, physical relationships or similarities show continuous gradation throughout, with no abrupt divisions anywhere.

Now it is clear that an arrangement of this kind is entirely different from the arrangement of peoples by either language or political units. There would be no difficulty in finding examples of peoples who speak the same language, and at the same time represent several distinct races. The most salient example is the United States whose population is composed of people descended from inhabitants of all parts of Europe and other continents. Perhaps we do not consider our social and political systems perfect, but few, if any of us, would attribute the imperfections to the sources of our population. Thus, it is apparent the race, language and political units represent different entities which should not be confused.

Conflicts take place between peoples who are in contact with each other. Neighboring nations have a tendency to go to war oftener than those separted by oceans because their interests clash oftener, notwithstanding the fact that racially they may be blood brothers, as the Germans and French, and the Chinese and the Japanese.

National pride, a praiseworthy sentiment when controlled by judgment, may, on occasion, become a destructive force when exaggerated. When it denies the essential brotherhood of all mankind and puts the special interests of a group in one generation above the considerations of peace and security of future generations of the world it should be viewed with suspicion. Distorted racial theories have been made the tool of national pride, and as we look back on history we realize how easy it is to send armies into the field for false ideals.

Recent events have made it evident that there can be no security unless continual precautions are taken to safeguard peace. The power of warlike propaganda has been fiercely demonstrated. To avoid such contingencies in the future, spreading the knowledge of the simpler anthropological truths might act as an antidote to attempts on the part of unscrupulous war lords to manipulate man's ever ready prejudices. There is no stronger defense available to us than education. The broad base upon which the democracy of Western civilization is built is the rights of the individual. But individuals cannot properly exercise these rights without education. Without a liberal education, they cannot judge the true from the false and are susceptible to unscrupulous leadership and pernicious propaganda. An international organization and police force must be backed by intelligent understanding in the nations.

Finally let me quote a statement made by Dr. E. G. Conklin of Princeton: "To the naturalist the differences between human races, subraces, families, and individuals are small indeed as compared with their manifold resemblances. Biology and the Bible agree that 'God hath made of one blood all nations of men'. Our common traits and origin and fate, our common hopes and fears, joys and sorrows would call forth our common sympathy with all mankind, if it were not for the lessons of hate which have been cultivated and instilled by selfish and unscruplous persons and social groups. These racial antagonisms are not the results of inexorable nature nor of inherited instincts, but of deliberate education and cultivation."

WHO IS A NEGRO?

By HERBERT ASBURY

(Condensed from Collier's Magazine)

An investigator accosted twenty Negroes, about equally divided among darkskins, brownskins and lightskins, at 126th Street and Seventh Avenue, in New York's Harlem. To each he put two questions:

1. Would you pass as a white man if you could?
2. Do you know of any Negroes who are passing or have passed as white?

Two of the twenty suggested that the investigator mind his own business. They were immediately dismissed as uncooperative. Of the remaining eighteen, all but two knew of Negroes who were living, or had lived, as whites. Eleven said that they would pass if they could. Significantly, however, each emphasized that it would not be because he considered the white man a superior being, but because of the obvious social and economic advantages to be gained. One, a very light-skinned man who resembled a South European more than a Negro, said:

"I pass, myself. Every day from nine to five I'm a white man. I've got a good job downtown; I do the work well, and I've had two raises. But I'd never have been hired if I had said I had Negro blood. When I applied, I gave my race as white and my nationality as Spanish, and neither statement has ever been questioned. I keep a little room in a white part of town, to bolster my story if necessary, but I seldom go there."

Authorities now generally agree that between 15,000 and 30,000 persons classed as Negroes go over to the white side every year, although a few investigators have placed the annual migration as high as 200,000. And as Walter White, secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, once said, "Large as is the number who cross the line, it is but a small percentage of those who might follow such an example but who do not."

These estimates are far from being mere guesswork. They are based on careful studies by experts of census reports, immigration records, vital statistics and information from other sources. These studies show very conclusively that approximately 20,000 Negroes disappear every year, and that their absence from the black population cannot be accounted otherwise than by passing.

Two of America's foremost social scientists, Dr. Charles S. Johnson of Fisk University and the late Dr. Edward B. Reuter of the University of Iowa and Fisk University, have made extensive examinations of the census records and other data relating to mulattoes. They found an abnormally low ratio of mulatto men to mulatto women especially in the age groups 15-19 and 20-24. For example, the census of 1910 showed an excess of more than 85,000 mulatto females in the age group 20-44, a ratio of 79.9 males to each 100 females. No such careful studies have been made of later censuses, but most sociologists believe that they will show a corresponding excess of females.

Fewer Women Cross the Line

Since there are no biological or other reasons, both Dr. Johnson and Dr. Reuter have attributed the excess of mulatto females to the fact that large numbers of mulattto men, particularly in the age group 20-44, cross the line, or at least have reported themselves to the census takers as white. Their theory is strengthened by the fact that the low ratio of mulatto men to mulatto women is particularly noticeable in the large cities of the North, where passing is easiest.

Another Middle Western investigator, after an extensive survey of census and other records, concluded that in the two decades from 1890 to 1910 the Negro race in this country lost approximately 600,000 persons, an average of about 30,000 a year. Since there has been scarcely any Negro emigration from the United States, he concluded that these 600,000 persons had gone over to the white side. In all investigations in which census reports are used, allowances have been made for the obvious fact that the authenticity of the information depends largely upon the judgment and care exercised by the census enumerator, especially in cases involving the definition of mulatto. For census purposes, a mulatto is a person having one half or less of Negro blood.

Nearly every survey has reported that few Negro families have been found which didn't know of at least one instance of passing. Some families knew of dozens. And contrary to general belief, Negroes who attempt to pass are seldom exposed by other Negroes. When they are, it is usually because of personal enmity that has followed them across the line; or because having turned white, they try to prove their orthodoxy by turning violently anti-Negro. Walter White says he "could name some men in American public life of this type."

There are many degrees of passing, of which the most important are permanent passing and what the sociologists call segmental passing. In both, the cause is generally economic, the desire to hold jobs or have careers which are not open to Negroes. Sometimes, however, a person with colored blood will cross the line because of a white marriage or love affair.

But as a rule the opposite is true. Most Negro-white marriages are between Negro men and white women, and usually the wife follows the husband into the colored community. In many instances she claims to be a light-skinned Negro, hoping thereby to overcome the aversion with which the majority of Negroes appear to regard interracial marriage. This is by far the easiest of all forms of passing, even if the woman happens to be a golden blonde. Few whites, or Negroes either, for that matter, can imagine her saying she is a Negro if she isn't.

The light-skinned Negro who passes permanently cuts himself off completely from the colored world; he usually moves to another part of the country where he is unknown and begins an entirely new life. Sometimes he prepares for the adventure by learning Spanish, French, Italian or Portuguese, or by cultivating an accent. He thus becomes a foreigner, and as everyone knows, a foreigner is apt to be any shade of color.

Biographies with Pages Missing

Some Negro authorities say that many Negroes who have passed return to the colored race after varying periods of months or years. In support of this statement they point to the fact that in the lives of a number of prominent Negroes there are gaps which biographers have been unable to fill. Some, of course, do return because they were not as successful as they had hoped to be, because the strain of living white was too great, because they simply didn't like white people en masse, or for other reasons. But no estimate can be made of the number who "come home," as the Negroes say. Probably it is very small.

In segmental passing, the white Negro leads two distinct lives, occupationally he is white, but in his social and family life he is a Negro. It is believed that a great majority of those who cross the line permanently are men; as a rule the economic drive is stronger in men than in women, and it is easier for a man to break with his family and friends. But about as many men as women appear to practice segmental passing.

* * * *

Segmental passing is beset with difficulties, for any person who tries to lead such a double life is necessarily under a considerable strain. In the first place, there is constant danger of recognition and possible exposure, for Negroes, especially light-skinned Negroes, do shop in the white stores and visit white offices. Too, friendships are formed with white fellow workers, and it becomes difficult to avoid social contacts after working hours.

* * * *

Thousands of light-skinned Negroes pass occasionally for various reasons. In the larger cities they visit the white restaurants, night clubs, beauty parlors and theaters. partly for the thrill of putting something over on the white folks, but mostly because they get better food, better service and better entertainment. In Chicago there is a group of half a dozen white Negroes, men and women, who dine regularly at the city's snootiest eating place. They spend freely and tip liberally, and always get the best tables.

* * * *

The same thing happens every night in some of New York's painfully swank places.

Many of the Negro leaders in the North are light-skinned, and on trips to the South they frequently pass as white in order to get Pullman tickets and good hotel accommodations. One prominent Negro says that on every Southern train there are always several Negroes riding comfortably in Pullmans and passing as white. In one Southern city recently, the ten best rooms in the town's leading hotel were occupied by white Negroes. Light-skinned Negroes often buy theater tickets for their darker friends who would find that the best seats had been sold if they went to the box office themselves.

In St. Louis and other cities some of the theaters employ spotters who are supposed to prevent this practice, for there is a widespread belief that one Negro can always identify another. Actually this is not true. Moreover, the legends of the blue shadow at the base of the nails, and the difference in the formation of legs and feet, are nonsense. It is true, of course, that some people are more expert than others in detecting racial characteristics, but if a person has one sixteenth or less Negro blood it is almost impossible, even with the most exact methods of anthropometry, to determine his ancestry.

Jim Crow Law in Reverse

Many white Negroes are compelled to pass in the South, at least temporarily, through the operations of the Jim Crow laws. It is not at all uncommon for a light-skinned Negro to be ordered out of the Jim Crow section of a railroad coach, bus or trolley car, and compelled to sit with the whites. A few years ago two friends, both from the North, met in a Southern city. One was a white man, the other a very light-skinned Negro. It was impossible for them to lunch or dine together without danger of embarrassment, so they went to the baseball game. The white man assumed that he would be permitted to sit with his friend in the Jim Crow stands, but he was not. So he went into the white section, and a few minutes later his Negro friend joined him.

"I was thrown out," said the Ngro. "After you'd gone, a cop came over and asked if I was a Negro, and when I said I was he said he didn't believe it. Then he called me a damned nigger-lover and told me to get over here where I belonged."

Two years later the white man had a letter from the Negro, who said he had finally gone over to the other side, and had started a business in a Middle Western city where he was unknown. He had married a white girl, and they were expecting a baby. He was greatly worried that the child might be black.

Actually, he had no cause whatever for anxiety, for modern genetics has effectually dispelled the black-baby bugaboo. Everyone has heard the story of the supposedly white couple which suddenly produced a coal-black infant; much heart-rendering fiction has been written around such a situation. This subject has been thoroughly investigated by many eminent American geneticists and anthropologists, among them Amram Scheinfeld, a well-known authority on heredity; Dr. Ernest A. Hooton, professor of Anthropology at Harvard University; and Dr. Edward M. East, also of Harvard, who, until his death in 1938, was one of the world's leading geneticists.

These scientists, and many other, agree that the tale of the white couple and the black baby has a fatal flaw; It could not possibly happen. If such a child should appear, there are three explanations: (1) a miracle; (2) as Dr. East has suggested, "a fracture of the Seventh Commandment", (3) both parents were really Negroes. Here is what, barring divine revocation of genetic laws, will result from unions of whites, Negroes and mixed-bloods:

1. If one of the partners to such a union is pure white, it is impossible for the child to be darker than the darker of its parents. The chances are very great that it will be lighter.

2. If both parents have Negro blood, whether they know it or not, there may be some accentuation of Negro characteristics in the child. But this is not likely, and in any case will be slight. If the parents have been able to pass for white, the child can probably do so too.

3. If both parents are mulattoes, quadroons or octoroons—the child may be darker than either. But in all likelihood it will not be black. Dr. Hooton has stated his opinion that "Negroid features seem to be attenuated, rather than intensified, by successive generations of inbreeding of mixed types . . . White features seem to gain upon Negroid features."

The problem of predicting the exact color shade or racial characterisics of any given child, whether born to whites or blacks, is greatly complicated by the fact that, as Dr. Hooton has pointed out, "no one can know his exact racial composition, no matter how he may search his pedigree."

* * * *

These processes of intermixture can clearly be seen at work in the United States. If the estimates of the number of Negroes who pass annually are even approximately correct, they mean that more than 2,000,000 persons with colored blood have crossed the line since the end of the Civil War. But these figures tell only a part of the story. A large majority of the Negroes who pass, marry white and raise white families, the members of which in turn seek white mates. Thus a constantly widening stream of colored blood is introduced into the white population. A great deal has also come into the white stream through Negro-white intermarriage, which is now legal in eighteen states, and even more through illicit Negro-white matings which have resulted in children.

Too Strict A Definition

It is now estimated that there are at least between 5,000,000 and 8,000,000 persons in the United States, supposed to be white, who actually possess Negro blood. In reality, this is a very conservative estimate.

* * * *

Virtually every scholar who has studied the problem of racial relations has speculated upon what the mingling of races in the United States will mean in the future. Many believe that the Negro eventually will be absorbed, assuming that there is no further Negro immigration, and thus assist in the creation of a new American race which will be somewhat darker than the present white population. Dr. Edward M. East has predicted that the pure Negro will gradually die out.

* * * *

Supporters of the theory of utimate absorption point out that from an anthropological point of view, and in the social sense as well, the Negro has already been absorbed in Mexico, and that the process is well under way in Brazil and other countries. And it is a historical fact that during the 17th century large numbers of Negroes were absorbed by the white population of England, and that no trace of them remains. There seems to be ample evidence that some two thirds of the Negroes in the United States have been modified by white blood. Some anthropologists contend that less than ten per cent of American Negroes have no white blood.

Another school of anthropological thought believes that absorption may be delayed, or perhaps even prevented, by the operation of a caste system that has arisen among the Negroes of the United States.

Socially, and to some extent economically, the colored race in this country is divided into three classes—the darkskins, the brownskins, and the lightskins, with the lightskins at the top of the ladder. The tendency is to marry from the bottom up; that is the darkskin seeks a brownskin mate, the brownskin tries to marry into the lightskin caste, and the ideal marriage partner of the lightskin is a person lighter than himself. The darkskin is thus compelled to marry with his own caste oftener than any of the other groups. This may perpetuate a small core of more or less pure Negroes, which will remain to fulfill the curse of Noah.

"RESTLESS INDIA"

A second recent book in India, "Restless India", by Lawrence K. Rosinger is a short account of the forces and leaders at work in India today. More general than the Gandhi biography it was one of the Headlines series issued by the Foreign Policy Association as a service to its members. It was offered to the general public later because of its significance.

"Restless India" should be the reading choice of anyone anxious to get a general view of what is happening in India today. Although not at all detailed it is accurate and to the point and it was published at a time when India is in the world spotlight.

"DEEP RIVER"

"Deep River" is an interpretation of Negro spirituals by Howard Thurman. An introductory chapter has been added to four addresses delivered at the Church for the Fellowship of all People in San Francisco where Dr. Thurman was co-pastor for two years.

Spirituals included here are "The Blind Man", "Heaven, Heaven", "A Balm In Gilead", and "Deep River". Dr. Thurman makes searching analyses of these songs and points to their significance in the life of the slaves and up to the present.

In discussing the spiritual "Heaven, Heaven" the author points out that: "It is one of the great spiritual problems of Christianity in America that it has tolerated such injustices as between Negroes and Caucasians, for instance, that in this area of human relations its moral imperative has been deeply weakened."

This brief book has much to recommend it and throws additional light on a subject which has been much discussed.

Why I Remain A Negro

WALTER WHITE

THE SCENE was a New York duplex apartment. The people were liberals, economically as well as intellectually well off. They were discussing the race question. I had been invited to speak. One of the women, listening, seemed agitated by something I had said. She scribbled on a piece of paper and handed it to another woman, a woman whose skin was reddish brown, a woman who was probably colored. "Is Mr. White white or colored?" the message inquired. The other scribbled an answer and passed it back. "I am Mrs. White," the reply said. The white woman, reading it, became excited. Hastily she penciled a comment: "What a wonderful talk! This is the first time I've had the opportunity to hear him."

I am a Negro. My skin is white, my eyes are blue, my hair is blond. The traits of my race are nowhere visible upon me. Not long ago I stood one morning on a subway platform in Harlem. As the train came in I stepped back for safety. My heel came down upon the toe of the man behind me. I turned to apologize to him. He was a Negro, and his face as he stared at me was hard and full of the piled-up bitterness of a thousand lynchings and a million nights in shacks and tenements and "nigger towns." "Why don't you look where you're going?" he said sullenly. "You white folks are always trampling on colored people." Just then one of my friends came up and asked how the fight had gone in Washington—there was a filibuster against legislation for a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission. The Negro on whose toes I had stepped listened, then spoke to me penitently.

"Are you Walter White of the NAACP? I'm sorry I spoke to you that way. I thought you were white."

I am not white. There is nothing within my mind and heart which tempts me to think I am. Yet I realize acutely that the only characteristic which matters to either the white or the colored race—the appearance of whiteness—is mine. White is the rejection of all color; black is the absorption of every shade. There is magic in a white skin; there is tragedy, loneliness, exile, in a black skin. Why then do I insist that I am a Negro, when nothing compels me to do so but myself?

For more than thirty years Walter White has devoted his life to the fight for Negro rights. During the wave of violence that followed the first World War his on-the-spot investigations of lynchings, frequently at great personal risk, focussed the attention of America on these hideous crimes. His book, "Rope and Faggot," published in 1929, is still the most revealing and authoritative document on lynching. Through the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which he has served as Executive Secretary since 1931, he has worked unceasingly to convince Congress and the American people that Negro Americans must be granted the first class citizenship guaranteed them by the Constitution.

WHY did the white woman who listened to me speaking become flustered when the woman she chose for her question turned out to be my wife? What made her confused, bewildered, and incapable of direct and efficient communication? It was the enigma of a black man occupying a white body, the presentation in fact of a theory to which millions give lip service, never really believing it is so—that all men are brothers under the skin.

The lady's agitation was natural. Suppose the skin of every Negro in America were suddenly to turn white. What would happen to all the notions about Negroes, the idols on which are built race prejudice and race hatred? What would become of their presumed shiftlessness, their cowardice, their dishonesty, their stupidity, their body odor? Would they not merge with the shiftlessness, the cowardice, the dishonesty, the stupidity, and the body odor of the whites? Would they not then be subject to individual judgment in matters of abilities, energies, honesty, cleanliness, as are whites? How else could they be judged?

MANY Negroes are judged as whites. Every year approximately 12,000 white-skinned Negroes disappear—people whose absence cannot be explained by death or emigration. Nearly every one of the 14 million discernible Negroes in the United States knows at least one member of his race who is "passing"—the magic word which means that some Negroes can get by as whites, men and women who have decided that they will be happier and more successful if they flee from the proscription and humiliation which the American color line imposes on them. Often these emigrants achieve success in business, the professions, the arts and sciences. Many of them have married white people, lived happily with them, and produced families. Sometimes they tell their husbands or wives of their Negro blood, sometimes not. Who are they? Mostly people of no great importance, but some of them prominent figures, including a few members of Congress, certain writers, and several organizers of movements to "keep the Negroes and other minorities in their places." Some of the most vehement public haters of Negroes are themselves secretly Negroes.

They do not present openly the paradox of the color line. It is I, with my insistence, day after day, year in and year out, that I am a Negro, who provoke the reactions to which now I am accustomed: the sudden intake of breath, the bewildered expression of the face, the confusion of the eyes, the muddled fragmentary remarks—"But you do not look . . . I mean I would never have known . . . of course if you didn't want to admit . . ." Sometimes the eyes blink rapidly and the tongue, out of control, says, "Are you sure?"

I have tried to imagine what it is like to have me presented to a white person as a Negro, by supposing a Negro were suddenly to say to me, "I am white." But the reversal does not work, for whites can see no reason for a white man ever wanting to be black; there is only reason for a black man wanting to be white. That is the way whites think; that is the way their values are set up. It is the startling removal of the blackness which upsets people. Looking at me without knowing who I am, they disassociate me from all the characteristics of the Negro. Informed that I am a Negro they find it imposible suddenly to endow me with the skin, the odor, the dialect, the shuffle, the imbecile good nature. Instantly they are aware that these things are not part of me. Then they grope for the positive values of the race—genius at song, easy laughter, great strength, humility, manners. Alexander Percy said that the most polite people in the world are the American Negroes.

This shift to the virtues of the Negro is apt to be dangerous for me. Once a Southern lady, discovering my identity, entered into a long conversation with me, and suggested that I come to her home where we might enjoy a more intimate chat on race matters without being disturbed. She suggested a time. I said I would surely come, and that I would bring my wife, who would be equally interested in the discussion. The lady's attitude changed immediately. She did not break the date then, but later she telephoned and said that she would be unable to see us. What precisely she perceived in me of interest I do not know, but probably it was the sudden transformation of the faithful "darky" into a man covered with magic white skin which titillated her. Southern women have generally been more friendly toward the Negroes than Southern men—who are largely responsible for the chiaroscuro effects in the race—and she may have felt that in some way I represented her faith and efforts, rather than the infidelity of her ancestors. Or she may have thought, "Are you sure?"

I am sure. There can never be a doubt. I have seen Negroes, male and female, killed by mobs in the streets of Atlanta. I stood with my father, who was a mail carrier, and watched them die. The next night they came to the Negro section, perhaps five thousand of them. Our house was just outside the section, above Houston Street. It was a [illegible] in which my father and [illegible] a family of seven children. [illegible] resented our prosperity; so [illegible] did the Negroes. The Negroes resented our white skin, and the ethical standards which my parents maintained themselves and required of their children.

IN THE darkened house that night there were my mother and father, four of my sisters and myself. Never before had there been guns in our house, but that night, at the insistence of friends, we were armed. My father was a deeply religious man, opposed to physical violence. As we watched the mob go by, their faces weird in the light of the torches they carried—faces made grotesque and ugly by the hate which was twisting and distorting them—my father said, "Don't shoot until the first man puts his foot on the lawn; and then don't miss."

I heard a voice cry out, a voice which I knew belonged to the son of our neighborhood grocer: "Let's burn the house of the nigger mail carrier! It's too nice a house for a nigger to live in!"

In the flickering light the mob swayed, paused, and began to flow toward us. In that instant there opened up within me a great awareness; I knew then who I was. I was colored, a human being with an invisible pigmentation which marked me a person to be hunted, hanged, abused, discriminated against, kept in poverty and ignorance, in order that those whose skin was white would have readily at hand a proof of their superiority, a proof patent and inclusive, accessible to the moron and the idiot as well as to the wise man and the genius. No matter how low a white man fell, he could always be certain that he was superior to two-thirds of the world's population, for those two-thirds were not white.

It made no difference how intelligent or talented I and my millions of brothers were, or how virtuously we lived. A curse like that of Judas was upon us, a mark of degradation fashioned with heavenly authority. There were white men who said Negroes had no souls, and who proved it by the Bible. Some of these now were approaching us, intent upon burning our house. My father had told us to kill them.

It was a violence which could not be avoided. The white men insisted upon it. War was with them a business; war and pillage, conquest and exploitation, colonization and Christianization. Later, when I was older, I thought about this and I began to see why. Theirs was a world of contrasts in values: superior and inferior, profit and loss, cooperative and non-cooperative, civilized and aboriginal, white and black. If you were on the wrong end of the comparison, if you were inferior, if you were non-cooperative, if you were aboriginal, if you were black, then you were marked for excision, expulsion, or extinction. I was a Negro; I was therefore that part of history which opposed the good ,the just, and the enlightened. I was a Persian, falling before the hordes of Alexander. I was a Carthaginian, extinguished by the legions of Rome. I was a Frenchman at Waterloo, an Anglo-Saxon at Hastings, a Confederate at Vicksburg, a Pole at Warsaw. I was the defeated, wherever and whenever there was a defeat.

Yet as a boy there in the darkness amid the tightening fright, I knew the inexplicable thing—that my skin was as white as the skin of those who were coming at me.

The mob moved toward the lawn. I tried to aim my gun, wondering what it would feel like to kill a man. Suddenly there was a volley of shots. The mob hesitated, stopped. Some friends of my father's had barricaded themselves in a two-story brick building just below our house. It was they who had fired. Some of the mobsmen, still bloodthirsty, shouted, "Let's go get the nigger." Others, afraid now for their safety, held back. Our friends, noting the hesitation, fired another volley. The mob broke and retreated up Houston Street.

IN THE quiet that followed I put my gun aside and tried to relax. But a tension different from anything I had ever known possessed me. I was gripped by the knowledge of my identity, and in the depths of my soul I was vaguely aware that I was glad of it. I was sick with loathing for the hatred which had flared before me that night and come so close to making me a killer; but I was glad I was not one of those who hated; I was glad I was not one of those made sick and murderous by pride. I was glad I was not one of those whose story is in the history of the world, a record of bloodshed, rapine, and pillage. I was glad my mind and spirit were part of the races that had not fully awakened, and who therefore had still before them the opportunity to write a record of virtue as a memorandum to Armageddon.

It was all just a feeling then, inarticulate and melancholy, yet reassuring in the way that death and sleep are reassuring. Years later, when my father lay in a dingy, cockroach-infested Jim Crow ward in an Atlanta hospital, he put it into words for me and my brother.

"Human kindness, decency, love, whatever you wish to call it," he said, "is the only real thing in the world. It is a dynamic, not a passive, emotion. It's up to you two, and others like you, to use your education and talents in an effort to make love as positive an emotion in the world as are prejudice and hate. That's the only way the world can save itself. Don't forget that. No matter what happens, you must love, not hate." Then he died. He had been struck by an automobile driven by a reckless driver—one of the hospital doctors.

I have remembered that. I have remembered that when, sitting in the gallery of the House or the Senate, I have heard members of our Congress rise and spill diatribe and vilification on the Negroes. I have remembered it when the Negroes were condemned as utter failures in soldiering. I remembered it when, in the Pacific, where I went as a war correspondent, a white officer from the South told me that the 93rd Division, a Negro unit, had been given an easy beachhead to take at Bougainville, and had broken and run under fire. I collected the facts and presented them to him. Bougainville was invaded in November 1943. The 93rd was ordered there in April 1944. The first night it bivouacked on the beach, and motion pictures were shown.

I remembered it when I talked with my nephew for the last time, as he lay in a bitterly cold, rain-drenched tent on the edge of the Capodichina airfield near Naples. He was a Georgia boy, the youngest of four children. His father, like mine, was a mail carrier. He, like me, could have passed for a white man. By sacrifice and labor his parents provided him with a college education. He won a master's degree in economics, and the next day enlisted in the Army Air Corps as a Negro. He went to the segregated field at Tuskegee, Alabama.

He hated war, he loathed killing. But he believed that Hitler and Mussolini represented the kind of hate he had seen exhibited in Georgia by the Ku Klux Klan and the degenerate political demagogues. He believed that the war would bring all of that hate to an end. He was a fighter pilot. He fought well. Over the Anzio beachhead he was shot down, bailing out and escaping with his right leg broken in two places. He was offered an opportunity to return home but he refused it. "I'll stick it out until the war is finished or I am," he told a friend. Later, returning from a bomber escort mission to Germany, his plane lost altitude over Hungary, was fired upon by anti-aircraft batteries, and was seen striking a tree and bursting into flames. That was the end of one of the men Senator Eastland of Mississippi described as "utter and dismal failures in combat in Europe."

It would be easy to grow bitter over such things, but in remembering my nephew and our last conversation, in which he asked me whether the war would really bring an end to prejudice and race hatred, I remember also the Negro corporal of an engineers unit, who said to me, "This is the only work they would give me, but I don't mind. We learn a trade; we do constructive work. The combat soldiers are taught how to kill. It will bother them. It will stick with them. It will have no effect on us. We will not have to unlearn it."

I could be sophisticated about the advantages of being a Negro. I am amused, for instance, at the fact that because it is considered remarkable that a Negro can write a book at all, a passing fair volume by one of my brothers is frequently hailed as a masterpiece. Everyone with the slightest sense is aware that genius has no color line. Everyone knows also that people generally choose friends and companions for their taste, manners, intelligence, and personality. Yet it does not occur to him that Negroes do likewise. Therefore he often mourns that we colored people cannot freely associate with whites, when it should be obvious that if we did have this privilege we would like no more of them for friends than he does. It is beyond the imagination of a white man to think that to a Negro he is dull.

NEGRO athletes and singers do not benefit from their color as do Negro scientists and intellectuals, for whereas the latter are considered wonderful if they attain mediocrity, the former are expected to surpass anything the whites can do. In the main, however, I have found it advantageous to be a Negro. My sense of humor is never without material, and I am easily able to judge the worth of white people by their reaction when they discover that I am not white. I am also able to add to my knowledge by pondering the fact that the people who turn away from me when they are told my identity are the most superior of all the peoples, for they look down upon those who are not afraid to be seen with me, and call them "nigger lovers."

Sometimes it is more enlightening not to insist that I am a Negro. Once on a subway going to Harlem I fell into conversation with a man who spoke with a marked German accent. "This used to be a pleasant line to ride on," he said. "But now there are too many Negroes. They have a distinctive smell." He wrinkled his nose.

"Suppose you and I had to do the same kind of work they do on the docks or over hot kitchen stoves," I said. "That is the kind of work Negroes are forced to do because they are Negroes. Would we be odorless—particularly if we lived in antiquated, crowded, segregated tenements, which we were forced to inhabit also because we were Negroes? Would we reek of lilies of the valley?"

He looked at me with amazement. "But Negroes do smell," he insisted.

I was tempted to paraphrase Dr. Samuel Johnson and tell him that "It is you who smell; they stink." But instead I quoted from the late James Weldon Johnson, who said, "Do you imagine the manufacture of deodorants is exclusively for a Negro market? I notice that the advertisements invariably feature a young and beautiful girl—a white girl."

The man shook his head, "I've lived in this country for thirty years," he said. "You're the first white man I've ever heard talk like that."

Looking at him I recalled an incident in Brooklyn during the early part of the war. A plant was manufacturing the famous and secret Norden bombsight. The plant refused to hire Negroes, but did hire persons of German descent. Most of these were loyal Americans, but a few were arrested by the F.B.I. for stealing the secret of the bombsight, and convicted. But it was too late. Germany got the information and passed it on to Japan. One of the officials of the company told a friend that, "I'd close down the plant rather than hire niggers."

Negro soldiers made a good record in this recent war. They have in previous ones. Yet I recall with uneasiness the grimness on a Negro soldier's face when he told me, one day in the Pacific, "Our fight for freedom will start the day we arrive in San Francisco."

It has indeed, and there are times when I have felt with a sweep of fear that the patience of the colored man is close to its end. I remember the clamoring stillness and the blood heat of a day in Georgia. A lynching was prevented when a band of colored women walked with cans of kerosene toward the village store, a terrible calm upon their faces, an awful quiet in their silent stride. I remember how I felt when I stood beside my father and knew that the whites would not let me live, that I must kill them first and then be killed.

Yet I know, I know, I know that there is no reason for this killing, this hatred, this demarcation. There is no difference between them. Black is white and white is black. When one shoots the other he kills his reflection. Only hate, the negative force, can separate them; only love, the positive force, can bind them together.

I am one of the two in the color of my skin; I am the other in my spirit and my heart. It is only a love of both which binds the two together in me, and it is only love for each other which will join them in the common aims of civilization that lie before us. I love one for the sins she has committed and the fight she has made to conquer them—and conquer them, in great degree, she has. I love the other for her patience and her sorrows, for the soft sound of her singing, and for the great dawn which is coming upon her, in which her vigor and her faith will serve the world.

Some of the members of the black race are passing over to the white race. It may be that I am one of these; that I am a member of a vanguard that in the millennium to come will transmute the great potentialities of the colored races into the civilizations which are to follow. I pray that those civilizations will be better and more virtuous than ours, and that the bridge which I and others are building will grow strong and be a highway for good.

I have a feeling that life is a rushing force, certain of its course and destination. Our bodies are its medium, and it shapes them to its use. As the social pattern of the Negro evolves, will his color change? Is it changing now? We do not know, and I, for one, am sure that it does not matter. I am white and I am black, and know that there is no difference. Each one casts a shadow, and all shadows are dark.

ALBERT EINSTEIN says:

On reading Walter White's article one is struck with the deep meaning of the saying: There is only one road to true human greatness—the road through suffering. If the suffering springs from the blindness and dullness of a tradition-bound society, it usually degrades the weak to a state of blind hate, but exalts the strong to a moral superiority and magnanimity which would otherwise be almost beyond the reach of man.

I believe that every sensitive reader will, as I did myself, put down Walter White's article with a feeling of true thankfulness. He has allowed us to accompany him on the painful road to human greatness by giving us a simple biographical story, which is irresistible in its convincing power.

Around The Town

By FRANKLIN ACKER

FLAGRANT INJUSTICE

The grossest, most flagrant piece of international injustice ever tolerated—and even sponsored—by so-called democracies, including your own United States, is the partition of Palestine to provide a howling mob of dissatisfied Jews with a free handout in the nature of a "home country", this, of course, at the expense of somebody else.

The Jews have no more right to claim Palestine than an American whose ancestors came from England has a right to claim a suburb of London, or any other portion of that country. The Jews raise the whoop and yell that they want a land they can call their own. This gives them no valid claim on any of Palestine, but now that they've got what they've been hollering for, it will be interesting to note how many are going to uproot themselves and head for the "old country."

It is our suspicion that this new Jewish state will serve largely to give the Jews an even louder voice in international affairs, and to provide a sort of staging area for Jews whose ultimate aims are to gain entrance into the United States.

The Jews claim to be a persecuted people, but in truth they are past masters at dishing out persecution themselves. When they get the whip hand, don't you think they won't use it. You probably read in Friday's newspapers about how one Isaac Bildersee, Jewish assistant superintendent of schools in Brooklyn, issued an order forbidding the singing of Christmas carols by Brooklyn school children on the grounds that this constitutes mixing religion with education. From the strictly legal standpoint. Bildersee is probably correct. He has the backing of the law.

But we wonder if Bildersee would have taken a similar stand had a Jewish religious holiday been coming up and school children wanted to observe it by singing some Yiddish ditties? It's quite easy to understand, however, that any mention of Jesus Christ is extremely distasteful to the Jewish citizens of Brooklyn, as well as Jews elsewhere, for Jews are the ones who nailed him to the cross and to this day are apparently right happy about the whole affair. Not being Christians, they can well afford to be intolerant of Christian ideals.

And being as time about as fair play, we can frankly say that it pleases us no end to note that the Catholics of Brooklyn are on Bildersee's neck. For this, he has no one to blame except himself. The neck belongs to him, and he's the one who stuck it out.

So much, for the intolerance of Bildersee. Leave him to steep in his own perspiration.

Turning back to Palestine, we're beginning to wonder how long it will be before the Jewish boys will start yelling for somebody to help them fight off the pesky Arabs, and perhaps a few million other Moslems? Politicians seeking the Jewish vote, and currying the favor of the powerful Jewish propaganda machine, will probably be whooping it up before long for a powerful international task force. And anybody who opposes it will be branded as un-American, intolerant and the human equivalent of the illigitimate offspring of a mongrel dog.

Most Americans have been so intimidated by Jewish propaganda, which harps on intolerance, democracy, freedom and such, that they are afraid to stand up and say what they think. Even if they did, few magazines and newspapers would publish it for fear of colliding head-on with some sort of committee investigating something or other, mostly people, organizations and publications opposed to Jewish aggression and intolerance.

But there's one comment invariably made when a group of Gentiles get together and start discussing the Jewish problem. It's to the effect that Adolph Hitler may have been at error about many things but on one issue he was right smack on the ball.

Two guesses are not required to arrive at the correct answer.

And just to show that there are still some white Americans who have the intestinal fortitude to call the score, we quote verbatim from a recent issue of the Congressional Record. Congressman J. E. Rankin, of Mississippi, author of the amendment creating a permanent Committee on Un-American Activities, has the floor. Listen—

Mr. Speaker, it is evident to every thinking American that the members of the so-called United Nations Organization desire to subordinate the United States to their domination.

If they have a right to go into a country like Palestine and dismember it, then they will probably claim the right to turn Texas and California back to Mexico, Louisiana back to France, and the Panama Canal back to Colombia.

I wonder how far these international moon gazers are going in their attempts to drag the United States down to the level of Italy, China, India, or Russia.

It is about time that Americans began to be heard, from one end of the country to the other. There is going to be such a wave of resentment against this surrendering of the powers of government to foreign influences that the Members of this Congress will never hear the last of it.

With reference to this subject of Palestine, I want to quote from the autobiography of Henry Morgenthau, Sr., one of the great Jews of this country and the brains of the Morgenthau family. He said:

"Zionism is the most stupendous fallacy in Jewish history. I assert that it is wrong in principle and impossible of realization; that it is unsound in its economics, fantastical in its politics, and sterile in its spiritual ideals. Where it is not pathetically visionary, it is a cruel playing with the hopes of a people blindly seeking their way out of age-long miseries. These are bold and sweeping assertions, but in this chapter I shall undertake to make them good.

"The very fervor of my feeling for the oppressed of every race and every land, especially for the Jews, those of my own blood and faith, to whom I am bound by every tender tie, impels me to fight with all the greater force, against this scheme, which my intelligence tells me can only lead them deeper into the mire of the past, while it professes to be leading them to the heights.

"Zionism is a surrender, not a solution. It is a retrogression into the blackest error, and not progress toward the light. I will go further, and say that it is a betrayal; it is an eastern European proposal, fathered in this country by American Jews, which, if it were to succeed, would cost the Jews of America most that they have gained of liberty, equality, and fraternity."

That is from one of the most patriotic Jews America has ever seen, warning the world against the stupendous fallacy into which this bunch of moon-gazers in New York have now plunged.

The next thing we hear will probably be a demand that America send soldiers to protect this new state.

The United Nations have thus waved a red flag in the face of every Arab, in the face of 500,000,000 Moslems, people who were our friends, and have turned them against the American people—because this whole thing is being charged against the United States.

This crazy program is being supported by certain alleged leaders of both parties in order to try to line up certain elements in New York in the next election.

The Way Of Life Of The New World

American Leaders Must Provide a Sound and Enduring World Policy — While Sharing Our Material Resources With the Less Fortunate Nations of the Earth, We Must Provide for Humanity an Inspired Way of Life

When we contemplate the legacies of two world wars, in one generation, and their almost incomprehensible destructiveness, our innermost impulses are stirred and a tinge of nervous apprehension is almost inescapable. However, upon thoughtful consideration, we realize that during the incidence of both of these devastating apocalytic conflicts America has been spared the desolation and despair that have characterized these events in most of the other portions of the civilized world.

Our homeland has not been invaded. Our women, children, aged, infirm and all those that have remained within our boundaries have been shielded from the horrors of falling bombs, shellfire and the indescribable torments that the scourge of World War has visited upon most of the world's people. Our courageous armies and fighting men have been awarded victory at the cost of minimum sacrifices. And in the race of scientists, of almost all civilized nations, for atomic power, America and American scientists have been rewarded with the atomic trophy. The impulse arising from these considerations causes every American to thrill with pride and gratification. When we think of these significant facts, we seem to sense a feeling of peculiar American security. Too often we become attended by an attitude of surcease from concern with reference to the plight of humanity.

Of course it is great to be an American. We enjoy the highest standard of living that human ingenuity has ever been able to attain and infinitely beyond that of any other major country. It is frequently mentioned by authoritative sources that America owns seventy per cent of the world's automobiles and trucks, and 50 per cent of the telephones, and operates 35 per cent of the world's railroads. We listen to 45 per cent of the world's radios, consume 59 per cent of the petroleum, and 50 per cent of all the world's rubber. We enjoy well equipped public libraries, public schools and state-supported universities. We have rapid, luxurious means of transportation and millions of other things the sum of which amounts to the maximum opportunity for American citizens to develop their innate capacities.

When, for objective reasons we seek to visualize the destroyed cities, factories, railroads, power plants, residences, hospitals, and institutions of the major areas of the earth; when we consider the shocking destructions of human life, human hopes and human capacities of millions and millions of the earth's inhabitants—the blessings of American citizenship assume an almost divine luster. Contrasted against the background of world devastation, America stands out as a magic land.

Indeed, as the citizens of Berlin, Warsaw, Dresden, Rotterdam, Vienna, Athens, and London, as well as the other war-torn areas of the earth, stand in the midst of ruination and in acual view of numberless crippled and emaciated men and women as well as starving children, many if not most of them think of America as a blessed land of relative peace, abundance and smugness, existing phenomenally in the midst of a world of desolation and want.

Yes—God has blessed America. Today we stand out preeminent among the nations of the earth; the flagship of the New World to which the confused, multi-delusioned and suffering masses of the earth look with faith and confidence, and from which goodwill, strength, and wise leadership are expected to emanate. However, as we thrill with emotion while musing upon the greatness of our country, the wise and sagacious among us are reminded that, according to the experience of life, a disturbing ominousness has attended greatness. Greatness has also been the traditional target of all of the jealousies and envies that the evil one could invent.

We know of Nineveh and Tyre. We are reminded of the misery, suffering and the appalling effects of the impact on human progress caused by the fall of Greece, Rome and the other nations and cultures of the past who too have been preeminent among the nations. Alas, as we scrutinize the black pages of history, in the light of human reason, it also becomes alarmingly apparent that humanity has escaped obliteration only because the destruction and misery occasioned by the fall of the great nations and cultures of the past have been limited by the undeveloped state of the destructive potentialities of man during these tragic periods.

We know, of course, that the destructive, as well as the constructive capabilities of humanity have been amazingly and alarmingly developed during the last few years. The development of means of high speed transportation, together with atomic power, the utilization of bacteria as implements of war and countless other inventions designed to harness more and more of the material forces, have made available to man destructive abilities that surpass our comprehension and probably our wildest imagination.

Napoleon traveled, in haste and with every then conceivable advantage from Vilna to Paris, a distance of 1,400 miles, in 312 hours, averaging about five miles per hour. Today, in America, the constellations of Eastern Airlines and the D. C.-6's of National Airways fly daily on regular schedules from Miami to New York, a distance which according to the American Automobile Association is 1,405 miles, in only four hours. If Napoleon could have flown to Paris in one of our supersonic aircraft not only the map of Europe but the plight of humanity might be vastly different from what it is today. The military aspects of high speed transportation must now be generally understood by all thoughtful persons.

Dr. J. R. Oppenheimer has reminded us that "The pattern of the use of atomic weapons was set at Hiroshima . . . and if it is used in war again, it may well be by thousands or tens of thousands."

Senator McMahon has advised the U. S. Senate that "It would not be necessary for an enemy to destroy our cities in order to destroy us. By the use of radioactive particles, or death dusts in combination with disease germs, every living thing in our cities could be annihilated and the cities themselves left standing and empty of resistance to an invader. Almost daily we read of the progress that America and the western nations are making in the development of destructive weapons, and the press is replete with opinions as to the relative achievements of Soviet Russia in the race for destructive potential. Much of what is being said today about the destructive potentialities of our marvelous scientific weapons seem to border on the fantastic and may be thought of as idle speculation or fancy dreaming. However, the fact remains that man appears to have his fate in his own hands and the people of the earth and each of us are challenged to devise through thoughtful responsible action, a humanitarian pattern for all. Indeed, the gravity of the situation of humanity with reference to our scientific weapons consists primarily in the fact that we are traveling full speed into a new world of myriad and conflicting atmospheres and ideologies, in which the chief quest of man seems to be more and more destructive powers; and yet no one knows or is able to comprehend the destructive potentialities of the implements that we now possess.

Of course, we must eschew both hysterical fear and the mood of those who have resigned themselves to absolute despondency, and await the end of civilization. However, the exigencies of the times glaringly and alarmingly dictate that throughout the world, and especially in America there must be a general awakening of the citizens from the lethargy of smugness and from the prevalent tendency of too many of the population to stand on the sidelines while the fate of humanity is being decided. The true leaders of the world—the great among us, whose loyalty transcends all selfish interest, realize with moral certainty that during these eventful and perhaps decisive, hours, days, or years, only that is expedient which is rooted in eternal principles of justice and righteousness.

It is high time for the true leaders of the people to strike positively and enthusiastically at the real villain of the peace—ignorance. Those who guide the destiny of humanity cannot, in view of their divine trusteeship, give concern to or recognize any fancied duty to save the faces of demagogues. They must act immediately, using all democratic means to end racial discrimination, segregation and unjust economic and social practices. Indeed, not only must we unmask the Klan; we must employ all democratic means to expose the cunning, selfishness and sinister motives of the real traitors to humanity. We must make known to the masses the heresy of those who with siren voices seek to maintain, promote, and arouse the prejudices of the people and to make capital of social discontent.

A bounteous and benign Providence has not only bestowed upon America magnificent and magnanimous blessings, but has honored us with the divine responsibility of not merely saving the face of democracy but of preserving the democratic ideals upon which the entire structure of our civilization depends. Surely the impact of those considerations will vividly arouse all true patriotic Americans and passionately inspire the noble, the divne, the constructve and imaginative impulses of all. As did the founders of the nation, America and Americans must with unselfishness and moral sincerity beseach the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our conduct.

During this eventful if not decisive period, American governmental policy with reference to Americans in particular and the peoples of the world in general is of most momentous significance. Upon the sagacity of the formulators of American policy the welfare and security of the world depends. In our democracy the ultimate responsibility for our nation's policy rest on its citizens and they can discharge such responsibilities wisely only if they are informed.

"Let facts be submitted to a candid world," said the founders of this nation, when they as representatives of the United States of America declared its independence from tyranny. It is the duty and the moral obligation of all American citizens through their votes and other democratic means to diligently safeguard the democratic principles of freedom of speech, freedom of thought and freedom of assembly. These essential democratic rights are guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, which was ordained and established to secure to all Americans the blessings of liberty.

We must militantly oppose all legislative practices or governmental trends that tend to curtail or abridge any of our democratic privileges through penalties or unjustified, annoying, and distracting investigations or threats of social or political ostracism. Any such legislative practices or trends are opposed to democracy and the safety of all. Through such policies vital information and early but significant symptoms of social disorder may be concealed and allowed to become formidable if not disastrous. . . .

Due to what we have learned from our expriences in dealing with China, and in view of the present instability of the European democracies, surely we have become fully aware of the fact that our American dollars cannot purchase or provide the peace of the world. Yes—America must aid the people of the war-torn areas of the earth. We must generously give even more of our material wealth. However, we will not even have squarely approached the discharge of our divine duties until America and Americans give to the world an inspired way of life.

Indeed, those who formulate American policy are today faced with a situation of unprecedented gravity. They must be able to envisage the destroyed residences, power plants, factories, and even cities of the war-torn areas. They must also understand and appraise the ravages of war on the minds, the ideals, and even the souls of the tormented victims. They must realize that the most alarming and menacing legacy of the wars of the century is a general, paralyzing, and demoralizing dilemma that affects the people, not only of the west but extends from Britain to the countries behind the Iron Curtain as well as China, Japan, Africa and, to some extent, Australia and America.

We have witnessed the uncanny spectacle recently staged by two opposing conferences of international intellectuals in New York,—the Cultural and Scientific Congress for World Peace, and Americans for Intellectual Freedom. The Roman Catholic Church, in alarm, protests and declares that Roman Catholics are being persecuted in the Communist-controlled nations.

The World Council of Churches on July 13th issued a militant call for all Christians to resist totalitarianism and among other things emphasized that in Spain, where Roman Catholics predominate, the Protestant churches are being persecuted by Roman Catholics. Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam of the Methodist Church in America has found that there is a progressive deterioration of religious freedom in totalitarian countries, both within and without the Iron Curtain. In America and South America, and in some democratic nations elsewhere, the Protestant churches openly practice racial discrimination and segregation and uphold all the social paterns that hate has conceived. Russian exponents of communism have used promises of freedom, promises of non-discrimination, and the Marxist philosophy as alluring willow the wisps, to delude the people, in order to foster their own totalitarian designs.

In America,—"the land of the free and the home of the brave" —the most undemocratic, delusive, and demoralizing social patterns of racial segregation and discrimination are openly practiced and even defended in the Nation's Capital and in all the southern states.

We may well assume that communism and tyranny thrive on social and moral instability. But democracy can prosper only when it adheres to its noble principles and follows a course inspired by these principles.

Those who formulate American policy will not be hoodwinked by the ghastly and ghostly sophistries of those of the ilk of Machiavelli and Metternich. They must and will shun the beguiling sophistries of those, including many of our present-day statesmen, who are willing to risk the fate of America and the world on selfish social formulas which seem to be based upon the proposition that by filibusters, cunning, and shrewdness, they can so skillfully reshuffle the cards of destiny, that they may safely continue to practice racial segregation and all the evils that hate has conceived. The sages and the ecclesiastics of old have warned us of the folly of the man who assumes that he may prudently fix the time that he will begin doing right. They have vividly told us that no man can determine the hour when destiny will strike.

Those who formulate the policy of America today must be guided by the immortal, time-honored principles of the true leaders of European culture, as well as the formulators of our American creed. They must give serious consideration to the noble thinkers of the world, from Erasmus to Voltaire, from Montaigne and Spinoza to Heinrich Heine and Victor Hugo. They must give profound consideration to the teachings of Americans like Jefferson, Lincoln, and Roosevelt. . . .

America and Americans will hold high the torch of liberty and through the glory of its light, we must reflect those things that are noble and divine. We must demonstratively implement the American creed. We must give to the world a peaceful way of life.—T. Renfroe Eaton, Editor.

SOME OBSERVATIONS

One of the best fruits of civilization has been the suppression of cruelty, and the cultivation of compassion. Our forefathers came here largely to avoid the cruelties and suppressions of the old world, and to enjoy a new birth of freedom. But it was not long before they themselves became cruel and heartless, with the burning of witches, and the owning of slaves, the shame of which continues to torment and bedevil us to this good hour.

Because of our former open-door policy, America has become the land of a complex and polyglot population, here to enjoy the benefits of civil and religious liberty, and to achieve fully the dignity of personality, which should be inalienable to all human beings everywhere.

Eliminating the overlapping of the latter group, there are contained in America, in these various minority groups, as much as forty per cent of our total population. The other sixty per cent is composed of so-called "old stock Americans," who have been here for three generations or more, and who are largely of Anglo-Saxon extraction. They constitute the dominant group in the United States.

As reassuring as this may be, it is true that, upon examination, we find ourselves woefully lacking in any well conceived or strongly sponsored plan for promoting inter-cultural unity. Now more than ever do we need it if we are to continue as a strong people in the coming new era.

VAN A. BITTNER
A TRIBUTE

July 20, 1949, is a date to be remembered—with sorrow, but also with pride—in the annals of the labor movement in the South and in the nation. On that day ended the long, useful, and dedicated life of Van A. Bittner, National Director of the CIO Organizing Committee in Atlanta, who had devoted 53 of his 64 years to the cause of making organized labor a vital and cogent force in the democratic, free-enterprise economy of these United States.

Truly, a prince in our Israel fell that day, a mighty man of valor in the good fight to secure economic and social justice for all who work with hand and brain to make and keep our American industrial production the wonder and envy of people everywhere, and the source of continually enriched and ever more gracious living for all who labor.

We pause to mourn his untimely passing. Yet, in the reverent spirit of Abraham Lincoln's great address on the battlefield of Gettysburg, we reflect that it is for us who live on, and who have been benefited by the unselfish and honorable career just now ended, to carry on the work that Van A. Bittner so nobly advanced. It is for us to study the life of this valiant servant of all who labor, to observe and evaluate the facets of his scintillating personality, to note and practice the principles that actuated him, to pursue with unfailing vigor the goals toward which he strove. That is precisely what he would have wished. It is the sincerest tribute that we could pay to his memory.

Van A. Bittner was born in 1885 in Bridgeport, Pa. His father was a coal miner. The Bittner family was poor, and the children—the boys, at least—had to begin early to contribute to the upkeep of the home.

At the tender age of 11, when boys today are normally in school, the young Van Bittner went to work in the coal mines near his home. He joined the United Mine Workers after getting his first pay envelope.

Five years later, still a mere boy of 16 but a man in stature, brawn, and ability, Mr. Bittner was elected president of his United Mine Workers local. Seven years later, at 23, he was elected a vice president of UMW District 5, with headquarters in Pittsburgh, Pa. Three years later, still a young man, now 26, he was chosen president of this district.

Working with Mr. Bittner in the UMW during the years that immediately followed were two young trade unionists whose names were to be much in the limelight of publicity later on—John L. Lewis and Philip Murray.

These years were lean and tough ones for Mr. Bittner and the UMW. The high cost of living had just begun to be the general topic of conversation and journalistic comment that it has since continued to be. The country at large was only beginning to recover from the stock market crash and financial crisis of 1907. Work was not plentiful. Business was stagnant. The mine owners, like most other business men at that time, viewed with foreboding any attempt on the part of their ill-paid workers to enlarge their oragnization in order to try to improve their condition. The concept of union-management cooperation for the good of both was yet unheard of—each side regarded the other as "the enemy."

In 1916, at the age of 31, Mr. Bittner came south for the first time as an International Mine Workers representative. He led the UMW drive to organize coal miners in West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee. He spearheaded UMW activities in and around Birmingham, Ala., in 1920. From 1924 on he was top representative of the UMW in West Virginia.

Altogether, Mr. Bittner remained in West Virginia eighteen years, nine of them as president of UMW District 17. Under his leadership hundreds of thousands of coal miners were organized into the United Mine Workers.

While he was an officer and member of the United Mine Workers, he served as a member of the Appalachian Wage Conference from 1933 to 1941.

At the start of the CIO's first campaign to organize the nation's mass industries, both Van Bittner and Philip Murray became top aides to John L. Lewis. Mr. Bittner became director of this drive in the Great Lakes-Western area. His direction of the CIO's program of higher wages and better working conditions brought thousands of workers—in the steel mills, the farm equipment factories, and the packing houses—into the CIO as active members.

In 1942, now a seasoned labor veteran of 57, Mr. Bittner was elected assistant to President Philip Murray at the first constitutional convention of he CIO United Steelworkers. As a representative of the steel workers, he became a member of the CIO executive board.

In the same year, Mr. Bittner was appointed by President Roosevelt, on Mr. Murray's recommendation, to represent the CIO on the National War Labor Board formed to function during World War II. Mr. Bittner served the nation in this capacity until December, 1945.

With the coming of peace, the CIO early in 1946 turned its attention to a relatively virgin field — the increasingly industrialized South. "Operation Dixie" was begun, with Mr. Bittner in command. On opening thic campaign, Mr. Bittner declared:

"This campaign is a single-minded organizing drive. We will organize the workers so that they can get the same good wages and working conditions that the CIO has served for all of its members."

It was while Mr. Bittner was still engaged in this valiant effort to bring the blessings of sturdy unionization to the working people of the South, that a stroke, due to heart trouble, took him from us. But not before he had scored some notable successes in the three years since the campaign was begun.

During "Operation Dixie" so far, the CIO has increased its membership in the South from 375,000 to 800,000. Most notable successes have been in Laurel, Miss., a woodworking and lumber center, where 6,000 persons of the 30,000 population —1 out of 5—now wear a CIO pin; Natchez, Miss., where the Armstrong Tire and Rubber Company workers are organized in CIO, and Gadsden, Ala., a small rubber and steel city which is now a "union city" by any standard of measurement.

What manner of man was this Van A. Bittner, the impact of whose life on the labor movement in our country has been so vitalizing and fruitful?

His manner was mild, quiet. Ho looked—and talked—more like a school teacher instead of a man with a half century of labor battles behind him. He was poised, shrewd, articulate, and as much at home as guest speaker for a Rotary Club as at a union meeting. Friendly and unhurried, he smoked a pipe and inexpensive cigars, and punctuated his remarks with gentle puffs.

Mr. Bittner was married and had a daughter and two grandchildren. He was a member of the Lutheran Church. He looked —and was—the solid, substantial type of citizen who is a pillar of his community, his church, his union, and his nation.

What were the principles that Mr. Bittner brought to his work among us here in the South?

Two quotations from his addresses may aptly be cited here:

"There will never be real civil liberties in the South—or in any section of the nation—until the workers are organized into free trade unions.

"The success of our campaign means the protection of wages and conditions for not only workers in the South, but for workers in every section of the country."

But perhaps the best clue to the underlying principles that actuated Mr. Bittner were the ones that he presented in practice for the consideration of workers, management, and townspeople generally where "Operation Dixie" was carried on. How well he won over these differing groups to the side of the CIO is well described in the following quotation from Business Week for Dec. 18, 1948, concerning his manner of conducting the campaign in Laurel, Miss.:

"Key to this strategy is a finesse of manner that would do credit to a social registerite. Southern Organizing Director Van Bittner demands more than toughness and persistence. His Dixie union representatives must also have a good working knowledge of public relation. They not only have to be able to sell unionization to the workers, but also union respectability and responsibility to the community.

"CIO's Dixie organizers—all of them native Southerners, drawl-equipped for their job—stay at the best hotels. They dress well, are model guests, pay bills promptly, carefully avoid any conduct that might lead to hotel complaints of irresponsibility. They are good customers at strategically located restaurants and stores. They attend church regularly.

"As a result, an arrest for handing out union literature at a plant gate doesn't hurt. The union agent has built up a name as a solid sort of citizen; he can't very easily be dubbed a rabble-rouser if a minister, church deacons ,and merchants vouch for him.

"Much the same policy is used in choosing local union leaders. In Laurel, for instance, CIO's woodworkers picked as business manager of the big Masonite local, a man who was deacon in his Baptist church and leader of a Boy Scout troop. . . .

"Here's what was done in this last respect at Laurel: Union officials estimated that workers' pay had increased $5,000,000 annually since they joined unions. Merchants were told about it, soon were giving credit to the union for a big improvement in business. The union offered to help in any civic project or charity; again, unions got a share of the credit for each community job well done."

The foregoing describes strategy. But the strategy is based on principles. The CIO unions in Laurel and elsewhere were not just pretending to be decent and civic-minded. They actually were—and are—all they purported to be. The object was not to undermine employers but to build up employees. Free enterprise and sound business management were accepted and applauded — no employer. no jobs. All that was sought was a reasonable share of the gross profits for the workers who had helped in the making of these profits.

This principle is the basic principle of the CIO. Mr. Bittner and all who had worked with him in the early days of the labor movement had learned it the hard way. When the time came to apply it in inaugurating "Operation Dixie," Mr. Bittner had the wisdom to formulate and implement related principles consistent with it and flowing logically from it in a democratic system founded on free enterprise.

It has been said that no man is indispensable. But some men are all but irreplaceable. Well did Secretary-Treasurer S. H. Dalrymple, of the CIO Organizing Committee, say of Van A. Bittner: "Words cannot describe his loss: his passing will be mourned by the nation."

"Operation Dixie" will go on —of this we are sure. Whoever is selected to be its commanding general will certainly be a man who learned his principles and strategy from—or perhaps along with—Mr. Bittner. It is these principles and this strategy that will bring evenually the consumination for which he consecrated himself — the organization into free labor unions of all in the South who do the actual work of industry, with the resulting benefits of higher wages and better working conditions.

In any case, "Operation Dixie" stands even now, and will increasingly so stand as it presses steadily forward toward fulfillment, as the final monument of a great-hearted, great-souled labor leader — Van A. Bittner.

ECONOMIC SOUTH

The South's Economy Has Made Solid Gains in the Past Ten Years — Southern Industries Have Already Taken Most of Their Recession Adjustment — The South's Attitude Toward the Negro Is Its Basic Economic Weakness.

BY GIBSON PHILLIPS

The South, like the rest of the nation, is in the midst of a downward adjustment period of some proportions. For the first time since the end of the war, current economic activity in the region is running below year-ago levels. That is, the monthly rate of gain over the previous year has not only continued its down trend begun last fall, but the gain has finally disappeared altogether. We have moved back to last year's levels and are now sinking below them.

So far, there is little evidence that the South is any worse off than any place else, however. As a matter of fact, up to the present the region's economy has been moving downward more slowly than the rest of the U. S. The country as a whole dipped below 1948 levels in the midwinter, but it was late spring before the South did likewise.

The reason for the South's comparatively better showing in recent months has been the cash receipts from its farms. Last year the region's farm income hit an all-time record of nearly $4.5 billion dollars. The important thing about this record income, so far as the present situation is concerned, is that a good slice of it—several hundred millions, from cotton, in particular — did not become available until after the first of the year. The South has been booming along on the effects of this cotton carryover ever since.

The other crops and farm enterprises have helped, too. There was a good peanut crop last year, and a good tobacco crop, except in parts of the Carolinas, and with high prices most growers had money in their jeans to carry them over into 1949. Citrus in Florida had an excellent winter season, largely because of the California freeze which helped both prices and the demand for Florida fruit. Livestock, a growing enterprise all over the South, has experienced some price drops, but continues to pour in a steady income.

Industrially, however, the South has not been doing too well in 1949. True, when you compare production, payrolls, employment and profits with some of the pre-war years, we have been virtually booming. But the post-war balloon burst for a big part of Southern industry way last fall. The South's industry got hit earlier and harder than that of the rest of the U. S., and if it had not been for the phenomenal farm income that continued to flow in after January, our region would have turned down quicker, rather than more slowly than the U. S. as a whole.

When you talk about Southern industry, you are talking first and foremost about textiles and lumber, of course. They are our biggest industries, employing about half of our total factory workers. Both industries have taken a rough beating.

Textiles had a fantastic post-war boom after the OPA controls were taken off. Prices and profits, and to a much less extent, wages skyrocketed. Then came the glut in the pipelines and the d[illegible] off of the export markets. Mills began to reduce the number of shifts. In recent months there have been many layoffs. Cotton mill activity today is about one-fourth off from last year.

Lumber also had a tremendous post-war boom spurred on by the huge increase in all kinds of building. Construction activity began to fall off last autumn, however, as the residential boom (particularly in Florida) came to an end. Prospective homebuilders decided to wait until prices came down. As a result, the demand for lumber dropped sharply around the first of the year. Today, lumber mills are no longer running at capacity. There has been a fairly heavy unemployment in the industry.

Another big Southern industry, furniture, has been equally sensitive to the tightening up of consumer buying. Furniture has gone through a very difficult adjustment period in recent months, which has been reflected in a cutback in production and a layoff in employment. The same is true in pulp and paper, one of the region's vigorous new industries. Demand has at least temporarily caught up with supply, resulting in a fairly widespread unemployment in recent months. The South now accounts for one-half of the total U. S. production of pulp and one-fourth of the U. S. production of paper and paperboard.

Certain stability has been introduced into the Southern industrial situation by the chemical, food-processing, metal and iron-and-steel industries. Chemicals are becoming increasingly important in the South, and their continued prosperity in the post-war period has added greatly to the well-being of certain parts of our economy. Even including fertilizers, however, chemicals are still minor compared with textiles. The same is true of the growing light metals industry.

Birmingham's iron-and-steel industry has held up very well, but its coal mining has had recent declines. Southern ports have been a source of great post-war strength in our economy, but port activity has recently fallen off considerably.

In brief summary, then, the present economic situation in the South is characterized by a slow downturn in general activity as the effects of the 1948 farm income boom wear off. Most of the region's major products, both farm and factory, are sold in nation-wide markets, and we are feeling the national declines in demand.

The question is, how will the Southern economy fare for the rest of 1949?

It is guessing, of course, but the chances are that the South will probably show greater declines in the months ahead than the rest of the country, reversing the trend of the recent period. Not only have the effects of our farm boom worn off, but also our industries are not currently showing the strength that is being shown in many of the major industries elsewhere. On the latter point, it must be remembered that the South has relatively little of the heavy goods industries that are still running nearly full-blast as a result of the heavy expenditures for national defense and foreign rehabilitation and arms. Our industries turn out products primarily for the consumer markets—textiles, lumber, furniture, paper, processed food.

From one point of view, you might say that a possible source of strength for the South in the months ahead lies in the fact that our major industries have already taken most of their recession "adjustment." They are now in a better position to react sensitively to any improvement in consumer demand as prices continue to decline. Dealers' inventories are low and pipelines are relatively clear. However, this is not enough to cause great happiness on the part of the Southern mill worker who is currently unemployed, waiting for demand to catch up to supply. Moreover, it may take some time for this pick-up to occur. In the meantime, Southern business is coasting along at below last year's levels.

It might be conservatively estimated that employment and payrolls will be off about 5 per cent in 1949 from 1948. It may be worse than that. In any event, the overall level of employment will be about 50 per cent above pre-war, which gives some indication of the fact that even with declines Southern industry is riding at high levels.

Cash farm income in the South in 1949 ought to drop about the same rate—five per cent. This will probably happen in spite of the Government props under the major Southern cash crops, cotton and tobacco. The parity formula will automatically allow for some decrease in price of these and other controlle crops. Moreover, livestock prices are still moving slowly downward and, as we pointed out earlier, livestock is becoming more and more important in our farm economy. In the U. S. as a whole, the heavier dependence on livestock and grains should result in the national farm income going down slightly more, percentagewise, than in the South.

With both farm and factory income sloughing off, the South's total personal income should also decline in 1949 from 1948—the first year of decline after ten straight years of increases. It is likely, however, that the drop in total personal income will only be four or five per cent, which will leave it at the highest level on record except in 1948.

There is no question about it, the South's economy has been making solid gains in the past ten years.

The South (not including Texas, Oklahoma and Arkansas, to the west) has gained about 10,000 new manufacturing plants since 1939.

It has added some 80,000 new non-manufacturing business firms in the period, its 320,000 today accounting for 13 per cent of the U. S. total. In 1939 the South accounted for only 11 per cent.

Its factory payrolls, which will run about $4,000,000,000 this year, are three times as great as they were in 1940.

Southern factory workers totaled some 1,568,000 in 1947, compared with 1,098,000 in 1939, a gain of 43 per cent.

The value added to the manufacture of Southern products jumped from $2,300,000,000 in 1939 to $7,900,000,000 in 1947, a 231 per cent gain. The "value added" is the difference between the value of shipments and the cost of materials and supplies. It includes some inflation due to price rises, as well as increases in physical output.

The South's farm income—like payrolls, running about $4,000,000,000 in 1949—is also more than triple the latest prewar figure.

And—just to throw in another figure on progress—the number of farms electrified in the South between 1945 and 1948 increased by nearly 500,000—that is, the number nearly doubled in three short post-war years. As of June, 1948, the number was 15 times as great as in 1935.

And so go the statistics. The story is fairly well known. Even allowing for price inflation, it is an impressive account.

Just as impressive and not as well known are some of the qualitative changes that have taken place.

Our economy is moving slowly in the direction of the balance that it needs. The trend is best seen in a breakdown of the income figures.

In 1939, manufacturing payrolls accounted for only 14 per cent of the South's total income payments. By 1947 that proportion had grown to 17 per cent, still short of the national proportion of 22 per cent but heading in the right direction.

Similarly, our dependence on farming has dropped. Whereas, agriculture accounted for 21 per cent of our total income in 1939, it made up only 16 per cent in 1947. Again, this was short of the U. S. figure of only 10 per cent, but the direction was good.

The same healthy trend is seen both within industry and within agriculture. On the farm, the South's nemesis has always been dependence on cotton. But that dependence is declining very sharply and has been for years. The trend is well illustrated by the growth in the importance of livestock. Twenty years ago livestock accounted for only about one-fifth of the South's total cash farm income. Today it accounts for a third and the proportion is growing.

In industry, our nemesis has been dependence on textiles. Despite the great importance of that industry in the South today, it is nowhere near as important even as pre-war. In 1939, textiles accounted for 42 per cent of the South's total factory employment. In 1947 it accounted for only 35 per cent.

In the same period, employment in machinery, equipment, metal and paper plants in the region increased by 91 per cent—from 10 per cent of the region's total employment to 14 per cent. Here were gains in industries of the "higher-value-added-by-manufacture" type—the industries that could bring more wealth to the South to stay.

Southern economists always get a funny feeling when they write or talk about their region's gains, however. They are always conscious of two facts lurking in the background: (1) the entire Southern economy is still only "peanuts" compared with the U. S. as a whole; and (2) even with our big gains, we have a long way to go before our economy can be described as being really healthy and strong enough to guarantee our people a good standard of living.

The second of these facts is really much the more important. That we are still "peanuts" in the eyes of U. S. industry as a whole is not really so serious. There is nothing wrong about being little. We have no reason to feel sorry for ourselves just because there is more industrial wealth strung out along the Pennsylvania Railroad's trunk line between Baltimore and New York than in the entire South put together.

The fact that we have a long way to go if we are going to bring the good life to our people is something to worry about, however. No quantity of statistics showing our great progress since pre-war can hide the fact that our economy has at least three basic weaknesses in it.

Two of these weaknesses have already been mentioned. One is our too heavy reliance on agriculture, even today after the progress we have made. The other is our inability to turn out products that make us wealthy. Our industries are still too much concerned with the initial handling and processing of raw materials where the real money is not made. We are not carrying our industrial processes along far enough to cash in on the profits made from the sale of the final articles.

A third weakness is perhaps even more basic. It is simply that we have been unable, partly because we have been unwilling, to utilize our human resources in a manner anywhere near resembling efficiency in the economic sense. I am referring, of course, to our refusal to allow the Negro to take his rightful place in our economy.

The effects of these weaknesses are clearly seen in the figures on personal income.

In 1947 the South had about 20 per cent of the nation's population and only about 13 or 14 per cent of the national income. This meant that on a per capita basis, the average Southerner accounted for only $883 a year, compared with the U. S. average of $1,323. On a per capita basis, our region was 44 per cent below the U. S. as a whole. This represented some progress since 1929, when we were 50 per cent below, but it was still not a happy comparison in 1947.

Let us try to break these figures down to find out more about the difference between the per capita income of the South and the U. S. at large. We are indebted to a recent address by Mr. Joseph K. Heyman, the well-known Southern economist, for the interesting and significant figures which make this analysis possible.

The highest income group naturally is the white population not living on farms. In the U. S. as a whole, the per capita income of non-farm white in 1947 was $1,590; in the South it was $1,280. The white farm group was considerably lower. The U. S. per capita for white farmers was $678, and the similar figure for the South was $534.

Per capita income for the non-farm Negroes is pretty close to that of the farm whites. It was $698 for the U. S. in 1947 and $572 for the South. The farm Negroes brought up the rear. Both the U. S. and Southern per capitas were about the same in 1947—$275.

Suppose we could raise the Southern per capita up to the U. S. level in each of the three categories in which we were lower in 1947. It would have added $6,000,000,000 to our income in that year, pushing our total to about $32,000,000,000 and our Southern per capita to $1,033 instead of $883.

But why, if we could raise our per capita to the U. S. average in each of the categories in which we are deficient, would the Southern per capita still be lower than the national level? The answer is simple: we have too large a proportion of our people in the categories in which the per capita income is lowest.

Nine out of every 100 Southerners are in the Negro farm group, which ranks by far the lowest in per capita income. In the U. S., only two out of every 100 people are in this group. Sixteen out of every 100 Southerners are non-farm Negroes, whose per capitas are also way below the general average. The U. S. number in this group is only half as large. Similarly, the white farm group—also far below average in per capita income—is larger in our region than elsewhere in the country. About 27 per cent of the South's population is in this group; nationally, only 18 per cent of the people are farm whites.

In only one group is per capita income above average. This is in the non-farm white group. But the South had a much smaller proportion of its population in this group (only 48 per cent) than the U. S. as a whole (72 per cent).

Here, then, is your answer. Our population is heavily weighted with folks in the below-average income groups.

Mr. Heyman sums it up very nicely. He says tha t, if the South's overall per capita income had been equal to the national average in 1947, our region would have had a total income some $13,000,000,000 greater than it was. About $6,000,000,000 of our actual $13,000,000,000 "shortage" was accounted for by lower per capitas, group for group — as we pointed out earlier. The other $7,000,000,000 "deficit" was due simply to the fact that we had unusually heavy proportions of farm whites, and of Negroes both on and off the farm.

The implications are clear and have already been stated. We are poor, first, because our economy is not generating enough stay-at-home wealth to give us per capitas that are equal to the U. S., group for group. We are poor, second, because our economy is still unbalanced in favor of agriculture, where per capita income is low. We are poor, third, because we peg the Negro at a relatively unproductive economic level and keep him there.

Earlier in this article, we have pointed out that we have made some progress in getting more and better industries in the South. It can also be said too, that we are making some progress on the Negro side of the economic problem. He has been getting better jobs and making more money. Also, he is becoming less of a drag on the Southern economy simply because he is pulling out—Negroes made up nearly 31 per cent of the region's population in 1930 and only about 25 per cent in 1947. The Negroes who are left have a better chance, by and large.

But the South's attitude toward the Negro is still the basic economic weakness of the region. Any clear-thinking business should know that the South is never going to be able to achieve economic parity with the rest of the U. S. as long as one-fourth of the Southern population is denied fair economic opportunities. There are centuries of facts to prove it.

All of the foregoing figures on both progress and unsolved problems merely beg the question: economically speaking, what are the long-run prospects of the South picking itself up by its own bootstraps?

No one would dare answer that without first assuming some premises that are strictly out of the economic field—premises having to do with the South's attitudes and point of view. The entire Negro problem is obviously not going to be solved by the out-migration of the black man. The South is going to be made up of a large proportion of Negroes for many years to come. Until the region decides that the Negro can take his place on the assembly line, at the brick wall laying brick instead of handing them up to a white layer, in other jobs where he can get equal pay for equal work done—until that happens, the South will continue to operate its economy a couple of notches below that of the rest of the country. This will happen, no matter how many new plants come in, and no matter how fast Southern agriculture is strengthened and at the same time is squeezed down to a more minor role.

If we could assume that the South's basic attitudes on equality of economic opportunity will change, however, what then, of the prospects?

Almost anyone would agree, I believe, that the prospects are excellent that the South could and would close the gap between its economic standards and those of the rest of the country. The region has natural resources in abundance, human resources that can both work to produce and pay to consume. The story of the wealth of the South has been told time and again.

Most immediately, of course, there would be a great need for capital for development purposes. Some New York economists recently raised the question: Why not a Marshall Plan for the South? If this region is as important as most people think it is, why not pour some U. S. money into developing the South for the good of the nation as a whole? It was a challenging thought, and the economists who presented it made a good case for it. Certainly the South today is woefully lacking in capital. Most of its investments in the past have come from the North. We will probably have to continue to look there for a large bulk of the investments to be made in the future.

We will have to continue to get help from the government, too. Few people realize what a tremendous part government spending plays in the life of the South, even today, years after the New Deal and months after the end of the period of war spending. In 1948 government—federal, state and local—pumped some $4,500,000,000 into the income stream of the 11 Southern states through wages, salaries, interest, veteran payments, and so on. It was the region's single biggest source of revenue—bigger than all wages and salaries of all of our industries, bigger than our record total cash farm income.

But there is also some evidence that, little by little, we are building up part of the capital we need right here on our own. During the past ten years the South's rate of gain in bank deposits and banking capital, resources in savings and loan associations, and assets in locally-owned life insurance companies has been twice as great as the other sections of the country. Southern life insurance companies, for example, have more than tripled their assets since 1940—a vastly greater gain than made by companies elsewhere in the U. S. A substantial part of these assets might be available for investment in new Southern enterprises; indeed, it may have already been so invested. All this means that we are coming along, though we are still a long way from competing with Wall Street.

In a variety of ways we can get the capital. That is only part of the job. The other part is using it to best advantage. We'll have to get the right kind of industries. We'll have to pay the right kind of wages. We'll have to develop the right kind of attitudes about the utilization of our most precious resource—our people.

If we put our full efforts along these lines, we should be able to hold all of our recent gains—and make some new ones.

THE CALL WITHIN

By HERBERT O. MATTHEWS

If I could grasp a twinkling star,
To light my way across the bar;
Could I discern, from day to day,
That which propels me on my zway;
Could I but halt, survey the scene,
Death would not mourn: "What might have been."

If man could weigh, with equal grace,
Divine portent in any race;
If nations sensed creation's plan
And Christians lived as man to man;
If only ego ne'er had born,
What peace 'twould be, tomorrow morn.

All fame and fortune, warp and wool,
All conflicts that becloud the soul,
Are retribution's awesome toll.
We're faithless, failing creatures all,
Who heed not that faint inner call:
To truth and to trials.

Since human personality is divine, it is inviolate, and it should have the fullest opportunity to flower to the ultimate of its potentiality.

Since love is the very core of the Christian way of life we are committed to the affirmative attitude toward all life.

And conversely, since hate is the Negative of love. Prejudice is but the daughter of hate.

A RECOMMENDATION FOR ACTION BY THE SOUTHERN GOVERNORS

The following letter was sent to each of the governors of the thirteen States by the Executive Committee of the Southern Regional Council at its meeting on June 8. Signing the letter were the following members of the Executive Committee:

Dr. Charles Johnson, Nashville, Tenn., president of Fisk University; Mr. Paul D. Williams, Richmond, Va., publisher and president of SRC; Dr. Gordon B. Hancock, Richmond, professor of economics, Virginia Union University; the Rt. Rev. Msgr. T. James McNamara, Savannah, Ga., Rector of the Cathedral of St. John the Baptist; Dr. Rufus E. Clement, president of Atlanta University; Dr. Guy B. Johnson, professor of sociology, University of North Carolina; Mr. Leonard Haas, Atlanta attorney; Mr. Charles Gillman, Atlanta, Georgia Director of CIO; Miss Josephine Wilkins, Atlanta, Citizens' Fact Finding Movement of Georgia; Mr. Carter Wesley, editor, Houston Informer; Mr. John H. Wheeler, Durham, N. C., vice-president, Mechanics and Farmers Bank.

As Southerners closely identified with the stream of change in the bi-racial society of our region, we feel it appropriate to call your attention to an opportunity which now presents itself to the South.

One of your number, the Governor of North Carolina, has lately set a significant example by his appointment of an esteemed Negro citizen to the North Carolina State Board of Education. The man selected for this honor is President Harold L. Trigg, of St. Augustine's College, in Raleigh, who is eminently qualified in every way to serve in this position. His appointment implements the policy, set forth by Governor Scott at his inauguration, of granting "broader representation on the boards and commissions which serve the public interest." As a precedent, the appointment was courageous; as an act of statesmanship, it shows acute discernment of the mood and needs of the Southern people.

State Services

Our States are accepting increased responsibility for public well-being in a broadening field of services. The need for further growth and improvement in this direction is the essence of the controversy about States' rights. If the Southern States would preserve a broad measure of autonomy in local and state affairs, they must speed their efforts in at least three fields. They will need a greater flow of revenue from state and local sources; they will need to build a tradition of administration markedly free from politics and patronage; and they will need to adjust their state services to fit more closely the needs of all citizens.

In most of our States, a fourth or more of the people are Negroes. As a group, the weight of need rests most heavily upon them, and they are accordingly entitled to a large share of the services of the modern State. This is true in education, in agricultural credit and instruction, in aid to the elderly and to dependent children, in unemployment compensation, and in the administration of justice. In all of these fields, and in others, the appointment of capable and representative Negro citizens to positions upon policy-making boards would be of the greatest public benefit.

Over a period of time, the benefit would be felt in many ways. The administration of public services would reflect greater attention to the exact needs of Negro citizens. Needless irritations and inconsiderate acts, which are now routine in many state services, would be greatly lessened. Most important, perhaps, the loyalty and common civic pride of the Negro citizen body would be considerably strengthened.

A New Era

Notwithstanding discouragements that would have crushed a lesser resolve, the Negro people of the South have held firmly to the faith that justice and a basic equality can be achieved within the framework of American legal and cultural institutions. The South has an old duty —postponed of fulfillment until the strain is very great—to reward that loyalty with recognition and acceptance. The kind of appointments we suggest will be seen by the Negro citizens of the South as the opening of a new era in their public standing.

There is a broader area, too, in which this step would benefit our region as a whole. Many of the South's problems spring from economic disabilities. Race relations would be vastly improved by the security to be derived from expanded industry, a strengthened pattern of family farm ownership, good schools, good homes, and good health for all our citizens. But these things are expensive — expensive beyond the means of the South by itself to provide.

We shall need the aid of the whole nation in obtaining these fundamentals of modern society. The nation will be understandably reluctant to put up its share of the funds unless there is evidence of a determination to provide public services more equitably than the South has done in the past. Such evidence can be convincingly furnished if the Southern States will follow the broadened precedent which North Carolina has set.

Below are listed some of the specific fields in which, it seems to us, the precedent might be most promptly and usefully followed:

Public Welfare Boards
Prison Boards
Pardon and Parole Boards
Boards of Health
Boards of Education
Hospital Authorities
Labor Commissions
Apprentice Training Boards
Agricultural Commissions
Police Commissions
Library Boards
Park and Recreation Boards
Veterans' Service Commissions
Licensing Boards
Boards of Registration Planning Boards

True Representatives

We respectfully recommend, therefore, that you give your attention to the unfolding of a series of appointments of this nature. We do not presume to recommend in detail the pace or the distribution of such appointments. We do, however, point out the importance of selecting appointees whose standing in their own communities commands confidence and respect. Here or there—as has happened—it may seem simplest to select an individual whose for

MEN, WOMEN AND CHILDREN

by

THE REV. WARREN CANDLER BUDD

Pastor

HAPEVILLE METHODIST CHURCH

Believing that the sentiments expressed in this beautiful prayer are worthy of a larger audience than that privileged to hear it on the occasion of the dedication of the Ford plant in Hapeville, Georgia, we proudly present it to our readers.

"O God, thou art Thyself the great Creator, the Master Workman. Thou has revealed Thyself to us in Jesus the carpenter whose roughened hands bear eternal testimony to the dignity of toil.

We sense Thy presence in the upward surge of the masses, who with the awakened self-respect of children of God, have through the centuries cast off the shackles of slavery and serfdom, and stand now gazing toward the dawn of a greater freedom.

We praise Thee for those brave spirits who have led the way; who have dared to risk even their children's bread in organized endeavor to improve the lot of all; who for their unselfish devotion have been condemned as outcasts of society; endured prison; sacrificed their lives as martyrs to the cause.

Help Thou the labor movement of our day to be worthy of its heritage. Unite in high purpose the workers in the factory and the farm. Preserve them from the temptation to selfish complacency. Guard their leaders from the lust for personal power. Guide them in the service of the common good. Help the workers of all lands to stand shoulder to shoulder for justice and peace among the nations. Save them from the sin of selfish nationalism. Give them a wider vision of world government with justice and liberty for all.

Grant to labor the wisdom to seek a world of peace and plenty by means of organization and the ballot, keeping their movement free from hate and violence, building into the cooperative commonwealth those spiritual values which alone can make it endure.

Bring at last, all workers by hand or brain into worldwide brotherhood; into clearer fellowship with Thee, O God, the Father of us all. Amen."

WHAT PRICE FREEDOM?

By ROBERT M. HUTCHINS
Chancellor of Chiacgo University
—at the 237th convocation—

We hear on every side that the American Way of Life is in danger. I think it is. I also think that many of those who talk the loudest about the dangers to the American Way of Life have no idea what it is and consequently no idea what the dangers are that it is in.

You would suppose, to listen to these people, that the American Way of Life consisted in unanimous tribal self-adoration. Down with criticism; down with protests; down with unpopular opinions; down with independent thought. Yet the history and tradition of our country make it perfectly plain that the essence of the American Way of Life is its hospitality to criticism, protest, unpopular opinions, and independent thought. A few dates like 1620, 1776, and 1848 are enough to remind us of the motives and attitudes of our ancestors. The great American virtue was courage.

We ought to be afraid of some things. We ought to be afraid of being stupid and unjust. We are told that we must be afraid of Russia, yet we are busily engaged in adopting the most stupid and unjust of the ideas prevalent in Russia, and are doing so in the name of Americanism. The worst Russian ideas are the police state, the abolition of freedom of speech, thought, and association, and the notion that the individual exists for the state. These ideas are the basis of the cleavage between East and West.

Yet every day in this country men and women are being deprived of their livelihood, or at least their reputation, by unsubstantiated charges. These charges are then treated as facts in further charges against their relatives or associates. We do not throw people into jail because they are alleged to differ with the official dogma. We throw them out of work and do our best to create the impression that they are subversive and hence dangerous, not only to the state, but also to everybody who comes near them.

The result is that every public servant must try to remember every tea party his wife has gone to in the past ten years and endeavor to recall what representatives of which foreign powers she may have met on these occasions. A professor cannot take a position on any public question without looking into the background of everybody who may be taking the same position on the same question. If he finds that any person who is taking the same position on this question has been charged with taking an unpopular position on another question, the professor had better not take any position on this question, or he may be haled before some committee to explain himself.

Is this the American Way of Life? The great American word is freedom, and in particular, freedom of thought, speech and assembly. Asserting the dignity of man, and of every man, America has proclaimed and protected the freedom to differ. Each man is supposed to think for himself. The sum of the thoughts of all is the wisdom of the community. Difference, disagreement, discussion decided by democratic professors are required to bring out the best in the citizens. America has grown strong on criticism. It would be quite as consistent with the American Way of Life to offer prizes for the most penetrating criticism of our country as it would be to offer prizes to those who have done the best job of advertising it.

The heart of Americanism is independent thought. The cloak-and-stiletto work that is now going on will not merely mean that many persons will suffer for acts that they did not commit, or for acts that were legal when committed, or for no acts at all. Far worse is the end result, which will be that critics, even of the mildest sort, will be frightened into silence. Stupidity and injustice will go unchallenged because no one will dare to speak against them.

To persecute people into conformity by the non-legal methods popular today is little better than doing it by purges and pogroms. The dreadful unanimity of tribal self-adoration was characteristic of the Nazi state. It is sedulously fostered in Russia. It is to the last degree un-American.

American education has not been constructed on such un-American principles. In general, the practice has been to give the student the facts, to try to help him learn to think, and to urge him to reach his own conclusions. It is not surprising that the heart of American education is the same as that of Americanism: it is independent thought. American education has not tried to produce indoctrinated automatons, but individuals who can think, and who will think always for themselves. The basic principle of American government, and one that accounts for the importance of education in this country, is that if the citizens learn to think and if they will think for themselves, the Republic is secure. The basic principle of the Russian dictatorship is that the people cannot think or cannot be trusted to think for themselves.

The American doctrine rests on the proposition that it is the individual in himself that counts. It is not who his father was, or how much money he has, or what his color or creed is, or what party he belongs to, or who his friends are, but who and what is he? So the test of a teacher is whether he is competent. The professional competence of a teacher is hardly a question on which lay bodies, or even administrators or trustees, would wish to pass without the advice of persons professionally competent in the teacher's field.

If we apply any other test than competence in determining the qualifications of teachers we shall find that pressures and prejudice will determine them. In 1928 it was said that Al Smith could not be President because he would be subservient to a foreign power; and today, in many places, and if not today it may happen tomorrow, anti-Catholic or anti-Jewish campaigns may mean that teachers who belong to those churches will not be able to practice their profession.

Teachers may be expected to obey the law of the land. But it is still permissible, I hope, to ask whether a law is wise. To discriminate against teachers—to act as though they were all disloyal—and to put them under special legal disabilities seems injudicious if we want able, independent men to go into the teaching profession.

The assumption appears to be that American education is full of Reds, an assumption that is the precise reverse of the truth. All the excitement of the last few years, all the hearings, investigations, and publicity releases, have not turned up more than four or five Communist professors, even though membership in the Party has been perfectly legal up to now. To require oaths of loyalty from all because of the eccentricity of an infinitesimal minority is an unnecessary and derogatory act. And of course it will not effect any useful purpose; for teachers who are disloyal will certainly be dishonest; they will not shrink from a little perjury.

The way to fight ideas is to show that you have better ideas. No idea is any good unless it is good in a crisis. You demonstrate the failure of your ideas if, when the crisis comes, you abandon them or lose faith in them or get confused about them to the point of forgetting what they are. The American idea is freedom. Freedom necessarily implies that the status quo may come under the criticism of those who think it can be improved. The American idea is that the state exists for its citizens and that change in society must occur to meet their developing needs. The whole theory of our form of government is a theory of peaceful change. Many of the changes that Marx and Engels demand in the Communist Manifesto have taken place in this country, and they have taken place without communism, without dictatorship, and without revolution, thus disproving, incidentally, one of the central theses of Marx and Engels, that such things cannot be accomplished without communism, dictatorship, and revolution.

These reflections on the Communist Manifesto lead me to say that labeling some thing or some man communist because communists happen to favor it or agree with him, that easy process by which one disposes of different views by applying a dirty name to them, involves the negation of thought of any kind. If it had been applied consistently in American history it would have deprived us of some ideas and some men that we are proud to think characteristically American. For example, the Communist Manifesto demands free education for all. Are we therefore to recant, and renounce the American doctrine of free education for all?

And what would the F. B. I. say of Thomas Jefferson, who calmly remarked in his First Inaugural, "If there be any among us who wish to dissolve this union, or change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed, as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it."?

Jefferson was not in favor of revolution; he was serene in the face of talk of it because he had confidence in our people, in our institutions, in democracy, and in the value, power, and results of independent thought.

We are now in the midst of a cold war. We must protect ourselves against external enemies, their representatives in this country, and any citizens who may be conspiring to overthrow or betray the government. But the statute books are already filled with laws directed to these ends. It has never been shown that there are so many spies or traitors in this country, that the external danger is so great and imminent that we have to divert the entire attention of our people into one great repressive preoccupation, into one great counterrevolution in which the freedoms of our citizens must be thrown overboard as too burdensome for the floundering ship of state to carry.

It is useful to remember that Jefferson spoke in 1801, when our Constitution was twelve years old, and when the infant republic was in dreadful danger from deep divisions within and from the wars that were raging between the great powers. If he was right in speaking in such a way at such a time, we cannot be far wrong if now ,when America is the most powerful nation on earth, we seek to recapture some of his sanity and courage.

How is the educated man to show the fruits of his education in times like these? He must do it by showing that he can and will think for himself. He must keep his head, and use it. He must never push other people around, nor acquiesce when he sees it done. He must struggle to retain the perspective and the sense of proportion that his studies have given him and decline to be carried away by waves of hysteria. He must be prepared to pay the penalty of unpopularity. He must hold fast to his faith in freedom. He must insist that freedom is the chief glory of mankind and that to repress it is in effect to repress the human spirit.

WHAT WILL I DO TODAY?

What will I do today?
Will I comfort a discouraged soul?
Will I help someone reach his goal?
Or must I stop and say "there's no need
To do someone else a deed".
Will I run a useful race today
And not give up while on my way?

Will I speak that my words be of need?
Will I live that my life be a noble creed?
Or must I live a life in vain,
Without a goal, or destiny, or cause to claim!
Will I give without receiving?
Will I accept criticism without grieving?

Will I look up, not down,
If I fail to accomplish renown?
Will I praise another's success
Even if it's great as mine, or best?
Will I brighten the darkest way?
Will I do these things today?

AN OBSERVATION

Since time immemorial, individual goodness has been striven for, but it is more than a soul-saving goodness that the world now needs. It needs that social goodness which comes only when people respect each other, and when they learn to work together for the common good, and also when they quit looking down their noses at less advantaged persons or groups of persons.

ALABAMA UNMASKS THE KLAN

By JAMES A. DOMBROWSKI

THE AUTHOR

James A. Dombrowski, native of Tampa, Florida, began his education in the public schools of that city. He served in the American Air Force overseas during the First World War, and is at present a member of the Willard Straight Post of the American Legion. He holds the collegiate degrees of B.Ph., Emory University, Georgia; B.D., Union Theological Seminary; Ph.D., Columbia University. Dr. Dombrowski is also a Fellow of the National Council on Religion in Higher Education, and a Rosenwald Fellow. It is well to mention that our author is a native-born Southerner, and with the exception of the years spent in the North at various graduate schools, he has lived all of his life in the South. His main interest at present is in serving as Director, Southern Conference Educational Fund, Inc., New Orleans, La.

The Alabama legislature has outlawed the wearing of hoods in public. This action was taken after a series of incidents in which white persons were the victims of hooded mobs.

One can take some satisfaction in this action by a Southern legislature. It is noteworthy, too, that the Birmingham Post and the Age-Herald have waged a relentless editorial attack upon the Klan, and these papers deserve the thanks of the community.

But the Klan is itself an effect and not the cause of much of the violence that is evident in so many parts of the South today. Segregation (based on the premise of superior and inferior races) is the antecedent cause of the Klan and the associate evils. In spite of all attempts to gloss over the real nature of segregation by such legalisms as "separate but equal," the harsh truth remains that segregation means that the Negro has no rights which the white man is bound to respect.

Segregation means that a Negro can be killed with impunity by any white man who chooses to kill him. That is what every Negro knows in his heart. It follows necessarily that segregation, based on the denial of the rights of certain individuals, inevitably breeds cynicism and disrespect for the laws intended to protect such rights.

We do not know whether or not the Klan officially is responsible for the beatings, threats and mob violence that have shaken Birmingham. We do know, however, that if the number of Negroes shot and killed by "law enforcement" officers of Birmingham in the past two years were tallied, and the circumstances of these police-murders were detailed, the revelations would read like something out of Hitler's Germany. But it is not the facts of violence, as revolting and shocking as they may be, which concern us here. It is that peculiar organization of society which gives rise to such conditions. Also it should be pointed out that Birmingham is not unique in the sadistic tactics of its police.

In New Orleans on Independence Day, 1949, two city police shot and killed an unarmed, twenty-year-old Negro Navy veteran, Crispin J. Charles, Jr. In February of 1948, New Orleans Policeman Alvin Bladsacker fatally shot an unarmed Negro, Roy C. Brooks. Brooks died, it is said, with a bag of peanuts in one hand and his hat in the other. Although under indictment for killing a man in his custody, Bladsacker remained on duty until June, 1949, when a jury cleared him after deliberating seven minutes.

Police have been beating and killing Negroes regularly for many years in New Orleans. So far as we know, in only one instance has a white police officer served time in the penitentiary for killing a Negro, and he was paroled after a few months. And why not? Is it not a basic tenet of the Jim Crow system that in court the word of a member of the "inferior" race has no status against the word of the "superior" race? Does not every police officer know, what every Klansman knows, that if the white man pleads "self-defense," that is the end of the matter?

These are not pleasant or pretty facts, but they are symptomatic of a diseased condition of society which will not be cured until we at least correctly diagnose the disease.

Action against the Klan is to be commended, for it tears the cloak of anonymity from lawlessness. But we should be reminded that such action is merely a palliative and does not deal with the basic illness of which mob violence is a system. What is contra-indicated here is to eliminate legalized segregation and discrimination as a matter of public policy. Only then shall we have a society in the South and the nation that is law-abiding and healthy, a society in which the basic public policy will be conducive to decent and normal human relations, a so-

THE SUPREME WHITE CASTLE

The Castle You Live In — The Earth You Live In — Eternity, the Atom and Environment.

By H. O. MATTHEWS, B. S. M. D.

EDITOR'S NOTE

That the approach of Dr. Matthews to the solution of the vital problems of today is unorthodox, will not be denied. It is to be remembered, however that progress ceases whenever writers or readers feel limited by standardized or conventional doctrines or patterns of thought.

The remarkable thought content, the emphasis on concepts of eternity, eternal life and predestination, render these articles mentally stimulating and captivating to the reader. The editorial staff invites our readers to comment on these articles.

The atom reveals a new world. The most reverend "ego" whips the devil round the castle yard. All humanity must take a new look and assess new values, in a new world. The educated "ego" must be subdued. The atom must be respected.

Whether you believe it or not, you are now living in a new world. Beneath you is mother earth. Above, the sun, moon, and stars, the heavenly planets and illimitable space. All about you is magnificent creation.

You are in the presence and the midst of universal creation. But above all else, you are in the presence of the divine atom. Your very being is a creature of the atom. The atom is the basic element—the building stones—of all the universe.

Man has split the atom and revealed the devastating power within it. Like it or not, man now finds himself compelled to respect that destructive power. He is compelled to give that power more reverence and respect, than he has given "The Risen Christ," in two thousand years.

During those two thousand years, and more, the most learned and right reverend "Father Ego" has chased and back-lashed the devil around the stump, in his own back yard. And at this late date, is there one most aged, most dignified, most learned, and most saintly among these ministers of the gospel, who can definitely say: "I have seen this devil we have chased so long. I can definitely identify him when he is lined up with the other criminals, on judgment day."

Not one can definitely identify this human devil. If they are at all honest—and atomic power now compels human honesty—they are compelled to admit that: like ordinary dogs, they have chased their own tails, round and round. They have whipped and back-lashed no one, other than themselves.

They are compelled to admit this, because all of us are now face to face with the atom and the mighty, immutable, awe-inspiring power which the atom contains. Who among us is brash enough to stand up and say: "This or that atom is evil, abominable and unworthy of human reverence and respect. This atom was divinely intended to be inferior to that, and this white atom is, alone, worthy of supreme emulation and praise."

Yes, whether you like it or not, the world is new. And you are shocked to find most of the basic principles you struggled so hard to learn in your primary, intermediate and college training—most of the basic concepts you have long taken for absolutely granted fact—must now be completely rearranged or forgotten.

For instance, you have long been taught, and had accepted as absolute unassailable fact, that our U. S. A. is a separate, self-contained and sovereign nation. She need only attend her own business and remain out of all the squabbles of the rest of the world. Sadly now, you realize that these concepts are not true, have never been true, and can never be true.

You realize now, that your aches and pains, your wants and desires, your eternal destiny and your aspirations, are identical with all humanity. Therefore, your nation is not dominant and supreme over all nations of the world. Your nation and you are a common, passionate part of all the universe, and may not even attempt to extricate itself.

Soon, you will realize that you and all humanity must take a new look and assess new atomic values in a new world. Your long educated and over-educated, ingratiating "ego" must be and will be subdued by the universal power of the atom.

Certainly, friend, you must have known that through all this rambling preamble we must eventually get down to the bedrock of our present fast-fading civilization. And here we are:

This is a beautiful Sunday evening in June. This is Birmingham, Ala. And on a rare June day, Birmingham can be as beautiful as any city on earth. Especially when viewed from the crest of Red Mountain at twilight.

I drove my car up here, stopped briefly, off the busy ciety which can develop the full potential economically, culturally, and spiritually.

With these facts before us, we can be less than optimistic about the ultimate effect of the anti-Klan act of the Alabama legislature when we learn that at the same time such action was taken the lawmakers were seeking a law which would enable them to continue the disfranchisement of Negroes, now that the Boswell Act has been stricken down by the U. S. Supreme Court.

highway, to have a soulful look across Jones Valley, at the fringe of day, swiftly departing westward. The rose-tinged smoke and steam from molten steel rises in the distance, to mingle with the gold-tinged western twilight. The vari-colored lights of a big city begin to twinkle all over the landscape. The windows of mass dwellings and homes, which admit light and radiate light to and from the very soul of the South, begin to glow dimly in a million directions.

Above me, "Old Iron Man, Vulcan," holds a red light high, as a warning of death riding the highways. Just as well, is this red light a warning of destruction, close upon many unsuspecting souls, now basking in the cozy light of home, far below.

Yes, this is the modern, beautiful Jones Valley. But these modern days are not the first days I have scanned this landscape. I have peered from this same spot, perhaps anxiously, furtively, fearfully, in other days and other times. You see, I was brought over here, a slave, from Africa, several hundred years ago. Yes, I am almost as old as America herself.

Down there in the valley I have clung, wide-eyed and frightened, to mother's apron strings, on the auction block, while she was sold down the river—at times without me, never to see her again. And times without number, I have stumbled, ragged, breathless, bleeding, over these hills, among trees and rocks, dodging bloodthirsty hounds, seeking my freedom from oppression, from want, from fear, and in eager quest of that, rumored, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and that, so desirable, dignity of person and privacy of home.

Sure enough, memory of past generations familiarizes this same terrain. Seated here, in this car, I have struggled a long way. But I have not yet reached my destination—that rumored human respect, dignity of person and privacy of home. Perhaps the unfolding new world will, suddenly, propel me into these universal aspirations.

Look up, my friend! Even though you have long been white and free, you seem vitally disturbed about peace and security. You are anxious about general world conditions, and about certain economic and political questions here at home—bureaucracy, deficit, spending, socialism, taxes, inflation and depression, states rights and civil rights, communism and nazism, hot wars and cold wars.

The Castle You Live In

Friend, look me in the eye!

Of course, you think I am a complete stranger to you. But, I'm not. In these, your most modern days, I have merely evolved from a slave into an average doctor of medicine, pursuing happiness here in the South. It is possible, I have had a slight economic success and the slight degree of happiness such success brings.

All I know of world conditions comes to me in your newspapers. And even though my life is overwhelmingly shaped, conformed, irrtated and exasperated by the same economic and political questions, as is your life, I am helpless to grapple with these problems, in order to shake them off. I am segregated from them.

You have constructed a wide, bottomless moat, surrounding high, insurmountable castle walls, wherein you have retired, to live eternally in your vaunted "white supremacy." It is so pathetic, because you believe you can ignore me, as unworthy of even slightest consideration. You think you have gathered up every shred of your national and international problems and every thread of your superior human destiny, to keep them cloistered within the castle, and solved, at your leisure, by your own superior knowledge and understanding. You even believe you have persuaded your own Great White God to abide with you, and left only the devil and his imps outside with me.

Of course, you are wrong my friend. It should be well known at this late date in history, that the only devil the world knows anything about is human ego. All that stands in opposition to the divine work of The Creator is human ego. And, my friend, The Creator did not build your present, princely dwelling place. This great white castle has been created solely by you and your ego. Therefore, you and your devil—ego—dwell together inside, while The Creator of all things is segregated outside, with me.

E'er long, my friend, you will learn that this devil of yours is very deceitful. He is not satisfied to be confined. He smiles in your face, but will stab even you in the back. He will gnaw into your very vitals and destroy you. Like so many termites, he will eat away and undermine the very foundations of your castle walls. The walls will collapse about your ears.

If you doubt these warnings, simply remember: Ego destroyed the ancient Ethiopian, Babylonian and Egyptian civilizations. Ego destroyed the Greek and Roman civilizations. Ego destroyed the Spanish empire. Ego, and nothing but ego, destroyed Hitler and his nazism. And ego, naught but ego, will destroy you.

Perhaps, my friend, you are one of those who think your civilization is so well organized, so far advanced, so deeply entrenched that it just can't happen here, and to you. This is pathetic, friend. Truly, you do not understand the dangerous character of this devil you are living with. Have you ever stopped to think of the fact that these national and world problems we are discussing are creatures of your own civilized ego. I refer to such things as: Government bureaucracy, deficit, spending, taxes, inflation, and depression, civil rights, states' rights, international free trade, Atlantic Pacts, blockades, and Big Four conferences. You will have to admit: these things are not natural figments and processes of nature. They are not part and parcel of creation. They are figments of civilization—human artifacts—that are diametrically, both opposed to and opposed by, creation and Creator. Therefore, these war-threatening problems, and many more of the world's dire dilemmas, belong to the impish litter of that dangerous devil who abides with you—your own civilized ego. That is why he is so dangerous. He and all these imps threaten to destroy you.

We have said previously: This devil of yours is deceitful. He is not satisfied to be confined within any castle walls. That is true. His imps—all of these very same problems—permeate the air. They fly over your castle walls and across the moat. They come to me in my sleep. They prick, prod, sear and burn me. Then, away they go out of my reach, back to irritate and exasperate you and your household.

While these imps are with you, they cajole and flatter you. They enhance your ideas of superiority and grandeur. Effusively, they praise your efficiency in capturing, caging, nurturing and controlling them —your vaunted civilized progress and advancement. But, all the while they are with me, they whisper to me of your penurious soul, your bigotry and prejudice, your pugnaciousness, your avarice, greed, and your absolute frustration in dealing with these imps and their bisexual progenitor—your devilish ego. Not only do they bring me such gossip, but they show me proof positive, untold examples of verification —such as the last terrible depression, World War Two—still in refrigeration, after ten years —and the dread recession, upon which the world is about to enter.

Well may you see, from this, it is not I, alone, nor just the thirteen million people like me, who are irritated and disturbed by these gossipy, malicious imps. Humans the world over are disturbed. Humanity's pot is boiling and ready for a cannabalistic feast upon your exclusive civilization. And these very imps haul the wood and stir the fire under the pot. Anon, these same little imps will dress you down, cook, carve and serve you up, in greatest glee.

Friend of mine: it is high time to take stock. See where you stand:

The only thing that will subdue this devil of yours and destroy all his litter, within their lair, is absolute faith. Faith alone will prevent civilized destruction. But, mind you, the faith I speak of is not simply what you believe and trust about a Human God and His Son, Christ. This faith is not what we think or reason about life itself and human destiny in life. It is not a set, planned goal in life, nor in eternity. The faith I'm talking about is an automatic, day-to-day action in life, into which thought, reason, nor any selfish consideration of reward, either here or hereafter, enters. For the instant one hesitates in his action, to consider, weigh, estimate, or judge the right or wrong, the good or bad effect of a situation or action, that very instant it is not faith. It is failure.

And most certainly civilization must soon know that civilized ego is a complete failure, in consummation of that divine edict: "Peace on earth, good will toward men." Because ego is selfish. Ego is in dire opposition to all of creation and Creator. In every situation, action, problem or dilemma; in every call of creation, every catastrophy of nature, ego, eternally hesitates to judge first its own protection and preservation, its own reward and aggrandizement, or, else the conceived good and benefit of its own family, group race or nation. All such considerations are in direct opposition to The Eternal Creator, who demands that when an atom, or a human receives creation's call he must go, direct, unfailing, to the bull's eye. Else he fails.

And for all that, who among puny humans is qualified to hesitate, judge and decide whether The Creator's call is just and righteous, or whether for the ultimate best interests of brazen civilizaion? No, no, my friend, every call must be fulfilled without question. That is exactly why we say: "To err is not human, because The Divine Creator does not forgive humans."

No, He does not forgive. He does not allow for any degrees of faith—no partly successful, no near misses. There are no angles to faith. Faith is straight and direct. This may be seen from the fact that, all above faith, all below faith, all to either side of faith, is failure. Thus, that person, or that thing which misses the directness of faith ends in failure. And in failure, both faith and the power to consummate faith are forever lost. There are absolutely no extenuating circumstances assigned to ignorance of the requirements of faith. There is no such thing as repentance unto salvation, of that faith and power lost through failure. There is no mercy, no forgiveness.

Eternity, the atom and environment.

Does that shock you, friend? Since you are taking stock, do you find your stock in trade critically low? Do you feel as though the earth has suddenly whirled from under your feet? I'm sure you do, because the above considerations have been your stay and shield for your waywardness, lo, these many centuries. But this is a new world. And these are the Divine Ordinations of that atom whose devastating power you cut loose, not so long ago. Now you are face to face with that power—eternity.

We have said: The atom is the basic foundation—the building stones—of the universe. Therefore, the atom is eternal. And what will you do with this eternal power? The atom has no ears for prayers and supplications for mercy; no heart and mind for compassion and forgiveness.

If you drop an atom bomb on other humans, there is no mercy, no compassion, no repentance, no forgiveness for hundreds of thousands of them—nothing but destruction. If you hold the bomb and fear to drop it. If you live in mortal dread, that some others might drop the bomb on you and yours. You will find no mercy nor compassion in fear. The fear itself will destroy you. If you agree among yourselves never to drop the bomb, fear remains. Your own ego will never let you thoroughly trust the other fellow's ego—ego is selfish and deceiving.

So, my friend in this new world, you are forever faced with that destructive power. From now on, your destiny is not in the arms of a merciful, compassionate and forgiving superhuman God. You face eternity itself. And eternity is austere, relentless and unforgiving. Heretofore ego and its imps have tried to split up eternity into the present life and future life. And while splitting, your ego has divided the present life into unlimited tiny pieces; in order that ego might claim exclusive and inalienable right to as many pieces as was humanly possible to identify. Such lack of faith toward life is no more.

Eternity, as always, is whole and complete. This present life is merely a temporary gift ,out of the grace of eternal life. Our human lives are not cut off from eternal life, at birth, so that we must struggle to reattain eternal life. No gift of life is inferior to another. No gift of life is ever sinful, degrading or unworthy, under any conceived circumstance. And every instinct and urge, every sense pleasure and every pain of life, is given of divine intent, to keep all things conscious, reverent and respectful of The Creator. These pleasures and pains keep life ever thankful for its known award of pleasure, in consummate faith, shy and dreadful of the destructive pains of faithlessness.

In one nutshell, my life was divine and eternal before conception. It remains divine and eternal at birth and during all mortal life. And my life can be no more, nor less than divine and eternal in death. However, there is one proviso: That I do not abuse and dissipate this divine gift of life, in senseless and faithless pursuit of the exclusive pleasures of life. I must be faithful to every phase of life—both its pleasures and its pains. I am not free to pursue happiness and discard my pains on some other individual, or some other material thing. If I do, it is the painful pleasure, that eternity withdraw my life from me, completely. And all that is now evident and mortal in me passes into oblivon, at death. And above all else, there is here for me no repentance, no compassion, no mercy and no forgiveness.

Thus, you see, eternity is cold and compelling. There is immeasurable force and compulsion within and behind every instinct, every urge, every vibration, every magnetic and electric wave of creation. And what is more, your life and mine is processed, evolved and destinated as much—possibly more—by electro-magnetic waves and vibrations, emanating between us and our eternal environment, as from our passionate instincts, urges and sensations. And what is even more still, these vibrations and waves are not only automatic and involuntary, but absolutely beyond our immediate understanding and appreciation. Certainly, you can find no free-will nor choice, for your overweening ego in that essence of life which is absolutely beyond human understanding.

Yes, friend, the environment is cold and rigorous toward life in us. It forgives not lack of faith. The atom is eternal, and eternity is our invironment. Our lives are a mere part of the eternal life. Our immediate environment is a mere part of eternity. Therefore, our environment is part of us. For, without environment, mortal life does not exist. We find a certain environment which nurtures us when life is given. Some type of environment remains when life is withdrawn. This, in spite of all evolution and change in environment.

For all that, it is our environment itself which projects us unto this passionate being. It is our environment which sustains us in life. It is our environment which accepts our lifeless shells in death—whether mummified, cremated or interred.

Environment knows no mercy nor compassion.

Is it not high time to pause and consider the stark , cold compulsions inherent in your own environment? Certainly, I know the rigors of my own environment. And my environment does not differ, even one iota, from yours, because our lives are given contemporary status in this evolutive period of creation. But today, in your life and mine, by means of our own pleasures and pains, our environment absolutely compels our reverence and respect for its own pleasures and pains.

Just in such over simplified manner as this:

I grow hungry. I must eat. Else, the pains of starvation will destroy me—without compassion. I turn eagerly to my environment for the pleasure of food.

I thirst. And painful thirst will destroy me—without compassion.

I must have clothing and shelter against the rigors of sun, climate, and catastrophic elements. Else, painful exposure will destroy me—without slightest compassion. I eagerly seek through my environment for some type of protection.

I grow weary and exhausted. I must find somewhere in my environment, if only a filthy hovel in an alley, or some moss and dry leaves under a tree, to lie me down to sleep. Else, exhaustion will destroy me, utterly.

If I'm normal and healthy; if I aspire to beget progeny; I must have sex life. Where else, other than environment, is my health safeguarded and progeny conceived?

Where, in all these, is there the least semblance of human mercy and compassion? Where, in the course of their eternal periodicity, even in the duration of any single human life, do these basic instincts and urges hesitate and dally, to allow for human repentance? How and when do they forgive human lack of faith and respect for them?

If you find no forgiveness here, then consider your five senses—eyesight, hearing, smell, taste and touch. None of these, among humans, is perfectly accurate and infallible. All of them are very narrowly limited. No individual is able to see, hear and touch all of creation; only an exceedingly small part of his own environment. But even in his own, near and dear, environment the individual is, most times, grossly mistaken in that which he thinks he sees and hears.

But the point we wish to impress is this: Have you ever stopped to think how coldly, how rigorously, how dispassionately one's environment impinges upon all his senses? In storm or fair weather we accept it. And no matter how terrifying and appalling any environmental catastrophy of sight or hearing, we are compelled to see and hear. We cannot blot that sight or sound from our senses, no matter how we try. It even matters not how distasteful and revolting the odor, we are compelled to breathe twenty times a minute and sense that odor, until it disappears into space, or until we flee and escape from it.

And just in case one is unable to escape, then is it necessary for me to state that the shock of certain sights, sounds, odors and poisonous tastes, may utterly destroy both you and me, without slightest compassion? And is it necessary for me to repeat, that all my thinking, all my planning, all my life's important considerations—even safety and security,, the preservation of life, itself—are bound up in the known rigor and dispassion of these urges, instincts and sensations?

Certain it is, my friend, these are the basic pleasures and pains of all human life, all animal life, all material life, and all spiritual life. These pleasant and painful forces are both mortal and immortal, both temporary and eternal. They may be temporary and mortal, in relation to my own span of life, but they are eternal with every human who preceeded me, with all those humans now blessed with contemporary life, and, as well, they remain eternal with the multitude of human lives yet to follow mine.

And still more certain, my friend, you and I are made conscious of each and every one of our urges, instincts and sensations by that same tiny little atom, and combinations of atoms, as well as electro-magnetic vibration of atoms—in food, air, water, sunlight, landscape, and all our environmental contacts—human or otherwise.

Then, what aspirations in life can rise far above these common, ordinary, simple pleasures and pains? If one aspires to know only the beauty of life—here it is. If one aspires to eternal life, what eternal consciousness can be conceived—in life or death—beyond the conceived beauty and ugliness of his own environment—that which conceives and labors him into being, that which sustains his being, and that which calms his fears in death? What future life can rise above these things?

Actually, these same pleasures and pains are at the bottom of any creed or sect, any denominational system of worship. Any human who claims the right to worship, according to the dictates of his own conscience, worships nothing in his own consciousness, other than these basic pleasures and pains. Anyone who claims the right to speak freely, speaks basically from his experience with these same forces. Anyone who would be free from want and fear, seeks to avoid the intensity of these pains and the privation of these pleasures. Anyone whosoever suffers fear and dread is basically in fear of the known destructiveness of these, the atom's pains.

You have the A-Bomb within your castle.

So, my friend, you dwell with your devilish ego and all his imps, secluded within your castle walls. Know you not, that all these threatening, life-destroying pains abide with you? Know you not, that the explosive atom rests 'neath your own bed?

Your ego has duped you into the belief that you can confine, manipulate and control these pleasures and pains, of your own free will and choice. Ego tells you that you can own the atom, with its tremendous power, and hold it as a threat, to cause human conformity to your way of life. Even by its ownership, you may eternally maintain your castle of white supremacy, wherein others fear to tread. You may drop an occasional atom, or withhold it at will. You may even agree never to disagree, about the power within the atom.

But, my friend, your walls are not high enough, wide enough and thick enough. Your bottomless moat is not deep enough and wide enough to restrict the awesome forces of all creation, when the atom explodes spontaneously. Or, perhaps you may stub your toe upon its detonator while rambling through some dark night, searching for your deeds and abstracts, your constitutions and bills of rights, your last will and testament.

These are only possibilities. However, I'm sure you are aware that the atom is immaculately faithful to you. It dares to tread the castle, and comes faithfully at your every beck and call. The atom hesitates not, to question or decide whether you are worthwhile and worthy; nor, whether your craving is consonant with the atom's own best interest. No, the atom seeks not your reward nor favor.

Then, how much less faith may you reveal toward the atom? How may you seclude yourself, hesitate, reason, judge and decide? Certainly, all the bloodshed, misery and loss of the past centuries could have been avoided, had your forbears denied ego, and consummated faith toward environment.

So, why wait? Now is the time to reinstate faith. It is not a mater of educaion, because your overweeing ego is already too highly educated in the ways of civilization. It is not a matter dependent on the slow processes of evolution and assimilation. Faith waits not, to be educated, evolved, nor assimilated. It waits not upon cooperation and tolerance, nor upon compromise and agreement. Dire destruction is at hand.

complacency would ease the task of getting political acceptance. But the job is more difficult than that; for the appointments will be meaningless unless the persons selected can be trusted by their own people to be truly representative.

We firmly believe that such a course of action by you who are elected to lead all the people of your States will be of multiplying benefit for generations to come.

Respectfully,

DANNY'S OBSESSION

By Herbert Owens Matthews

Bare eight years old was "Dippy" Dan.
He now lives in Chicago.
Born down in Georgia's backwood land,
Where Negroes seldom argue.

Quite shy of all white folk was Dan;
He'd lived there just a year now.
His Pop was lynched by hooded men
As Mom drew near to farrow.

So Danny and his little pals
Oft' drew and jumped in chalk-rings,
And as each youngster took his trials,
These words I heard them shouting:

One, two, t'ree. fo', fi', six, seb'n,
All God's chil'n got go to Heb'n.
Ef God's kin fo'k git da befo',
Den us po' fo'k got hunt back do'.

'Cause dey's seb'n kin fo'ks t' us's one,
An' dem whi' fo'k got mas' an' gun.
Dey tell Sain' Pete whut he mus' do:
"Stan' back da, Pete, an' let us th'u."

"We gwine bu'n cross 'fo' dis hyah gate;
It wa'n yo' massa whu us hate.
Ef He gib black-fo'k much dis lan',
He gwine hab trubble wif dis ban'."

"We laks col'd fo'ks, dey needs dey Heb'n;
Ef dey gits one yahd, we gits leb'n.
Ef dey in dey place—back us street,
Den you-all Heb'n be kep' right neat."

"Now, Pete, You's sher'ff on dis big gate;
Ef you wants yo' job, play dis straight.
You tell yo' massa, un'erstan'?
We's de Klav'n of de Ku K'ux K'an."

DEMOCRACY IN MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

EDITOR'S NOTE

The background and training of Leander G. Blackus qualifies him to discuss the fields of recreation and athletics. Mr. Blackus started his athletic career as a sprinter and broad jumper at the West Philadelphia High School in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, being the first Negro to make that track team. From there to Tuskegee Institute, Alabama as a member of the track, basketball, baseball and football teams. Quarterback of Tuskegee's undefeated and unscored on football team and chosen as an All-American backfield man. He has been a member of the track team at Temple University, Philadelphia, Pa.

By LEANDER G. BLACKUS

A statement in the June issue of the New World Commentator alluded to the possibility of Negro baseball, particularly the Northern teams, expanding their rosters by using players of other groups to balance their organizations. Such a procedure would not only increase the attendance but would go a long way in demonstrating that Negro baseball is willing to reciprocate with the policy of using other race team members, as is now being followed by the major leagues. ment on the part of Negro basement on the part of Negro baseball would lend encouragement and inspire Southern baseball organizations to take steps in this direction. As an example of what can be done along these lines, look at the organization of the Lexington Hustlers, a semi-pro team of colored and white team members, playing to mixed spectators in a non-segregated park. Some owner and manager had to take this bold step to demonstrate to the public the democracy that exists in baseball. This new routine in the realm of sound business principles is paying off at the box office, and in so doing, should mean better facilities for the spectators and better salaries and transportation accommodations for the players.

Negro baseball has grown up and become big business, and should be treated as such. These leagues should realize that the customer is the real umpire and calls the game through his financial support. It appears the following list of suggestions could be considered by the officials of the Negro American League as a yardstick to future development:

Better Parks—It is realized that here is raised a point of argument. There are some who would say that the arrangement with present league parks lends prestige to the organization. That in this way the Negro League is brought before the white public. Such discussions only mean that someone, somewhere, is afraid to face up to the responsibility of business organization. It seems wise for any business to own its establishment and not be at the mercy of an owner who has within his power the opportunity of closing out this business by merely declaring that the facility cannot be used this year. The money spent in rentals and percentages could be applied to park development. Income could be derived from concessions, park rentals, etc.

Schedules—With park ownership, schedules could be arranged to meet league requirements and not be dependent upon when some other league team will be on the road. This would put a halt to the long bus jumps now taken by Negro players. It does not make good business sense for a team playing in Alabama to go as far north as New York, northwest to Indiana, or southwest to Texas to carry out its season's schedule. Such movement is too hard on players and equipment and impossible for the public to follow through reader interest.

Players—Need to understand that baseball is big business and they are business men and must conduct themselves as such on and off the field. This point leads into the conditioning and coaching of players. A good coach with an understanding of men and public relations is necessary for the improvement of the league. Players' contracts are not all that should be desired, and a good lawyer in this department would do much to make for more harmonious agreement on the part of players and management.

Publicity—From the news releases at present, it is impossible to give up-to-the-minute statistics on teams and/or players. There appears to be no central clearing of results, game by game. Should a club secretary feel so disposed, one newspaper will carry Team "A" in first place and another Team "B." A central clearing of statistics is necessary for public consumption to keep interest alive in home teams. A good league publicity department would solve this problem and make all sports writers very happy.

Broadcasting—Why not broadcast road games so spectators can follow the team while playing away from home. The fan is interested and wants to know what the boys are doing.

Farm Club Arrangement—There is no reason that farm club arrangement cannot be explored with major leagues to serve as a feeder for the national pastime. This suggestion will act like dynamite upon some Negro team owners, as they feel such a move would curtail their present autonomous status; however, to survive they must revamp their thinking and plan for the future. Baseball is a cooperative effort and not the whims or wishes of a few bosses. Semi-pro and industrial leagues should be encouraged and assisted by the Negro league. Working arrangements should be made with these, as the Negro League has a working arrangement with the major leagues. In this way, young players would have a chance to develop and not be ruined before their big opportunity arrives. This would also make some old players in the Negro League wake up, as they would realize that they do not have a life lease on their jobs. Last, but not least, baseball schools on some Negro college campuses would go a long way toward game, player development and league improvement, and would attract more players and spectators to the regular contests.

These are the views of the writer, to whcih you may or may not agree, but whatever your opinion, send it in and we assure you space in this column for your thinking.

YESTERDAY, TODAY, TOMORROW

By Isadore Sperling

191. Some people are so engrossed in the petty details leading to a great reputation that they lose sight altogether of the good deed which must dwell within the great reputation.

Such foolish reputation builders are strikingly similar to the mad carpenter who busied himself day and night with the details of saw and hammer, board and nails telling everybody it is a great home he is building.

Finally, the whole town shook its head in deep pity when it was horrified to discover that what the mad carpenter turned out is not a great home for the living, but a huge coffin for the dead.

192. "There is nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so". Shakespere.
Look. The excellent steel in the hand of a thoughtless breaker of the Divine Law spells untold danger to society.

The excellent steel in the hand of the thoughtful surgeon spells no end of hope and healing to society.

193. The birth of a nation is very much like the birth of an individual of the nation.

There must be pangs, tears, blood with the birth of the smallest nation, exactly as there must be pangs, tears, blood with the birth of the smallest babe.

Neither the birth pangs, nor the cries cause alarm to the good midwife.

The good midwife does watch with the keenest eye the flow of the life-blood and it is this life blood at the birth of the littlest nation which gives the best friends of humanity the greatest concern.

Prophet Ezekiel sums it up succinctly in the verse of the Lord to Israel: "And I passed close by thee and I noted thee wallowing in thy blood and I said to thee—in thy blood live and I said to thee—in thy blood live."

194. It is a gross error to maintain that Wednesday, May 11, 1949, the United Nations lifted the head of Israel to a nation among the 58 nations.

Matter of fact, had not Israel been all things essential to true nationhood way before that Wednesday, May 11, 1949, nothing from the pen, mouth, or hand of the United Nations on the 11th of May, 1949 would have helped Israel one inch to rise to its seat among the 58 nations.

There is this undeniable truth: as long as the seat of Israel, seat 59, was not filled, so long the head of the United Nations had been crying for a crown it never earned.

When the high office of that august assembly respectfully walked up to the representative of Israel and asked him to fill that vacant seat, 59, among the 58 seats of the nations, he whomever God had endowed with eyes to see, could plainly see that by so doing, the United Nations at last obtained and secured for itself a shining crown which most admirably fits the head. How about Israel's headcover? That? Look at it? Look well at the crown of thorns on the tear-stained, martyred brow.

Countless millions of martyrs, women, children, greybeards, thru the tragic twenty centuries, the darkest Diaspora of Israel, together with the last six million victims, burnt alive, buried alive by the Teutonic Messiah of a Great Germany tied tenderly these thorns together and most tenderly they see to it that it fits perfectly him who wears it.

Is there any need for any other crown?

195. Every bit of it occurred on the 11th of May, 1949 when the representative of Israel rose from his seat, mounted the stage and occupied the new seat among the nations, seat 59.

Turn to Next Page

The watchful reporters never noticed the occurrence. The astute camera eye never caught a glimpse of what took place behind the representative of the new nation.

The public, the newsmen, the officials were positive that only one single representative from Israel answered the call of the high officer of the august assembly, only one mounted the stage.

Just the same, a host, no small host, lined up close behind, in perfect order, in perfect silence, followed the representative of Israel to his seat.

No other representative of the 58 representatives ever had a similar host to line up close behind and follow him to his seat upon the stage, unnoticed and unknown to the public, to the camera, to the whole newspaper guild, gluttons for novelty, for the unusual.

Do you know who that host of honor was? It was the Jewish patriarchs of old. It was Moses, Joshuah and all the prophets. It was Jehudah Halevi, the great Hebrew poet of Spain of 1000 years ago. All dreamers of Zion who forever sang of the Resurrection of Israel in Eretz Israel were there making up the Host.

Indeed, it makes no more sense to say that they were not there, that they could not be there, because they are dust and their words are dead, as for example, to say that it is vain for America in the Supreme Moment to call upon the spirits of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln, because these makers of America, these moulders of America's soul, are dead and their words are so much dust.

Perhaps, this explains why the face of the representative of Israel on that day, Wednesday, 11th May, 1949, shone with a light that Israel of yore saw in the face of the great Law Giver, when he came down from Sinai to make it known for all times that a new nation was born.

196. When Israel swapped one God for the Golden Calf, God put Moses to the severest test.

God said to Moses: let me destroy this bad nation and create a new nation from thine issue.

Moses was sorely tempted. Did not the nation forget the miracles, the liberation, Sinai, the Ten Commandments, in amazingly short time? Should he not say now: "God, let Thy Will come to pass?

But then Moses wrestled with that rising passion and suppressed it, as a man suppresses a fire about to get out of hand and burn his house to ashes over his head.

"And Moses returned to God and said: Indeed this nation has committed a great sin and they made for themselves a god from gold. But now if Thou wilt forgive their sin, very well and if not, pray, erase me from Thy Book and what Thou hast written" . . . and spare them.

God replied to Moses: I will not destroy a nation, when that nation has a leader who loves the people more than he loves his own life, and the lives of his own children.

197. The Hebrew word for bride really means: all things.

Talmud tells us why the Hebrew word for "all things was selected to mean a bride.

From times out of mind the scholars in the community attended weddings, especially the weddings of the poor.

These scholars came with gifts and songs. The purpose of the gifts and songs was clear: to endear the bride to the heart of the groom.

The scholars vied with each other in the songs, which showered compliments upon the bride.

One scholar after another sang before the bride and in each song there was a spontaneous word wreath, so to speak, which chanted that the bride is all things that a groom desires.

He who sings well to the bride and even dances well with the bride to make the wedding cup run over with joy, dances before God, the sages said.

198. The ancient legend knows exactly how man came into his life-allotment of three score and ten.

The Lord addressed the first man: be strong in body; be mighty of spirit; be of great faith; possess far flung ambitions; let thy thirst for knowledge embrace the whole earth and rise to the seventh heaven. The years of thy life shall number 30.

Man listened and shed bitter tears: Lord, man cried, Thou hast given me all these wonderful gifts and such short time to enjoy these gifts.

The Lord replied: I have no more years for thee. Wait. Perhaps, a little later I will find more years and I will add them to thy years.

Then the Lord spoke to the donkey: a beast of burden thou shalt be; all thy life thou shalt bear upon thy bent back enormous treasures which will never give thee one single pleasure; under lash thy pains will never grow less. The years of thy life shall number 30.

The donkey fell down to earth, kicked up its heels and broke into a terrific howl. Lord, the beast cried, since my lot on earth is soaked thru and thru with pain, must I suffer 30 long years? Lord, have mercy upon me and cut my misery to ten years.

The Lord asked man: dost thou desire to pick up the 20 years which the donkey won't have?

Yes, Lord, man exclaimed with great joy.

Then the Lord said to the dog: a watch beast thou shalt be; in heat, in cold, without a roof, a beggar of bones thou shalt be; every day of thy life thou shalt feel the deep hurt of ingratitude by the hard boot and sharp cane of thy human master. The number of the years of thy life shall be 30.

For the first time the dog wept as only an unhappy dog can weep; Lord, the dog stammered between one sob and another, since I must suffer as Thou sayest I must,, do shorten my life span to ten years.

The Lord heeded the plea of the dog and this explains how 20 more years were added to man's fifty years, thus rounding out man's life allotment to the three score and ten.

Therefore, the first 30 years of the life of man mark power, ambition, creative achievement.

The twenty years, succeeding the first 30, mark sweat, grunt, the back-breaking burden, remindful of the donkey.

Last come 20 years of instinctive saving. Like the dog at his feet between the years 50 and 70 man stands watch over his life accumulations.

Mind you, these divisions in the life of man are distinct enough when normalcy has the upper hand.

But no sooner does an upheaval of some sort break loose from somewhere, than the exception to the rule almost becomes the rule: a man below 30 may be seen acting exactly like a man of 60: the miser standing watch over accumulation in a manner to remind the spectator of the proverbial dog of the hay-stack. Nobody must come close to enjoy a mouthful of the good hay, even tho the hay can not possibly hold out one mouthful of joy to the jealous watchdog.

199. A warning from the Talmudic sage comes down to the men and women of this age of the split-atom:

"He who calls his fellow man a bad name, has no portion in the life of Hereafter."

What is this life of Hereafter if not life tomorrow and tomorrow?

Has there ever been in the long life history of man an age more fraught with frightful name-calling than our age of incredible speed and incredible slander?

Can man hope to have his fair portion in a good life tomorrow and tomorrow, if the Fear of Heaven will not stop man calling his fellow man bad names, before the catastrophic consequence of the measureless evil destroys everything?

200. "He who says a thing in the name of him who fathered the saying, brings Redemption into the world." Talmud.

Many centuries before our mounting discoveries and inventions, long before the printing press, Wisdom tied up human redemption with spiritual honesty, with the care to give credit to him who first set down or enunciated the good saying.

The eighth Commnadment, Thou shalt not steal, applies even with greater force today: do not steal a neighbor's discovery, a neighbor's invention. Mention the name of the essayist whose essay you pronounce. Do not deceive your readers, or hearers that you are the father of the Wisdom. Do lend Redemption to your life, your day, your community. They need your example for their Redemption.

BOOK REVIEWS

TRIAL AND ERROR: BY DR. CHAIM WEIZMANN

REVIEWED BY RALPH GIBSON

EDITOR'S NOTE

Mr. Ralph Gibson, the author, is an Englishman, 27 years old, a native of London, and a Bigelow Felow on the law faculty of the University of Chicago. He is a barrister of the Middle Temple and a graduate in law from Brasenose College, Oxford. During the last world war he was an officer in the Kiny's Dragon Guards stationed in the Middle East in command of troops of the Arab Legion.

This book is the autobiography of Dr. Chaim Weizmann, a leader of Zionism for fifty years and now the first President of the State of Israel Reconstituted. Of all the recent books on Zionism and Palestine, it is assuredly the most valuable boon to the specialist and to that gentle person whom we define as the "general reader," not in condescension but in envy.

For the gentle general reader, then, the books is "essential;" and, happily unlike many "essential" books, it is an exciting tale. It is the tale of a truly noble nature, of a great and humble person whose humility never degenerated into submissiveness. It is the tale of a man who was one of the foremost leaders, who led the leaders of a great international movement and society that was also the political expression of a "nation." Here was a "prime minister" with the shaky powers, the equivocal position and the variable finances of the head of a voluntary organization who met with and dealt with the statesmen of great nations. It is a tale of struggle and of wanderings and of devotion and of disappointment: it is a bitter tale for us to read but is not written in bitterness.

In the past ten years the public debate on Palestine has grown too shrill for proper comprehension: those who knew little became shrill themselves, and those who knew much were themselves doing the talking. Now that the tumult is dying—and the continuing problems are coming to the surface—we are fortunate to have a book that will remind us again of the quality and texture of Zionism and of the long patient history of its leaders and of its lesser folk.

For those who have long been interested in Palestine and Zionism, particularly for those Western non-Jews who have been concerned to discover what it is that the West has done to the Jew and what, in so doing, the West has done to itself, the book is of supreme interest; and not least for what it does not say. There is a restraint to Dr. Weizmann's pen that was inevitable (however much it disappoint us) when the author was writing as the head of a movement, in which there are serious unresolved differences, at a time when unity in the face of desperate peril was the author's desire as much as it was his duty to preserve it.

There is plain and direct talk on the content of Zionism as Dr. Weizmann saw it when the movement was young: he is outspoken in his belief that the movement depended on the passion and faith of the little people as against the subtle maneuvering of the wealthy of the "statesmen." He is explicity in his condemnation, as he was then, of the espousal by Herzl of the British offer of Uganda as a place of settlement in 1903. On the problems that face Israel today, however, he is less decided.

The Constituent Assembly of Israel, now meeting in Jerusalem to adopt a Constitution for the State, is faced with problems to which the answer depends, almost entirely, upon what belief the members hold as to the true content of Zionism. Should there be a civil law for all citizens in matters of personal status, of marriage and the like, with the right to go into religious courts if the parties wish? Or should there be an exclusive jurisdiction, as was the case under the Mandate and Turkish rule, for the courts of the Jewish, of the Moslem, and of the nine Christian communities? And if there be this exclusive jurisdiction, should the non-orthodox Jews have access to courts of their own beliefs? Is Israel, in other words, a vehicle to carry that culture that shall the expression of the many shall be the expression of the many facets of Jewish culture, with the enrichment and impoverishment that have come with the harsh experiences of the Diaspora, or is Israel to be an introverted archaism, the shrine of an ethnic faith that knows only orthodoxy?

This latter alternative will, we know, not happen. The quality of social life in Israel is far from the ailing antiquarianism, from the turgid theocracy, of which it is on occasion irresponsibly accused. But the problem remains: what shall Israel be? What shall the relation be to it of the Jews of the secular West, whose Liberal and Reformed Judaism, in its organized manifestations, has taken on so much of the low-temperatured moralism of the churches of the West? What shall the word "Jew" mean in after years, supposing hopefully that the West cease to clutch its old sin, whereby the word came to mean a "situation" into which the West has forced those persons within a definition laid down by the "Gentiles" of the West?

We would be wrong to feel disappointed at the absence of answers to these questions. It is sufficient that there is much to be learnt from Dr. Weizmann's story of his life and work. For Dr. Weizmann was an "authentic" Jew: a most completely "authentic" Jew in the sense that Jean-Paul Sartre defined him: "Authenticity . . . consists in having a true and lucid consciousness of the situation, in assuming the responsibilities and risks that it involves, in accepting it in prde . . ."* What that situation was, and is, what it meant to accept it "in pride" and creatively, we can learn from Dr. Weizmann's auobiography.

It is invaluably instructive, also, to read of the achievement of the Balfour Declaration. Dr. Weizmann, and other leaders of Zionism, were doing their job superbly well, but, like all national statesmen and Trade Union leaders everywhere, they were representatives of one cause and not students of international affairs. They were more mindful of their own plans than of the susceptibilties of others, although, be it said, they were more sincerely mindful of the rights of other inhabitants of Palestine than the more vociferous Arabists. To have asked them to have rejected the Balfour Declaration in 1922, when it became apparent that the cynicism and stupidity of the Anglo-French Treaty of 1916, the secret Sykes-Picot Treaty, had cheated the Arabs of their independence and had, into the bargain, destroyed as a result that agreement that Weizmann had made wih King Feisal in 1919, would have been to ask too much of angels, let alone hard-pressed men. But the lesson is still important. In 1919, as we see from a letter that Weizmann cites, King Feisal could still write to Mr. (now Justice) Felix Frankgurter that Zionism and the revival of the Arabs complemented each other since neither were imperialist; but when the Treaty was signed, in 1922, when greater Syria was divided up between the British and the French and Feisal robbed of his throne in Damascus, and by that same treaty the Jews were afforded "rights" in Palestine under the Balfour Declaration that was written into the Mandate, how could the Arabs feel so cerain that Zionism was not imperialist? Was it not riding in on the back of British imperialism? The conflict of Arab and Jew in Palestine may be laid at the door of British imperialism, but only to the extent that Britain signed and honored the Sykes-Picot Treaty, whereby Zionism was converted, in the eyes of the Arabs, into a tool of that imperialism. The frequent allegations of a deliberate policy of "divide" and "rule" are too clumsy an analysis.

We cede that this degree of detached objectivity, arguable even with the aid of 27 years of hindsight, could not have been expected of the Zionist leaders. They were convinced of the integrity of their own intentions and they lived in a naughty world. Dr. Weizmann tells the story with honesty and simplicity. But the story contains a dolorous lesson for all of us, not only for Britain. Dr. Weizmann was, as we have said, a superbly authentic Jew. He reacted proudly and in creative spirit to the situation that the West had created for the Jew. But there were other forces that retarded his work. Had the promises to the Arabs been honored, we had perhaps seen a productive and enriching partnership between Arab and Zionist in greater Syria; but the actions of the West forced the Arabs and Jews into conflict and, as the conflict grew sharper and the need for allies more desperate, both Arabs and Jews, or many of them, began to forget that they were both victims, just as Indians and Negroes forgot in their recent battles in the suburbs of Capetown, in South Africa. Let us hope that Arabs and Jews will soon remember their identity of interest and injury; let us hope that the West will soon earn and deserve their forgiveness.

Dark Hour, Before Dawn

By Herbert Owens Matthews

Base man: have you not ever seen
The rut, the shame you wallow in?
Ten thousand years, yes, even later,
You've looked, yet overlooked, Creator.
Since He's unseen—He's vagrant elf—
Since He's unknown, project yourself.
You're free of will, well qualified
To consummate all He's denied.
You understand Divine intent;
Manipulate, to heart's content,
Your favored projects, lust and greed,
Select and grade Creator's seed.

Pale wastrels, came to Afric's sand,
To bind proud humans, foot and hand,
To lead them to these virgin shores,
Besmirch them with the meanest chores.
The wastrels lashed and lynched and bled;
Our forbears laughed and sang and prayed.
The vilest thrusts were parried off.

'Twould seem, these facts should be enough
To prove them strong, courageous, brood,
Most worthy of Christ's brotherhood.
How stamp us of inferior breed,
And most unworthy of their seed?

We're proud, our forbears and equator
Burnt in us faith to our Creator.
They tanned our skin, they oiled our hair,
Made our lips curl and nostrils flare;
Kept our brain cool 'neath heavy shell,
But gave us song to sing in hell.
They armed us for your vile deceit,
For all degrading things we meet.
That's why our song from jungle hill,
Your thongs, as slaves, have failed to chill.
That's why we stand, this early morn,

Erect and facing this new dawn.
For, by the gray, dim, distant light,
We're promised ending of the night.
The rising sun will end your sway
And light for us Creator's way.
Your hate, your fraud, your tricky pelt,
Grandiose will, within itself,
No more can heap inhuman shame
Upon our souls—His faithful clan.
Last night was long and harried, when
Our humble, contrite, loyal, pain
Brought no reward—e'en countless slain.
But now, the night must end.

E'er day, you'll know that black and white
Were fiendish dreams conceived last night
And all creation must unite,
To void complete destruction.
For, when you split that atom—bombs,
"'Twas that one split which sealed your doom"
So says, all power of creation.
Then e'er 'tis dawn, 'twere best to see,
You spite yourself, despising me.
Best, grasp, my hand and trudge with me;
We, both of us, stand on the brink.
And friend:-'Tis far, far later than you think.

TRAVELING THE ROAD OF LIFE

By LIL WINGFIELD

While traveling the road of life
we may sometimes meet
Envious foes and belligerent souls,—these we may not happily greet.
Our roads may be longer than others but our courage may be stronger than our brothers',
And as we travel along with jubilant song we may tarry
To rest our weary feet and drink from some wayside well, cool and deep.
But as hours fade while we rest in the shade we may fall asleep
And dream wonderful, fantastic dreams of happenings further up the road of life;
But we dream not of hatred or guile or injustice, nor of turmoil and struggle and strife;
That miles ahead may bring hours of dread and times of sacrifice.
But we dream on and are content in our dreams of ecstasy,
And hours pass fast as we idly
tarry by the side of the way;
Night draws near and still finds us here where we'd stopped with the ending day.
Finally we awaken from dreams that are shaken
And encounter the long distance before us.
Our loads grow heavier as we pursue the miles and miles
That follow; but we walk on through the rain, through the cold and the mist though our friends are but few,
For we have faith in Him who watches from above all the things we do;
Who leads us through impetuous storms and perilous battles of fear,
And will always guide and abide with us though fate may seem near.
With exultant hearts and uplifted heads we walk triumphantly on,
For we know He will guide us wherever we go; we know we walk not alone.

We need everlastingly to submit the school, the church, the press and the radio to a searching observation lest they become media for propagating prejudice, and at the same time to use them to the fullest extent to promote the spirit of good will, kindliness to all, a deep reverence for human personality and respect for civil, religious and political liberties.

FACTOGRAPHS

The "third rail" used at first in the electrification of New York City's transportation was the invention of Granville T. Woods, a Negro of free parentage, of Columbus, Ohio. This invention was brought to the attention of the public by a race riot in 1880 instigated by steam locomotive engineers who had lost their jobs as a result of Woods' achievement. Woods, however, had only begun his inventive career. Soon after the riot he invented a system, technically known as induction telegraphy, which made telegraphic communication possible between moving trains. Subsequently he perfected twenty-five other inventions, some of which have added greatly to the mechanical development of our country by the American Bell Telephone Company. His extraordinary inventive genius secured for him a position in Thomas Edison's laboratory at a salary of $10,000 yearly.

Howard Latimer, a Negro, made the original drawings for Alexander Graham Bell's first telephone. He too was one of the "Edison Pioneers." Among many useful inventions credited to Latimer was a carbon filament for the Maxim Electric Lamp. Soon after this achievement, he became chief draftsman for the General Electric Company. Latimer directed the installation of the electric light systems of New York, Philadelphia, and London.

COMPULSORY HEALTH INSURANCE

By H. OWENS

How shall we protect and maintain free government and the present high standard of living? How prevent dictatorship? How prevent degeneration of human character int osocial irresponsibility? A plan to exercise governmental concern and governmental responsibility, yet maintain individual concern, individual effort, ndivdual thrift, and individual social responsibility.

This is America, the land of the free. This is U .S. A.—whose subjects boast the world's greatest individual freedom, the greatest per capita wealth, the highest standards of living, the longest expectancy of life, and the highest degree of per capita health standards, of any nation on earth. In addition to all this, America claims to have made the greatest scientific, techsical and cultural advancement in its three hundred years, of any other nation, in more than three thousand years.

This is our great Uncle Sam. How did Uncle get that way? Certainly, not by wars and conquest. Certainly, not by power politics and mere political maneuvering. Certainly, not by mere governmental fiat and governmental snooping into the regulated and regimented lives of its subject peoples. All these methods have been passionately tried and found wanting, by certain other contemporary nations, which now trail us, far to the rear.

Uncle has exercised a necessary supervision and limited control over some exigencies and crises, affecting the health and lives of his nephews and nieces, from the very founding of the republic. But not until recent years has there been a desire or tendency to absolutely control, manipulate and process human life by governmental fiat.

However, such recent tendencies are not to be laid entirely at the feet of government, itself. These tendencies have culminated from demands of Uncle's relatives for freedom from oppression, from want and from fear—security. The original settlers came here to find freedom from governmental oppression, want, and fear. Their progeny are still pained by certain degrees of want, but, mainly, they dread reinstitution of that old governmental oppression. So, the fight never ends.

Yes, a large percentage of Uncle's nephews and nieces constantly send up supplications for security from want and fear. And because of this paternalistic attitude toward government, the people have been forced to bear, more and more, paternal chastiement and dictation. Just because of these annoying supplications, Uncle Sam has sapped up the wealth and power of the highest class of people, and leveled them off into an indistinguishable alloy with the middle classes. Then Uncle has tried to use this assimilated and digested wealth and power as a lever, to elevate his lowest class of citizens up to a level, comparable to that alloy of middle classes, from he point of view of security. But, we fear the end result will be a very poor, unstable alloy of none but the lowest class of poverty and want.

However, Uncle has tried. And in this effort, the government has demanded and compelled the overwhelming majority of its working class of citizens to lay aside a pittance for a rainy day of unemployment, retirement and old-age assistance. The power of compulsion begets reasons for more power. The people, generally, accepted without serious protest this levelling off, amalgamation and alloy, of powerful wealth with the middle classes. And the middle classes accepted, without serious protest, this compulsory elevation of the lowest laboring classes into a status of financial security, and stability comparable with their own.

Now, this newly acquired governmental power is greedy for more power. Out of this maelstrom of amalgamation and absorption, the professional class of citizens, alone, stands aloof, free, and at least, partly independent of governmental regulation and regimentation. They are now begrudged even this partial independence. Because the children who labor have raised a hew and cry unto Uncle, for welfare funds, pensions, greater disability compensationss, and they scream to high heaven about the high cost of sickness and disability, the supposed poor distribution of medical care, and lack of adequate hospital facilities, in certain areas. So, Uncle Sam proposes to do something about it all, even if what he does turns out later to be the wrong thing.

For these varied reasons, one burning issue at present is the governmental version of compulsory health insurance. This issue has the nieces and nephews puzzled, distraut a wrangling among themsc But under the government plan, the government would undertake to furnish to every citizen, free of cost, complete medical, dental, specialist and necessary hospital care and services. The plan in its entirety, to be financed by a compulsory tax on payrolls, wages, salaries and other income, collected at the source.

None would be exempt from the tax, though ostensibly any would be free to accept or not accept government-sponsored care. It is specifically stated that any physician may join the government group, or remain in private status of his own free will. And any patient may accept regimented medicine, or seek his own choice of physician, of his own free will, and at his own expense.

At any rate, the tax is the burning issue with the laboring man. For ninety per cent of Uncle's relatives desire their Uncle's periodic allowances and emergency assistance. But, it hurts when they are required to first give Uncle value received —work for Uncle—in the form of unavoidable taxation. If only Uncle could make his millionaire nephews foot the entire bill. If only he could milk the giant corporations and trusts for the full amount.

Destroy the middle class and dictatorship follows.

But, as we have just pointed out, Uncle Sam has sponged up the wealth of all his millionaire nephews, in other taxes, and leveled them down to a state of indistinction from the middle class. And Uncle has learned the fact, the hard way, that the big corporations and trusts are not the independent, soulless monsters they were once thought to be. All of them are completely built, owned, operated and controlled by the great middle and laboring classes of citizens. If these corporations are destroyed by taxation, then the middle class will be destroyed, and leveled down, so that no class exists, except laborers and indigent poor.

Then what? The laboring class and indigent cannot provide the required number of jobs of compensable work, to sustain itself in the present high standards of living. Neither can free democratic government undertake to so provide in toto. Either living standards must be very materially reduced, or some form of dictatorship—socialism, nazism, or communism—must take over. And it is certain, sure, that none of these systems of dictatorship is qualified to maintain the present living standards.

Under communism, for instance, a man cannot obtain a suit of clothes, just because he sees it, likes it, and wants it. All his pleasant desires are submerged in the common good. Somone in Moscow must first decide and vouch for the fact, that a suit of clothes for a certain man in the Ural Mountains is consonant with the common good of all Russians.

Because of this very fact, the farmer in the Ural Mountains becomes indifferent over producing a bumper crop of sheep. And if he does produce them, he holds them to the last minute, just to gloat over his own possessions. Frequently, he turns over the last of them to the community stockyards, only at point of a gun. Since sheep and everything else are valued by a standard of gold, it is easy to see how this farmer's indifference and delay slows the stream of gold on its way upward to Moscow. Then politics and governmental red tape slows and dissipates the flow of gold back downward to the sheepherder's common share, in the mountains.

Thus, the sheepherder and all other Soviets remain in continual and perpetual depression. They are forever conscious of needs and desires — pleasures and pains—which are never completely satisfied—a low standard of living. In order to maintain a high, pleasant standard of living, gold must circulate rapidly and freely. Pleasures, needs and desires must be satisfied, almost at slightest whim, for the greatest number of people. The stream must not become sluggish. One must not wait for some important personage to wake from an afternoon nap, or return from dinner, to sign a voucher, in order that some other individual may obtain a piccolo, or a white elephant, if that be his desire—his pleasure.

The same is true, possibly in less degree, of socialism. The universal high standards of living which now prevail could not and would not be maintained under socialism in America. That is simply because the flow of gold inevitably becomes sluggish and stagnant, by superior recognition and reasoning for the common good of all, in every possible situation.

So then, we have stated: the professions are the last, ostensibly free and independent, upper crust of the middle class. 'Twould be well to keep it so. They are the last bulwark of a free and independent people. The professions are now neither subservient to government, nor to class. But they serve both.

The middle class is the buffer which holds the oppressive heel of government up off the neck of the laborer and indigent poor. The history of the middle ages and the French Revolution will detail just how oppressive government can be. Even Hitler's Gestapo and the present Russian secret police will testify to this, exceedingly well. But free and independent professions will guarantee the complete freedom of the middle class, yet a while longer. If the professions are regimented under the governmental heel, it will not be long e'er dictatorship descends upon all the people.

The many compulsions of the government plan of insurance—a threat to freedom of religion and freedom of person.

Dictatorship thrives on compulsion. It is well to remember that very point. And it is well to remember that the essence of the government's plan of health insurance—the gold sustaining element—is a compulsory payroll tax, from which none would be exempt.

While this is being remembered ,we should also become cognizant of the fact that there are many more potential compulsions involved, than at first appears. Actually, this compulsory health plan touches precariously upon two basic American ideals—freedom of religion and freedom of person.

Freedom of religion is jeopardized, in that we have in this country uncounted numbers of a religious sect, known as faith-healers. They are certainly religiously averse to any form of regular medical care. Yet they are not exempt from the tax to support it. Would they be compelled, by government edict, to accept it? Who can say at this early date? But, the probabilities are that some one or more politicians would conclude that these religious fanatics were a threat to the general health, and dupe other politicians into their way of hinking. And just here, it would not be amiss to include the many thousands of Christian Scientists with this religious group.

The threat to person appears, in that every person insured will have a number, just as under the social security system. All his personal and private diseases and disabilities become a permanent record in Washington, under that number. These records will be open to any future political snooper, and may be used for political purposes, or any other conceived use.

But above all else, each physician is specifically given freedom of choice, whether he will serve under the plan or not serve. Therefore, some will not join up. In that case the insured who chooses to have the service of that patricular physician must pay out of his own pocket, even though he has previously been taxed. Under such circumstances, is it not probable some independent physicians will be subject to boycott and other public pressure, from certain malicious individuals and organizations, to either force him into the system or ruin his business? Thus compulson begets compulsion.

And under this system, all and sundry will crowd in upon the poor overworked physician, often unnecessarily, just to get his tax dollar's worth. The doctor will see 50 to 100 in his limited time. Then he must spend most of the night collecting and compiling records and reports, in order to collect his compensation. Thus the mortality rate among the profession will increase.

However, the most terrible threat is: such governmental paternalism tends to break down the dignity and sanctity of the home. The head of the family is temped to shift his individual responsibility onto the shoulders of government. He becomes shiftless, thriftless and irresponsible toward family. He knows the government is committed to care for his family in sickness and in death. He may desert them without compunction. And such social ideas of irresponsibility will gnaw into the very fiber of the nation; thus, weaken the nation as a whole.

When the national fiber is weakened, one compulsion will lead on to another, one governmental regimentation will call for another, just for security reasons until there is neither freedom nor security under complete dictatorship.

Individual responsibility for person and home transcends governmental responsibility.

We must take the position that the individual responsibility must be maintained. But it would not imply that government has no direct responsibility for the health of its people generally .We firmly believe in the sheer impossibility of government infusing itself into every ache and pain to which the flesh is heir, in an equitable and beneficial manner.

Thinkers hold that government is responsible to the people as a whole — not to any class of people, not to poor states nor to rich states, not to veterans nor non-veterans, not merely to the underprivileged and indigent. All of the people do not need, nor want health insurance. Therefore, the government is not responsible for health insurance for those who do need it and want it. The greatest error in Uncle Sam's government is its attempt to legislate for benefit of special classes, special situations, special areas, and special occasions. These special financial crises never end. And this special class legislation — to agriculture, to veterans, to poor states for the indigent and old-age assistance, to those merely unemployed, and for education—these are extremely wasteful, and especially threatening to the economy of the country. These especially cause deficit spending.

There is no good reason why the government should spend billions erecting special hospitals for veterans, and restrict them exclusively to veterans. Any hospitals built by government should be open to use of all the people, bar none. Any man who suffered loss or disability in service of his country, is entitled to gratitude and appreciation of all the people and this gratitude may be shown in special ways and special favors. But the mere fact that one served his country ,and for various reasons another did not, should cause no special preferment to the one who served. Therefore, all non-service-connected disability payments and services should be discontinued. These are special class favors and very wasteful, both in the payments themselves and in the cost of administration of the payments and services.

Now is the time for government — state and national — to assert the unassailable principle that: Government is responsible to all the people. And this principle must be stoutly defended by government, against all pressure groups, political, or otherwise. Because our government is truly of the people, for the people, and by the people. Therefore, government is responsible to the people as a whole, not to any particular group of people, no matter how rational certain groups of pressure may sound.

Government has been ignorant of the fact: that every ache and pain, every want and desire, every fear and fancy, every present and future aspiration, of the most insignificant of all its people is valued in terms of gold. The national government, under pressure of a class of citizens who are devoted to free enterprise, has been largely responsible for instituting this gold standard. And the national government itself, in an effort at self-protection, has collected and cached more than three-fifths of the world's entire supply of gold, underground at Fort Knox. Actually, that is equivalent to holding three-fifths of the aches and pains, the wants and desires, the fears and fancies and the eternal aspirations of all its citizens, static underground.

Then, as we see it, government has but one responsibility in this dilemma of public health. That responsibility is, to make that gold circulate to the best advantage of all its own people and the people of the world. Government will find it impossible to adequately satisfy every pleasure and pain of its people. But if human pleasures and pains circulate freely, in terms of gold, the government will find that human aches and pains will satisfy themselves more satisfactorily.

With free circulation, each responsible individual can then take care of his own illness and that of his family. There will be less class avarice and greed, less group pressue on government, less state and political pressure for handouts. Because with all citizens more financially competent, many states will suddenly find they are not so poor as once thought to be. Farmers will have no need to press for support of farm prices. There will be no need for special non-service-connected disability payments. No need for special old-age assistance. No need for special state aid to education. No need for regimentation of the professions. No need for a special compulsory tax for health insurance. No need for increased public debt and deficit spending.

A plan to make gold circulate freely.

The following are basic outlines of the plan conceived by me, to be adequate and workable:

Discontinue all special class handouts and class services. Absolutely dissolve, all bureaus and agencies so concerned. This, alone, will save billions of tax dollars that may be used in social security. And if the social security agency remains in status quo, except for extension of its services to all the people—farmers, domestics, self-employed—at most, only a very slight increase in S. S. taxes would be needed under this plan.

Then, let every man who is able to work, work and earn to his fullest capacities. If he is able to work, if there is a job for him, and he refuses to work, let him summarily forfeit all guarantees, under this plan. When he is disabled for work, even temporarily, let the S. S. Agency, in co-operation with his employer, both together, guarantee him at least 50 per cent of his average yearly wage or salary, over the last five years he worked, with an absolute rock-bottom minimum of thirty dollars a month for the duration of his disability, or duration of life.

If the man's disability is the result of employment, the employer must assume complete responsibility. If not the result of employment, the employer and agency cooperate, 50-50. But if the employee never returns to work, or dies, the agency assumes complete responsibility, even to any undue loss to employer. In every case where disability is not the direct result of employment, the employee's own estate and savings may be taken into account, and the employer and agency would be liable only for any deficit required to reach a guarantee of 50 per cent average yearly earnings, or the minimum of thirty dollars, whichever is greater.

When a man retires at age 65, if he has insufficient estate or savings, let the employer and agency, in cooperation, guarantee him any necessary deficit required to reach 50 per cent of earnings, or the minimum, for duration of life.

All indigent, disabled and aged male persons, should receive a minimum of thirty dollars a month assistance under this plan. Indigent, disabled and aged females may vary, depending upon whether they have at any time entered the labor market—been employed.

All farmers, domestics, and self-employed, should receive the same minimum guarantees, as others. Indigent, orphaned and disabled children, should be given special consideration, up to the age of employability.

Then, for special emergencies requiring large outlays of funds for personal or family illness, hospital and special medical care, the S. S. Agency should undertake to guarantee loans, from the employer, if at all possible, or from others, up to a maximum of 75 per cent of an average year's wage or salary, repayable over long periods, at a fixed rate of interest, not to exceed 3 per cent.

And under this plan the minimum of thirty dollars would be free of tax. But those receiving the 50 per cent of average earnings would be liable for both a normal tax and S. S. tax.

Then let the national and state governments cooperate in building hospitals and facilities for all the people, covering all areas.

By this plan it is easily seen that we believe the employer also has a great deal of responsibility toward relieving the aches, pains, fancies and desires of his employees. Especially does the employer's responsibility increase with the longevity and faithful service of his employees.

It is our honest opinion that some plan similar to this is easily workable, without any greater financial outlays, than are now habitually made by our national and state governments combined, in needy social fields. In fact, we believe the total outlays would be much less than now. And we believe each individual would be better able to shoulder his own responsibility for the high cost of living, disability and disease. We believe the national economy would be much more stable, over the long period.

BY THE EDITOR

In our romantic Southland white men have lived side by side with black men for many years. In spite of the white man's studied unwillingness to be more considerate of him, they have gotten along very well together, or rather the black man has shown a rather generous willingness to get along with his white brothers. But suppose the Negro did not speak our language, follow our religion, wear our clothes, eat our food—what an insufferable mess we continually should be in!

Our present dilemma seems to lie in the fact that we have no philosophy whatsoever of getting along with Negroes. Our only policy seems to be that we want no progress of any sort to eventuate.

The status quo—that in the South is our firm position. We want most to keep the Negro in his place. But what is his place? Is it to be forever that of a second class citizen?

In an inter-cultural meeting, an able Negro once asked, "But where is our place?" Then he said:—"In the streetcars we are put back behind, on the trains we go up in front, on the steam boat we are sent down below, in the theater we climb up above."

An able white Southerner is reported to have said: "Yes, I'm an educated man—I hold all the accepted prejudices." And prejudice has for so long dominated our thinking that it has become so deep-seated in our mores as almost to have become a part of our very culture.

It is now to laugh; for what could have been more ironical than for the atomic bomb to have evolved from an idea brought out of Germany in the brain of a there-despised Jewess?

Throughout the world there are groups of people who are farther, or less far, along in their cultural development than other groups. Witness the bushman of Australia, or the Dravidian of India, in contrast with the highly cultured man of Northern Europe, and his descendants who have spread around the world. Yet in the divine plan we are all brothers.

Just think what America might become in this new world of promise if all of her varied peoples were given the opportunity fully to achieve their destiny, to which they are fully entitled under our constitution.

Because we are so stupid as to keep one-tenth of our population in continual economic and political slavery, we do as much harm to ourselves as we do to this large segment of our population. Booker T. Washington said: "You cannot keep a man down in a ditch without staying in there with him."

The Southern Regional Council is a non-profit, non-denominational, non-political organization set up in February, 1944 to study the many problems of the South and to mobilize the people of the South to solve those problems. It is pro-democracy and pro-humanity. It is an outgrowth of the needs of the South, it is Southern in its make-up and its work.

The Southern Regional Council believes that the people of the South must take the lead in solving their own problems. SRC believes in the future of the South. It believes that the South can be prosperous and healthy, purged of poverty, hatred and fear. It believes that the South needs to broaden the narrow base of Democracy on which it stands if it is to go forward.

The Southern Regional Council does everything it can to promote these beliefs. It works through its state divisions and affiliated state and local committees to take its aims and activities into all communities of the South. PROGRESS AND TRADITION—"In Greenville, Miss., a typical Deep South community, segregation follows no hard and fast rules. The Negro labors alongside the white man (above). But the familiar divisions still obtain in restaurants (right), buses, movies and many other areas of contact."

Segregation's Way In One Southern Town

The barriers against first-class citizenship for Negroes are crumbling—but slowly.

By HODDING CARTER

GREENVILLE, Miss.

EVEN if the Supreme Court does outlaw the South's dual educational system — an issue now being considered by the justices — segregation's Wall of Jericho will not come tumbling down to the tread of Negro children marching off to hitherto all-white schools. Not even the most fearful white defender of the status quo ("separate but equal" school facilities for the races) or the most optimistic Negro objector expects anything like that. Most of the Southern states, if not all of them, will take evasive action that will delay into the far future any significant implementation of a court order to open the presently white public schools to both races. The legal counter-measures proposed range from the abolition of the public school systems, as has been promised by the Governors of South Carolina and Georgia, to a variety of local redistricting programs which would gerrymander school districts into geographically fantastic divisions with the sole object of keeping Negro children in the Negro schools. And, inevitably, extra-legal devices would also be resorted to in some areas of the South.

Whatever the court does, there can be no doubt that next fall and for many years to come the great majority of Southern Negro children will continue to go to separate schools. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court's imminent decision is causing many white Southerners to look more closely and with some anxiety at a social pattern which, until the very recent past, has been taken for granted or accepted as immutable by the great majority of the white and Negro citizens of the South.

It is a pattern which is confusing in its contradictions not only to the newcomer but to people who have lived with it all their lives. I am assuming, correctly I think, that my own city, Greenville, is fairly typical of any Deep South community of similar size in which dwell white and Negro citizens in almost identical numbers. In Greenville, as elsewhere, segregation follows no hard and fast rules, nor is it as severe or as all-embracing today as the practice was in my Louisiana boyhood.

OF our 30,000 citizens nearly one-half are Negroes, and Negroes make up two-thirds of the county population of 70,000. Ours is a Mississippi River port town, a prosperous county seat where a changing economy is reflected in growing industrial payrolls and diversified agriculture. In the surrounding countryside, cotton is no longer the only crop. Rice, cattle and soybeans increase the planters' income, while mechanization is replacing, and sometimes displacing, the Negro tenant, who first moves to the near-by town and then so often treks to the North. Like Mississippi as a whole, where the Negro population decreased between 1940 and 1950 from about 50 per cent of the total to 45 per cent, Greenville and Washington Counties are losing Negroes.

The more familiar divisions still obtain here and almost everywhere else in the South. Negroes sit separately in the buses and in the movies. They cannot patronize restaurants catering to white customers. They attend separate churches. And so on. But there are other things they can do now which they could not do twenty and even ten years ago, and some of the variants are indeed puzzling.

PERHAPS the best way to illustrate these paradoxes is to accompany an imaginary Negro citizen during one day of his life in Greenville. This man, let's say, is a bricklayer. On this particular day he has labored all morning on an unsegregated job, the construction of a new office building downtown. He belongs to the same union and receives the same pay as do the white men beside whom he works. Last night he attended a union meeting in the same small hall, though he observed the amenities by sitting a little way apart.

Just now it is noon, and he has decided to walk over to the courthouse to vote in the special city election. On the way he passes a hotel in which Negro and white dining room employes, including one of his daughters, are working side by side; but he could enter it only in line of duty. When he gets to the courthouse he stands in the same voting line as do the white voters, and after he has cast his ballot he may stroll upstairs to the unsegregated courtroom to listen to the testimony and nod to a neighbor who is one of two Negroes on the jury.

When he quits work at 5 P. M. he decides to buy himself a new hat and a pair of shoes before he catches the segregated bus for home; and because he likes good clothing and has been working steadily all winter, he goes to one of the best men's stores in town. He can remember when he would not have been served in that store, and even now the clerks don't want him to try on the hat before he buys it, though they have no objection to fitting him for the shoes; but since he knows his head size, he doesn't worry overmuch.

WHEN he gets home he settles down to read the afternoon newspaper before supper. Sixteen years ago only 200 Negroes read that paper. Today there are more than 5,000 Negro readers. I know because it's my paper. Maybe he and his wife will go out tonight, so he looks at the movie ads. There are three (Continued on Page 34)

Kills Moths—
I use Expello!"

says Jinx Falkenburg McCrary

"Come Spring when moths get ready to feast on furs and woolens—out comes old reliable EXPELLO. I know that my blankets and woolens are always safe from these hungry pests. And it's so easy! All I do is put EXPELLO hangers in my closets and garment bags and sprinkle EXPELLO crystals in the chests and and drawers and let me tell you, ours is one home that moths stay away from."

Thanks, Jinx Falkenburg. You are so right! EXPELLO does destroy moths, moth worms and eggs too, as you say. Here's why—

EXPELLO "EX-RAY" VAPOR kills moths in spots where ordinary spraying doesn't reach:

And EXPELLO is so easy to use! NO WORK . . . simply put EXPELLO in closets, or sprinkle crystals in drawers, chests or trunks. NO WORRY . . . EXPELLO "EX-RAY" VAPOR penetrates to every seam, pocket and fold of a garment where ordinary spraying does not reach—giving full, not partial protection. KILLS MOTHS . . . all moth life is destroyed by EXPELLO "EX-RAY" VAPOR.

Take a tip from Jinx Falkenburg. EXPELLO-PROTECT your clothes and be sure! Don't rely on costly partial protection of old-fashioned methods. EXPELLO is stainless, has no oily film—no lingering odor. At leading stores.

Expello only EXPELLO gives off "EX-RAY" VAPOR movie houses for Negroes only, one white movie with a balcony for Negroes and two which admit only white patrons, so he has a wider choice than do the white theatre-goers.

His house is not so much to look at, because housing here is at a premium. He and his family are living in a small cabin which he has put in fair repair. He hopes to own his home one of these days as do most of his friends, and he has in mind the new Negro housing addition just north of town.

ON this street, not all of his neighbors are Negroes. There is one poor white family just across the way and another one on the corner, for poverty and overcrowding are no respectors of housing segregation in the South; there are hundreds of white and Negro citizens of Greenville who live in the same depressed neighborhoods, some of them even next door to each other. They have almost nothing to do with each other, but they are not unfriendly.

He also sees by the paper that the American Legion is sponsoring a carnival, featuring a big tent show, which opens tonight; that a notable pianist is performing at the white high school auditorium in the community concert series, and that out at the air base there will be a reception for the graduating class of cadets. He can't attend the piano recital or go to the air base reception. However, his wife's sister, who lives in Chicago, has a son who is a cadet here and he'll find out from the boy what the party was like when he and his wife drive out to the base next week to see the boy parade. And he can go to the Legion carnival, and enter unrestrictedly the tawdry shows and gamble side by side with the white dupes along the midway.

HIS wife suggests that they go to a late movie instead of the carnival and that first they call on a friend who is a patient in the new hospital which everyone in town is so proud of. There are Negro doctors practicing in the hospital and Negro nurses in the Negro wing, and all the facilities are just alike, with common kitchens and operating rooms.

So the couple fix up a bunch of daffodils and go off to see their friend. They find the friend in good spirits and entertaining a few relatives from across the river in Arkansas. One of the kinfolk, a nephew, is a veteran and a graduate student at the University of Arkansas, which was the first Southern university to admit Negroes after the Supreme Court held that it was in fact impossible to provide separate and equal facilities at the graduate school level.

The nephew is arguing with his parents and his sick aunt, as so many of the younger Negroes are arguing today, about the remaining disparities in the South. He wants to know why he can buy two-bit shockers in the city's drug stores, but can't enter the public library, only the small branch library for Negroes. He wonders when the University of Mississippi will admit its first Negro as most of the other Southern state universities have already done. He is protesting that most of the jobs open to Negroes in the new industries in the South are only the menial ones. He is questioning the Christianity of white Southerners who don't want Negroes to study in the same theological schools with white divinity students nor to worship in the same churches.

THE COURT ISSUE

The segregation cases before the U. S. Supreme Court pose the issue whether it is constitutional for the states to segregate Negro children from white ones in the public schools. The issue is presented in five cases involving South Carolina, Virginia, Delaware, Kansas and the District of Columbia. Thirteen other states in which segregation is in force can be affected by the decision. The Fourteenth Amendment forbids a state to make a law "which shall abridge the privileges" of any of its citizens or deny them "equal protection." By a Supreme Court decision of 1896, it was held that "separate but equal" school facilities complied with this amendment, but the present complaints contend that separation itself constitutes a condition of inequality.

His angry criticism makes the older folks uncomfortable. They tell him that he doesn't remember the old days. They point to the two Negro policemen and two policewomen on the Greenville force, to the record of no lynchings in the South in 1952, to the new swimming pool for Negroes, the two new high schools whose teachers have almost achieved equality of pay, to the hospital in which they are sitting, to the 2,000 Negro farm owners in the county, to present-day wages. But the young veteran replies that these benefits and improvements for the most part raise the barriers of segregation higher by making racial separateness more agreeable to Negroes and highly profitable for some of them. Before the argument is over they have to leave, because visiting period has ended.

here are not. The debate in the hospital room is raging today among Negroes, among many white Southerners and their non-Southern critics—and sometimes the debate is among white Southerners themselves. I have no way of telling how many Negroes in the South are as impatient as the imaginary veteran. I believe, however, that the younger Negroes and the Negro intellectuals, particularly the urban dwellers, are not satisfied with the speed or the direction of most of the changes, while the older, less educated, rural and small-town Negroes are inclined to be satisfied with the progress that has come in their lifetimes and particularly in the last twenty years.

IT is easier for me to gauge the attitudes of white fellow-Southerners for they are not inhibited against speaking freely. Overwhelmingly they believe that the improvement in the Negroes' lot has been remarkable. Some of them argue that the changes have come too fast. Only a few will contend that the pace has not been swift enough or that the progress is and will remain inconsequential as long as segregation itself is imposed. Vocally, at least, the white South still insists upon segregation in the realm of mass, unselected personal contact—in restaurants and swimming pools and hotels, and, of course, in the public schools.

Having spent almost all my life in two Southern states, Louisiana and Mississippi, I know firsthand that regardless of segregation the change in the Negro's status in the South appears almost miraculous to white and Negro Southerners who can remember what the racial pattern was like forty years ago. As contradictory or unreasonable as the taboos under which our Greenville bricklayer moves may be, they are far less onerous and numerous and rigidly enforced than they were in his and my boyhood. By and large, until some seemingly revolutionary, emotion-charged issue like the possible ending of public school segregation comes up, the white people of my town, and elsewhere in the South, are not overly worried about what is happening on the fringe of the pattern.

THEIR sons are serving in the same units with Negro troops, living and dying alongside them. They know that Negro students are attending state universities and a considerable number of sectarian colleges and divinity schools in the South, and that interracial meetings of college students are not a rarity. My white fellow-townsmen took quite calmly the fact that about a year ago Negro delegates to a state-wide convocation in Greenville of a Protestant denomination dined in the church annex with the rest of the delegates and were served by the women of the church. When they travel by air and by Pullman they see increasing numbers of Negroes as their unsegregated fellow-travelers.

They know that Negro and white workers belong to the same unions, and profit from the unity they have achieved thereby. They are aware that the effect of a series of Supreme Court decisions has been to make racial discrimination and segregation itself more difficult to preserve. They are growing accustomed to the Negro as voter, as juror, as educated land and home owner, as professional man, as a customer and client with a lot more money to spend than his sharecropper father had.

They don't know him any more intimately than they used to—probably the personal contacts are relatively fewer—but they see him as a different person from his father, whom they remember as an obsequious, almost illiterate, culturally inferior and likable hoe-hand. They felt more comfortable around the father than they do around his son, but if and when they can look at him rationally and objectively, they admit that the son is more valuable to the South and to the nation.

BUT when you discuss with these fellow-citizens of mine the possibility that the United States Supreme Court may, in what would be a momentous decision, cause the white children to attend public school with Negro children, they will tell you with great emphasis that this will not happen. Most of them do not wax vehement or make threats as was their fathers' custom when the racial status quo was threatened. They simply say that it's not going to happen in Greenville. They point to the editorials in The Delta Leader, a Negro weekly published in Greenville, and in The Jackson Advocate, the largest Negro newspaper in Mississippi, which insist that Mississippi Negroes want only equal school facilities and do not desire a single public school system.

Most Southern Negroes are of the same opinion, these Greenvillians say, and few if any of those who disagree will try to send their children to the presently all-white schools. And, if this surmise is incorrect, my white neighbors add, they are prepared to go to any legal lengths to prevent integration of the public schools. Whether physical coercion and economic reprisal would be added to their list of weapons if it ever seemed necessary they do not say—and this is an encouraging sign in a land where formerly the initial reaction to such potentialities was violence or the threat of violence.

WHAT the Negro bricklayer and his wife and their belligerent young veteran nephew are saying about this, I do not know, nor could I be sure that "SEPARATE BUT EQUAL"—Greenville school, for Negroes only.

what they might say to me was what they really thought. I am sure only that Negro opinion in the South is honestly divided. Some of those who say that they would prefer separate secondary schools, if they were really equal, may be accommodating themselves to realities or calculatedly parroting what they know the white Southerner wants to hear. Others are weighing against the fruits of victory the probability of humiliation for their children and some kind of community retaliation against unorthodox Negro parents. And, of course, there are thousands of Negroes who themselves profit, directly or indirectly, from segregation and who have an economic stake in its continuance.

THIS unsureness of what is really in the mind of the other is a mighty barrier between the races. But I cannot believe that in the event of a favorable court decision any concerted effort will be made by Negro parents to enroll their children in the white schools, at least not in Mississippi and the other states of the Deep South where the Negro population represents from one-fourth to nearly one-half of the total. It is altogether likely that in the border states and in sections of the Upper South where the Negro is a tiny minority, economic considerations may permit the enrollment of the relative handful of Negro children among scores or hundreds of white children.

The pressure of numbers, the ratio of Negro to white, is an important factor in this matter. So, in time, will be the pressure of educational costs in a dual system under which actual equality of facilities must be provided.

BUT here and now, my white fellow-Greenvillians are prepared to spend themselves broke to meet whatever terms the Supreme Court may demand as the price of the continuation of the dual system. Abolition of the segregated school represents for them too sudden and complete a break with the past and even the present. The Negro's status is changing and the barriers raised against his first-class citizenship are crumbling here and there, as the bricklayer and even the veteran can tell you. But it is a sporadic sloughing off.

Some among the white Southerners say it is happening too fast, some among both races say it is happening fast enough, some—and almost all of them are Negroes—say it is happening too slow. They all agree that the acid test of how fast it can happen will come if the Supreme Court holds against the segregated school and the South faces what to do next. No one believes that the Southern states will willingly live up either to the letter or the spirit of such a decision.

Biracialism in American Society: A Comparative View

RUTH LANDES
New York City

I

OUR culture exercises certain values forcefully through our interracial arrangements, principally Negro and white. Comparison with other white-governed societies receiving Negroes reveals the uniqueness in American developments, above all in the operations of Negro status.

Studies of American Negro life have been done chiefly by disciplines other than anthropology; American anthropological method has not contributed new insights to the already rich literature. No scholar employs intercultural comparisons of modern Negro groups.

There is, regarding the American Negro, Powdermaker's study of the biracial functioning of a Southern town, giving the values of both segments of the community (1939); and anthropologists have participated in distinguished single- and multidiscipline presentations of Negro personality, culture, and society, of historical and culture origins, of separate institutions like family, church, and press. All the accounts are mutually elaborating and reinforcing despite some differences of interpretation, as reflected, for example, in the disputed terminology of "caste" and "class." There are, however, hidden commitments to cultural valuations and personal philosophies in the work of individual scholars, which Myrdal shows need enunciation (Myrdal 1944: 1036–64); cross-cultural surveys of Negro place in other white-ruled societies show how substantial for method and theory are the value cautions stressed by this foreign observer.The present article rests upon the whole literature, since no real anthropological differentiation is apparent, and statements are pointed cross-culturally by my studies of Negro life in other societies.

American culture and society have a Negro or interracial aspect. It has shaped the life of each American Negro by rigid, clear formulas of relationships with whites, especially in the south and southwest, specifying conditions of residence, employment, schooling and burial, of sex and marriage, of separate conduct and speech for the races. The Supreme Court's decision ordering against segregation in public education reveals again how Negro life rests upon assumptions of the host society. They have been most completely defined as the traditional South saw them, including reciprocal injunctions upon whites which have not held so fast in other regions. Other regions of the country before World War I actually knew Negroes as little as Indians, except for "northern" centers like New York, Chicago, Detroit.

Southern blacks began the Great Migration north during the first war, attracted by industry, and were later joined by demobilized soldiers, all groups equally footloose. Adrift from the clearly patterned South, the blacks conducted themselves essentially as they had at home, unrelatedly perpetuating fragments of the race-ways to which they were habituated in association with whites; there was no solid guidance to new speech, conduct, and interracial concepts.

The North also lacked guidance among its confused familiarities with slavery, Emancipation, Jim Crow, the occasional segregation of even New England, and industry's readiness to exploit any new unskilled labor supply. The features of northern life from which the migrants hoped to profit reached them largely as negative conditions—in the want of southern paternalism, the absence of rules for biracial association, the lack of special emotion about the race. Negroes were not significantly different from Italian immigrants, and the Irish often fared worse. Social disorientation long comprised much of their "freedom," and Wright (1940) shows how it did allow for broadened, although dangerous, interracial experience.

But true liberation did inhere in the reality of the North's want of slavery traditions. European immigrants also contributed positively to northern life their fierce confidence in eventual achievement; how this filtered through to Negroes can be gathered from works of Wright and Willard Motley and from accounts like Record's of the organizing efforts of political groups. Racism and the American Creed ideals (Myrdal 1944, chap. 1) forced the President before Pearl Harbor to create the Committee on Fair Employment Practices, to protect Negroes and other minorities in industry, and to issue antidiscriminatory orders to the armed services; these formally indicated advance in the Negro's place since the last war (Mandelbaum 1952). In 1863 also, concessions to American ideals of equality had grown from war emergencies. Then it had been upon white initiative; in 1941 it was biracial; both times it was to "save the Union," politically in '63, spiritually in '41.

The altering social balance between the races affects the South most sharply, touching all vested interests, habits, philosophies. Neither the conservative nor the liberal responses can be linked absolutely to generation, class, locality, and occupation. A retired Fair Employment Practice Commission chairman stated defiantly in 1943 that "not all the armed might of Hitler could change the social customs of the South"; yet white university students elected a Negro student president of a professional organization. Today South Carolina and Georgia governors defy the decision of the Supreme Court while Arizona and Indiana public schools quietly have been integrating students belonging to different races.

In the North also, individuals feel torn between prejudice and ideals, asking how to act in concrete biracial situations in school, recreation, jobs, and how to evolve a philosophy of racial integration. National organizations plan against disorders that might follow the recent Decision and struggle to envision nobler repatternings of conduct and belief.

But our ugliest racism has never seriously questioned the Americanism of Negroes. They "belong" here, unlike Negroes living in Britain (Landes 1952a,b, 1953b), France (Tardits Ms.), and dependencies in Africa such as white Kenya (cf. news reports of Mau Mau); unlike also American Indians, Orientals, and Mexicans in the southwest. In that social sense, they are a variant of native white. Sporadic efforts to "return" them to Africa or to establish nationally a separate black caste, as had been Marcus Garvey's ambitions, have failed and today appear absurd; but a separate caste is now shaping by law in the Union of South Africa. The Reconstruction South would not expel Negroes, symbol of enemies and defeat; it incorporated them well, though in servile place. We know the South's traditional phrases of responsibility for the race: "We believe in being kind to our darkies. . . . We understand them and they understand us. . . . . They belong to us . . . They aren't happy with Yankees." Most Negroes have remained south and love much there; individuals flourish, though often behind white fronts; a Negro knew he "belonged" even when he struggled for life in savage extremity of the "American Dilemma" (Myrdal 1944, Pt. XI).

Today the focus upon discrimination has passed from emotion to informed defense of national principles of existence, as in the Text of the Supreme Court Decision outlawing Negro segregation in public schools. Each challenge to prejudice reveals how live these principles are. Biracial physically, our society is a unity in culture and Constitution. This social unity of races persuades many Britons that "Yanks" are Negroid in living tempo, speech, body postures, and expressiveness. The weakness and guilt of our racism is that Negroes belong in American society yet are not admitted to their equal place in it.

Britain manifests informally and the Union of South Africa asserts explicitly that Negroes do not belong inalienably and automatically to their societies. Brazil vaunts a policy of mixing racial elements and admiring the results. By 1951 the Nationalist government of South Africa was elaborating extremely the segregation rulings in terms of social alienation, "apartheid." Neighboring Portuguese Africa continues to formally certify "assimilated" natives to full place in Portuguese society, but the numbers are few and the actual processes not clear. In France, African students complain of unredeemed social isolation (Tardits Ms.).

Americans are not actively interested in any Negroes but "our own." They incarnate public conscience about "human rights" and the Constitution, a symbol complex which is utterly mysterious to Britons, though English Midlands textile mills were struck all during our Civil War in sympathy with our freedmen. Our involvement with Negroes contrasts with our relatively indifferent though romanticized feelings about American Indians, Mexicans, and Orientals, who have endured the same racisms, unameliorated by the traditional kindnesses to Negroes. For these other nonwhites have barely entered into our blood, wars, economic and political struggles, or private understandings.

The long intense history with Negroes produces endlessly a great literature of self-exposure and criticism, in all forms, covering all experience. We pour it out upon other nations, who echo our powerfully explicit race concepts, usually in considerable ignorance of their American meanings. They conclude that we are a color-obsessed people.

This inference isolates one glaring manifestation and overlooks other features that influence developments. Our society is busy re-incorporating and revaluing at a tremendous rate the highly identifiable descendants of a former slave caste that remained such for two-thirds of their three centuries' part in a prime center of our civilization; customary definitions are steadily being recast, forced by global events and devotion to the national creed of freedoms, accelerated by the Negroes' prestige as being among our oldest Americans. The nearest historic comparison is in Brazil, whose society also depended upon vast numbers of African slaves, subsequently freed and held integral to the nation. The similarities end there; it is the differences that uncover our Americanism (Landes Ms.).

The Catholic-Lusitanian world of colonials possessed a supraracial humanism unknown to the Protestant English-speaking world (Landes 1953a). Slavery could be as vicious as anywhere else but Brazil modified it by a regard for Africans drawn from the old Moorish domination of the Iberian Peninsula. The Catholic church demanded baptism of new slaves before sale, to enter them as persons into the Christian society of the paternalistic family of purchase, the church and state. Negroes maintained close formal ties with the church outside of the obligations, banking funds for purchasing freedom and burial, and to dignify their Afro-Brazilian sects. The church gave them three black saints, one being Benedito the Moor, a reformed convict permitted to cradle the child Jesus in his arms.

In our slave regions, far from mandatory Christian personification, slave status was reduced to an extreme in world history by market notions of chattelism, exaggerated by industrialization. Owners called slaves "chattels" (including British victims of the Irish Wars and Industrial Revolution exported here for punishment), hardly more human than cattle; good studs were bred for market after the abolition of the African slave trade. An owner's sex mates of color were hidden; in Brazil they became recognized concubines and mistresses producing legal heirs. Brazilian humanism and Anglo-American chattelism differentiated critically the two slaveholding systems; there eventuated consistently the mild Emancipation of Brazil and the violent one of the United States. Former chattels of the American South became a segregated class of serfs after 1863; Brazilian slaves became normal citizens after 1888, fitted into the class structure according to general criteria of family, accomplishment, and the relative handicap of color.

Chattelism was their legal status, but informally American Negroes were very active and intimate in personal and cultural exchanges with whites, unlike Indians and Mexicans among us. Southern masters made them responsible for indoctrinating the young of both races, and so close was the tie that "poor whites" sought to boycott their protected labor (C. S. Johnson 1930); they were the black face of the white aristocracy. Such shared interests and identity do not greet Negroes now migrating to Britain (Little 1947; Landes 1952b, 1953b) and France (Tardits Ms.) nor the tribesmen becoming proletarianized in South African industry, as shown in the news, parliamentary speeches, and the new literature of that country; often the Negroes are fiercely repudiated.

Our slave administration caused blacks to lose tribal traditions more thoroughly than in Brazil and the Caribbean. American masters insisted upon steeping slaves in Anglo-American culture, rationalized as for greater manageability and Christianity. European immigrants are also obliged to drop their customs during acculturation to our life; our feelings about equality demand cultural standardization. Now the very presence of Negroes testifies to a community's rooted Americanism.

Brazilian masters encouraged African practices, if only tacitly. So have other class societies in the Catholic Americas (including south Louisiana). Today these subcultures are class-linked, identifying "black peasantry" but not "colored" bourgeoisie.

Regardless of Africanisms, all New World societies share the conviction that Negroes belong here where they are born, whatever their ancestors' origins. This probably feeds upon the Americas' emphasized role as hosts to resettling foreigners. It contrasts with the rootless place of the colored "half-castes" born in Britain in this century of colonial fathers, citizens of the kingdom in law but not in real acceptance. Yet Britain has not developed domestically instruments of race prejudice and so reveals that there is no absolute connection between lack of formal discrimination and real acceptance. The New World also stresses the discontinuity since everywhere Negroes "belong" completely but among ourselves have been denigrated while in Brazil they suffer more from the general inequities of an aristocratic class organization.

No white-ruled societies beyond the Americas allow the Negro to "belong." Because we do absolutely, the Negro now tells us how we have failed our creed of liberties, how we must redeem national morality; he tells it in the Negro press, in scientific reports, novels and poetry, in the lawsuits of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Roi Ottley therefore wrote in 1951, disillusioned by the United Kingdom and Europe, that elsewhere lie "no green pastures" for his race but only here in America.

"Place" and "belongingness" operate through interwoven details. Isolated, one detail can appear like others in foreign societies, but the actual local interrelationships function with significant differences. Frequently in interracial matters these are overdetermined by local ideas of status. Our elaborate preconceptions obscure insights into other societies' purposes, by ourselves, and by foreigners captivated by our literature and impressed allegedly by conduct of our troops (white) and tourists. The misfit of American racism applied to biracial actualities elsewhere reveals our cultural skewings.

There is, for example, the term "Negro": we of the United States cannot communicate without it; its loaded meanings ride us over the seven seas. But no other society finds the word useful or even tolerable except for technical purposes like anthropology. In even our most respectful usage, "Negro" conveys rawly the whole exposed position of the descendants of our country's former slaves. In Brazil the term is offensive, even brutal, except anthropologically, precisely because of slave associations; this is also the view in Spanish and French speech. The preferred term in Brazil, as in France, is "black," a decent analogue to "white"; another is "colored," but it is best to omit all race references. Subcultural identifications, such as Afro-Brazilian, are correct as with our own nationally hyphenated citizens. In our deep South, affected by Spanish and French colonization and the aristocratic organization of life, "black" and "colored" are also kindlier references though they deteriorate into "darky." Generally, "black" sounds harsh to us, as "white" sounds noble, through folk moralities (C. S. Johnson 1941). In the United States, "Negro" recently became acceptable to the race after successful insistence upon capitalizing the word and so converting it to the appearance of a subcultural or subnational identification. Brazilian speech did something similar when general usage specialized "neg'o," a corruption like "nigger," to convey endearment regardless of race and class.

In Britain, "Negro" is meaningless except anthropologically. There "black Yank" signifies American Negro; humorously it is "Blackie." Negroes of the Empire are "colonials" or nationals of their homelands, e.g., Jamaicans, Nigerians. Those called black or colored are indifferently south Europeans, Indians, Jews, or Africans. "Kaffir" is extraordinarily offensive, especially in South Africa, similarly to our "nigger," stressing the cultural and civic degeneration of conquered tribesmen; it is seldom directed to Negroes in Britain but chiefly to detribalized "primitives" in South Africa. "Native" describes peoples of Africa and is as full of opposed nuances as our "Negro."

British terms reflect historical and administrative relations with the colonies, and attitudes toward the greater world; they make no sense within our framework, and Anglo-American conversations regularly fall afoul of them. Colonial, Kaffir, native, and the nationalist terms place Negroes within empire relationships. The "color" words stress British separateness not only from Negroes but from other European and Asiatic powers. The terms all assume the nonpresence of Negroes in the kingdom. This is re-conveyed bluntly in the distressing term "half-caste," which describes all the colored born in Britain. The terms indicate the sensitive fronts to abuse which is secondarily race-connected.

The race-like terms everywhere are code indicators of status. In the British West Indies, special color terms are linked synonymously to each of the three classes. In Britain there is no such synonymity. Thus in the British Caribbean, black is low or working class, colored is middle class, white is upper; the social meaning is revealed when an extreme Negroid type possessing middle-class attributes of education becomes designated colored. In the United States, complexion distinctions are subgroup features within Negro society, linked to aspirations there but lost in interracial functions, except for unacknowledged "passing" (Davis, Gardner and Gardner 1941; Powdermaker 1939; Dollard 1937). Whether class- or race-divided, the Americas' accepting biracialism is at the opposite pole from the United Kingdom's experience of distant administration of other races in colonies. The present colonial migrations are forcing a race and culture cosmopolitanism in Britain that raises American-style issues, blurred by the conviction of Negroes not belonging "properly" there.

The London Times of May 31, 1954, estimates that in the Kingdom, "Coloured residents of all nationalities probably now total 75,000. . . . During the past 15 years the number of persons of Negro descent resident in Britain has grown from fewer than 10,000 to about 35,000" (Banton 1954:7). They arrived with the two wars, especially the last, in a youthful migration that is principally male seeking employment, though some attend universities and technical schools. By British standards, the workers are largely unskilled, poorly versed in the culture, and transient. "No matter how long they stay, they are only passing through. They don't exist for us." Though there was a considerable spillover of blacks in port towns during the slaving period, it is entirely forgotten and certainly not related to the present development which is unique in the history of Negro entrance to any white society. There is no "reason" why Britons should accept the migrant colonials but Americans would expect otherwise; consistently, we do absorb West Indians to our "Negro" category (to their annoyance).

Negroes are foreigners in the United Kingdom. The notion of "foreign," like "Negro," is crucially unlike in the two English-speaking countries. To us a foreigner is a potential American upon entering our land. To the Briton he is a stranger and permanent outsider; he includes the whole non-British world and also domestically those who live at a distance, say in another country. Every person is socially appraised in Britain by class and national indicators, stressing speech, occupation, and total physical appearance; in the United States social place is differentiated critically and permanently only by race.

The outsider's surest entrance to the British social organization is by marriage to a native. Colored colonials marry English girls or domicile with them unofficially and establish families. Such marriage is always termed miscegenation, exposing the felt irregularity. Censure is directed less at the Negroes than at the girls, as Britons responsible for the social violation; Englishmen can demonstrate violently at mere sight of a biracial couple. In the northern United States mixed marriage tends to alienate the couple from both racial sections. In both countries intermarriage confuses separatist principles—of "race" here, of "nationality" in Britain.

Most British miscegenation occurs in the "working class," where the pretensions—of family, occupation, accent—are weakest. Very occasionally a professional or wealthy colonial marries into the solid middle class, and the couple is likely then to depart for the West Indies or West Africa. The opposite occurs in the United States, where it is usually intellectuals and prestigeful liberals who dare to defy racism.

Accidentally and singularly, Britain thus permits the growth of biracial households which are always headed by a colored man. Forbidden by law in some of our states, it is blocked by custom in the others. Therefore Americans are startled by British intermarriage, supposing that, "The English like them." The English do not like them, even less than marriage to more familiar Europeans. But there are no legal or traditional prohibitions, and "the rule of law" defends normal conduct. In our country, on the other hand, everyone has been exposed to strong indoctrination, and mixed unions are statistically insignificant.

All Americans, all colonials view the legal freedom of intermarriage as the sign of interracial Utopia. Ottley shows how colonials become disillusioned and accuse Britons of a hypocrisy exceeding American prejudice. They complain, with some cause, of being offered marginal jobs, rooms, women. British officials deny this and privately accuse the women of misleading Negroes' hopes; however, Negroes say, "our only friends here are the women." (Why women respond is a subject distinct from biracialism.) When authorities invite colonials to study, it is only for a specified period. Interracial association in Britain thus draws its poison from the convergence it forces of heretofore separate significances of foreigners, colonials, and British marriage; "race" is partly an exacerbation of foreignness and partly a reminder of conquest. It is no conceptual thing-in-itself as with us.

Colonials want desperately to "belong." The case is graver for half-castes, who comprehend intimately the English rejection of colonials, being themselves English; but they are not more acceptable to fellow-citizens than the colonial fathers they resemble.

The British proudly make limited exceptions to rules, and the exception of welcome in Negro relations is made for individuals of rare merit, like a great cricketer, a gifted scientist, a fine doctor. Comparable open exceptions do not occur in our traditional South or elsewhere since the race as a whole is provided for and so incorporated. British welcome does not extend to the honored individual's closest kin. "Passing" involves less deception in Britain than here, in the absence of explicit race formulations.

In Britain, the half-castes are largely wasted social stuff. Here they are valuable "Negroes." Though British colored profess to scorn American Negroes for Jim Crow, they express envy of the luck of "knowing where you stand" (Landes 1952b). Half-castes visit us to learn the feeling and machinery of social placement. A Scottish mulatto in New York explained, "The British don't want me. They're terribly polite because I'm different and so they make me feel I'm not real. We're not used to Negroes."

In the United States, half-castes are pulled into the Negro group by American-style recognition, receiving passively our elaborate scheme of race. The orientation is so new and massive that it both excites and depresses. One said after a year here, "Now I know I'm a person without a country. My own won't have me, and I don't see why I must live with Negroes in America . . . they think only about race! And they admire me for my English mother!" When American Negroes informed another half-caste that here she was a "second-class citizen" she said scornfully, "Aren't Negroes second-class everywhere?"

Status changes in divergent directions are now apparent in the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Union of South Africa. The common factor is the effort of Negro peoples to secure membership in white society; differential ones flow from each society's view of the Negroes' claims. It is difficult to evaluate the force of mere population figures. We have 16 million Negroes in a total of 160 million; South Africa has nearly 10 million "natives" in a total of over 12 million, following the 1950 midyear estimate in 1951 South African-American Survey; Britons surmise 75,000 colored among the total British 50 million, as the census does not distinguish race. But these three Negro bodies are dissimilar since their social characters are defined differently. Historically a constructive force in the Americas, Negroes are weak confusing elements in Britain and South Africa. The United States now strives for equal association of the races, South Africa officially enforces extreme segregation, Britain denies the existence of another race in her kingdom despite steady immigration. In all countries, Negro living conditions move with those of the general population so that despite the social ease of Brazil he is often retarded materially there, and despite the harshness of the United States he is here at his richest and most celebrated.

III

A fundamental feature of American race relationships, matched only in South Africa, is the explicitness of the rulings. This British Negroes envy since all positions are plotted and a course among them can be planned.

Such has been the consequence in the United States underscored in the Supreme Court's recent unanimous Decision. The Decision also rooted in American dynamics of the moment, with reinforcing factors of Negro numbers, historicity, belongingness, the fluid class character of the whole society, reiterated affirmation of constitutional principles, special training of Negro strength, a flourishing economy—all sparked by war threats to the nation.

The Decision is widely assumed to open a new era of liberties. It is also felt that anything can happen, without care. How will race observances alter in the south and border states, in appearances, in pace, in implications for the whole society? Can we work upon the necessary rephrasings of critical situations? How will a white home guide children to receive Negro teacher and classmates? Cabell Phillips watches straws in the wind in Indiana schools, reported in the New York Times Magazine of May 30, 1954; certain southern churches already announce their support of the Decision. Negro homes must move from the hierarchical tradition to the egalitarian: the news already states that in the South Negroes advise caution upon each other. Can America reverse old learning to see the function or functionary above the race, e.g., the teacher before the white or colored woman? How resolve the emotional strains among a newly competing race-mixed teaching profession in the segregating states? Familiar aggressions are now illegal. What becomes of the many Negro teachers now abandoned by a desegregated system; how will whites react against successful Negro rivals?

The ruling on educational integration has already been extended to such a bordering area as public recreation. It is only a matter of time before freer association will reach multitudes. Northern parents do not easily face biracial couples on school dance floors, anticipating the questions that foreshadow intermarriage. Shall I allow John of colored parentage to invite my Mary, of Scotch-Irish descent, to the movies and a hamburger? If so, am I to invite him to supper here? We have not the British screen that, "They do not exist"; rather, we insist upon confronting the issues openly and explicitly.

Intermarriage will increase, and how is the resulting colored generation to be guided? This is an absolutely new problem for us. Heretofore all born of Negroes have been Negroes. Will the term and category now disappear? Will future colored resemble the confused half-caste? Will "white" retain its hierarchical meanings or be replaced by something like "American" that erases race? Europeans approach this when they lump all our citizenry as Yank. West Indian color-class and Brazilian class organization that preserves a colored peasantry are alien to our notions. Already we see old patterns weaken in the South under accelerated interracial exchanges, and compromise arrangements form that herald strange "survivals" in unimaginable future surroundings.

The heart of the new order upon us is the biracial family, the final grant of "belonging." But this is our taboo, unique except for South Africa. Intermarriage will increase, but will it surpass the limited number of mixed unions occurring among other American groups specialized by religion or national origin? As we confront basic redefinitions of biracialism, will we see the fears and hates drawn from our concept of intermarriage?

I guess you never knew that the whole Civil Rights Bill was just a Communist Plot spinned by the Anti-Defamation League. "Parson Jack" Johnson knows the truth, however, & he's not bashful about telling it. Please pass on to George Mitchell.

Who Is Behind T Civil Rights Fight

One of the major political issues of recent months has been the battle between northern and southern Democrats over the Civil Rights Bill. The question as we have read it in our newspapers and magazines and heard it over the radio has seemed to be a question as to the treatment of the negro in the South. Thinking people, however, will go farther beneath the surface of this issue to find where the real cause of trouble lies.

It will be discovered upon investigation that the negro is being used as an innocent tool of subversive elements to bring about division and strife within the United States. The American public has a right to know the truth and to know all the facts in regard to this great issue. American negroes are being misused by the Red underground of America. They are being made scapegoats. Certain groups who in reality hate them profess for the present to be their friends. Actually the driving force behind the program of civil rights is the "Civil Rights Committee of the Anti-defamation League of B'nai B'rith." This Jewish organization rightly takes credit for the civil rights fight but it is hiding behind the American negro in a fight for equality for members of its own race. Many fine law abiding American negroes are refusing to have anything to do whatsoever with this Civil Rights battle because they realize the element that is behind it.

"Those who seek a millennium in communism are following a phantom and a mirage. Communism is not a solution for the ills of the world. It is a powerful deception, a political and social quackery. It promotes hatred and class war, it destroys the sacredness of the individual personality and is hostile to the Christian religion and Christian morality."

The communist-inspired fight to bring about an equality among all men should be recognized by Christian Americans everywhere for what it is—one more attempt to destroy American democracy. The American negro has made great strides of progress in the past few generations without the help of communism or a new Civil Rights bill. We of the North deplore the deplorable conditions under which negroes live in many parts of the South, but so do Christian people in the South and most of the southern states have been working toward the improvement of the lot of the negro for many years. We trust that communist interference will not destroy and tear down that which is being built up by right thinking whites and negroes in our free America.

The U.S. Negro, 1953

A decade of progress has wrought a revolution in his life, brought him more prosperity and freedom—and new problems

TELL me," asked the British visitor, "do your Negroes play golf?"

The question, put to a U.S. businessman, brought a stammering answer.

Yes, said the businessman, he supposed that U.S. Negroes played golf, but he had never seen one with a club in his hand. Come to think of it, he'd seen a picture of Joe Louis on a golf course, but he had no idea at what club Joe could play.

The incident illustrates how little white Americans generally know about their colored fellow citizens. Negroes, in the phrase of the sociologists, have "high social visibility." But their lives are in effect invisible to most Americans, who rarely bother to look behind the Color Curtain at the Negroes' homes, their places of work or worship, or their spirit. There is, as a matter of fact, some news about Negro golfing.

¶ In Seattle, Negroes are now free to play on all public golf courses (but they still may not take part in tournaments played on the same courses).

¶ In Chicago, where they play on public courses without restriction, the number of Negro golfers has gone up from 25, a few years ago, to more than 2,000.

¶ In New York there are no restrictions on public courses, and Negroes do play in tournaments.

These facts & figures, modest in themselves, are symptoms of a major revolution in the life of the U.S. Negro—only half-noticed by the rest of the nation. It is a revolution which, although still far from overthrowing segregation, amounts to the biggest, most hopeful change in Negro history since Abraham Lincoln, just 90 years ago, signed the Emancipation Proclamation. Says Negro Publisher (Ebony, Jet) John H. Johnson: "Every Negro is a Horatio Alger . . . His trek up from slavery is the greatest success story the world has ever known."

Markers of Progress

One of the great facts of U.S. history is that the Negro, no matter how ill used, has remained deeply loyal to the U.S., always hoping for the "Year of Jubilo," stubbornly telling himself

The very time I thought I was lost
The dungeon shook and the chain fell off . . .
You got a right, I got a right,
We all got a right to the tree of life . . .

The fruit from the tree of life is still rationed, and often bitter. The U.S.'s 15 million Negroes are still denied the right to the pursuit of happiness on equal terms with whites. Negroes still do the meanest jobs and get the lowest pay; they must slowly wrest from their white fellows a table in a restaurant, a desk in a school, a smile, the privilege of praying in a white church or using a white swimming pool. This is true on both sides of the Mason-Dixon Line. While the Negro is generally better off, economically and socially, in the North (as is shown by the fact that thousands of Southern Negroes still move north every year), the North has no cause to feel superior. The chains of prejudice can be as heavy in New York's Harlem or on Chicago's South Side as anywhere in the South. Yet North & South, the Year of Jubilo seems a little closer.

In 1942, in a brilliant study of the American Negro, Swedish Economist Gunnar Myrdal reported: "Negroes are in desperate need of jobs and bread, even more so than of justice in the courts and of the vote." This definition of the Negro's needs is today strikingly out of date.

¶ For most Negroes, the problem is no longer jobs, but better jobs; for many, it is no longer bread, but cake. The Negro wage earner today makes four times as much as in 1940 (compared to the white wage earner's 2½ times as much). The Negro's average yearly income is still only a little more than half of the white average, but ten years ago it was about 35%.

¶ The forces that kept the Southern Negro from voting—intimidation and the poll tax—are largely beaten. The South has more than 1,000,000 registered Negro voters (compared to 300,000 in 1938), and there could be half a million more if Southern Negroes were politically less apathetic.

¶ The Negro gets justice in the courts, although in some Southern courts he still has to fight for his right (affirmed by the Supreme Court) to be heard by mixed juries. The big issue today is no longer justice in the courts, but justice in daily life, i.e., the fight against segregation.

¶ Negro college enrollment is up 2,500% over 1930.

¶ The life expectancy of the male Negro has gone up from 47 years in 1920 to 59 years. In the same period, the white's life expectancy has risen more slowly, from 56 to 66 years. With improving living standards, the gap between the white man's and the Negro's life span is closing.

Prosperity: Cadillacs & Babbitts

The signs of Negro prosperity are everywhere. On the rooftops of Manhattan's Harlem grows that bare, ugly forest of TV antennae which has become a new symbol of middle-class achievement. On the outskirts of Atlanta are shiny new Negro housing developments (financed by Southern whites), with built-in washing machines. Yet the streets of Harlem are still largely slum streets, and a few blocks from the Atlanta apartments stand the old clapboard huts with outdoor privies. Where should one look for the real direction of the Negro economy?

U.S. business, for one, has its eyes fixed eagerly on the TV antennae and the washing machines. U.S. Negroes today have an annual income of $15 billion a year—almost as much as the national income of Canada, or more than the value of all U.S. export trade. Negro publications, whose advertising columns were until recently dominated by hair-straighteners and skin-bleachers, are now agleam with four-color ads of all the national brands—a dusky glamour girl smiling above a pack of Luckies, Negro men of distinction sipping Calvert, a Negro executive praising Remington typewriters. (Most advertising agencies now have special Negro market consultants who see to it that ads will sell and not offend Negroes.)

The Negro is a good customer. He wants to feel that he can buy the best. Swift & Co. does not advertise its ordinary fowl in Negro publications, but the more expensive Swift's Premium ("The dream chicken that came true"). Several Negro families often pool their savings to buy an expensive car and drive it on alternate days. On Harlem's Lenox Avenue, Cadillacs are so commonplace that nobody turns to look at them any more (a situation which one resourceful driver met by having his Cadillac's top painted a gay plaid).

Some of the Cadillac prosperity is obviously false or forced; many Negroes are driven to spend their earnings in showy ways because they still cannot get the more ordinary things a white man with a similar income would buy, e.g., a decent home or a vacation trip to a good resort. Says a Negro leader in St. Louis (where Negro housing is particularly bad): "A flashy car becomes their living room, the only one they've got." Says a San Francisco Negro: "It is a sort of mobile aspirin tablet."

Despite the flashy cars, the Negro's spending habits have changed radically. He saves much more than he used to. Big insurance companies, which once considered Negro business more trouble than it was worth, now go after it. Loan companies, car dealers, etc. find Negroes excellent credit risks. There are signs that the Negro has begun to develop a large, strong middle class. Some Negro leaders, in fact, believe—and they do not consider it a bad thing—that the Negro is turning into the nation's new Babbitt.

Though Negro home ownership has gone up dramatically, the most depressing feature of the Negro's existence is still his home. Negroes now own nearly a third of the places they live in, a two-thirds rise over 1940. (White home ownership has risen more slowly in the same period, is now 57%.) But nearly a third of all Negro homes are dilapidated, compared with less than 10% in the nation as a whole. More than 20% of all Negro homes are overcrowded, compared with 5½% in the nation as a whole.

The Great Emancipators

The foundation of the Negro's economic progress is the fact that he has broken in large numbers out of farm and domestic work into industry. During World War II, a million Negroes went into defense industries. By & large, they have stayed in industry ever since. Today, nearly 11% of all U.S. industrial workers are Negroes—twice as many as in 1940. Most Negroes are still held to unskilled jobs. But there has been progress:

¶ Among U.S. skilled workers and foremen, 4% are now Negroes, up from 2½% in 1940.

¶ Among women professional and technical workers, 7% are Negroes, up from 4½% in 1940.

One big trouble: there simply are not enough qualified Negroes. Example: U.S. industry will hire all the Negro engineers it can get, but few Negro college students go in for science or engineering. They still favor the respectable, relatively secure professions, such as teaching, medicine, the ministry and the law. In business, Negroes are generally in service lines, e.g., undertakers, barbers, cleaners, etc. This is not entirely the result of discrimination. Also to blame: the Negro's lack of confidence, which makes him underestimate his very real opportunities.

Negroes know that they have advanced because these are good times for the country as a whole, and some fear that their gains might melt away in a depression. But most Negro leaders agree that the Negro's progress in the past decade has been too solid ever to be rolled back easily. One measure of that progress is the fact that the Negro's biggest preoccupation is not economics, but social equality.

The biggest single blow against segregation in the U.S. has been struck by the armed forces. The great experiment of "integration" proved once & for all that 1) if decently treated and trained, Negroes can fight as well as any man; 2) if properly led, white Americans from any part of the country will live, work, fight and die side by side with Negroes.

From the Civil War through World War II, Negro soldiers were kept in segregated units. Despite individual bravery, their morale and performance were generally low. In World War II there were some outstanding Negro units, but of all the Negroes in uniform (about 1,000,000), 90% were kept in rear-area service outfits. During the Battle of the Bulge, when he urgently needed reinforcements, General Eisenhower put Negro service troops through a quick combat training course, attached them in platoon strength to line companies. The experiment worked: the Negro troops, more or less unsegregated for the first time, made a good combat showing. This experience became an argument for postwar integration policy.

The Air Force was the first to abolish separate units for Negroes. The Army followed. By 1951, in the U.S., Europe and the Far East, Negro soldiers were scattered through the regular units. Today the Army has 200,000 Negro enlisted men (11% of total strength) and nearly 4,000 officers. The Air Force has 70,000 enlisted men (7%) and nearly 1,000 officers. The Navy, lagging behind the others in giving equality to the Negro, has 34,000 enlisted men (a little less than 3%, half of them still in the mess steward's branch) and 65 officers.

In Army camps and Air Force bases across the nation, there have been virtually no "incidents" between white and colored soldiers. The only difficulty has occurred at Southern Army camps, where children of colored officers and enlisted men are still sent to segregated colored schools off the post (the President has recently promised to remedy that situation). In Korea the integration policy has worked wonders with the morale of white as well as Negro troops. Negro officers command white troops without any friction. The matter is no longer even discussed. Says Lieut. Colonel Robert W. Wilson of Washington, D.C., a G-1 officer, and a Negro: "I think about the color problem about once a day: when I shave in the morning."

There are other emancipators at work. Among them:

THE MACHINE. It was fashionable, in the '20s and '30s, particularly among pink-eyed young economists, to say that the machine degraded man. Actually, it has proved a great equalizer. It tests a man coldly and without prejudice: he can either run it or he cannot. North & South, thousands of Negroes are experiencing equality for the first time in their lives—the equality of doing exactly the same work as whites on the assembly line.

THE COURTS. For years, liberals have argued that only new, drastic and specific legislation, i.e., FEPC, would do the Negroes any good. Yet in the past decade, the Negro has made tremendous progress not, in the main, through new legislation, but through a long series of court decisions interpreting the basic law of the land, the Constitution. These rulings, it was usually warned, were "out of step" with popular sentiment and would provoke trouble; yet, accepted virtually without protest, they have quietly accomplished a variety of things, from forcing Southern state universities to accept Negro graduate students to opening up Chicago bowling alleys to interracial teams.

SPORTS & TV. The sight of Negroes playing major-league baseball, carried all over the nation by TV, has probably done as much for equality as most legal victories. Southern minor-league clubs have begun to hire Negro players. TV has had another effect on the South: it has carried to thousands of people their first sight of colored and white entertainers appearing together. Says one Negro teacher: "Why, stuff like that, coming into white homes, it's going to make the white man think, whether he realizes it or not."

These very American forces, constantly working on North & South alike, have driven racial discrimination and prejudice sharply on the defensive.

The North: Guerrillas on Main Street

What is it like to be a Negro and actively fight segregation in the North? Hascal Othello Humes, 30, is an A.B. from Columbia University, a former infantry lieutenant who saw combat in Italy. With his wife, he lives in a white neighborhood in Seattle. When they first moved in, the Humeses got threatening letters and obscene telephone calls, but they stuck it out. Humes has three jobs: he is studying for an M.A. in psychology at the University of Washington, he is a city policeman in the afternoon, and at night he is a bouncer in a mixed nightclub. His police beat is in a white section, and when some white people objected, his superior suggested that he ask for a transfer, but he quietly replied that he would rather resign from the force. After he goes off duty each evening, he reports for work at the China Pheasant. By closing time (5 a.m.), Humes has usually lifted at least one drunk (white or colored) well above the floor and carried him into the street. Humes says he does not often wonder whether it's all worth it. But when he does, he thinks of his wife and of the new baby she is expecting. If that doesn't help, he prays.

Humes's life illustrates the price the Northern Negro often pays for his state of semi-equality. As a citizen, the Negro in the North, by & large, enjoys full rights: everywhere except in the border states, he is equal in the schools and in most public services. His great fight in the last decade has been for simple, decent treatment in everyday life. In this fight, he has made marked but uneven progress.

Ten years ago, for example, Northern hotels and restaurants that would openly turn away Negro patrons were in the majority; now they are definitely in the minority. The facile old excuse—"Personally, I don't care, but the customers just wouldn't stand for Negroes to come in here"—has been proved empty again & again. The chief trouble is that the Negro can never be sure: he is in a constant guerrilla war, always half-expecting to be snubbed by this desk clerk or that headwaiter, or fobbed off with a gentlemen's-agreement type of spiel that all the tables have been reserved, all the rooms taken. Many Negroes prefer not to risk being embarrassed, stay away from predominantly white places. On trips, many prefer to drive all night, rather than take the chance of being turned down by a hotel.

But there are many wedges in the walls of prejudice:

¶ Telephone companies in the North, all white until a few years ago, now employ 5,000 Negroes.

¶ Denver now employs Negro bus drivers (long since a fixture in New York and Chicago).

¶ Detroit banks, in white neighborhoods, employ Negro tellers.

¶ Many Northern department stores hire Negro sales help.

¶ New York breweries now hire Negro production workers.

The Negro's biggest trouble comes when he tries to live in a white neighborhood. The worst race riots in recent U.S. history took place in Detroit (1943) and Chicago (1951), where there had been a huge, wartime influx of Negro workers. Today, both cities live in somewhat uneasy peace. The case of Chicago is fairly typical. "Property owners' leagues," openly dedicated to keeping Negroes out of white neighborhoods, have disappeared or gone underground. Nevertheless, Negroes rarely escape their ghetto—they simply stretch its boundaries. White people retreat before the Negro advance—generally to the suburbs, where Negroes are usually strictly barred. In many Chicago neighborhoods, Negroes and whites live side by side. A mayor's commission has organized the "lighthouse system," under which citizens alert police as soon as trouble signs appear in a neighborhood. Police themselves have been put through a special "human relations" training program.

The South: Minefield among Magnolias

Even if he does not meet outright hostility in the North, the Negro is apt to meet indifference, which can hurt worse. Not many Northerners are interested enough in Negroes to worry about where they ride on a streetcar; but few are interested enough to be really kind to them, either. The South—still the home of two-thirds of the U.S.'s Negroes—cares far more deeply about its Negro problem.

A South African visitor reports: "I went down there to find the Deep South. But everywhere I went, they said: 'Oh, this isn't the Deep South. You've got to go farther on to find what you're looking for, Mister.' I never did find the Deep South, where they lynch Negroes and provide source material for William Faulkner and Lillian Smith. It wasn't in Tennessee, it wasn't in Georgia, it wasn't in Mississippi. Now I'm beginning to wonder whether the Deep South really exists any more."

There is a lot of evidence that it does not. The color line is no longer a barbed-wire fence strung between the magnolia trees. It is more like a minefield through which whites and Negroes must carefully pick their way—and the map is obviously out of date. Segregation now seems like something out of Alice in Wonderland as rewritten by Herman Talmadge.

In the South, a Negro may ride a Pullman car and eat anywhere in a diner (until a few years ago, he had to eat behind a curtain). But he must buy his tickets at a segregated ticket window. He may sit anywhere in an airplane, but his waiting room at the airport is likely to be Jim Crow. He may ride in elevators, body-to-body with whites, but in buses and streetcars he must still jostle past standing white passengers to the Jim Crow rear. (In some cities, he may sit down in the white area if there are empty seats, and white people will often sit down in the colored area if the white area is crowded.)

Several states give Negro doctors full membership in their medical societies, but Negro doctors are not allowed to practice in most Southern hospitals. (White private ambulances often refuse to pick up critically injured Negroes.) A Negro is welcome to shop in almost any Southern department store, but in most he may not try on a suit until he buys it.

A Negro may give a white panhandler a handout but he may not follow him into a bar with the sign, "Whites only." He may attend the graduate schools of state universities (about 1,000 do), but he may not attend undergraduate colleges—with some exceptions (e.g., University of Louisville, University of Delaware). In such schools Negro and white students get on without friction, and form friendships; but the Negroes, while they eat with whites, may not belong to white fraternities—but they are allowed to attend dances as guests.

In many important industries of the South, e.g., Haspel, Chrysler, International Harvester, Glenn Martin, Firestone Tire & Rubber, Negroes work side by side with whites (only South Carolina still has a law requiring segregation in work areas). Union meetings are nonsegregated, but some locals have raised hell when union headquarters ordered an end to segregated toilet facilities. But in one plant near Atlanta, when the "colored" and "white" signs over the fountains wore out, nobody bothered to repaint them, and segregation for drinking stopped. (But if someone had protested formally that it should stop, it would unquestionably have been furiously enforced.)

Struggle in the Soul

Mob violence is rare. The year 1952 was the first without a single reported lynching. Many of the South's "better people," who for years tacitly condoned the Klan, have now abandoned it. It is socially as safe to back anti-mask bills as it was once to take hot broth to an ailing Mammy's cabin.

The principle that Negroes must have "separate but equal" facilities* was an empty phrase a decade ago; today, it is rapidly becoming reality. Most Southerners feel that unless they make "separate but equal" a fact, the courts are sure to saddle them with "whole hog" rulings, i.e., complete equality. Many states are hastily building fine new Negro schools and hospitals, although from a purely economic standpoint, "separate but equal" schools are insanely wasteful. Most Southerners no longer sneer at the educated Negro as "biggety"; many want to help the Negro get a better education, better jobs and better housing, and let the rest take care of itself.

However, some Southerners are afraid that this formula may prove too little and too late. Southerners complain that there are too many "whole hog or nothing" Negroes. This is only partly true. No Southern Negro seriously wants or expects complete equality overnight. But all Southern Negroes want it as an ultimate goal—and they want to see faster progress towards that goal. They have become suspicious of "gradualism." They want to know, as one Negro leader puts it: "When does Old Man Gradualism run out?" The Southern Negro's mood may be summed up by the case of the successful Negro attorney in Birmingham who recently built a new home. "Look at it," says a friend. "Look where it is. Over there, on Dynamite Hill. You don't build a $35,000 house in that location—unless you are a Negro and haven't got a better place to build it. Some say he wanted to wait, hoping that maybe better areas would open up. But he wanted to live in that house before he died. So he built it."

Southern customs are still largely based on the assumption that the Negro is an inferior being. But that assumption lacks the pseudo-scientific backing it still had a generation ago. For decades, the South's preoccupation with the Negro was a kind of cushion against reality, a diversion from the facts of poverty and stagnation. Southern "poor whites" had nothing if they could not feel superior to the Negro. During the past ten years, the South has been caught up in a great industrial boom; reality has become a little easier to face.

Although many Southerners today will agree that segregation is wrong in principle, the vast majority still fiercely defends it as right in practice. A mass of state laws and city ordinances enforces it. But Southerners seem to know in their hearts that it is not really defensible, and that the tide of events is against it. The result is a war in the South's own soul which many Northerners, who see the South only as stubborn and narrow-minded, fail to understand. A Southern Negro and former slave understood it. Said Booker T. Washington, the greatest Negro leader in U.S. history: "The outside world does not know . . . the struggle that is constantly going on in the hearts of both the Southern white people and their former slaves . . . While both races are thus struggling, they should have the sympathy, the support, and the forbearance of the rest of the world."

The Spirit: Hopes and Headaches

The Negro has suffered more than any other group of Americans. He has seen the white man at his worst, and he might have turned cynically against the white man's faith and values. But he has not. The Negro does feel bitter about his lot. But it is a bitterness greatly modified by hope, patience and humor.

Negro intellectuals occasionally talk "African nationalism." But the majority of U.S. Negroes feel no more kinship to the Kikuyu of Kenya than to the man in the moon. They want to be, above all, Americans.

The most spectacular illustration of the Negroes' loyalty to the U.S. is the Communists' crashing failure to win recruits among them: by FBI estimates, no more than 1,400 Negroes ever belonged to the Communist Party at one time. Dr. Carlton Goodlett, young San Francisco Negro leader, gives these reasons: "More than anyone else, the Negro believes in the American opportunity to better himself. The Communist he sees as a run-down, underprivileged guy. The Negro just isn't interested in the underdog role. Secondly, he has learned to believe in the right to protest. People like myself, always protesting against injustice, wouldn't last ten seconds in Russia. Also, no single group in this country believes more strongly in God and the hereafter. The Negro doesn't want to catch hell on this side of the River Styx and on the other side too." A Negro lawyer put it this way: "It's bad enough to be black without being Red too."

The Negro is still deeply religious, although American churches have been slow in fighting discrimination before the altar. Says Marie Johnson, wife of Fisk University's President Charles Johnson: "I think we got the best out of Christianity, because we had to have it. No matter how we may scoff, we believe . . . Still, 11 o'clock Sunday morning is the most segregated hour of American life."

There are fewer outstanding Negro leaders on the national scene today than ever before. Negro leaders have found that, as their people's status improves, the business of leadership gets tougher. Walter White, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, recalls that back in the days when there were three or four lynchings a year, it was a lot easier to raise funds than now. A great Negro leader, the late James Weldon Johnson, once said that leadership was a form of escape; by this he meant that "Negro spokesmen" might gain a lot of prestige by making speeches and gathering personal followings, but did not really accomplish very much. Today's Negro leader concentrates on getting things done on specific issues. Emancipated to a large extent from the white professional liberals and their pet slogan, "education," he tries, for instance, to get a court ruling on segregation in Pullmans instead of trying to "educate" millions of individual Pullman passengers. Today's Negro leader does not want to be known as a firebrand; the compliment he prizes most is to be called "a good tactician." One symptom of this change is the fact that Booker T. Washington, a superb tactician whom most Negro leaders in the '20s and '30s denounced as an "Uncle Tom," is being rediscovered by Negroes as a great man.

The Negro still cannot forget his color. Negro writers and artists wish that they could be craftsmen first and Negroes second, but they find it virtually impossible. Yet more & more Negroes are impatient with spirituals and the blues (including the literary form of the blues, also known as the novel of protest). Many intelligent Negroes are plainly eager to stop looking at every problem through colored glasses. One interesting symptom: Negroes used to have a kind of secret slang* which, as one Negro writer puts it, was "like a tattoo on your wrist"; it has now all but disappeared. Says Negro Photographer Gordon Parks: "There is this pressure to make good for your whole people. If you fail, they give you a black eye. But a while back, I made up my mind, from now on it's just going to be me. If I want to fail, that's my business. You can't walk around with your race piled on your back." He adds thoughtfully, with the persistent doubt that even the most optimistic Negro seems unable to escape: "Anyway, that's what I tell my kids. Maybe I'm just bluffing myself."

Indications are that, as the Negro shares the white man's privileges and opportunities, he also shares his headaches. Says a Negro newspaperman: "When the Negro had less freedom, he could blame the whites for whatever went wrong with him. Now it's harder for him to blame the whites for his failures." Says Negro Novelist Ralph (Invisible Man) Ellison: "After a man makes $10,000 or $20,000 a year, the magic fades. He is just another man with his problems." Most Negroes still wish they had that kind of problem, but many will agree with Ellison that "we are all Americans together, all modern men together. And we're all facing the same spiritual crisis."

Perhaps the Negro's most serious problem is that, as he gets more of the fruits of the tree of life, his appetite increases. Explains a Manhattan Negro social worker: "A Negro laborer living in Harlem and rarely peering beyond the boundaries of his ghetto might be reasonably content; but if he gets a good job downtown, mixes with white people on a more or less equal basis, and then in the evening is forced to go home to a miserable house in Harlem, he will be bitterly discontented." Says a Negro philosopher, Dr. Alain Locke of Howard University: "The old slum is no longer the problem. It's the new, respectable slum that worries us. We call it Striver's Row." As Negroes move into Striver's Row, their bitterness at remaining inequalities will mount. At the same time, white resentment of growing Negro ambition may mount too.

The Future: Liability or Opportunity?

Justice has been imagined by mankind in many different shapes. Could it be that her face is black or brown? That, at any rate, is the way she is likely to appear to the majority of the world's people, whose skins are colored. They are the people, in Asia and in Africa, whom the U.S. hopes to lead to democracy. They judge the U.S. very largely on evidence drawn from the "Negro problem." The U.S. has probably won more enemies by stories, true and false, about its treatment of Negroes than by any other propaganda; but many Negroes feel that the U.S. could be winning friends instead. Just how much individual Negroes have done to win friends for the U.S. is almost never realized: they have been effective both in the diplomatic service (which so far employs only a handful—about 60) and in personal contacts at Negro universities like Howard, where young people from Africa and Asia come to learn about the U.S. Says Novelist Richard (Native Son) Wright: "The key to Asia is right there in Harlem and on Chicago's South Side."

The Negro problem is basically not economic, or social, or psychological. It is moral. Prejudice does more moral harm to those who harbor it than to those who are hit by it. And the most hopeful fact about the Negro's progress in the last decade is that it could not have been possible without some moral progress by white Americans.

Gunnar Myrdal explained the U.S.'s state of mind on the Negro problem more succinctly and movingly than anyone else: "The ordinary American is the opposite of a cynic. He is on the average more of a believer and a defender of the faith in humanity than the rest of the Occidentals . . . He investigates his faults, puts them on record, and shouts them from the housetops . . . America's handling of the Negro problem has been criticized most emphatically by white Americans . . . and the criticism . . . will not stop until America has completely reformed itself . . . Mankind is sick of fear and disbelief . . . If America in actual practice could show the world [that] the Negro became finally integrated into modern democracy, all mankind would be given faith again . . . and America would have spiritual power many times stronger than all her financial and military resources—the power of the trust and support of all good people on earth. America is free to choose whether the Negro shall remain her liability or become her opportunity."

THE RACE QUESTION IN MODERN SCIENCE

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF RACIAL DIFFERENCES

by

G. M. MORANT

THE RACE QUESTION

The importance which the problem of race has acquired in the modern world scarcely needs to be pointed out. Mankind will not soon forget the injustices and crimes which give such tragic overtones to the word " race ". It was inevitable that Unesco should take a position in a controversy so closely linked not only with its goals but also with its very nature. For, like war, the problem of race which directly affects millions of human lives and causes countless conflicts has its roots " in the minds of men ". The preamble of Unesco's Constitution, adopted in 1945, specifically named racism as one of the social evils which the new Organization was called upon to combat. Moreover, the Constitution declares that " the great and terrible war which has now ended was a war made possible by the denial of the democratic principles of the dignity, equality and mutual respect of men, and by the propagation, in their place, through ignorance and prejudice, of the doctrine of the inequality of men and races ".

The vigorous action which Unesco is about to undertake in support of the struggle against race prejudice was evolved in response to a resolution adopted by the United Nations Social and Economic Council at its sixth session in 1948. By that resolution Unesco was called upon to consider the timeliness " of proposing and recommending the general adoption of a programme of dissemination of scientific facts designed to bring about the disappearance of that which is commonly called race prejudice ".

The General Conference of Unesco in 1949 adopted three resolutions which committed the Organization " to study and collect scientific materials concerning questions of race ", " to give wide diffusion to the scientific material collected ", and " to prepare an educational campaign based on this information ".

There is great confusion on the notion of race, so great that no campaign designed to remove prejudices can be effectively undertaken without careful preparation. Such groundwork must include a clarification of the present scientific position in the controversy on the subject; indeed, it must first of all provide a definition of race on which the different scientific circles concerned can agree.

It was with this in view that Unesco invited a number of anthropologists and sociologists from various countries to meet as a committee of experts in Unesco House in December 1949. They discussed all aspects of the problem at great length and finally drew up a declaration, the text of which is presented further on. Every word of this declaration was carefully weighed. Nothing was neglected in the effort to present to the public in a simple and clear manner the conclusions which science has reached on the subject.

Nor was the declaration in the form decided upon in Paris the end of the effort to make the statement fully authoritative. It was submitted to many leading scientists in various countries. They examined it in detail and a number of them suggested additions and amendments. The competence and objectivity of the scientists who signed the document in its final form cannot be questioned.

In organizing the meeting of experts which produced this authoritative declaration on the race problem, Unesco took up again, after a lapse of fifteen years, a project which the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation has wished to carry through but which it had to abandon in deference to the appeasement policy of the pre-war period. The race question had become one of the pivots of Nazi ideology and policy. Mazaryk and Benes took the initiative in calling for a conference to re-establish in the minds and consciences of men everywhere the truth about race. Scientists were unanimous in wishing to have the opportunity of denouncing before world opinion the absurdity of the racist dogma. But they were not given such an opportunity. Nazi propaganda was able to continue its baleful work unopposed by the authority of an international organization.

Knowledge of the truth does not always help change emotional attitudes that draw their real strength from the subconscious or from factors beside the real issue. Knowledge of the truth can, however, prevent rationalizations of reprehensible acts or behaviour prompted by feelings that men will not easily avow openly. Unesco has the will and the means to make available to everyone the achievements of science, if those achievements can help to lessen the hatreds that separate human groups from one another. But Unesco can really succeed in this task only if it is careful to present the facts in all their complexity without trying to hide ignorances and doubts.

Science was faced with the problem of race at the beginning of the nineteenth century when the great evolutionary theories were being formulated. Unfortunately, the problem soon shifted from the purely scientific field to the field of politics. As a result, the discussions which it has provoked have rarely been free from the passions and prejudices of the moment.

But psychology, biology and cultural anthropology, which have developed so remarkably during the last fifty years, have made possible extensive inquiries and experimental research studies into the problem. The results of this important work are presented in general terms in the declaration of the experts assembled by Unesco. It should not be forgotten, however, that new methods and techniques of appraising results are being put into practice every day. At the present moment, it is impossible to demonstrate that there exist between " races " differences of intelligence and temperament other than those produced by cultural environment. If, tomorrow, more accurate tests or more thorough studies should prove that " races " as such do, in fact, have different innate faculties or aptitudes, Unesco's moral position on the race question would not be changed.

Racism is a particularly vicious and mean expression of the caste spirit. It involves belief in the innate and absolute superiority of an arbitrarily defined human group over other equally arbitrarily defined groups. Instead of being based on scientific facts, it is generally maintained in defiance of the scientific method. As an ideology and feeling, racism is by its nature aggressive. It threatens the essential moral values by satisfying the taste for domination and by exalting the contempt for man. Concern for human dignity demands that all citizens be equal before the law, and that they share equally in the advantages assured them by law, no matter what their physical or intellectual differences may be. The law sees in each person only a human being who has the right to the same consideration and to equal respect. The conscience of all mankind demands that this be true for all the peoples of the earth. It matters little, therefore, whether the diversity of men's gifts be the result of biological or of cultural factors.

Thus, the problem of race must be approached not only on the biological and social levels but also on the moral level. And, in view of the growing inter-relation of the sciences affecting man and society, it can be solved only by the joint action of different scientific disciplines. Unesco will undertake to make known to a vast public the results of the researches obtained in all these various fields. It will, for example, publish pamphlets prepared by eminent specialists.

Many inquiries have already been undertaken into inter-racial conflicts and the factors that produce them. The time has now come for us to consider the societies which have in large measure succeeded in resolving antagonisms by overriding racial differences. Thus, the General Conference of Unesco in Florence recommended for the 1951 programme of the Organization a study of racial relations in Brazil. This great republic has a civilization which has been developed by the direct contributions of different races. And it suffers less than other nations from the effects of those prejudices which are at the root of so many vexatious and cruel measures in countries of similar ethnic composition. We are as yet ill-informed about the factors which brought about such a favourable and, in many ways, exemplary situation. But in the present state of the social sciences, general speculations no longer suffice. We must have specialists make searching inquiries in the field. We must learn from them exactly why and how social, psychological and economic factors have contributed in varying degrees to make possible the harmony which exists in Brazil. Then the results of their inquiries can be set forth in publications in order to stimulate those who are still struggling elsewhere to introduce more peaceable and happier inter-racial relations.

Yet, no matter how great an effort Unesco may make in this field, it cannot by itself bring to an end the most tenacious and the most widely spread of human prejudices. It must be able to count on the support of groups and organizations formed in many countries to achieve the same purpose. To these fighters, indeed to all those who rebel against the idea that millions of human beings are condemned by the mere fact of their birth to humiliation and misery, Unesco brings its co-operation. It brings too the hope that the struggle against the misdeeds of racism will become a crusade to be carried out in common by all the peoples of the earth.

1. Scientists have reached general agreements in recognizing that mankind is one : that all men belong to the same species, Homo sapiens. It is further generally agreed among scientists that all men are probably derived from the same common stock; and that such differences as exist between different groups of mankind are due to the operation of evolutionary factors of differentiation such as isolation, the drift and random fixation of the material particles which control heredity (the genes), changes in the structure of these particles, hybridization, and natural selection. In these ways groups have arisen of varying stability and degree of differentiation which have been classified in different ways for different purposes.

2. From the biological standpoint, the species Homo sapiens is made up of a number of populations, each one of which differs from the others in the frequency of one or more genes. Such genes, responsible for the hereditary differences between men, are always few when compared to the whole genetic constitution of man and to the vast number of genes common to all human beings regardless of the population to which they belong. This means that the likenesses among men are far greater than their differences.

3. A race, from the biological standpoint, may therefore be defined as one of the group of populations constituting the species Homo sapiens. These populations are capable of inter-breeding with one another but, by virtue of the isolating barriers which in the past kept them more or less separated, exhibit certain physical differences as a result of their somewhat different biological histories. These represent variations, as it were, on a common theme.

4. In short, the term " race " designates a group or population characterized by some concentrations, relative as to frequency and distribution, of hereditary particles (genes) or physical characters, which appear, fluctuate, and often disappear in the course of time by reason of geographic and or cultural isolation. The varying manifestations of these traits in different populations are perceived in different ways by each group. What is perceived is largely preconceived, so that each group arbitrarily tends to misinterpret the variability which occurs as a fundamental difference which separates that group from all others.

5. These are the scientific facts. Unfortunately, however, when most people use the term " race " they do not do so in the sense above defined. To most people, a race is any group of people whom they choose to describe as a race. Thus, many national, religious, geographic, linguistic or cultural groups have, in such loose usage, been called " race ", when obviously Americans are not a race, nor are Englishmen, nor Frenchmen, nor any other national group. Catholics, Protestants, Moslems and Jews are not races, nor are groups who speak English or any other language thereby definable as a race; people who live in Iceland or England or India are not races; nor are people who are culturally Turkish or Chinese or the like thereby describable as races.

6. National, religious, geographic, linguistic and cultural groups do not necessarily coincide with racial groups : and the cultural traits of such groups have no demonstrated genetic connexion with racial traits. Because serious errors of this kind are habitually committed when the term " race " is used in popular parlance, it would be better when speaking of human races to drop the term " race " altogether and speak of ethnic groups.

7. Now what has the scientist to say about the groups of mankind which may be recognized at the present time ? Human races can be and have been differently classified by different anthropologists, but at the present time most anthropologists agree on classifying the greater part of present-day mankind into three major divisions, as follows :

The Mongoloid Division
The Negroid Division
The Caucasoid Division

The biological processes which the classifier has here embalmed, as it were, are dynamic, not static. These divisions were not the same in the past as they are at present, and there is every reason to believe that they will change in the future.

8. Many sub-groups or ethnic groups within these divisions have been described. There is no general agreement upon their number, and in any event most ethnic groups have not yet been either studied or described by the physical anthropologists.

9. Whatever classification the anthropologist makes of man, he never includes mental characteristics as part of those classifications. It is now generally recognised that intelligence tests do not in themselves enable us to differentiate safely between what is due to innate capacity and what is the result of environmental influences, training and education. Wherever it has been possible to make allowances for differences in environmental opportunities, the tests have shown essential similarity in mental characters among all human groups. In short, given similar degrees of cultural opportunity to realize their potentialities, the average achievement of the members of each ethnic group is about the same. The scientific investigations of recent years fully support the dictum of Confucius (551-478 B.C.) " Men's natures are alike; it is their habits that carry them far apart. "

10. The scientific material available to us at present does not justify the conclusion that inherited genetic differences are a major factor in producing the differences between the cultures and cultural achievements of different peoples or groups. It does indicate, however, that the history of the cultural experience which each group has undergone is the major factor in explaining such differences. The one trait which above all others has been at a premium in the evolution of men's mental characters has been educability, plasticity. This is a trait which all human beings possess. It is indeed, a species character of Homo sapiens.

11. So far as temperament is concerned, there is no definite evidence that there exist inborn differences between human groups. There is evidence that whatever group differences of the kind there might be are greatly over-ridden by the individual differences, and by the differences springing from environmental factors.

12. As for personality and character, these may be considered raceless. In every human group a rich variety of personality and character types will be found, and there is no reason for believing that any human group is richer that any other in these respects.

13. With respect to race-mixture, the evidence points unequivocally to the fact that this has been going on from the earliest times. Indeed, one of the chief processes of race-formation and race-extinction or absorption is by means of hybridization between races or ethnic groups. Furthermore, no convincing evidence has been adduced that race-mixture of itself produces biologically bad effects. Statements that human hybrids frequently show undesirable traits, both physically and mentally, physical disharmonies and mental degeneracies, are not supported by the facts. There is, therefore, no biological justification for prohibiting intermarriage between persons of different ethnic groups.

14. The biological fact of race and the myth of " race " should be distinguished. For all practical social purposes " race " is not so much a biological phenomenon as a social myth. The myth " race " has created an enormous amount of human and social damage. In recent years it has taken a heavy toll in human lives and caused untold suffering. It still prevents the normal development of millions of human beings and deprives civilization of the effective co-operation of productive minds. The biological differences between ethnic groups should be disregarded from the standpoint of social acceptance and social action. The unity of mankind from both the biological and social viewpoints is the main thing. To recognize this and to act accordingly is the first requirement of modern man. It is but to recognize what a great biologist wrote in 1875 : " As man advances in civilization, and small tribes are united into larger communities, the simplest reason would tell each individual that he ought to extend his social instincts and sympathies to all the members of the same nation, though personally unknown to him. This point being one reached, there is only an artificial barrier to prevent his sympathies extending to the men of all nations and races. " These are the words of Charles Darwin in The Descent of Man (2nd ed., 1875, pp. 187-8). And, indeed, the whole of human history shows that a co-operative spirit is not only natural to men, but more deeply rooted than any self-seeking tendencies. If this were not so we should not see the growth of integration and organization of his communities which the centuries and the millenia plainly exhibit.

15. We now have to consider the bearing of these statements on the problem of human equality. It must be asserted with the utmost emphasis that equality as an ethical principle in no way depends upon the assertion that human beings are in fact equal in endowment. Obviously individuals in all ethnic groups vary greatly among themselves in endowment. Nevertheless, the characteristics in which human groups differ from one another are often exaggerated and used as a basis for questioning the validity of equality in the ethical sense. For this purpose we have thought it worth while to set out in a formal manner what is at present scientifically established concerning individual and group differences.

(1) In matters of race, the only characteristics which anthropologists can effectively use as a basis for classifications are physical and physiological.

(2) According to present knowledge there is no proof that the groups of mankind differ in their innate mental characteristics, whether in respect of intelligence or temperament. The scientific evidence indicates that the range of mental capacities in all ethnic groups is much the same.

(3) Historical and sociological studies support the view that genetic differences are not of importance in determining the social and cultural differences between different groups of Homo sapiens, and that the social and cultural changes in different groups, have, in the main, been independent of changes in inborn constitution. Vast social changes have occurred which were not in any way connected with changes in racial type.

(4) There is no evidence that race mixture as such produces bad results from the biological point of view. The social results of race mixture whether for good or ill are to be traced to social factors.

(5) All normal human beings are capable of learning to share in a common life, to understand the nature of mutual service and reciprocity, and to respect social obligations and contracts. Such biological differences as exist between members of different ethnic groups have no relevance to problems of social and political organization, moral life and communication between human beings.

Lastly, biological studies lend support to the ethic of universal brotherhood; for man is born with drives toward co-operation, and unless these drives are satisfied, men and nations alike fall ill. Man is born a social being who can reach his fullest development only through interaction with his fellows. The denial at any point of this social bond between man and man brings with it disintegration. In this sense, every man is his brother's keeper. For every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main, because he is involved in mankind.

THE RACES OF MAN

EARLY MAN LACKING MEANS OF WIDE TRAVEL AND COMMUNICATION DEVELOPED INTO VARIED TYPES WHICH WE CALL RACES. PEOPLE THEN NEEDED TO KEEP PEACE WITH FEW NEIGHBORS. TO-DAY ALL MEN ARE NEIGHBORS AND WITH ALL MEN IN TIME WE CAN AND WE MUST LIVE IN PEACE.

Race Relations Division, American Missionary Association
287 Fourth Avenue, New York 10, N.Y.

WHY ARE THERE DIFFERENT RACES?

Very small groups of people have the extreme characteristics of white, yellow, and black "races"; the great majority of the people of the world are the "inbetweens"—those with various shades of tan and brown.

Man's greatest adventure was his spread from somewhere in Asia to all corners of the world.

Originally man was neither light nor dark. As he advanced into the areas of hot sunlight and long summers to the South, those with darker skins were better able to survive. The short wide nose developed as the best means of inhaling the moist warm air, and body hair disappeared.

As he advanced into the north, those with lighter skins were better able to absorb the sunlight in the short months of summer and so store up a quantity of Vitamin D against the long dark winter to come. Here, too, the long thin nose was better adapted to inhale and warm the cold air, and a large amount of body hair was some protection against the cold. In some places in Asia, a fold of skin developed over the inner corner of the eyes to produce what we call the slant eye. The geographical differences between men are however of small magnitude when one considers the fundamental likeness.

The population of the world was small in the days of early man and differences, once begun, tended to persist through isolation and inbreeding. Each so-called Race became functionally adapted to living in the area in which it found itself. There was no question of superiority or inferiority, for the white man would have suffered in the hot tropical sun as much as the Negro would have suffered in the cold North.

With the growth of civilization, man has been enabled, through the use of proper clothing and scientifically prepared food and vitamins, to move into all areas of the world, no matter what his color. The so-called racial differences are superficial, and man is essentially the same and has the same potentialities wherever you find him, be he light, dark, tall, short, fat or thin, long headed or round headed.

THE JEWS ARE NOT A RACE

Chief Rabbi W. A. Matthew, of the Royal Order of Ethiopian Jews, at the Harlem Synagogue. His followers are not converts but are from families in the West Indies and Africa whose Hebrew faith stems from the Falashas of Ethiopia—direct descendants from the House of David and of Solomon.

a Jewish Negro

Jews are people of any race who practice the religion of Judaism. They are found among all races and sub-races, and among people of every conceivable physical type and occupation. Certain physical characteristics which are called "Jewish," such as the curved nose, are found among millions of non-Jewish peoples of Eastern Europe and Western Asia which is the area from which many Jews originally came. Even Jewish culture is a composite of customs from the many areas in which they have lived. Indeed, persecution of a Jewish "race" is a comparatively new thing. Previously the Jews were persecuted for their religion. Now that we have religious freedom, there is invented a mythical "racial" basis for the persecutions.

THE FOODS WE EAT ARE A GIFT FROM ALL PEOPLES

The crab-apple and the hazelnut are the only important foods contributed to our table by the ancient Europeans. Everything else we eat we have borrowed from someone else. If the contribution of the American Indian alone were removed we should have no kidney beans, lima beans, chocolate, corn, peanuts, pineapple, sweet potatoes, Irish potatoes, pumpkins, squash, avocado, tomatoes, tobacco or turkeys.

CULTURE IS NOT INBORN

culture Chinese

Race deals with matters that are inherited, but such things as are called culture (speech, clothing, habits, music, etc.) depend on the surroundings in which the child lives. The little girl drinking the ice cream soda is of the yellow race but her culture is American.

LONG, LONG AGO, THERE WERE JUST A FEW PEOPLE IN THE WORLD. THEY DIDN'T LOOK LIKE ANYONE YOU KNOW TODAY.

THERE WERE MAMA AND PAPA GOG'S FAMILY AND THEIR RELATIVES AND NEIGHBORS — THE SIGGLES AND THE SOGS, THE BIGGLES AND THE BOGS.

THEY HAD NOT YET LEARNED TO GROW FOOD. THEY HUNTED WILD ANIMALS AND ATE WHAT PLANTS THEY COULD FIND.

THEY LOOKED FOR FOOD IN FAR PLACES. IN THEIR SEARCH, THE BIGGLES AND THE BOGS AND THE SIGGLES AND SOGS WENT DIFFERENT WAYS, AND SEPARATED FROM ONE ANOTHER.

PUBLISHED BY THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE OF B'NAI BRITH, PUBLICATIONS DEPT., PROGRAM DIVISION, 212-5TH AVE., N.Y. 10, N.Y.
EDUCATIONAL CONSULTANT: BUREAU FOR INTERCULTURAL EDUCATION.

AND WE KNOW THAT PEOPLE IN THE WORLD TODAY DON'T ALL LOOK ALIKE EITHER.

AND THAT'S GOOD. IF WE ALL LOOKED ALIKE, YOU COULDN'T TELL YOUR MOTHER FROM THE LADY NEXT DOOR.

AND YOUR BEST PAL WOULD HAVE TO WEAR A BADGE OR ELSE YOU WOULDN'T KNOW HE WAS YOUR BEST PAL.

THERE ARE LOTS OF WAYS TO TELL PEOPLE APART. NO ONE LOOKS EXACTLY LIKE ANYONE ELSE.

SOME PEOPLE HAVE DARK SKIN, SOME PEOPLE HAVE SKIN THAT IS YELLOWISH-TAN, AND SOME HAVE PALE SKIN.

SOME PEOPLE HAVE A CURIOUS IDEA THAT, BECAUSE OF THEIR COLOR, THEY ARE BETTER THAN PEOPLE OF A DIFFERENT COLOR.

BUT THEY ARE WRONG. SKIN COLOR HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH ABILITY OF ANY KIND— NOTHING AT ALL.

SKIN COLOR DOES NOT TELL US HOW FRIENDLY—OR INTERESTING—OR GOOD-PEOPLE ARE.

WE CERTAINLY MISS A LOT WHEN WE DON'T FIND OUT WHAT PEOPLE ARE LIKE ON THE INSIDE BECAUSE WE ARE TOO BUSY LOOKING ON THE OUTSIDE.

PART II

HOW WE LOOK DOES NOT TELL WHETHER WE DO THINGS DIFFERENTLY OR THE SAME.

ALL CHILDREN LIKE TO PLAY. CHILDREN ALL OVER THE WORLD EVEN PLAY THE SAME GAMES. TAKE KICKBALL, FOR INSTANCE.

WHERE THERE ARE NO PLAYGROUNDS, CHILDREN KICK THE BALL OVER THE LIMB OF A TALL TREE.

OR WHERE THERE ARE NO BIG TREES, CHILDREN KICK THE BALL OVER A STREAM

WE KICK THE BALL BETWEEN THE GOALPOSTS. HOW WE PLAY KICKBALL DEPENDS UPON WHERE WE LIVE AND NOT UPON HOW WE LOOK. WE ALL HAVE THE SAME KIND OF FUN.

PEOPLE ALL OVER THE WORLD LIVE IN HOUSES OF SOME KIND. WE ALL NEED PROTECTION FROM THE WEATHER.

PEOPLE IN COLD COUNTRIES LIVE IN SNUG TIGHT HOUSES THAT KEEP THEM WARM.

PEOPLE IN HOT COUNTRIES LIVE IN OPEN AIRY HOUSES THAT KEEP THEM COOL.

AND THEY LIVE IN THE KIND OF HOUSE THAT IS COMFORTABLE. IT HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH THEIR LOOKS, HAS IT ?

PEOPLE ALL OVER THE WORLD WORSHIP GOD.

THEY WORSHIP HIM IN MANY DIFFERENT WAYS.

BUT THE WAY THEY LOOK HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH THE WAY THEY WORSHIP.

AND OF COURSE, PEOPLE WHO DO LOOK ALIKE MAY DO THINGS DIFFERENTLY.

WE LEARN OUR WAYS OF DOING THINGS FROM THE PEOPLE AROUND US.

AND THEY LEARNED FROM THEIR MOTHERS AND FATHERS.

SO YOU SEE, PEOPLE WHO DO NOT LOOK ALIKE MAY PLAY THE SAME GAMES, LIVE IN THE SAME KINDS OF HOUSES, AND WORSHIP GOD IN THE SAME WAY.

WE DON'T ALL ACT ALIKE AND WE DON'T ALL LOOK ALIKE. BUT THE WAY WE LOOK HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH THE WAY WE ACT.

FROM THE MINUTE WE ARE BORN WE BEGIN TO LEARN. WE LEARN MOST OF OUR WAYS FROM OUR MOTHERS AND FATHERS.

BUT EVERYBODY KEEPS LEARNING NEW WAYS, TOO. NEW INVENTIONS MAKE US LEARN SOME NEW WAYS, AND OTHERS WE LEARN FROM MEETING PEOPLE WHO DO THINGS DIFFERENTLY.

IT WOULD BE SILLY TO TRY TO WEAR HOOP SKIRTS ON BUSES, OR SUBWAYS, OR IN FACTORIES. SO WE HAVE STOPPED WEARING HOOP SKIRTS.

IT WOULD BE SILLY TO LIGHT A GAS STOVE BY RUBBING TWO STONES TOGETHER.

FROM THE INDIANS WE LEARNED TO EAT CORN, FROM THE PEOPLE OF THE FAR EAST WE LEARNED TO EAT RICE ...

... AND WE HAVE LEARNED MANY OTHER THINGS FROM THE PEOPLE ALL OVER THE WORLD.

AND THAT IS GOOD. IT WOULD BE SILLY TO KEEP ON DOING EVERYTHING IN THE SAME OLD WAYS ALL THE TIME, WOULDN'T IT? AND NOT MUCH FUN!

BUT WE'RE LUCKY. FROM THE MANY DIFFERENT PEOPLE IN OUR OWN COUNTRY WE HAVE A SPECIALLY GOOD CHANCE TO LEARN NEW WAYS AND TO IMPROVE OLD ONES.

PART III

AMERICANS ARE OF DIFFERENT SKIN COLORS, OF DIFFERENT RELIGIONS, AND THEY HAVE MANY DIFFERENT WAYS OF DOING THINGS.

WHEN COLUMBUS DISCOVERED AMERICA, HE FOUND PEOPLE HERE WHOSE SKINS WERE YELLOWISH-TAN. HE CALLED THEM INDIANS. THEY WERE THE FIRST AMERICANS.

INDIANS TAUGHT THE FIRST SETTLERS HOW TO PLANT NEW KINDS OF FOOD AND HOW TO BUILD HOUSES IN THIS NEW LAND.

THESE SETTLERS HAD TO LEARN THE INDIANS' WAYS IN ORDER TO STAY ALIVE.

AFTER THESE FIRST SETTLERS, MORE PEOPLE CAME—AND MORE—AND MORE—FROM ALL OVER THE WORLD.

THESE PEOPLE ARE OUR FOREFATHERS. THEY BROUGHT MANY WAYS OF DOING THINGS. THEY LEARNED FROM ONE ANOTHER AND TOGETHER THEY BUILT AMERICA.

BECAUSE THEY LEARNED FROM ONE ANOTHER AND ENJOYED ONE ANOTHER'S WAYS WE NOW HAVE... MORE INVENTIONS THAT MAKE LIFE EASIER....

...MORE KINDS OF THINGS TO EAT...

...MORE KINDS OF GAMES TO PLAY...

...MORE SONGS TO SING.

ALL THESE PEOPLE TOGETHER AND THE PEOPLE WHO KEEP COMING FROM OTHER COUNTRIES MAKE AMERICA A BETTER PLACE FOR ALL OF US. TOGETHER, WE ARE AMERICA.

YET, SOMETIMES, SOME PEOPLE FORGET. YOU MAY SOMETIMES HEAR PEOPLE SAY THEY DON'T LIKE FOREIGNERS, OR THEY DON'T LIKE NEGROES, OR THEY DON'T LIKE METHODISTS OR JEWS. ISN'T THAT A CURIOUS THING TO SAY?

IF THEY DON'T LIKE FOREIGNERS, OR PEOPLE WHOSE FATHERS AND GRANDFATHERS CAME FROM FOREIGN LANDS, THEY MIGHT AS WELL DISLIKE THEMSELVES! ALL OUR FOREFATHERS CAME FROM FOREIGN LANDS — EXCEPT THE INDIANS!

INDEED, IT IS THE MANY KINDS OF PEOPLE AND THEIR DIFFERENT WAYS THAT MAKE AMERICA WHAT IT IS TODAY.

YOUR NEIGHBOR MAY WORSHIP GOD IN A WAY DIFFERENT FROM YOUR OWN. BUT YOU CANNOT TELL WHETHER OR NOT YOU LIKE THIS NEIGHBOR UNTIL YOU KNOW HIM.

AND WE HAVE ALREADY SEEN THAT THE COLOR OF A PERSON'S SKIN MAKES NO DIFFERENCE IN WHAT HE DOES — OR IN HOW BRIGHT OR FRIENDLY HE IS.

SO IT MAKES NO SENSE TO REFUSE TO BE FRIENDS WITH A PERSON BECAUSE OF HIS COLOR, BECAUSE OF THE WAY HE WORSHIPS, OR BECAUSE HE OR HIS PARENTS COME FROM A FOREIGN LAND.

MOST OF US CHOOSE OUR FRIENDS BECAUSE THEY ARE FUN TO BE WITH...

... BECAUSE THEY ARE PLEASANT TO TALK TO ... OR LIKE THE SAME MOVIES OR RADIO PROGRAMS... OR BECAUSE THEY HAVE GOOD IDEAS FOR GAMES... OR FOR OTHER SIMILAR REASONS.

HAVE you EVER THOUGHT ABOUT HOW YOU SELECT your FRIENDS?

There Are NO MASTER RACES!

THIS FEATURE IS BASED ON THE PAMPHLET, "THE RACES OF MANKIND," BY LEADING ANTHROPOLOGISTS PROFESSOR RUTH BENEDICT AND DOCTOR GENE WELTFISH OF COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY. PUBLISHED BY THE PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, INCORPORATED, 30 ROCKEFELLER PLAZA, NEW YORK 20, NEW YORK.

BUT IF WE ARE ALL THE SAME, WHY DO SOME PEOPLE HAVE DARK SKIN AND OTHERS HAVE LIGHT OR WHITE SKIN?
THAT'S A GOOD QUESTION, AND THE ANSWER TO IT IS A THRILLING ADVENTURE STORY! NOW, LOOK AT THIS MAP...

...MANY THOUSANDS OF YEARS AGO, MEN BEGAN TO MOVE FROM THEIR ORIGINAL HOMES IN THE CENTRAL REGIONS TO THE FAR CORNERS OF THE EARTH. SOME SETTLED IN THE NORTHERN SECTIONS, OTHERS, IN THE COUNTRIES NEARER THE EQUATOR. OTHERS STAYED IN THE MIDDLE.

THE PEOPLE IN THE MIDDLE REGIONS HAD AN IN-BETWEEN COLOR, SUCH AS THE POLYNESIANS, HINDUS AND MONGOLS.

THE PEOPLE IN THE NORTHERN REGIONS HAD LIGHT SKIN.

THE PEOPLE IN THE TROPICS HAD DARKER SKIN.

IN OTHER WORDS, DIFFERENCES IN SKIN COLOR ARE NOT AS BIG AS WE THOUGHT?
EXACTLY! ALL SKINS CONTAIN THE SAME CHEMICALS. PERSONS WITH YELLOW SKIN HAVE MORE CAROTENE IN THE SKIN, WHILE THOSE WITH DARK SKIN HAVE MORE MELANIN. THAT'S ALL THERE IS TO IT.

NOW, CONSIDER INTELLIGENCE. MANY BELIEVE THAT EUROPEANS WERE THE FIRST TO HAVE SUPERIOR INTELLIGENCE. BUT WHILE THEY WERE STILL LIVING A PRIMITIVE LIFE, AROUND 3000 B.C...

THROUGHOUT HISTORY, PEOPLES OF ALL RACES HAVE BENEFITED BY THE CONTRIBUTIONS OF OTHER RACES. TODAY, THIS VAST POOL OF KNOWLEDGE IS A "BIRTHDAY PRESENT" TO ALL BABIES AND ALL BABIES CAN LEARN TO USE THIS KNOWLEDGE REGARDLESS OF RACE. SCIENCE HAS PROVED THAT PEOPLE OF ALL RACES ARE EQUALLY CAPABLE OF EDUCATION.

INTELLIGENCE HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH SKIN COLOR. IN WORLD WAR I, TESTS GIVEN TO U.S. SOLDIERS OF ALL COLORS SHOWED THAT EDUCATION, NOT SKIN COLOR, DETERMINED THEIR INTELLIGENCE RATING!

RACE HAS EVEN LESS TO DO WITH ONE'S IDEAS OF LIFE. THE POINTS OF VIEW OF INDIVIDUALS ARE NOT INBORN. THEY CAN BE GREATLY CHANGED BY EDUCATION, PROPAGANDA OR CIRCUMSTANCES. FOR EXAMPLE...

IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY, THE INDIANS OF MEXICO WERE CONTINUALLY FIGHTING EACH OTHER—UNTIL THE SPANIARDS INVADED THE COUNTRY.

AFTER THE SPANISH CONQUEST, FIGHTING SPANIARDS AND BELLIGERENT INDIANS SETTLED DOWN AND INTERMARRIED. TODAY, THEIR DESCENDANTS ARE OUR PEACEFUL GOOD NEIGHBORS BELOW THE RIO GRANDE.

IN CONTRAST TO THE ONCE WARLIKE INDIANS, THE JAPANESE—AS RECENTLY AS FIFTY YEARS AGO—WERE PEACEFUL FISHERMEN AND FARMERS, POETS AND ARTISTS.

IN 1854, WHEN THE AMERICAN NAVY OPENED JAPAN'S GATES TO THE REST OF THE WORLD, SOME JAPANESE LEADERS SAW A CHANCE TO GAIN GREATER POWER FOR THEMSELVES.

SO, WITHIN TWO GENERATIONS, THE JAPANESE HAVE BEEN TAUGHT TO BE WARLIKE TO SATISFY THE AMBITIONS OF THEIR MILITARY RULERS!

BANZAI! WE ARE THE SONS OF HEAVEN! KILL! KILL!

AND TWENTY YEARS AGO, MUSSOLINI USED THE SAME "MASTER RACE" TACTICS TO SEIZE CONTROL OF ITALY AND MAKE ITALIANS WAR-MINDED.

ITALIANS, DO NOT FORGET THAT YOU ARE CHILDREN OF DESTINY! YOU ARE THE DESCENDANTS OF THE VALIANT ROMANS!

THEN, TEN YEARS AGO, HITLER ROSE TO POWER IN GERMANY, REVIVING THE WARLIKE AMBITIONS HELD IN THE GERMAN RULING CASTE FOR MANY GENERATIONS.

OUR NATION MUST BE A NATION OF WARRIORS! IF WE ARE TO CONQUER THE WORLD, WE WILL HAVE TO TEACH OUR YOUTH THAT THEY ARE UNBEATABLE!

REMEMBER, THROUGHOUT HISTORY WE GERMANS HAVE ALWAYS BEEN VICTORIOUS IN WAR! THERE IS NO PLACE FOR WEAKLINGS AMONG US! WE ARE THE MASTER RACE! HEIL HITLER!

BECAUSE GERMAN YOUTHS WERE TAUGHT ONLY WHAT HITLER WANTED THEM TO BELIEVE, THEY BECAME WARLIKE, FOR THEY KNEW NO OTHER WAY OF LIFE.

OUR PLANS ARE WORKING WELL! WE ARE RAISING A GENERATION OF BRUTAL KILLERS.

MEIN FUEHRER, WE HAVE OUR STORM TROOPERS AND OUR BRUTAL FIGHTERS, BUT WE MUST INSTILL IN THEM A FEELING OF MENTAL SUPERIORITY.
THAT IS EASY! WE WILL MAKE THEM FEEL STRONG BY MAKING OTHERS LOOK WEAK. THERE ARE JUST A FEW JEWS. WE WILL CALL THE JEWISH RACE INFERIOR!

WILL THE PUBLIC BE CONVINCED? THE JEWS ARE NOT A RACE—THEY ARE PEOPLE OF MANY RACES WHO FOLLOW THE SAME RELIGION.
THE PUBLIC WILL ACCEPT WHAT WE WANT THEM TO BELIEVE BECAUSE WE HAVE TAUGHT THEM TO DO SO!
JEWS ARE NOT A RACE. THEY HAVE A COMMON RELIGION BUT ARE OF MANY DIFFERENT STOCKS. THERE ARE JEWS IN VIRTUALLY EVERY COUNTRY.

HITLER CALLED HIS NAZI FOLLOWERS "PURE ARYANS," AND ENCOURAGED THEIR FEELING OF SUPERIORITY BY STRESSING THEIR "DISTINCTIVE DIFFERENCES" FROM OTHER PEOPLE.
AN ARYAN IS SLENDER!
...AND TALL!
...AND BLONDE!

BUT—THE "PURE ARYAN" NAZIS WHO CONQUERED FRANCE ACTUALLY CONQUERED PEOPLE CLOSELY AKIN IN RACE TO THEMSELVES.
SYSTEMATIC PROPAGANDA ENABLED HITLER AND THE MILITARY LEADERS OF JAPAN TO MAKE THEIR PEOPLE BELIEVE THAT THEY WERE "MASTER RACES." BUT THIS SIMPLY IS NOT SO!

To All Members and Friends:

With cutbacks already a stark reality in thousands of American homes, mass unemployment must be avoided. To do this, Americans must stick together more closely than ever. We must not fear our neighbors. We must understand that all groups depend upon each other.

In a world torn with political, economic and physical strife, it would seem that superficial differences would have no place. It would seem that great conflicts over who should rule and how, who should eat and how much, who should kill and be killed, would eliminate petty prejudice, and that men would stand together on the basis of their ideas, their ideals and their goal of survival. It would certainly seem that the color of man's thinking would outweigh the color of his skin, and that the forces of reason and reaction would each line up on issues which fundamentally engage the spirit of man, rather than on those concerning the shape of his nose or the texture of his hair.

The CIO has lined up on basic issues calling for the cooperation of all who strive for a better life for the common man of the world. It does not care to what race these men belong any more than it cares how much money they have in the bank. It subscribes to the outlook of science in describing physical differences which in no way affect the mind and heart of the individual.

We therefore commend this leaflet to all people of good will who find themselves confronted, in their daily living, with the morass of ignorance, and superstition, and misunderstanding of racial factors, which are being deliberately used by the enemies of democracy to confuse Americans and others, in the selfish interests of privileged groups.

FOR WHITE MEN AND WOMEN EVERYWHERE

For the sake of our COUNTRY and the SOUTH I plead that you READ the following:

In 1944 genuine Democrats made the first serious move to eliminate from the real Democratic Party the alleged Negro-LOVING, pink and red MONGRELS who FALSELY called themselves Democrats—True, we were whipped and humiliated and on election day 1944 real Democrats found themselves with no place to go. BUT, THE SEED OF OUR STRENGTH HAD BEEN PLANTED!

Since then the scalawag, carpet-bagger Northern bosses of the New Deal Party kept adding shame and degradation to our lot—smugly sure there was no end to what loyal Democrats would endure for party harmony—Late in 1947—after Chairman McGrath of the Democratic National Committee showed RIDICULE and SCORN for our Constitutional State Rights—GOVERNOR BEAUFORD JESTER of Texas sounded the first warning that the SOUTH and good Democrats everywhere would not forever give BLIND OBEDIENCE to renegade, FALSE and Negro Democrats.

The warnings of Governor Jester gained wide public approval in the genuine Democratic newspapers and meeting places of the SOUTH and the entire nation—But New Deal spokesmen SCOFFED and POOH-POOHED the warning of Governor Jester—they laughed at the Texas spark as something they could STOMP out with the greatest of ease—they had the usual CONTEMPT for "IN THE BAG" Southern Democrats.

BUT THE TEXAS SPARK DID NOT DIE and since then FIRES have broken out in Mississippi, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana—sparks are flying all over the South—Now, GOVERNOR FIELDING WRIGHT, backed by the almost unanimous support of the entire Democracy of Mississippi, has challenged the Democrats of the South and Nation to work with his state to put an end to the delivery of the Democratic Party to the Negroes, the C. I. O., the Pinks and Reds who control and ride herd over these minority groups.

On Thursday, January 29, 1948, senior U. S. SENATOR JAMES EASTLAND of Mississippi told a joint session of both houses of the Mississippi legislature that "THE SOUTH HAD ITS BACK TO THE WALL", and that unless we defended the real Democratic Party we would soon be completely governed by a collection of "MONGRELS."

Senator Eastland said that, "In good times or in bad, the bone, sinew, the flesh and the constancy of the Democratic Party was found below the Mason and Dixon Line"

Instantly! Democrats asked "THEN, WHY NOT A DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION BELOW THE MASON AND DIXON LINE??!!"

Congressional delegations from several Southern states are talking the situation over—At last! Political leadership have ears to the ground, waiting for "We the People" to stomp and speak.

If you are tired of the threat of FEPC—sick of the Wallaces, Hannegans, McGraths and Peppers—weary of C. I. O. and the Reds who want to MARRY us into the WILLING ARMS of the Negro! You can now do something about it before it is too late!

WE MUST HAVE A DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION BELOW THE MASON - DIXON LINE.

Five million white men and women of the South must get a message of approval to the thirteen governors of the Southern States—five million people must sign their name and address to one of these circulars and mail or carry it to their governor, ASKING FOR A DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION BELOW THE MASON-DIXON LINE.

Your political leaders are waiting to HEAR FROM YOU—if you fail it will not be their fault. "THE HOPE OF THE NATION RESTS WAY DOWN SOUTH IN DIXIE!"

WHAT ABOUT HUMAN EQUALITY?

By W.Hardin Hughes

In countless ways, men are unequal. White people are no exception to the rule. They are tall and short, weak and strong, intelligent and idiotic, cultured and uncultured, saintly and sinful. With respect to every measurable characteristic, they cover the entire scale. Some there are whose contributions to the betterment of the world will be remembered and lauded for ages to come; while others will be remembered, if at all, for their hindrances to human progress. Other peoples — black, brown, and yellow — are correspondingly dissimilar among themselves. The principle of individual differences, in short, applies to every people of the globe. The difference between the noblest and the meanest in any race is as great, in all probability, as the corresponding difference within any other race.

Those who have achieved world renown are rightly thought of as exceptional. Booker T.Washington, George Washington Carver, Paul Robeson, Marian Anderson, and a score of other American Negroes are of this class. Aristotle, St.Thomas Aquinas, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Edison, were likewise exceptional. Few there are in any generation or time who qualify for world-wide honors. Superior inborn capacities coupled with appropriate opportunities are essential to outstanding achievement. Sometimes, however, superior innate capacities transform ordinary opportunities into the extraordinary. Individuals who bring about such transformation are equally to be honored whatever the color of their skins -- honored, not because of any mystic duty of anyone to accord honor; but, rather, because honoring, when not restricted by ignorance, prejudice, and selfishness, is the normal reaction of men to those who have contributed to the common good.

Fortunately, society is not wholly dependent on its outstanding geniuses for its maintenance and progress; for on the scale of human capacity, just below the level of genius, are the near-geniuses only slightly less gifted by nature; and still farther down the scale, about a point midway between the two extremes, is the average man, the "common man" as we are wont to call him, whose importance must not be overlooked or underestimated. Truly, the "common man" plays an essential role in every society. Since he outnumbers all others combined, it is within his power to conserve or to destroy the social heritage. Without his cooperation, human progress is impossible. How important that his cultural and educational status be raised to the highest posible degree!

But why elaborate the individual differences of men; differences which are as much in evidence in one race as in another! Are not the common aspects of human nature and of society at least as important as the variables? The common needs, the common values, the common goals — these are the equalities in question. Everywhere, the commonality of mankind is unmistakable. Bone for bone, muscle for muscle, nerve for nerve, and sense organ for sense organ, the races are so similar as to be rightly classified as a single species. The same physiological principles apply to all.

Likewise, the same psychological factors need be taken into account in any scientific analysis of human conduct and relationship. Everywhere and in all time, men strive however blindly for the realization of certain human values. Whether happiness is the universal goal, as some insist, or whether it is the natural accompaniment of the good life; happiness is, nevertheless, a universal goal. In its absence, men do strange things. Or, may we say, in the doing of "strange" things there is unhappiness. Furthermore, neither happiness nor unhappiness can be segregated. The greatest happiness principle implies not only the greatest happiness to the greatest number; but the least of unhappiness for the smallest number. Unhappiness anywhere in society has its unhappy effects elsewhere. No majority, however numerous and powerful, can possibly insure its own continuous happiness by restricting the happiness ofothers. The Golden Rule has become a social necessity.

An essential condition of happiness is freedom. From earliest infancy, men respond unhappily to arbitrary, unnecessary, and especially to inequitable limitations of freedom. Necessary limitations are in a different category, but they must be recognized as equitable. There is no greater source of unhappiness in the family, in the community, in the nation, and in the family of nations throughout the world than the feeling on the part of some members that they are being discriminated against. Discriminations are always violations of human freedom. So generally recognized is the need for freedom that peoples in all time have been willing, at almost any cost, to contend for its realization. To fight for its freedom, is considered the supreme right of every people.

Correspondingly universal, is the common need for security. If happiness is to be realized in any considerable measure, freedom and security must go hand in hand. Unlimited freedom would inevitably lead to insecurity; while absolute security would invalidate the very conditions under which progress and happiness are attainable. Men need, however, to be secure in their physical lives and in t the economic possibilities for sustaining them. They need, furthermore, to be secure in the common rights to "liberty and the pursuit of happiness" guaranteed, at least on paper, by the supreme law of the land. Like happiness and freedom, security cannot be segregated. There can be no sharp line of demarcation between those who are secure and those who are insecure. A state of insecurity anywhere endangers security everywhere. A global illustration of this principle may be seen in the conditions and events leading up to the World Wars. Insecurities multiplied and spread to every nook and corner of the world.

No less important is the need for social identification. Beginning in early childhood, the individual develops a feeling of "we-ness", a "consciousness of kind", and an awareness of oneness with his primary group. These early experiences, similar as they are throughout the world, account in large measure for the common ethical ideal of mankind. The in-group characteristics -- mutual aid, fair dealing, truthfulness, sympathy, loyalty, and the like — become the ethical bases for all religions. Only in a society in which there is mutual identification of its members, can there be a full realization of these ideals. Mutual understanding and a true "consciousness of kind", in the words of Giddings, "make group life possible, create loyalty, ability to stand together, to meet the enemy together, to deal with catastrophes together, to fight pestilences and famines, to build up the industries of the world, in short, to build up all civilization." And no nation, we may add, is at all prepared to identify itself with the family of nations before it has reduced to a minimum the artificial obstacles to mutual identification at home.

America needs today as never before, the wholesome and full contribution of all her people. Equality, not of achievement but of opportunity, is a basic principle of our democracy. We do not expect the musicallly untalented to become composers nor persons of low mentality to become scientists and ~~philosophers~~ statesmen; but we do feel the justice of allowing the possessors of good capacities anywhere, at whatever level, the fullest opportunity to develop them into their own peculiar best. Only the ignorant and the short-sighted~~ly~~ ~~selfish~~ deliberately block the legitimate accomplishments of their fellows.

RACIAL AND CULTURAL MINORITIES by George Eaton Simpson & J. Milton Yinger

Chapter 17: Intermarriage: Interracial, Interfaith, and Internationality.

Powdermaker notes some changes in the circumstances of interracial sex relations, including the fact that the Negro woman to day is in a position to refuse the advances of a white man. This writer also mentions that currently most of the white man in interracial sexual relationships are middle-aged, and that popular sentimentagainst Negro-white cohabitation is increasing in both groups. Her explanation of these changes in attitude is in (1) the increasing irregularity of intrawhite relationships and (2) increasing race pride and demand for respect on the part of Negroes.

The Negro-white intermarriage rates in New York City, New York State, Boston and Los Angeles have been from 1 to 5 percent of all marriages in which Negroes participated. These intermarriages appear to be declining. (*)

Perhaps the fullest data on Negro-white intermarriages in the United States are for Boston. Stone found that there were 143 such intermarriages for the period 1900-1904, or an average of 28.6 per year. The rate per 100 Negro marriages was 13.6 Data secured from the Boston Registry Department by Wirth and Goldhamer for the period 1914-1938 are given in the accompanying table.

(*) According to Ebony (December , 1949, pp.20-21), the Chicago marriage license bureau reported a record number of 200 Negro-white marriages in 1948. If this is correct, it represents the highest known number of Negro-white intermarriages for any city in the United States. No data on intermarriage rates or trends are available for Chicago. M. L. Barron, People who Intermarry, Syracuse University Press, 1948, p. 189.

Number of Negro-white Marriages and Percent Negro-White Marriages of All Marriages Involving Negroes and of All Marriages Involving Whites

Boston, 1914-38

Year	Number of Negro-White Marriages	Percent Negro-White Marriages of All Marriages Involving Negroes	Percent Negro-White Marriages of All Marriages Involving Whites
1914-1918	89	5.2	.18
1919-1923	47	3.1	.10
1924-1928	53	3.6	.12
1929-1933	40	3.6	.11
1934-1938	47	3.7	.12
Total	276	3.9	.13

The considerable decrease in Negro-white intermarriage in Boston cannot be explained by the hypothesis that the smaller the proportion of a minority race in the total population the higher will be the rate of intermarriage. The percentage of the Negro population in Boston was practically constant from 1900 to 1920 (1900, 2.1; 1910, 2.0; 1915, 2.1; 1920, 2.2). It was not markedly higher in 1930, (2.6). Wirth and Goldhamer attribute this decline mainly to two factors: first, though Boston was at one time a center of abolitionist agitation and was known for cordial relations between the races, it was not to be expected that this situation could continue with the coming of a new population from Europe; and second, the migration of Negroes to the North during World War 1 years brought southern Negroes whose economic and cultural status was unfavorable to interracial marriage.

The Boston rate of Negro-white marriages in all Negro marriages in the period 1914-1938 was 3.9 as compared with 3.4 for New York urban areas exclusive of New York City in 1919-1937. The Boston rate changed little after 1919, whie the New York rate, with the exception of period 1922-24, dropped steadily. Whereas the former rate of intermarriage in Boston was unique, the present Boston rate does not seem to be a typical.

THE HOUSTON RACE RIOT, 1917

The most serious riot involving Negro soldiers which occurred in the United States during the first World War took place in Houston, Texas, on the night of Thursday, August 23, 1917. At that time over a hundred Negro United States Army regulars seized rifles and ammunition by force, and marched upon the city. This outbreak followed a period of rising racial tension climaxed by an altercation between white police officers and Negro "military police." The following morning it was announced that there were thirteen known dead, of whom only one was a Negro, and nineteen wounded, including five Negro soldiers, as a result of the riot.

A few days later the mayor of Houston appointed a special investigating commission which sat in open session for several days. Much of the testimony there presented is quoted in subsequent issues of The Houston Daily Post; upon these reports the following analysis is based.[1]

The Social and Psychological Setting

The several companies of Negro troops of the 24th United States Infantry who later took part in the riot had been sent from a western army post to Houston to guard government property during the construction of Camp Logan.[2] This detachment, totalling about 600 men, included both men who had been in service for some time and were more or less seasoned troops, and more recent enlistees who came from various parts of the country, particularly from the North.[3]

Houstonians were expecting the early arrival of a considerably larger number (about 3,000) of Negro troops along with the white National Guardsmen from Illinois who were to be housed at Camp Logan upon its completion. In addition to some of the white Guardsmen, one company of Negroes had arrived on Monday, August 20.[4] The anticipated arrival of further substantial contingents of Northern Negro troops, alarming in itself to some Houstonians, gained special significance in its relation to the hotly debated issue of local prohibition.

Another point which needs to be mentioned is the fact that Houston was currently being considered by military authorities as the site of a new aviation center. Probably this circumstance had something to do with the lack of public admission of the race tension which was mounting prior to the outbreak itself. A final element in the situation, which may or may not have been of importance, was the fact that early in the week during which the riot occurred there was a change in commanding officers at the Camp. The new commander, possibly less experienced than his predecessor, apparently had not fully gained the respect of the Negro troopers.[5]

This brief résumé of the objective social factors in the situation leads to a consideration of what various segments of the population of Houston were thinking and doing, and particularly what types of interracial interaction patterns were developing prior to the riot. As has already been

[5] It is reported that "The life of the major [Major K. S. Snow, in charge of the Negro troops following the departure of Colonel Newman, on the Tuesday preceding the riot] was threatened as he tried to quell the rioting troops." (August 24.) Elsewhere it is stated that after the trouble had begun, and Major Snow had talked to the men, ". . . trying to get them to return to the camp . . . they turned upon him and said, 'You white ——, get back into camp.' . . ." (August 30.) It should be pointed out that Major Snow was sometimes referred to as "Captain Snow" in the published testimony. The fact that he had been promoted to the rank of Major and made commanding officer at Camp Washington only two days prior to the riot helps to account both for the inconsistencies in the rank by which he was designated and for his inexperience as a commander. (August 21.)

pointed out, there was practically no recognition in the Houston press of the ominous indications regarding local racial friction. Almost without exception the reports of developments published prior to the riot indicated that everything was serene in Houston and at Camp Logan. The pages of the local newspapers, however, echoed and re-echoed with the reverberations of racial troubles elsewhere. The notorious rioting in East St. Louis and the subsequent investigation were reported during July and early August. Fairly prominent news items appeared in the Post on the East St. Louis investigation in the issues of August 16, 17, 18, and 19—that is, just before the Houston riot.

Another indication of editorial recognition that racial troubles were imminent—elsewhere—is to be found in a published letter to the Post by a Mr. B. F. Riley, of Blue Ridge, N. C. This letter reported a noteworthy conference of prominent Southerners at Asheville, N. C.

> For three days, day and night, the sessions went on in the discussion of topics relative to mob violence, the sanitary condition of negroes, their wages, the treatment accorded them by railways and on street cars and in waiting rooms, the disparity in public education, the term [sic.] produced by an attitude of threatening and mob violence. . . . It was recognized that we are facing a crisis in the South, which is eating away like a hidden gangrene, to the undoing of law and order, and which, if not arrested, must work ruin. . . . The regret was general that these matters so little claimed the attention of the pulpit. . . .[6]

A grim reminder to the Negro of the dangers of getting out of place is contained in the following item from Brenham, Texas, which said, in full:

> Willie Shears, an Independence negro, was shot to death at Caldwell Sunday night while resisting a deputy sheriff who attempted to arrest him. The coroner's verdict says it was a clear case of suicide. Funeral services were held at Independence Monday.[7]

The foregoing items indicate a recognition of stirring racial troubles elsewhere. But regarding Houston not only was there almost no admission of potential racial conflict; there was even evidence of apparently amicable race relations. An example is the announcement of an all-Negro baseball game which was scheduled for the Saturday before the Thursday on which the riot occurred, and of a similar double-header for Sunday, for which "As usual there will be special accommodations for white patrons. The Isles' band will be on hand with ragtime airs. . . ."[8]

[7] August 15.

Again, one week before the day of the riot, it was reported that ". . . At Camp Logan work is going on in the same even tenor, putting the finishing touches on the many structures already raised. . . ."[9] And a front-page story on the very morning of the riot reported that "Camp Logan is one day nearer ultimate completion; a day marked by no unusual occurrences, but characterized by the same swift moving efficiency that is not unusual in the record of the big job. . . ." The story was headlined "Camp Logan Work Moving Smoothly."[10] Furthermore, the good behavior of the Negro troops was scheduled to be rewarded by giving them a watermelon feast at Emancipation Park that fateful Thursday night.[11]

Buried on the 14th page of the issue for Sunday, August 19, is the only item the writer found published prior to the time of the riot which indicated the existence of local racial friction:

> While standing in the pay line at Camp Logan Saturday noon, Sam Blair, a negro employed at the camp, was stabbed and slightly wounded in the back by an unknown white man. The negro is said to have pushed his way into the pay line ahead of the white man, who resented it.
> Blair, it is said, grabbed the white man by the shoulder while someone else hit him with a shovel, when the white man, with a free arm, pulled a knife and stabbed Blair in the back. The latter was taken to the infirmary in the ambulance of the Houston Undertaking Company.

[8] August 18.
[9] August 16.
[10] August 23.
[11] August 24.

Even this item, it will be noted, deals with civilian workmen employed at the camp rather than with the Negro soldiers themselves.

What is the explanation for the silence of the press regarding racial tension which subsequently was freely admitted to have existed from the first appearance of the Negro troops on the scene? One plausible hypothesis is that it was thought publicizing of the racial tension would serve merely to intensify rather than dissipate it. Another hypothesis is that while the construction of Camp Logan was good for business in Houston and also, apparently, for labor, it was thought public admission of serious racial tension might tend to jeopardize completion of the project. The following items emphasize the economic advantages to Houston of the proximity of Camp Logan.

> More than $60,000 of war department money was released into circulation in Houston when the contractors building Camp Logan paid off Saturday evening. . . .
> It is not improbable that the sum for next week will pass the $100,000 mark.[12]
> Men at work on the big job are wishing that the work might keep on until the sea dries up, and they are not reticent in saying so, coming home at night in cars and jitneys. Pay was never better, they say. . . .[13]

When the construction phase was completed there would be the business brought in by the thousands of soldiers, their officers, their visiting friends and relatives, to look forward to.

Furthermore, one of the Texas representatives in Congress had been working assiduously to further the interests of Houston by securing for it another military training center.

On August 21st it was announced that within the next few days the War Department would make known its decision with regard to the location of the aviation camp at

Houston. Ironically, just one day before the riot the following victorious announcement appeared:

> Houston has been passed upon by the aviation board and chief of the signal corps and has been designated for one of the aviation camps soon to be located in Texas for the training of aviators. . . .
> . . . ever since Houston announced that she possessed an ideal aviation camp site Congressman Garrett has been hard at work hammering home the idea to the members of the aviation board the desirability of locating a camp in that city. . . .[14]

Confirmation of the second hypothesis, above (that acknowledgment of racial tension might delay or indefinitely postpone completion of the camp), would seem to be given in an editorial which appeared one week after the riot. After admitting that "The public hearing of the causes leading up to the mutiny of the negro soldiers last Thursday night, as well as the incidents thereof, is revealing conditions that were entirely unknown to the body of Houston's citizenry . . ." and also that the situation was far from desirable, the unknown editorial writer lets the cat out of the bag:

> The only explanation of toleration of this insolent and disorderly conduct is that those who knew of it thought it best to endure in patience rather than run the risk of losing the camp by flooding the department with complaints. In other words, it was thought that the negro soldiers would soon be removed and that their lawless conduct would cease to trouble the authorities. . . .[15]

In brief, then, it would seem that most middle and upper class white Houstonians knew little about the developing racial friction, for they were too far removed to learn about it at first hand, and the press did not inform them. Those who were in a position to know the facts thought it better not to publicize them. It is impossible to determine on the basis of available evidence the extent or importance of rumor and gossip in this connection.

The law enforcement officials, at that time exclusively white persons, in the performance of their duties soon came into direct contact with the disturbing realities of the situation. From the testimony of Houston's Superintendent of Police C. L. Brock it is clear that instances of racial difficulty, especially those growing out of the Negro troops' resentment of segregation regulations, were not infrequent. In all probability the subsequent violence employed by certain Houston policemen was regarded by them as a legitimate and indispensable means to the end of maintaining law and order—and particularly the racial mores.[16] Superintendent Brock is quoted as follows:

[15] August 30.

Q. How much trouble has your department had with the negroes?

A. When they first came the situation was bad for a day or so. They were overbearing and I feared trouble. Colonel Newman told me there would be no trouble. I believed all the time we would have trouble with them. Colonel Newman passed an order that no soldier should be out of camp after 11 p. m. There were several clashes on street cars, and in one instance a street car conductor gave the money back to negro soldiers and they got off the car. There was friction at different times. The troops resented the Jim Crow signs in street cars and often threw them out the window. One instance particularly, I remember, a negro on a Washington street car pulled out a knife when told to move to the negro section of a car. There was no trouble as he moved. Colonel Newman told them to obey the city ordinances.

We had a conference and I told Colonel Newman that I believed military police would assist in keeping order. First I was informed the men wanted to wear side arms. I told the officers this would not do and the city got them clubs. Next he said they had to have means of transportation to town. I went to David Daly, manager of the street car company, and he agreed that they should ride free. Then they wanted a badge. I bought out of my own pocket the cloth to have the badges or brassards made. Finally 16 military police were put down town. The men seemed satisfied.

Q. Was there much trouble?

A. No, very little. There was unrest all the time and especially around pay day. . . .[17]

[16] See the vivid and enlightening treatment of "Day-by-day law enforcement" in a Southern city by Allison Davis, Burleigh B. Gardner, and Mary R. Gardner, Deep South (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1941), pp. 498-508.

[17] August 30.

In spite of Superintendent Brock's minimizing of the trouble with the Negro troops, the fact that he aided in the organization of the Negro "military police" seems to demonstrate his awareness of the imminence of more trouble than his own staff could properly cope with.

That the office of the sheriff was both cognizant and tolerant of the illegal transportation of alcoholic liquors to the Negro troops at their quarters is suggested by the testimony of a painter living near the camp, W. E. Quin, in which he reported seeing Negro women taking bundles containing whisky to the troops:

> Yes, I went to the sheriff's department and they would not take my information. I told Mr. Fitzgerald at the sheriff's office about it. I went to Mr. Green and he wouldn't take my testimony.[18]

A third group, numerically small but very important in an analysis of the general situation in which the riot occurred, is the white officers in charge of the Negro troops. There is considerable evidence to indicate that these officers (1) exercised rather lax discipline over their troops, and (2) tended to show sympathy with their troops rather than with local white civilians when interracial differences arose. For example, M. J. Howard, a white dairyman, testified that he had had trouble with Negro soldiers crowding him into the ditch. He reported this difficulty to a deputy sheriff, and to an officer at the camp

> . . . who told him that the trouble was he had been calling the soldiers "niggers." He waited until Major Snow came and reported the case, who told him to come back the next day. He called the next day, and Snow told him that the white people were causing the trouble, he said. He also told him that he had placed the two offenders on double guard duty as a punishment.[19]

Similarly, City Detective Bob Martin, in response to the question, "Tell us what you saw there [at the camp]," testified as follows:

> I noticed a lot of negro women inside the camp. I asked Captain

[19] August 30.

Snow if it wasn't an unusual thing to have so many negro women there. He said: "We have to do it in order to hold the men here." The second time I went out was last Thursday afternoon [immediately before the riot]. When Detective Fife and I got there Captain Snow was using the telephone. He was talking for perhaps twenty minutes and I saw a crowd of negro soldiers in his office. I went a little nearer so I could hear some of the conversation. He was talking to someone about Sergeant Baltimore. After he hung up the receiver he spoke to a negro civilian, who said he knew something about the trouble. The negro said he did not see Baltimore shot, but heard the shot fired. Captain Snow asked him what they did to Baltimore. The negro replied that they took him to jail. Captain Snow appeared indignant at this and said: "They should not have done so; they should have taken him to the hospital." Then the Captain asked the names of the officers who Baltimore had trouble with, and said: "Those officers must be prosecuted to the limit of the law." By this time there were about 200 negro soldiers ganging up around us. . . .[20]

The testimony of Superintendent Brock confirms the foregoing statements:

Colonel Newman told me when I spoke to him about them shooting craps and having negro women, that he let them shoot craps and let the women in camp because it kept the men satisfied. I heard through reports by officers that many negroes were drunk at the camp.[21]

A fourth group whose role in the pre-riot situation should be recognized is the advocates of prohibition for Harris County, in which Houston is located. Thirsty soldiers were not forbidden to quench their thirsts at Houston saloons which were sufficiently removed from the Camp itself, but it was contrary to regulations to sell alcoholic drinks within a certain radius of the Army installation or to bring liquor on Government military property. But the main reason for giving attention to the prohibitionists here is not with regard to the violation of these regulations: it is the content of the following four-column advertisement which appeared on Monday, August 20—just the day before the first company of colored infantry was scheduled to arrive from Illinois:

3,000 NEGRO TROOPS TO BE IN HOUSTON WITHIN THE MONTH

Can the men of Harris County afford to vote to continue the saloon in face of this? For the security of the homes of this community and for the protection of the law-abiding negro, who will be helpless

MAKE HARRIS COUNTY DRY—
REMEMBER BROWNSVILLE

Harris County, Local Option Committee,
A. S. Moody, Vice Chairman

Thus it appears clear that the coming of the additional Negro troops, in this case entirely from the North, and furthermore to be quartered permanently at the Camp, in contrast to the 600 colored troops already in Houston who were expected to remain on guard only during the construction of the Camp, was causing genuine concern to some of the white residents. It may also be pointed out that if the Negro troops already in Houston had no intention of resorting to open conflict, this advertisement could hardly help but implant the suggestion.

To understand the import of the exhortation, "Remember Brownsville," a brief account of the Brownsville "race riot" is necessary. Although eleven years had elapsed since it occurred, it was probably vividly remembered by Houstonians, or the brief slogan used by the prohibitionists would hardly have been sufficient for their purposes. The following statement is the published telegraphic report of the investigating officer, Major Blocksom, to President Theodore Roosevelt:

Brownsville, Texas, Aug. 20 [1906].—The Military Secretary, United States Army, Washington, D. C.: Causes of disturbance are racial. People did not desire colored troops here, and showed they thought them inferior socially by certain slights and denial of privileges at public bars, etc. Soldiers resented this. There were several individual encounters between soldiers and citizens. About midnight of 13th a party of soldiers, probably nine to fifteen, made a raid through several squares of town, firing 75 to 150 shots, killing a bartender and dangerously wounding a lieutenant of police. They also fired into several houses where women and children narrowly escaped being shot. The raid lasted from eight to ten minutes. It is claimed that citizens fired first, but I believe this is without foundation. Although the act was probably preconcerted I do not think the commanding officer could have foreseen. Citizens cannot identify individual raiders, and authorities have made no demand for them. Investigation now going on has yet discovered none. Commanding officers today invited committee of three citizens to assist in conducting the investigation. The people are still in a state of great nervous tension, and men nearly all carry arms openly at night. Women and children are still frightened. I consider it necessary to remove the colored troops—the sooner the better. While now apparently under perfect control, an entire company is on guard every day, it is a great strain, with little prospect of relief. Differences between soldiers and citizens are irreconcilable. Fuller report will be made in regular course. Blocksom, Major.[22]

In accordance with Major Blocksom's recommendation the troops were soon removed. But meanwhile the papers of Texas had daily front-paged the accounts of Brownsville's plight and the inability of her citizens to return to normal living until the Negro garrison had been removed. Thus we get some intimation of the attitudes of fear and resentment which must have been renewed by the prohibitionists' slogan, "Remember Brownsville."

It has already been pointed out that white workmen, either on construction crews at Camp Logan or from that vicinity, were reported to be quite happy over the high wages they were able to make on the job. It has also been indicated that the only instance of local racial difficulty publicized before the riot occurred in connection with members of this group. At the municipal investigation following the riot a William Bigley was asked to describe "whatever friction existed between the white people and the negro soldiers on guard at the camp." His statement follows:

About three weeks ago Saturday I went to the camp to get my pay. I saw an old man standing in line, waiting his turn to get to the paymaster's window. He must have been standing there for an hour. When he reached the window, the paymaster rejected his receipt because it was not signed with an indelible pencil, as is required, and he asked the man to step outside the line a few minutes while one of his clerks got a pencil. The old man did so and leaned up against a building where he was not in the way at all. While he was standing in this way, a negro soldier on guard approached him and, using the vilest of vile language, told him to get back in line. When he saw the old man was not inclined to obey him, the soldier roughly shoved him into line with considerable force. I expected trouble any minute. I saw white men grit their teeth at the occurrence and clinch their fists. I said to myself the time has come at last. Just then a negro officer came up and said, "What's the matter here?" Then all the white men spoke up at once and told him and said the fault was all with the negro soldier on guard. At this the negro officer ordered the soldier back to his post and told him to stay there where he belonged.

I worked at the camp eight days and got all I wanted of it and quit. I knew just as plain as anything that trouble was coming.

Q. What was the attitude of the white workmen there toward the negro soldiers?

A. Very bitter. We had orders not to speak or have anything to do with the negro soldiers. . . .[23]

A sixth group whose contact with and attitudes toward the Negro troopers was brought out in the investigation is the street car motormen and conductors. A motorman, B. M. Spiegel, told of difficulties in enforcing segregated seating. "They said, 'We're from New York and we'll sit where we please. We're as good as any white man in town.' This happened frequently, but I could not tell whether it was the same soldiers or not."[24] A conductor, O. J. Charboneau, ". . . told of trouble he had experienced with negro troopers in the removal of segregation signs or 'screens,' as he called them. . . ."[25] Three other transportation workers gave similar testimony during the first day of the inquiry.

In connection with the same problem a deputy sheriff reported that he had arrested a Negro soldier ". . . for refusing to observe the Jim Crow sign on a street car. . . ."[26] A police officer, G. Peyton, was questioned as follows:

Q. What trouble did you, as an officer, have with the negro soldiers?

A. The only trouble was in disregard of the Jim Crow law. The

[24] August 29.

negroes seemed to object to the screen which separates whites from negroes in the street car.

Q. Did you find any of these screens in the street?

A. I found two of them near a water plug down town. I saw two negro soldiers at Travis and Preston and one of them had a street car screen in his hand. He told me some of the troops had taken it out of a car and he was going to return it. I took it from him.[27]

Their attempts to disregard the segregation regulations suggest how the Negro troops were feeling on this issue. Further information on their thinking, feeling, and behavior comes from various sources. The city engineer, E. S. Sands, stated:

. . . I learned . . . that the negro soldiers were trying to incite negro civilians to revolt against the whites and their government. I happened to overhear some of their conversation one day. Some of the soldiers told the Houston negroes that they were taking too much from the white people. . . .[28]

C. C. Craig, replying to the question, "Did you hear threats?" said:

Yes. Soon after the negro soldiers came here a white contractor backed his wagon over a negro civilian and two negro soldiers said: "We will put some damn white man in the grave."[29]

A white foreman of a Camp Logan contractor

. . . told a reporter for the Post Saturday that he had reported to the authorities talks that he had had with negro guards. They told him, while half-drunk on guard and unable to keep from boasting, he said, that the battalion was going to "raise h—l with the white ———after pay-day." . . .

The same foreman says that the negroes hated the Illinois guardsmen so that they could hardly speak of them without cursing them. They considered that the Illinois soldiers were to blame for killing negroes in the East St. Louis riots, and they were out to get them, he says. . . . [There is nothing to confirm this last idea.][30]

A member of the [National] Guard from the camp said after the shooting had occurred that he had known it was coming. Members of the negro troops, who were placed on guard duty at the camp, have for two or three days been insulting the white soldiers.

[29] August 29.

[30] August 26.

Although the trouble did not start between the negro and the white troops, the action of the former in their remarks to the white men showed the frame of mind in which they were. . . .[31]

The testimony of Negro witnesses was to the same general effect.

A negro living on Providence street was the next witness. He said that he was working at the camp on the Monday before the trouble, and that six of the negro guards who were guarding the warehouses told him that they would "raise hell with Houston" because they had been mistreated. "They said they would do Houston like the Ninth and Tenth did Brownsville. They cursed the people of Houston, and said they didn't now how to treat Northern people right. They said us Southern darkies didn't have sense enough to protect ourselves. . . . I told several people, I told my landlady that those niggers told me that about four or five days ago. It was four or five days after they reached here that I heard that the colored troops were going to straighten out Houston."[32]

One of the firemen stationed at the warehouses at the camp, G. J. Wolf, reported that he learned from Howard Burks, a Negro guard ". . . that they had intended to start the riot on Tuesday, but postponed it. . . ."[33] W. C. Wilson, desk sergeant from 11 p. m. to 7 a. m.,

. . . stated . . . that sometime before the riot one or two negro troopers were brought in who complained about the treatment given them and said they were going to get even. . . .[34]

The last three witnesses were the only ones whose testimony would indicate that rioting had definitely been under consideration prior to the day of the riot itself. It will be recalled that the reported reference of the Negro troopers to the Brownsville incident was stated to have been voiced on Monday, the day on which the prohibitionists' advertisement containing the "Remember Brownsville" slogan appeared. As was pointed out above, it seems entirely possible, since the Post is a morning newspaper, that the advertisement suggested the Brownsville parallel to Negroes as well as to whites.

With the exception of the hospitable behavior of young women and girls, little information is available regarding the reception accorded the Negro troops by the colored residents of Houston. Nor is it certain that all the feminine entertainment provided the troopers was afforded by genuine Houstonians, for camp followers were reported to have come from the troops' previous station in New Mexico. As an example of the type of testimony given by a number of Negro girls and young women, here is that of Edna Tucker, a 13-year-old girl who ". . . looked to be much older than the age she gave. She was asked, 'How did you happen to go to the camp Thursday night?' "

A. They asked me.
Q. Did you see any whisky there?
A. Yes; Lizzie had a bottle of whisky in a paper bag in her bosom. She took it in the camp and gave it to her man. . . .
Q. What did the soldier do with the whisky?
A. Put it under the bed.
Q. Did you see any women there?
A. Yes sir; lots of them. They were in tents. . . .
Q. Did the guards see you and the women come and go?
A. Yes; they didn't stop me.
Q. Did white officers see you?
A. Yes sir; I saw lots of them.[35]

THE PRECIPITATING INCIDENT: MORNING

On the day after the riot there appeared on an inside page of the Post a brief item which evidently was written and prepared for publication prior to the outbreak of the riot. Inconspicuous in comparison with the blaring headlines of the riot itself, it gives the first account of the incident which precipitated the riot.

Two negro soldiers, one of them a member of the military police, were arrested by Officers Daniels and Sparks on Thursday afternoon and claim to have been beaten up to some extent by the officers. Later two other negro soldiers from Camp Logan approached the officers to ascertain what had become of their comrades, and on receiving the information reported to their superior officers at the camp.

[35] August 30.

Afterward the officers in command of the negro soldiers had a conference with Superintendent of Police Brock, which resulted in the issuance of an order by the chief that hereafter negro soldiers are not to be referred to by members of the department as negroes, but as "colored" soldiers. It is said that the order has stirred up a good deal of feeling.

Officers Daniels and Sparks gave their version of the trouble as follows: they had arrested a negress on San Felipe Street Thursday afternoon, when a negro soldier came up to them and asked them to turn the negress over to him. They refused and finally the soldier became so insistent that the officers were obliged to subdue him and send him to the station. Shortly afterward another negro soldier, one of the military police, asked the same officers what had become of his comrade and one word led to another and this soldier also was sent to the station a little the worse for wear.

In speaking of the occurrence Thursday evening, Superintendent Brock said one of the soldiers had been returned to the camp, while the other was still detained at police station. He could not say what action would be taken by the government against the two officers who are alleged to have hit the soldiers, but he had put the whole thing up to the government. The chief said he was doing all in his power to preserve order between the two elements and would continue to do so.[36]

It is worth pointing out that the central importance of this incident is admitted in the front-page major story of the riot following a brief version of the same incident: "From every source Thursday night, reports came that this treatment of the troops led to the riot." To avoid confusion in the material about to be presented it should be noted that the "trouble" referred to occurred Thursday morning rather than Thursday afternoon, as the above account has it. It seems hardly necessary to state that the order issued by Superintendent of Police Brock regarding the mode of address to be employed by police officers in dealing with Negro soldiers was later stricken from the police records.

At two points in the investigation testimony was taken regarding the incident which precipitated the riot, and certain basic inconsistencies between the versions of the white policeman who participated and of other informants were clearly developed.[37] The crux of the matter seems to be whether the treatment of the Negro soldiers by the white civil policemen was justified. The following is that of the white policeman:

Mr. Sparks said that he and his partner arrested a negro woman on Bailey and San Felipe streets Thursday morning on a charge of abusive language. They took her to the police box at San Felipe and Wilson streets and sent in a call for the patrol wagon. While waiting there they saw a negro soldier running toward the negro woman, and when told that he could not have her he said that he would take her anyway.

Sparks said that he told the negro Edwards three different times to get back, but that when he kept coming in he struck him four times with his revolver. He then made him sit down and wait for the patrol wagon, and he and the negro woman were put in it together and sent to the police station. Edwards was drunk, he said.[38]

Officer Sparks was called to the witness stand a second time in the course of the next day of the investigation. This time he was quoted as follows:

"I arrested the negro woman for abusive language. While I was waiting for the wagon Edwards came up with about 20 negroes following him and said he wanted the woman. I said he couldn't have her. He said he was going to have her and reached over. I hit him over the head three or four times till his heart got right and he sat down."[39]

But to return to Officer Sparks' first version of the events which followed later in the course of the day of the riot:

He said that he and Daniels went to the same box Thursday afternoon to ring in and that while they were waiting there Corporal Baltimore came up and asked them who hit Edwards that morning. Sparks said he did, and asked why Baltimore wanted to know. Baltimore answered that he asked because he wanted to know. Sparks answered him to the effect, "I don't report to any negro." Baltimore said, "By —— I'm on this beat and I have a right to know." Sparks said that Baltimore was acting so ugly that he hit him once with the butt of his revolver and then arrested him. When he started to run by Sparks shot in the ground behind him to scare him, and then arrested him and sent him to the police station. . . .

Afterwards he [Sparks] said two negro soldiers came to him and Daniels and asked them in a nice way what the names of the two soldiers were who had been arrested. The policemen told them they did not know, but they called up at the police station and learned that the names were Edwards and Baltimore, and told the two soldiers what the names were. . . .[40]

The second session of questioning, however, elicited a substantially different version of the same incident.

The action of the police officers in arresting negro soldiers the day of the riot was threshed out by the Committee Friday night. Testimony introduced tended to show that Corporal Baltimore, one of the men arrested, simply inquired of Police Officers Sparks and Daniels concerning the negro who had previously been arrested, so that he might make his own report to the commanding officer of his company. Sparks' testimony, however, was to the effect that the negro was insulting in his inquiries, and that he was forced to deal roughly with him. . . .[41]

Here is the pivotal question in the entire affair: what was the nature of the interaction between Sergeant Baltimore, a colored soldier playing the role, but not clothed with the authority of, a military policeman, and the two white civil policemen, Sparks and Daniels, resentful of being questioned by the Negro, and possibly covering up an inward fear by an outward show of violence?

Superintendent of Police Brock was recalled to the witness stand and was questioned by Judge Henry J. Dannenbaum regarding the encounter between Sparks and Sergeant Baltimore and the latter's arrest. He said that the negro soldier made a statement at the station which was produced and read. He said Captain Haig Shekerjian, Detectives Daugherty and Fife and he were present at the time.

According to the statement, Sparks struck Baltimore over the head with his pistol, then fired at him, and Baltimore ran into a house and got under a bed. Sparks followed him, according to the statement, and made him get up, and then struck him twice. Baltimore said he was just inquiring what had become of his brother officer, and that it was his duty to investigate the matter. . . .

Sparks said he only struck Baltimore once, that he did not strike him after he had run into the house. He said Baltimore had no arms or police club with him. . . . Asked why he hit the negro more than once he said he wasn't going to wrestle with the big negro.

[40] August 30.

[41] September 1.

He admitted that in making arrests in the thickly populated negro sections where the more vicious elements of the negroes congregate, he thought it necessary to use more force than was legally or morally ncessary in order to keep the other negroes from running away with him.

In answer to General Chamberlain, he said he had received no instructions as to the relations to be maintained between the police officer and the military police and General Chamberlain observed, "I thought so." . . .

Sparks and Daniels made a verbal statement, said Mr. Brock, and he told Sparks he would be suspended in the morning. Sparks said he could not afford to be suspended, that he had been suspended before and Brock told him he would wait until he investigated the matter. . . .[42]

. . . Sparks said that he told the chief and the officer that nothing more was said except that Chief Brock told him to go home and stay away until he was called for. Baltimore seemed to have been drinking, he said.[43]

Detective E. F. Daugherty, who took the negro Baltimore's statement on the typewriter, explained the conversation in Superintendent Brock's office. He said that besides himself, Officers Fife and McPhail, Superintendent Brock, Captain Shekerjian of the Twenty-fourth Infantry and Baltimore were in the office. He said that Baltimore stated that he was coming down San Felipe Street when he met another negro soldier of whom he inquired where the police officers could be found. He said he went to them and asked them why they had arrested another negro soldier that morning, telling them that he wanted the information in order to be able to report to his commanding officer.

Baltimore, according to Detective Daugherty, said that Officer Sparks then hit him with his pistol, and that when he turned and ran three shots were fired at him. He said he was arrested in a house about a block down the street.

Daugherty said that later Superintendent Brock and Sparks were in the former's office alone, and that when Sparks came out he said something to the effect that he wasn't getting a square deal. He also said that any man who would stick up for a negro was no better than a negro himself, Daugherty testified, and as he went out of the door he continued that if that wasn't enough he would give him (Brock) the rest of it. Later Daugherty said that Sparks sent an apology to Superintendent Brock by Captain Anderson.

When asked whether he knew if Sparks had been suspended by Superintendent Brock, Daugherty said that Brock and Captain

[43] August 30.

Sherkerjian were to have had a conference Friday morning, and that he understood Sparks was to be suspended until the matter had been settled. He said that Sparks said after his interview with the Superintendent that "if Chief Davison had been in the office he would have told Captain Shekerjian to get out and take his negroes with him. . . ."[44]

Even though it involves some repetition, since it adds some significant data, the first interchange between Inspector General Chamberlain, U. S. Army, and Superintendent Brock is next presented:

Q. You took a statement from Sergeant Baltimore. What did Baltimore have to say?

A. Baltimore asked the officer why he arrested the woman and the officer told him he was not in the habit of reporting to a negro, and the officer hit him.

Q. Did Baltimore strike or attempt to strike the policeman?

A. I can't say he did.

Q. Did both policemen claim the striking was justifiable? Why did they beat up the private?

A. The private demanded the release of the woman. They hit him.

Q. Did the negroes try to strike the officers?

A. I don't know.

The witness was then asked to explain the general attitude of negro troops since they came to Houston and the trouble the police had with them.

He said: "It was reported to me Thursday morning that two police officers arrested a negro woman in San Filipe Street. She was drunk and also had used abusive language. A negro soldier, a private, came up to the officers; he was drunk and tried to take the woman from them. I was busy and did not wait for the rest of the report. At 2:30 Thursday one of the officers informed me that one of the negro soldiers was marked 'hold for chief.' The man was brought to my office. He had blood on his face. I asked him to wash it off and he did. He told me he had asked a policeman why the officer was beating up a woman, and the policeman beat him up and shot at him. It was Sergeant Baltimore. He made a statement and Captain Shekerjian and the other officers heard it. The negro did not seem to be sore. I told the Captain he could file charges against the officer if he wanted to. He said let it go until Friday. That was all right with me.

"I turned Baltimore over to the Captain. That was about 5 o'clock Thursday afternoon."

[44] September 1.

Q. Did the negro soldiers know Baltimore was not shot?

A. They must have known it, for he was in camp. . . .

Q. What was the first information you had there was going to be trouble?

A. Later Captain Kessler (city detective) told me he had word from the Sheriff's office there was trouble at the camp. I got busy and about that time Captain Snow came to the station. He told me when Sergeant Baltimore got back to camp and the negroes saw he was not hurt there would be no trouble. Captain Snow told me "can't a man get out of camp? There won't be any trouble." I went home and went to bed. It was raining. About 8 o'clock I heard shooting. I called the camp over the phone and asked for Captain Snow. I asked him if there was trouble. He said "yes." The telephone wire went dead then and we were disconnected. . . .

Q. Were you afraid of trouble with white troops too?

A. Yes.

Q. If a white provost guard should inquire of one of your policeman why he arrested a man or woman, would the policeman hit the guard?

A. I don't think so.

Q. Would you expect a white man to do any different?

A. I don't think a white man would act like Baltimore did.

The witness said there had been no complaint of lack of courtesy to the military on the part of policemen, and the soldiers seemed satisfied. The army officers also seemed satisfied. He said few of the soldiers had been arrested for being drunk.[45]

About a month after the riot, the following was reported from El Paso, Texas. It was based on testimony taken before the special board of inquiry at the Fort Bliss stockade, where the Negro troopers were being tried for their role in the riot.

The evidence taken before the board of inquiry develops that the meeting was carefully planned, and that it was the result of the beating up of a negro provost guard by a Houston policeman. This negro, with his face still showing the scars of combat, was before the board of inquiry Wednesday and told his story.

According to this story the man returned to the camp at 11 in the morning of the day of the mutiny. He told of his experiences at the hands of the police and two hours later it had spread throughout the entire battalion.[46]

THE ROLE OF RUMOR: EARLY AFTERNOON

We are now in a position to give a brief synthetic account of the supposed sequence of events up to mid-afternoon. It began with the arrest of a Negro woman, drunk and therefore using abusive language, by the white policemen Sparks and Daniels. In this process they treated her with considerable severity if not actual brutality as a result of which Edwards, a Negro soldier (a private, but also a provost guard, and therefore Baltimore's "brother officer"), attempted to intervene. This led to his beating, arrest, and incarceration; but as he was not kept long at the station he was able to be back at the camp in the late morning.

Early in the afternoon Corporal Baltimore, another provost guard, attempted to locate the police officers stationed in the San Felipe district to find out what had happened to Edwards and why. Directed by another Negro soldier, he soon located Officers Sparks and Daniels.[47] Being refused the information he sought he attempted to escape from the policemen, was chased, shot at, captured, beaten, arrested, taken to the station and locked up in the early afternoon. Sparks and Daniels, meanwhile, returned to their beat, where they were subsequently approached and questioned by a pair of Negro soldiers whose demeanor was such that they saw fit to reward them with the desired information. Meanwhile, also, the story of Baltimore's ill treatment at the hands of the same policemen who had that morning beaten up Edwards had been carried back to the camp by [47] From the conflicting testimony and news accounts it is not clear, however, whether Baltimore had previously had direct or indirect contact with Edwards; whether he had been ordered by his superior officers to make the inquiry; whether he was supposed to relieve Edwards on provost guard duty, and made inquiry when he could not be located; whether the Negro soldier who directed him to the policemen's station also accompanied him there; whether Baltimore had been informed that the policemen had been beating the Negro woman whom they had arrested that morning; and whether he asked them only about the reason for the arrest of Edwards, of the woman, or both.

the soldier who had directed Baltimore to the policemen, and who had hung around awaiting developments. Broadcast throughout the camp by the grapevine, and at the same time exaggerated, this news proved to be the straw that broke the camel's back. For it tended to confirm the already current notion that the only way to release the cumulative pressure of resentment and rage was to retaliate directly against the offending San Felipe policemen.

It seems clear that the resentment aroused by the returned Edwards was terrifically intensified when the report that Baltimore had been "shot at" became transformed into the rumor that he had been shot and killed. The first reports after the riot included this statement:

> The trouble began early in the afternoon when a member of the military was arrested by the local police officers. Within a short time this was reported at the camp of the negro soldiers and quickly became bruited about that the negro had been killed by a policeman.
> There has been much unrest in the camp for several days past. Within a short time after this report became general it was noted by the officers that some of the negroes were stealing ammunition and passing it from one to another.[48]

Another statement on this rumor appeared in the published reports of the municipal investigation:

> It was this clash between the police and the negro soldiers that caused a rumor to reach the camp that Corporal Baltimore had been killed by a policeman. The rumor spread like wildfire among the negro soldiers and brought to a climax the smoldering feeling that the negro soldiers had been harboring against the white citizens, particularly the police force, for nearly two weeks.[49]

Said N. L. Daniels, a construction worker, ". . . One negro soldier had told me the shooting was going to start at 9 o'clock because the police had shot a soldier. . . ."[50] According to E. E. Ammons, gate keeper and special deputy sheriff at Camp Logan:

> . . . the negro soldier on guard at my gate that came on at 3 o'clock when the guard was changed started swearing. I asked him what the matter was. He said "the —— —— police had shot up one of our men and we won't stand for it." I told him he would have to obey the laws if he stayed around here. I asked him his name, but he was surly and refused to tell me. I told him I would force him to. I called the sergeant and told him what had happened. The latter reprimanded him and made him give me his name, Albert Wright. I wasn't satisfied at this and phoned to the negro camp. I don't know who answered the phone, but I believe it was a petty officer. I told him how the soldier had talked to me and that he said there was going to be hell in Houston tonight. He asked me to arrest the soldier, but I did not think it necessary. . . .[51]

PLANNING, PREPARATION FOR, AND EXECUTION OF THE RIOT: MID-AFTERNOON AND LATER

James Divins, member of Company I of the Negro regiment, in an affidavit obtained by the District Attorney's department, stated that he . . . came off guard duty at about 2:30 and heard some of the men of [his] company talking about Corporal Baltimore having been shot downtown by a police officer, and they were all talking among themselves as to who would go down town and raid. They all agreed to wait until night, so they could see about the ammunition.[52]

A similar statement was made by Leroy Pinkett, a Negro private:

Yesterday about 3 o'clock we heard that Corporal Baltimore of our company had been shot by special police officers (white officers who ride horses). All the boys said: "Let's go get the man that shot Baltimore." . . .[53]

According to the news dispatch from El Paso at the time of the soldiers' trial,

About three in the afternoon the men commenced stealing their rifles and ammunition and planning the descent on the town. The real leader of the mutiny, Sergeant Henry, committed suicide with his own pistol rather than surrender.[54]

The news of the imminent riot spread quickly from soldiers to civilians. V. G. Dustin, white foreman of the Houston post office, reported that the morning after the riot he said to a Negro mail carrier, Herman J. Ford, "... it seems that a great many of you people knew about this trouble beforehand." Ford's reply was "... that he knew about it when he got off from work Thursday afternoon about 4 o'clock. He said he brought his wife and child in from the Brunner district, where he lives, to San Felipe for safety. ..."[55]

Several Negro girls testified to having been warned of the imminence of danger. Josephine Wright, a 13-year-old girl, quoted the soldiers as saying:

> " 'You better hurry home. If you don't hurry you've got to stay here overnight. If you don't go you're liable to get killed. You better go, because we're going to raise sand. Somebody killed one of our brothers and we're going to get him.' They were cleaning their guns," she said, and had ammunition. That was at 4:30 o'clock.[56]

Lorraine Forman, a 16-year-old mulatto girl, testified:

> I heard them say they were going to raise sand because one of our soldiers was killed, one was arrested, and one was beat up. ... I saw one white officer out there when the soldier told me that. He said this colored soldier is right and this white policeman is wrong.[57]

A white man, Henry Koenig, asserted:

> ... that on Thursday afternoon about 5 o'clock some negro soldiers passed on the way to the warehouses and that they were cursing and telling what they intended doing to the white people. ...[58]

Said E. Hartwell, captain of the temporary fire station at the government warehouse, in response to the question, "Did those men [the Negro guards at the warehouse] tell you anything of the trouble?":

> They said when the wagon came that night bringing provisions the men had been told that the police in town had shot one of their number. When they left the camp they said they were going to the police station to get revenge. ...[59]

Flossie Chaney, another of the Negro girls, was at the camp Thursday afternoon and left at 6:30.

Q. Why did you leave camp so soon?

A. "They told me they were coming to town and raise hell, and told us to go home. . . . They were all talking about it. All of them said there was going to be trouble. They talked it all over the camp. . . ." Questioned relative to any demonstration against white people, she said the negro soldiers cursed and abused both the white people and their white officers.

Q. What did they say about the white people before they started to shoot up the town?

A. "They called the white people every kind of name. They called them everything. They cursed the white military officers and said 'We'll kill them, too.' They cursed the whites all the time. . . ."[60]

Bessie Chaney, 15-year-old sister of Flossie,

. . . said she was at the negro dance hall near the camp Thursday night and left at 7 o'clock.

Q. How came you to leave?

A. "The soldiers told us to leave. They said a soldier had been killed down town by a policeman and they were going to town and raise the devil. They told me and the other women to go now or stay all night. 'If you don't go ahead of us you can't come behind.' " She testified she had been in tents with negro soldiers; that no one stopped her and no one bothered her. . . .[61]

Edna Tucker, 13-year-old Negro girl, was asked, "How came you to leave?" She replied:

A white soldier and some negro soldiers said for me to leave by 7:30. They told us to go home and stay there, or we would have to stay in camp all night. They said, "there is going to be the devil." I came home and told the rest of the women to come. . . .

Q. Who told you to leave?

A. Jackson and Thomas of Company I. They were cussing. They said the police had killed one of the soldiers. They were mad. . . .[62]

Leroy Pinkett, a Negro soldier previously quoted, asserted in his affidavit:

. . . It was getting late then, and we stood retreat at 6 o'clock and then our men began changing by talking. I heard Sergeant Henry of our company say: "Well, don't stand around like that. If you are going to do anything go ahead and do it."

After that I saw some of the boys slip over to Company K and I heard them say they had stolen the ammunition. Then Captain Snow called the men out in line. He asked what we were doing and ordered a search made for the ammunition and also ordered that our rifles be taken up. Another sergeant (I forget his name) took up our rifles from our tent. In this same talk Captain Snow told us that Baltimore was not in the wrong. I heard him say that.[63]

James Divins, another Negro soldier, reported on the same period:

About 7 o'clock Captain Snow called the company out, called them in line and Sergeant Henry called the roll. Every member of the company answered except Corporal McKnight and Private Singleton. They were away from the camp on leave.

Captain Snow told the men in line that they had the officer who had beat up Baltimore and that the officer was in wrong and would be punished. Some member of the company spoke and asked if the officer would be punished on federal grounds. Sergeant Scott then checked the company for ammunition and all rifles were then taken up and turned in to the supply tent.[64]

A white grocery salesman, B. A. Calhoun, testified as follows:

. . . I took Captain Snow to the police station. We went to the station at 4:30 and returned at 6:00 o'clock.

Q. What was the temper of the negroes?

A. They were surly at 6 o'clock. Captain Snow talked to them about the trouble Sergeant Baltimore had with police officers and told them that Chief Brock had said his police officers were wrong in his case and they would be suspended and would be punished. . . . The men seemed ugly and congregated in groups. . . . About 8 p. m. Sergeant Henry came to Captain Snow and told him he could not make the men obey. Five men of Company K were put in the guard house. The bugle was sounded for the officers' call. All officers came out and reported to their companies, and they were assembled. They all lined up and were without arms. This was about 8:10 o'clock. Captain Snow said to me, he had collected all arms, and ordered all negro civilians out of camp. Just at that time someone cried out "break ranks, and get your guns." Firing began. I don't know who fired. It may have been the men designated to do police duty downtown. [It will be recalled that Supt. Brock stated the military police were armed with night sticks only.]

But all seemed to have ammunition. . . . I ran into Captain Snow's tent and his negro attendant told me to lay down. He told me if the troops knew he had not joined them they would kill him. A part of them marched right by the tent I was in. Others refused to join them and were threatened with death. Some officers ordered them to halt. They kept on, about 150 in line, I guess. Some one said, "Stop firing, save our ammunition, for we will need it later." I heard one say, "We are headed for the police station!" . . .

The witness said . . . that Captain Snow told him when he had disarmed the negroes that he believed the trouble was settled and that Captain Snow refused to carry a revolver, saying, "There won't be any trouble." He said he was told the negroes liked their officers and did not want to kill them. . . .

In reply to questions from the committee he said Captain Snow had ordered a double guard about the ammunition tent and said, "The lieutenant . . . in charge of the tent was beaten and thrown out of the tent when the negroes seized the ammunition." . . .

The witness testified he heard remarks about like this from Sergeant Henry: "If we are going to go down, let's go. What's the delay?"

He said Captain James and his company were loyal, but in direct answer said Captain James did not order his company to stop the riot.

"They wouldn't have fired upon them, anyway," he said.[65]

The soldier who gave the signal for the break is identified in the statement of Leroy Pinkett:

A big fellow in our company named Frank Johnson then came running down the company street hollering, "Get your rifles, boys." We all made a rush then for the supply camp and got our rifles and we went to a large ammunition box and got our ammunition. Sergeant Henry was the leader. . . .[66]

The following statement of James Divins takes up immediately after the company had been checked for ammunition, and the rifles had been collected and turned in to the supply tent:

About half the company then gathered around the stump and they were talking about someone getting the box of ammunition. Captain Scurgion walked up and said he wanted to speak to the company. About that time some member of the company said, "There is a mob coming, get your gun," and everyone commenced hollering, "Get your gun" and we all rushed to the supply tent and got our guns. Someone then was pitching ammunition out of the box and Sergeant Henry asked, "Has everybody got their ammunition?" and some hollered "I have not got enough." Sergeant Henry formed the company in front of the officers' line and Sergeant Henry made a little talk and said this is serious business and everyone was asked to stay with him.

As we all went off towards town I heard a demand to halt but it was not given by anyone in our company and no one obeyed the command. Sergeant Henry after going a short distance halted the company and said, "We will go back and make L company go with us," and we marched down to L company's street and some said that L company would not go. We came back and Sergeant Henry stopped the company again and said his father was a soldier and had gone down, but we men would have to follow him and he would carry us down.

Sergeant Henry then ordered a flank guard put out in the rear and he also put one out in front and we marched down the shell road. . . . I think there were about 150 men in this company and a little over half of them were from my company and the others were made up from other companies. . . .

None of the men were drunk that I know of; they didn't seem like they were drunk to me. We did not have any beer at the camp and I never heard of any men getting any beer that day.[67]

In charge of the rear guard was Corporal Baltimore, according to the El Paso dispatch, "with instructions to shoot down any negro of the battalion who refused to join in the shooting up of Houston, or who attempted to fall out of line."[68]

Another witness was a white civilian, R. R. McDaniel, who was going home Thursday night with . . . four or five negro cotton pickers in his car. As he reached the end of the West End car line a white soldier jumped on the running board, he said. When they had almost reached the negro camp the firing began and the white officer jumped off and ran and the negroes quit shooting. Just then Major Snow ran up and jumped in the car, begging McDaniel to save him, he said.

Mr. McDaniel said that he told Major Snow to keep quiet and that they would get away. In turning around he said he ran the car in the ditch and got stuck and that Major Snow jumped out and ran. He overtook him again, and picked him up. They met Police Officer Gentry and his partner and Major Snow told them to go back or they would be killed, McDaniel said. . . . He said that Major

Snow was so nervous that he (McDaniel) asked the druggist to give him something to steady his nerves.

He said they got back in the car in about 30 minutes and drove back toward the camp, and that when they were about four blocks this side of the Heights boulevard police officers stopped them and asked Major Snow about the affair. While they were talking some white officers came out from the town and asked the major to tell them all about the trouble. He said that he took the arms away from the men, all but about 135 of them, who refused to give them up.

Q. What did Major Snow say that he did after the trouble started in an effort to quell it?

A. He said he gave repeated orders and pleaded with the men to give up their arms and stay in the camp, but that they paid no attention to him.

Mr. McDaniel said Snow told him the men were shooting at the telephone wires in order to cut them when the firing started at camp. He declared that Major Snow lay huddled in the rear of the car and would not get on the front seat with him.[69]

Captain L. A. Tuggle, post commander at Camp Logan, and in charge of the Illinois troops who were sent in to Houston to break up the riot, is quoted by a reporter of the Post as follows:

I sat here just where I am sitting now at 8:30 o'clock Thursday night. . . . I was working on reports.

Up from the east came a vicious whirr of rifle fire. I jumped to my feet in amazement, ran out of my tent, and strained my eyes toward the source of the sound. . . . Officers from the six companies of infantry and the battery of artillery on the line here, had by this time clustered at my tent. We all were gazing into the east and wondering whether it might not be a sham battle. A sham battle on a rainy night, with mud underfoot and a drizzle still falling seemed foolish to undertake. . . .

The lights of a motor car dashed through the pines and played on us. The car darted up and stopped with a wrench of the brakes. Captain J. A. Rossiter . . . leaped out and after him came a bareheaded negro soldier.

"Captain Tuggle, this man says the colored troops of the Twenty-fourth are mutinying and killing their officers," Captain Rossiter gasped.

The soldier then told me what he knew. . . . The man had run all the way to the camp of Captain Rossiter's engineer company more than a mile to the west, to ask for help. . . .[70]

[69] August 30.

[70] August 26.

Meanwhile what was happening in Houston? We can get some idea from the story of P. F. Lowder, a reporter representing the Chicago Herald, which was reproduced in the Post:

The first Houston knew of the trouble was at 8 o'clock. A few scattering shots were heard. Everybody began to ask everybody else what the trouble was. Then the telephone began to ring.

"Send help! Send help! The niggers are shooting up the town."

Three automobiles loaded with police officers started for Camp Logan. They halted at the city limits and confined their activities to warning people not to go near the camp. An ambulance that ventured near to pick up the wounded girl [hit by a stray shot while she was within her home] was stopped by the colored troops.

The tires were shot full of holes, the driver told to turn around, a few shots were fired in the air and the machine came tearing back the road on flat tires.[71]

Other reporters, out to see what was happening, had the following to say:

Eighty of the negroes, marching in military formation, in column of twos, led by a tall private, marched south . . . This was at 9:20 o'clock. The men were in perfect order, though they were marching along out of step. When two other newspaper men, bound for the camp to find out the cause of the trouble, ran into the column, they made no threatening move, except that the tall leader shoved one of the reporters into the ditch. . . . The two civilians were allowed to go on toward the army camp unmolested. As they were abreast of the middle of the column, one negro called out: "See here, boys, what you let them two go by for? You goin' to pass up them two? Let's get 'em."

There was no answer and no move was made to "get 'em." . . . It is thought that these soldiers marched down the Shepherd's Dam road, across the bridge, and entered the city in the San Felipe Street section where the fighting kept up long after it had ceased everywhere else. . . .[72]

Testified Mrs. Maude Potts, a jitney operator, in response to the question, "What do you know about the riot?":

I was in the center of it. . . . I heard a negro soldier tell me, "get away from here, white lady, we don't want to kill you, but we are

after the white policemen who have called us names and have been beating our men up." . . . I saw many civilian negroes go along with the negro soldiers and they were armed and some of them were shooting wild. . . .[73]

James Divins further testified:

We crossed the bridge and we met two United States officers in a car on San Felipe Street and halted them and returned their guns to them and let them go. . . . I saw two officers (police officers) in uniform. One lying in the street on his back had been shot but he was not dead and the other one was lying on his side in the bend of the road. I don't know if he was dead or not. . . .[74]

From the last four items it seems clear that the Negro troops were not out to mow down Houston whites indiscriminately. That some of the Negroes, both soldiers and civilians, may have had an inclination to be less discriminating in their violence is entirely possible. But the disciplined and relatively orderly way in which the departure from the camp was organized and carried out strongly suggests that the leaders, while inflexibly determined to punish the San Felipe policemen, had no intention of generally "shooting up the town." This interpretation is corroborated by the statement of Captain Tuggle:

"Of course everyone knows . . . Captain Mattes and the [police] officer (Meineke) . . . had gone on ahead of the troops, had met the crowd of negroes advancing up San Felipe, and had been killed. . . . I am fully convinced that Captain Mattes would never have been shot if he had not been in the car with a police officer. I believe that the negroes thought he was another policeman."

After Captain Tuggle had made this statement a negro prisoner, in a signed confession, made a similar statement that bore out Captain Tuggle's theory. The negro said that if they had known that Captain Mattes was an army officer they would never have harmed him. They had shot out the street lights. They saw, in the front seat, a man whom they knew to be a police officer. In the dark they thought Captain Mattes was another and killed both. Then they plunged bayonets into them.[75]

More light is thrown on the general turmoil and alarm among the civilians of Houston by the following quotations:

[73] August 29.

[75] August 26.

Houston policemen, armed civilians, and members of the Texas National Guard, as well as Illinois guardsmen who were in town when the trouble started quickly went to the scene of the shooting . . . where Captain W. P. Rothrock, constructing quartermaster of Camp Logan, assumed command.

Angry cries of "lynch them" and "come, let's go kill 'em," were heard on all sides. Captain Rothrock placed an armed guard across Washington Avenue with instructions not to let anyone pass, then climbed upon the hood of an automobile and appealed to the men to listen to reason. . . .

About the undertaking establishments great throngs gathered and there was muttering and denunciation of the most rabid sort.

At the police station probably a thousand men, many of them armed, gathered and there was a seething mass which circulated wild rumors and offered their services to the chief of police and his lieutenants. This crowd stayed around most of the evening, though there was a gradual thinning out and at midnight there were only a score or so.

At 10 o'clock every available member of the police department was being rushed to the scene of the trouble in autos, armed with repeating rifles and pistols.

A report reached police station that one-third of the riotous negro soldiers were under restraint and that the balance had divided up into small groups and were rushing their way into other parts of the city. . . .

Someone broke in the front window of Bering's Main Street [hardware] store, but Lieutenant G. G. Howard stationed himself in front of the door and refused to let anyone in.

A large crowd gathered in front of Bering-Cortes wholesale [hardware] store in Prairie Avenue upon the report that negroes had broken into the store to get arms, and in some way a number of them gained admittance to the store and obtained guns.[76]

The importance of the rumors which accompanied the beginning of the outbreak is indicated in the following report:

. . . The vagueness and uncertainty of early reports of the trouble of Thursday night caused much uneasiness and fear. . . .

Added to the more or less authentic reports as to what was actually taking place were rumors—wild imaginings of disordered brains. One was to the effect that the negro troopers were moving upon the city, 600 strong, sweeping everything in their path. Another was that local negroes had joined the soldiers in a general uprising; that they were forming in various parts of the city and awaiting a general signal to start their work of destruction. As a result of these rumors many spent an anxious and sleepless night. . . .[77]

A brief account of the role of the Illinois National Guardsmen concludes the section on the riot proper.

Companies were marched to the camp site of the negro companies. Other companies went to the San Felipe district where the army negroes had gone.

The camp site was surrounded and not a man, white or black, was allowed to leave.

Word was received late at night that the San Felipe quarter was surrounded by Illinois troops and that they were waiting for daylight to capture the negro company. . . .[78]

AFTERMATH

Peace and quiet failed to settle upon troubled Houston with the capture of the last of the riotous Negro soldiers. On the Sunday after the riot appeared a report of flaming fear and boundless rumor:

What appears to be a deliberate attempt to incite a race riot is being made.

Negroes have been told, in all sections of the city, that the white citizens and police intended to raid, murder, and burn. Whites have been told that negroes are arming and preparing to attack.

Both races are excited in a manner which has become most dangerous.

Hundreds of negroes have fled the city, many of them leaving during the day and other scores during the night.

Practically the whole of the ship channel has been deserted by negro workmen, who declare they have been warned to leave the city, but they do not tell who warned them.

As a result of these wild rumors which were spread throughout the city Thursday a feeling of continued unrest and anxiety prevailed among both white and negro citizens in several of the outlying sections Thursday night.

In the Fourth Ward the word was passed along that a raid would be conducted on the negro residences by white soldiers and civilians. There was no foundation for any such rumor.

At the same time in the Cottage Grove section, near Brunner, the word was spread that a raid would be conducted by the negroes on the white residents. The rumor gained credence when a party of white men riding through the section in an automobile warned the people that such a raid would be made. People rushed from their homes in their bare feet and dressed as they were at the time of the warning and congregated in the stores along Washington avenue. No foundation existed for this rumor.

As a result of these rumors, a large number of negroes have already left the city and others are preparing to move away.[79]

Immediately below this account were published three resolutions by groups of colored residents of Houston condemning the action of the colored soldiers and commending the restraint shown by the white citizens of Houston.

In spite of assurances by the military authorities, however, that the situation was entirely under control, hysterical fear and the rumors engendered thereby continued to agitate the people of Houston. Almost two weeks after the riot the following notices were published conspicuously on the front page of the Post:

By Maj. Gen. Geo. Bell, Jr.
To the Public:

The frenzied appeals made to me personally and to the officers of the staff of the 33rd division during the last 24 hours, coupled with the rumors which have come to us, demonstrated that a condition of apprehension exists in the minds of the people of Houston which demands a statement from me.

The only colored troops in Camp Logan are in Company G of the Eighth Ill. infantry, which numbers three officers, 134 men, 10 men attached, 3 men sick, and 4 men absent on leave, a total of 154.

. . . they have no service ammunition in their possession and no organization is quieter or better behaved. . . .

There is abundant evidence to show that many people in Houston have worked themselves up into a state of frenzy bordering on hysteria on the subject of these colored troops.

A certain newspaper in Houston has under large headlines given circulation to a rumor that "negro soldiers and civilians are preparing for a raid," and that "the time of the attack has been set for 11:15 o'clock Wednesday night." [That very night.]

It is impossible for me to find terms sufficiently strong to condemn such statements as these. They, and every one of the rumors which have come to my ears in the last 24 hours, are absolutely and unqualifiedly false and without the slightest justification in fact. . . . I therefore appeal to the sensible people of the city to put an end to all the unfounded reports and resultant hysteria created thereby for the good, not only of Camp Logan, but for your city as well.

GEORGE BELL, JR.
Major General, U. S. Army.[80]

By Mayor J. C. Hutcheson, Jr.
To the Public:

So many hysterical and unfounded rumors calculated to disturb the peace of the city of Houston and to bring discredit upon our city if persisted in have reached me and there seems to be such a feeling of uncertainty and unrest generally prevalent that I feel it necessary to personally state that I have been assured by Gen. Bell that every precaution has been taken against disorder arising out of or connected with Camp Logan, and that I have arranged with Gen. Bell for placing in the city, beginning Wednesday, a sufficient number of white military police, composed of picked men, to thoroughly police all quarters where the soldiers from Camp Logan may be. . . . Certainly it is utterly inexcusable for any of our citizens when thus reassured on the matters of original apprehension, to circulate or give credence to wild and disturbed rumors, wholly without foundation such as have been recently current. . . .

J. C. HUTCHESON, JR.

These statements speak for themselves. But along with the general hysteria the conception of the riot held by the people of Houston was undergoing a transformation; a legend was being born.

At the time of the riot it was generally admitted that the Negro troops were bent on wreaking vengeance on the civilian policemen who they felt had treated them very badly. The first attempt to re-define the event seems to be that of a minister preaching a funeral sermon:

Dr. W. S. Lockhart, pastor of the South End Christian Church, who delivered the funeral sermon over the remains of Officer Ira D. Raney, who was killed by negro soldiers in the mutiny Thursday night, declared in the sermon that, while there appeared to be an attempt on the part of many to attribute this mutiny to race troubles, the real facts were that the mutiny was due to just two causes—"vice and booze" . . . It was simply a case of a bunch of "bad niggers" dressed up in a uniform, given a little authority and put under very lax discipline, who, under the influence of women and booze, perpetrated this murderous crime against the army and the city of Houston.

The blame ought to be placed where it belongs, he said, and a great mistake will be made if Houston allows the impression to grow abroad that it was race prejudice that caused the trouble, and it is a slander on the Houston people, white and black, to make it appear so . . . He praised the police force for the brave fight it put up against the armed desperadoes. . . .[82]

A week later the sermon of another Houston minister was reported as follows:

A beautiful tribute to the men who gave up their lives for the defense of the people of Houston on the night of the mutiny of the negro soldiers, was paid by Dr. H. D. Knickerbocker, at the First Methodist Church, Sunday morning.

The minister was preaching on "The Atonement" and he used this incident to illustrate his sermon. Those soldiers and policemen who died that night to stem the black tide of death sweeping toward the homes of Houston, they entered into the glory of God himself, who gave the fullest exhibition of vicarious suffering in the death of his Son. . . .[83]

Thus we see the role of the Houston policemen identified with that of Jesus Christ himself, beyond which it would seem difficult for any apologist to go.

Four weeks after the riot from a special Camp Logan section of the Post we learn how complete the transformation has already become: the conception of the event has shifted from one in which direct retaliation is central into one featuring incipient mass slaughter. Say the headlines: "How Illinois Guardsmen Saved City of Houston—Nothing Stopped Mutineers on the Night of August 23 Until They Faced the Unflinching White Soldiers from Camp Logan."

Illinois guardsmen on the night of August 23 saved Houston. There is not a Houstonian who will contest this statement. . . .

[The Negro soldiers] with their rifles and belts and bandoliers filled with ball ammunition . . . marched into Houston, then down Felipe street shooting at every white face they saw. . . .

What broke up the organization? What was it that crumpled the will of these angry soldiers, that scared them into slinking away up side streets, each man by himself? What was it that checked their march on Houston, saved dozens, perhaps hundreds of lives?

[83] September 3.

It was the men in khaki, from the State of Illinois. . . .[84]

One more item must be presented to round out this account:

Thirteen negro soldiers of the 24th United States Infantry were hanged at dawn today for murders committed at Houston last August, when members of that regiment engaged in mutinous rioting in the city's streets. Forty-one other negroes were sentenced to life imprisonment, four others for short terms, and five were acquitted. . . .[85]

But this is not the final scene, for that lives on with the people who experienced directly or indirectly the terror and hatred of the riot and its aftermath.

CONCLUSION

The data presented in the course of the municipal investigation demonstrate that the stage was all set for a serious disturbance growing out of race ill feeling.

The data also indicate that although there were other situations in which tension was aroused, it was the members of the Houston police force, and particularly those stationed in the Negro district around San Felipe Street, against whom the colored troopers' hostility was directed.

As a case study of racial conflict involving Negro soldiers, this particular event yields a number of hypotheses which should be tested for validity as principles of general significance in the phenomena of race conflict, particularly of riots:[86]

1—Transportation difficulties growing out of resentment due to segregation are significantly symptomatic of growing tension.

2—Mistreatment of Negro women being arrested by white police officers is keenly resented by Negro men; this resentment is likely to cause Negro men, particularly military personnel, to say or do something which is unacceptable to white policemen.

[86] See Edgar A. Schuler and Charles G. Gomillion, "The Pattern of Military Race Riots," unpublished study.

3—The pattern of relationships and interaction between Negro military police and white civilian police is perhaps of crucial importance in understanding and controlling racial relationships in which Negro military personnel are involved.

4—Whether on the basis of factual or rumored incidents of mistreatment, when the feeling of tension or resentment becomes sufficiently oppressive a nucleus of Negro military leadership is likely to appear, organized about the attempt to secure arms and ammunition, with the objective of taking direct retaliatory action.

RACE RIOTS CAN BE PREVENTED

Excerpts from an article in Harper's Magazine,
December, 1945 - by special permission of the publisher

ERNEST A. GRAY, JR.

Mr. Gray wrote extensively on racial problems for the OWI during the war. He prepared this article with the aid of Robert Jones.

Race riots can be prevented. Techniques have been worked out which can keep minor frictions from blazing into major disorders. These methods are reasonably simple. They have been tested. New York City proved on August 1 and 2, 1943, for example, that a dangerous Harlem outbreak could be prevented from spilling over into a race riot. The country over, potential race riots were averted on an average of once a week in the year following the bloody Detroit disturbances of June 1943.

If enough people can learn these techniques fast enough, we may be able this time to escape the ugly epidemic of rioting which flared clear across the nation after the last war. But there is a very real threat that one will break out. All the conditions -- social, economic, and emotional -- which touched off the 1919 troubles are back with us today.

Thus once more the dynamite of racial tension is lying loose in many communities. When it blew up in 1919, there were major riots in Washington, D. C., in Omaha, in Phillips County, Arkansas. One of the worst was in Chicago, where mob rule and violence swept through the city for four days; 38 people were killed, 537 were injured, and more than a thousand were made homeless through bombings and arson. In all, race war was fought in 26 cities, taking 350 lives and injuring no less than 12,000 people. If we are to avoid another such explosion, we must know how to remove the fuse.

I do not intend in this article to discuss any of the long-range problems -- involving housing, education, juvenile delinquency, and employment -- which lead to racial friction. I propose to deal only with certain major techniques which any alert community can use to keep these frictions from exploding into race riots. These are the most important of many which have been worked out by individuals and a number of organizations. (Some of them can be applied to frictions and outbursts involving other groups than Negroes.) Let's take up the techniques, one by one.

1. Every city and town with a sizable Negro population should determine through thorough surveys the temper of race relations. It should then prepare to control and eventually eliminate any frictions which the surveys may reveal. It should set up an official Citizens Committee on Race Relations. (Twenty-five such committees already are on the job, among the most outstanding being Mayor Kelly's in Chicago, which is taking determined action to make sure that nothing like the 1919 riot happens again.)

Such a committee must be made up of both Negroes and whites, and every member should be a leader who has the confidence of his own race. Its job is to keep a close watch on race relations, to spot dangerous frictions in their early stages, and to advise the authorities what to do to cure them. It should carry enough weight to influence official action in housing, law enforcement, schools, public health, recreation, and every other field which affects its special problem.

In addition, there should be an unofficial group to handle tasks outside the scope of the official committee such as mustering public opinion, prodding local agencies and politicians into prompt action, and needling the press to improve its reporting of events involving Negroes. (More than a hundred and fifty such groups have already been organized.) Both the official and unofficial organizations should set up machinery for emergency action in case of disturbances. Specialists from agencies such as the American Council on Race Relations, the Urban League, and the Southern Regional Council often help in working out such programs.

2. The police force should get special training both in the handling of riots and in the day-to-day problems of helping Negroes and whites get along together. In many cities the police have long been notoriously hostile to Negroes, and the Negroes in turn have feared and mistrusted the police. In reporting on Chicago's 1919 riot, Illinois State's Attorney Hoyne noted that "a great many police officers were grossly unfair in making arrests. They shut their eyes to offenses committed by white men while they were very vigorous in getting all the colored men they could." Negro antagonism and police bias were responsible for many imflammatory reports; a major factor in the outbreak of that 1919 riot was the report that a policeman had failed to arrest a white man accused of stoning and causing the drowning of a colored youngster named Eugene Williams in Lake Michigan.

Consequently, police administrators must make it clear to every man on the force that he is expected to give equal protection and fair treatment to whites and Negroes alike. In addition, it is important for the force to include a suitable proportion of Negro officers. They have proved much more effective than white in Negro neighborhoods, although their usefulness is by no means limited to these areas. Washington, D. C., has 150 Negro police, including motorcycle cops who have worked for three years in all sections of the city. Use of Negro police vastly improves relations with the Negro community, And in case of race trouble, their presence is almost indispensable. During the 1943 Harlem disturbance, several hundred Negro officers and special deputies were used; they made most of the arrests.

Superintendent Edward J. Kelly has made Washington's police department a national model in the handling of racial conflicts. There is little doubt that his sagacious action prevented a riot in Washington in May 1943. Racial tensions in the war-crowded capital had then been rising for some time. The Washington Committee on Jobs For Negroes in Public Utilities was conducting a campaign for the employment of Negroes on the city's bus and streetcar lines. The climax was to be an open-air mass meeting on Friday, May 8. Plans for the meeting were well publicized in the Negro press, but the regular newspapers gave them little or no mention. In the absence of accurate information, rumors began to fly through the white community that a race riot was brewing and probably would break on Friday night. Fearing that the rumors would lead to real trouble, leading citizens asked Superintendent Kelly to withdraw the permit for the parade and meeting. He refused, on grounds that such action would violate Negro rights and lead to worse feeling in the future, since whites would then believe the rumors had some basis and Negroes would resent the denial of free assembly.

On Friday Kelly instructed all his officers to be completely impartial in preserving order, and posted them heavily along the line of march and at the meeting ground. Kelly himself marched at the head of the parade. There was no trouble.

3. The danger spots where conflict is likely to break out can be located in advance, so that special precautions can be taken in time. The fact that trouble is mounting, and the time when it is likely to flare up, also can usually be determined.

The methods of forecasting and spotting trouble have been most highly developed by the mayor's committee in Chicago. It has arranged for the prompt reporting of all incidents involving racial friction, through policemen on their beats, social workers, transit employees, newspapermen, neighborhood leaders, and others in direct daily contact with the people of the city. The location of each incident -- a fist-fight, vandalism, rumors, even a squabble among women in a meat-market queue -- is recorded on a map of the city.

Almost invariably such incidents are concentrated in a few areas; and in all communities these danger spots have certain common characteristics. They are places where antagonistic groups meet in "incidental or competitive contact," according to two leading experts in this field, J. E. Weckler, of the American Council on Race Relations, and Theo Hall, police chief of Wilmette, Illinois and instructor in police training in Chicago. A white neighborhood into which Negroes have recently moved is very likely to be a friction area. So are public parks, beaches, and shopping centers used by both races, particularly where Negroes have just moved in.

On the other hand, neighborhoods where racial groups have intermingled for a period of years are surprisingly free of friction; given time, the most ingrained prejudice apparently will melt in the solvent of close acquaintanceship. Throughout the Detroit riot of 1943, there was not a single conflict in neighborhoods that had been mixed for some time. All-Negro riot-provoking incidents, because as Weckler and Hall have noted -- "Negroes rarely mob whites except in self-defense."

Knowledge of both "safe" and "tension" areas obviously is invaluable to the police department in deploying its forces to forestall trouble. Moreover, a rise in tension, which indicates a potential riot just as a falling barometer foretells a storm, can be noted immediately, simply by plotting the increasing frequency of incidents on the city map.

4. Rumors about racial friction should be exposed and refuted as promptly as possible. Such rumors precede every riot and help keep it going. Generally they are of two kinds. One type consists of general statements about a large racial group. A rumor of this sort, widely circulated in 1943, alleged that colored maids were organizing "Push Clubs" for the sole purpose of shoving white people in stores, subways, and other public places. It became a nation-wide housewives' tale, conveying the false and dangerous impression that large numbers of Negroes were spoiling for trouble.

The other kind of rumor gives a much more immediate indication of impending strife. It is highly specific, purporting to give actual names, places, and dates. Often it alleges crime, rape, or the other intention of a racial group to make an uprising. Two such rumors helped spread the Detroit riot in 1943. Among the whites, the rumor was that Negroes had raped a white woman on the bridge leading to Bell Isle Park, where a Negro-white brawl had broken out. Among the Negroes, the rumor was that whites had killed a colored woman and her baby at the same park. Like all others cited here, these tales had obsolutely no basis in fact.

Sometimes explosive rumors are actually spread by the press.

It is enough to say that the press should be the chief means of exposing and smothering false rumors.

Prompt action by the radio, police, and citizens' commission to combat rumors also can do much to cool off a dangerously heated situation. Houston, Texas, averted a crisis in June 1943 in just this way. People were whispering that the annual Negro Emancipation Day parade and carnival was to be the signal for an uprising. Some irresponsible white citizens started a movement to attack the parade. Informed of the rumor, the police chief, the mayor, the city's bi-racial commission, and leading white and colored citizens signed a proclamation that there would be no trouble on "Juneteenth Day," that the celebration would be held according to plan, and that anyone who tried to interfere with it would be promptly arrested. This proclamation was published as a full-page notice in all the daily papers. It turned out to be the most peaceful "Juneteenth" celebration in Houston's history.

Of course there isn't always time for the kind of action Houston took. Even emergency action to scotch rumors can, however, prove highly effective -- as New York's officials and leading citizens proved in the handling of the Harlem outbreak.

A policeman, recognizing danger as soon as the crowds began to form, called headquarters. Within an hour both Police Commissioner Valentine and Mayor LaGuardia appeared at the 123rd Street Police Station in Harlem and took personal charge. The details of their operations will be discussed a little later; here it is enough to note that the quelling of rumors was one of their most effective tactics. The mayor, with other city officials and leading Negro citizens -- Ferdinand Smith, Walter White, Max Yergan, and many others -- toured Harlem throughout the night in sound trucks. They broadcast to the crowds the true facts of the initial incident and exposed other rumors that were springing up. Broadcasting equipment was set up in the police station and frequent rumor-debunking talks were carried by most local stations. The trouble was over within eight hours, without ever flaring into a real race riot.

5. The Harlem disturbance illustrates another important point in the handling of potential riots: police should be moved into the trouble zone immediately and in the largest possible force -- but they must use their power with the utmost discretion.

On that summer night in 1943, LaGuardia and Valentine immediately mobilized a third of the city's entire police force for Harlem duty. They instructed their men to use no more force than was absolutely necessary to break up the street mobs. The police did not attempt massed frontal attacks on the crowds, nor did they fire wildly into the masses of people. Instead they separated small segments from the large groups, arrested the ringleaders in each segment, and ordered the rest to go home.

6. It is not enough for the police to be fair in their handling of a rioting crowd -- they must also give an unmistakable appearance of impartiality and evenhanded justice. They can thus eliminate Negro distrust and, just as important, discourage hoodlums from getting the idea that they can attack Negroes with impunity.

For months before the Chicago riot broke, the police had been undermining Negro confidence in their fairness by onesided law enforcement. Gangs of hoodlums had been attacking Negroes with apprent immunity from police interference. In the two years before the riot twenty-four Negro homes were bombed, but not a single one of the bomb-throwers was arrested. Consequently, when the riot got under way, the Negroes suspected the police of bias even on those occasions when such suspicion was unjustified.

How far the Chicago police have come since that time was indicated by another incident, of equally dangerous potentialities, on the near South Side in the summer of 1944. It began with a fight between a white and a Negro. A mob gathered, mostly Negro but with some whites. Threats and violent language began to fly. Suddenly forty police squadcars swooped down on the crowd. The officers broke it up, promtly but without gun-play. And they made several arrests of both whites and Negroes.

Police should immediately isolate the area in which trouble has broken out. The Harlem disturbance provided a classic example of this technique. Commissioner Valentine threw a police cordon around the neighborhoods where fighting and looting had broken out. Traffic was routed around this section; all bus service in the neighborhood was suspended; police guarded subway exits; trolley lines were closed to traffic, except for one on which it was possible to provide a police escort. No vigilantes, hoodlums, or curiosity-seekers were permitted to enter Harlem that night.

Again, the 1919 Chicago riot provides an illustration of what can happen when such procedures are neglected.

8. Breaking big crowds up into little ones and then dispersing them is one of the most effective methods of preventing violence. All through the Chicago trouble crowds of curiosity-seekers became transformed into bloodthirsty mobs as they grew in size and became excited by rumors. The presence of an audience also seemed to give the leaders both a sense of support and an incentive to violent action.

But without the spectators, the urge to brutality seemed to lessen.

9. Finally, municipal authorities should make arrangements in advance to call in the militia if necessary. There are few local police forces which can control a riot once it has begun to make real headway -- and thereafter every hour's delay is likely to cost lives and thousands of dollars in damaged property. Detroit's experience in 1943 indicates the importance of getting all the legal machinery set up and greased for action long before it is needed. In that case red-tape difficulties resulted in a twelve-hour delay in the arrival of troops.

Advance preparation is, in fact, the crucial point in all the techniques for preventing racial trouble and for neutralizing it after it reaches the danger stage. Today every prudent American community with any considerable bi-racial population ought to be taking at least the first steps -- the formation of both official and unofficial committees on race relations, the mapping of friction areas, the training of its police force, the enlistment of press, radio, schools, churches, and private organizations in a campaign against dangerous rumors. Many of the larger cities have made encouraging progress in all these measures. If enough other communities follow their examples -- and do it promptly -- America has a good chance of getting through this postwar era without another disgraceful and costly epidemic of rioting.

RACE RIOTS AREN'T NECESSARY
Public Affairs Pamphlet No. 107
By Alfred McClung Lee

To Summarize, Here Are the Steps

1. Know that race riots are symptoms of a disease, not the disease itself. The disease is intergroup intolerance or "scapegoatism," closely related to Nazism and Fascism.

2. There is no substitute for a long-term program to promote sound interracial relations. An anti-riot program has value merely to patch up a truce and to give long-term methods a chance to work.

3. Keep your eye -- or see that some organization keeps its eyes on the seven areas in which danger signals of approaching race violence appear. Those who will look and will see, can see a race riot coming. These seven areas are: rumors, frictions, demagogues, delinquency and crime, police attitudes, congestion, employment.

4. Organize for immediate action. Get together an emergency committee of good explorers and good strategists of social action. The explorers will chart the problems, and the strategists will lay out the things to be done.

5. Make certain that the mayor of your town knows how to bring in the state militia or, better, the U. S. Army without delay.

6. Organize the channels of publicity for immediate action. See that they have "canned" materials at hand for the possible emergency.

7. Develop emergency plans with school and transportation officials, clergymen, management and labor leadership, veterans' groups, scouts, and men's and women's civic and service clubs and societies. Make sure that these plans can easily be placed in action.

8. Should a race riot break out, make sure that the state militia or the U. S. Army is on its way as soon as the danger becomes apparent. Then place the rest of the emergency program into immediate operation.

9. Every organization and every individual of good will can help -- if only by keeping cool and keeping people off the streets.

10. After the emergency has passed, turn to and help build a substantial and permanent organization for the strengthening of interracial democracy in your community. In this long-term program make the focal points of attack congested housing in segregated districts and the dangerous anxieties that all feel in the face of pressing job insecurity.

Wouldn't It Startle Us?

William S. White, political commentator for Harpers, is a writing person of considerable eminence with enough weight of judgment, one might think, to relieve him of any fear of being classified with the lunatic fringe. Yet in the November issue of that magazine he writes as nervously as those members of the Zenith Rotary Club, in Sinclair Lewis' Babbitt, who spoke in favor of raising money to establish a symphony orchestra; they insisted that they favored the project purely as good publicity for Zenith, not because they were guilty of the infamy of actually liking music.

Mr. White opposes the ideas of Senator Goldwater and the John Birch Society; but in so doing he is horribly afraid that he may incur suspicion of being an adherent of Henry A. Wallace, at least, maybe even of Earl Browder. He will, of course. Senator Goldwater may not accuse him, but the John Birchites brand as a Communist anyone who refuses to accept their idiotic gabble. But why should it worry Mr. White? It is characteristic of nuts to think every man of sense insane.

In an effort to establish his exact position Mr. White describes a political spectrum, placing what he calls the Irresponsibles at the infra-red and ultraviolet ends, with true Conservatives and true Liberals in the middle, separated from the Irresponsibles by bands of the "woolly-minded." He rates himself as a true Conservative, professing considerable respect for such true Liberals as Senator Humphrey, but less for the woolly-minded, such as Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.

However, under the subhead "More Than Treason," he attacks "the notion spread by some in recent months that the whole of the military establishment, the whole of the 'military mind' should be held suspect because some officers held or spread right-wing political views." This he calls "a dreadful act of discredit." That's pretty rough on Eisenhower, who is supposed to know something about the military mind and has publicly expressed his anxiety lest it become dominant.

The interesting thing, though, is not Mr. White's case in itself, but what it reveals of the state of political thinking in this country. Categories are conveniences, not ideas; and when men are engaged in a genuine battle of ideas, they waste little time worrying about categories. If they do worry, the reasonable inference is that they are short of ideas.

It may be plausibly argued that Truman's Point Four was the last genuine idea that has been introduced into American political philosophy, and that was nearly 13 years ago. Kennedy's Alliance for Progress may have been another, but it seems somehow to have been lost in the shuffle. For the rest, we have been threshing over old straw, and it is easy to believe that the popularity of Birchism is due mainly to the public's boredom with the futility of it all.

But we are not likely to break out of the dreary old round as long as our political leaders feel compelled to explain that if they vote in favor of a symphony orchestra, it is strictly for publicity purposes, not for any real love of music. All over the world we feed the starving, and nurse the sick, and teach the illiterate, not because it is right to do so, but because if we don't we fear that they may go Communist. Rather than risk being found guilty of charity, we proclaim that we are submitting to blackmail!

Well, heaven knows the introduction of the moral issue into politics is a dangerous thing. Historically, it has made a sickening record of hypocrisy, deceit, lying and betrayal; and all too often it has led to that overweening arrogance that has been the ruin of many once great nations. Nevertheless, the thing exists and there is power in it. Cynics may sneer at Woodrow Wilson, but they can't sneer away the fact that the old boy shook the world.

In one of his memorable addresses Wilson confessed that he didn't know whether he was a liberal or not. He did claim, though, that he knew the difference between right and wrong, and he may have been mistaken in that; but proceeding on that assumption he made such an impact upon the world that it has never been the same since; and whatever else he may have done, he never bored us.

It may be that we have attained a level of sophistication at which the categorical imperative has lost all potency, but here is one opinion to the contrary. If some leader of high intellectual capacity should offer to the American people a new idea backed by one argument only, to wit, "This is right" – well, he would certainly be denounced, and he might be lynched, but he would startle this country out of its intellectual torpor, and he just might achieve Wilson's ambition to "release the generous energies of our people" – to the astonishment of all mankind.

PROJECT ALERT . . by Robert L. Frye

Pensacola, Fla.

A PROGRAM dedicated to the "rebirth of the ideals of the American way of life" was born here in the fall of 1959. It was given the title "Project Alert," and was based on a similar one-year program that had been conducted at Lubbock, Texas.

Since then, Project Alert has grown from a local movement into a regional one involving more than thirty Southeastern communities in Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama and Florida.

Its exact origin is uncertain. [See editorial, p. 503.] In the summer of 1960, its chairman, Pat N. Groner, a hospital administrator in Pensacola and a World War II Marine Corps pilot, gave credit for the original idea to Vice Admiral Robert Goldthwaite, Chief of Naval Air Training, with headquarters here. Following the publication of Senator J. William Fulbright's now famous memorandum to the Defense Department, in which both Project Alert and Admiral Goldthwaite were mentioned, the official version gives the credit to "twenty Pensacola businessmen [who wanted] to reawaken the people to the basic principles of Americanism."

The project was launched at a "familiarization meeting" attended by newsmen, businessmen, industrialists and influential citizens. It became a resounding success practically overnight. The Communist threat and the ideals of the Founding Fathers were discussed on the streets, debated with sales clerks, studied in the classrooms. Youth groups were formed in the schools; almost every civic organization in the area created committees to explore the dangers of communism and to study ways of cooperating with Project Alert.

Project leaders supplied speakers to harried program chairmen desperate for something to put on at the next meeting of their club or society. Preachers joined in the expanding chorus of voices deploring the "apathy and sluggishness" shown by the American people to the threat of the "Red monster."

Once firmly established locally, Project Alert called a conference and seminar to which citizens from more than thirty Southeastern cities and military bases were invited. The usual fiery speeches and a program of anti-Communist films constituted the bulk of the program. The delegates, impressed, went home to spread the word.

CONSISTENTLY, Project Alert officials point out that theirs was not "another John Birch Society" and that they had no intention of participating in name calling. Their only purpose was to give the citizens a "true" understanding of the vicious nature and ultimate aims of international communism, to revive interest in America's heritage, its laws and economic system, and to offer to the citizens certain suggestions which they might act upon in their own way to aid in a rebirth of patriotism on a national scale.

At one time local talk connected Dr. Kenneth Wells, president of the Freedom Foundation at Valley Forge, Pa., with the Project. Admiral Goldthwaite and Admiral J. W. Reeves (U.S.N., Ret.) reported that Wells had expressed an interest in the program and that an attempt was being made to raise $60,000 to $70,000 to conduct five pilot program tests in other communities. Apparently the money was never raised and talk about the pilot programs was dropped. Subsequently, however, Project Alert of Pensacola was awarded the Freedom Foundation's George Washington Honor Medal for its work in 1960 in bringing about "a better appreciation of the American way of life." Admiral Reeves went to Valley Forge to accept the medal.

The Pensacola High School band also received a George Washington medal for its patriotic activities during the same year. It had carried out a series of programs devoted to patriotic American music.

Project Alert had clearly posed the problem: the menace of communism. Now people wanted to know: "What can I, as an individual, do to fight this menace?" So Project Alert, on July 4, 1961, inaugurated a letter-writing campaign. Chairman Groner reminded his supporters that the "Communist Party can get 50,000 letters to Washington on any issue within forty-eight hours." Groner went on: "Seventy-five per cent of national legislation is initiated and promoted by special interest groups representing less than 5 per cent of our population." Now, said Groner, citizens should write letters to President Kennedy on such issues as "Berlin, Cuba and Communist China." The letters would be gathered by Project Alert and forwarded to the President. The campaign was to run for one week.

Full-page newspaper advertisements were run and radio and TV stations supported the drive. On July 11, the deadline was extended for four more days. A month later, Rep. Robert L. F. Sikes (D., Fla.) carried a grand total of 425 letters to Washington. Groner estimated that another 200 letters were mailed directly to the White House.

APPARENTLY this was not the answer to "What can I do?"

About this time, Senator Fulbright dropped his bomb into the Congressional Record on involvement of the military in rightist politics. He named Admiral Goldthwaite as supporting Navy-initiated forums, conferences and "alerts" aimed at arousing the civilian population to the dangers of communism. He also listed the Commandant of the 8th Naval District and staff, at New Orleans, as supporting the same organizations. His memorandum charged that the Navy had flown a group of community leaders from the Pensacola area to Harding College at Searcy, Ark., for "indoctrination" before Project Alert actually got under way. It noted that the Project used material from Harding College in its promotions and that Glenn Green and Dr. Clifton Ganus, both of Harding, were used as speakers on the local Navy base as well as for the Project. The memorandum further alleged that Navy personnel and civilian workers were required to attend some of the Project meetings during duty hours.

Admiral Goldthwaite, who has since been transferred from Pensacola, defended his part in the movement by saying that while his staff had held "leadership" meetings at the Naval Air Station here, he did not believe "anyone had been required to attend." He added that he had accepted a position on the Project Alert executive committee because it was a patriotic organization. "If being on the Project Alert committee is an offense of any sort," he said, "and that may be what some people are talking about, I know of no basis for accusations of any sort other than the fact that I have been opposed to communism ever since I can remember. I endorsed the program for that reason."

Concerning the flight to Harding College, Admiral Goldthwaite said he had sent a few people to the college to "see what educational material we might be able to use in our education program on the station, not off the station. Project Alert people went along to get the information for their own program."

WITH THE failure of the letter-writing campaign and the publicity it received from the Fulbright memorandum, interest in Project Alert began to wane. But what took most of the starch out of the program was the Berlin crisis and Kennedy's military build-up. The Communist threat was no longer something distant that could be combated by high morals and "thinking American." There were classes on survival to attend and fallout shelters to build. People just didn't have time to worry about infiltration by Communists and the decay of Americanism.

To counteract this waning interest, Project leaders set up a series of lectures by "noted" personages. The first visiting dignitary was Edward Hunter, author of Brainwashing from Pavlov to Powers and generally credited with invention of the word brainwashing. The final speaker on the program was Captain Eddie Rickenbacker, World War I flying ace and president of Eastern Air Lines.

More recently, the Project initiated another letter-writing drive, this one aimed at the program managers of radio and TV networks and editors of newspapers and magazines. "Newspapers and wire services are feeding the American public political garbage so slanted and biased it is an insult to common intelligence," a speaker told a local civic club. He didn't say which way the bias was directed. He added that there were only two national newspaper columnists worth reading, but failed to name them. He climaxed his speech by charging that the communications media were "publishing all of Russia's propaganda of success" and playing up not America's successes, but its failures.

There is as yet no count on the number of letters Project Alert has managed to relay to the nation's editors and broadcasters.

NEW MISSION to MOSCOW . . by Barbara Deming

TEAM MEMBERS of the San Francisco-to-Moscow Walk for Peace tell how sometimes in the Eastern countries a crowd at the roadside would surge out to meet them, offering flowers, singing songs, expecting from them the kind of talk about peace they were accustomed to. But then the walkers' plea for unilateral disarmament, their plea to resist as individuals the military policies of their own government, would so take people by surprise that there would be a stunned and prolonged silence.

The walk across Europe sharply dramatizes the world's dilemma. As they crossed from the Western into the Eastern world — fifteen Americans, reinforced by volunteers from eight other countries — the team literally stepped out of one perspective of events into another. In the West, fingers were always pointed East: there lies the trouble. Crossing the border into the Communist world, they had only to take a few steps and — as though they had walked through the looking-glass—the same image was presented to them, in reverse. All fingers pointed West: there lies the trouble.

In the States, the reiterated question, "Why not tell it to the Russians?" had been responsible for the idea of the walk. In Russia, they were asked again and again, "Why aren't you back home making your suggestions there?" In meetings in the States, their speeches sometimes brought people in the audience jumping to their feet to cry, "Communist!" The same recommendations now provoked the cry of "Fascist!"

In East as in West the fears they encountered were heartfelt, the bitter experiences cited were real. They became real enough for the walkers; as they were on foot, they covered the actual ground where certain events had taken place — passed the mass graves where the Nazis had used bulldozers to shovel the dead into the ground, spent a day at Auschwitz. At the press conference the team held when it returned home from Moscow, Bradford Lyttle, the team's coordinator in the field, warned: "One thing I would like to emphasize again and again to the United States — that is the horror with which the people of all Eastern countries view our arming of West Germany. The ultimate justification they give for their military policies is that they could take no chance of ever being invaded again by the Germans. . . ."

East and West, fears were real. But to neither East nor West were the fears of the other side real. When Brad Lyttle spoke to the American

How Some Birchers Were Birched

An editor tells how simple exposure 'to the judgment of the public' checked a rising tide of John Birch Society activities in his community.

By THOMAS M. STORKE

SANTA BARBARA, Calif.

A YEAR ago Santa Barbara was sizzling with John Birch fever. Today the temperature of the body politic is almost back to normal. Why the change?

The answer is simple. The John Birch Society has been brought out of hiding. It was exposed to the judgment of the public, as it can be in every community.

It was revealed as a monolithic organization ruled with a dictatorial hand by its creator, Robert Welch, a man who sees Communists everywhere—in the White House, in the Supreme Court, in Congress, in the State Department, in our churches, schools and universities, in our press, radio and television.

It was revealed as a holding company for virulent "aginner" groups that say, as does the title of a current London show, "Stop the world; I want to get off"—groups that are against democracy; against all income taxes; against the welfare and protective activities of the Government, which it calls socialism; against our participation in the United Nations; against foreign aid; against alliances for mutual protection with NATO and SEATO nations; against organized labor; against academic freedom; even against fluoridation.

In any community, the true image of the John Birch Society can be exposed to public view—the image of its reactionary rebellion against the twentieth century, as well as the face of anti-communism which it presents to the world. It can be exposed by individuals, organizations, newspapers, radio and television stations in a joint effort for public enlightenment.

The Birchers will fight back—as is their right. But out of the debate, the public will be able to make its own judgment, based on facts and open arguments.

THIS is what happened in Santa Barbara:

More than a year ago, it became apparent that organized effort was being put behind the activities of the ever-present radical reactionary extremists. A steady pattern of attack was emerging—against school officials, particularly in the adult education field; against churchmen; against the United Nations; against university professors and administrators. Day after day, the mails brought literature vilifying the entire Supreme Court and calling particularly for the impeachment of the Chief Justice. Most of these came in envelopes bearing Robert Welch's now familiar battle cry, "This is a republic, not a democracy—let's keep it that way."

More and more, letters to the editor followed the familiar "anti" pattern. Anonymous telephone calls charging "Communist" became commonplace. Mailings to Protestant church members cast doubts on the loyalty and patriotism of their leaders.

Santa Barbarans were seeing the manifestations of organized activity, but most of our citizens did not know what was behind it—the John Birch Society. I and my newspaper, The News-Press, decided the people had a right to know about the society that was trying to influence their thinking; just as all Americans have the right to form their own opinions from a free flow of information, and the right to promote their views in a legitimate way.

ON Jan. 22 and 23, reporter Hans Engh told the Birch story in The News-Press after weeks of digging for facts. The story was told almost entirely in the (Continued on Page 101) words of the society, from its founder, some of its local members and its literature. Still, it brought cries of "smear" from the Birchers, and the pattern of Birch attacks continued.

SO I decided I must tell my readers what I thought of Robert Welch and his society and what they were doing to my beloved Santa Barbara. I did so in a front-page editorial on Sunday, Feb. 26, 1961, that was accompanied by a statement of democratic principles in which I believe, and which my newspaper stands for. I introduced my editorial comments with these words:

The editor and publisher of The News-Press is in his 85th year. His entire life has been spent in this community. His memory takes him back many years and his reading even further. He lived when conditions were rugged. When West was West and men were men. He lived during periods when if a man or a group of men openly by word of mouth, or the printed word, called our President, or Vice President, our Secretary of State, the President's brother, members of the Supreme Court, and others at the head of our Government traitors, they were made to answer. Such slanders often called for a visit from a courageous and irate group which brought with them a barrel of tar and a few feathers. And such instances were particularly likely to occur if the slanderer came from New England. He lived when men were considered cowards when they hid behind their women's skirts and clothed their identity through anonymity.

It is in the light of this background that The News-Press tells where it stands on the John Birch Society.

The results were amazing. Most remarkable was the flood of support for our anti-Birch position from the moderates, both liberals and conservatives—the people in the middle who are rarely heard from. Community leaders who had been subjected to Birch attack stood up and fought back, realizing that the newspaper and a broad segment of the public were behind them.

The air cleared and the political temperature began to drop.

WE soon learned that other communities were having similar problems. Within a few weeks we filled requests for more than 15,000 reprints of The News-Press editorials and articles. The end of such requests still has not been reached.

Birch Society tactics call for the formation of "front" groups to carry on its program in disguise. Welch's Blue Book, "bible" of the society, says on page 86: "We would organize fronts—little fronts, big fronts, temporary fronts, permanent fronts, all kinds of fronts." It says further on: "We are talking about a million men, by which of course I mean men, women, and girls and boys of college age or old enough to be in the fight * * * They are there just waiting to be recruited if we can get the story to them."

Thomas M. Storke.

Last April The News-Press exposed, with documented evidence, the existence of a Birch "front" organization—the first such exposure anywhere. The "front" was called the Freedom Club, and it was set up on the campus of the University of California at Santa Barbara. It pretended to be just an organization of conservative students.

IT was far more than that, as The News-Press revealed. At least part of its financing came from the treasurer of the John Birch Society in the Santa Barbara area. The guiding hand of both the Freedom Club and campus unit of the Birch Society was a 26-year-old man—not a student—but one of Robert Welch's paid coordinators. His primary job was to help spawn John Birch units on California college campuses.

A report signed by the leader of the campus Birch unit contained these words: "It was decided to soft-pedal the societies [sic] activities and concentrate on the Freedom Club." And the minutes of a meeting of the Birch unit said, "A further point of attack shall be subtle movements in objectives and use of the Freedom Club so that attention shall not be focused on the actual society."

Nine of the fifteen members of the Freedom Club, it turned out, constituted the entire roster of the campus Birch cell. The Freedom Club was an instrument for bringing college students into the John Birch Society.

And not just college students. News-Press disclosure of the Freedom Club - Birch Society link came just after mailings had gone out to juniors and seniors of a local high school encouraging them to join the Freedom Club, without revealing its Birch parenthood.

Since The News-Press disclosed the deception, nothing more has been heard of the Freedom Club or campus Birch unit. Exposure was all that was needed.

More recently came Birch efforts to kill the UNICEF Halloween fund drive. A front-page News-Press editorial pinpointing the lies of the Birchers and setting the record straight probably was a factor in boosting this year's UNICEF collections to a total of $6,000, compared with $4,300 last year — a sizable amount for this small community.

THE John Birch philosophies have been aired so thoroughly in Santa Barbara that they have lost much of their force. Welchers and Birchers and their brethren ("I'm not a member, but . . .") continue to pressure church and school leaders. But now the overwhelming majority of Santa Barbarans—the rational moderates—take their outpourings for what they are, the unbalanced exhortations of a tiny, fanatical, highly vocal minority. California Attorney General Stanley Mosk has described the movement graphically as "a collection of wealthy business men, retired military officials and little old ladies in tennis shoes."

To me, Birchism—or Welchism—is a recurrence of a bad dream. My life spans eighty-five years of American history, and history has a way of repeating itself. Time and again I have seen people who should know better caught up in an emotional wave, following a leader as absurd as Robert Welch.

I RECALL a chat I had with President Roosevelt in the White House in 1934. I had just flown to Washington from Mexico City with Senator McAdoo, stopping en route in New Orleans, Jackson and Atlanta — the realms of three demagogues named Long, Bilbo and Talmadge. I was deeply concerned about their successes, so I asked Mr. Roosevelt, "How are you going to combat such menaces?"

F. D. R.'s expression turned grave. He gestured with a rotating motion of his right arm and said, "I liken these threats to an epidemic of measles. You have to let it run its course. All we can do is keep the disease in its course and hope for the best."

The epidemic of demagoguery of which Long, Bilbo and Talmadge were the images did run its course and die down, if not disappear. The Birch epidemic, of which Welch is the image, also will run its course and die down.

BUT the distressing thing to me is the fact that there still is abroad in the land a paranoia so deeply rooted that it could sustain the John Birch movement—as for years it has sustained the Ku Klux Klan through periods of bold violence and longer periods of hiding and waiting. President Truman has said, "The Birch Society is the Ku Klux Klan, without nightshirts."

The parallel between Welchism and McCarthyism is obvious. McCarthy, like Welch, fed on the paranoiac fears of his followers. But the post-McCarthy period saw the paranoia grow as communism gained new victories abroad and more and more frustrated Americans began seeing Red ghosts in every high office and under every bed.

With encouragement from Welch, a new crop of Americans began to get the idea that they could thwart communism by suspecting and smearing their neighbors, plastering the "Comsymp" label on everyone in sight and discarding our democratic heritage of free discussion of all political ideas.

Welch picked up the game where McCarthy left off, but he added refinements. He lacked the advantage of a seat in the Senate, but he more than made up for it by making sure his society was well financed and tightly organized.

Welch, as he himself boasts is not playing for peanuts. He is out to recruit 1,000,000 members. Yearly dues are $24 for men and $12 for women—which, if averaged at $18, would mean an income of $18,000,000 a year, if his dream were realized; this, without considering large contributions by wealthy fanatics.

In a letter accompanying his monthly bulletins to members, Welch makes an appeal for extra gifts, beyond the dues, and blandly adds, "We shall not go into any detailed accounting" as to how the money is used. This is a policy he has frankly followed from the first; no public accounting of receipts or expenditures.

Smart operators could do quite a bit with $18,000,000-plus a year that need not be accounted for. Smart operators are doing quite well already, on the fringes of the Birch Society and its fronts, with large fees for lectures, exposés and shock-talks to "freedom forums" or to secret study classes—delivered by reformed Reds, unemployed ex-Federal agents, columnists and commentators.

NO idea seemed too nutty for Robert Welch — even the idea that former President Eisenhower was a dedicated Communist who was working with his high-ranking partners-in-treachery to deliver us to the Russians.

Merely exposing such monstrous ideas—merely ventilating them in the public breez—is enough to bring sanit (and sometimes laughter, t be sure) into the discussion political issues. The absurdi ties fall of their own weig or continue to be held de by a minority so minute t it is more troublesome t dangerous.

No instrument can perf the exposing operation mo effectively than a newspaper. Congressional and legislative committees, sniffing the scent of subversion, have come close to launching all-out investigations of the John Birch Society. But there is potential danger in such inquiries.

A SEARCH for subversion can turn too easily into probe of political beliefs. Leg timate questioning can t easily become intimidation of witnesses who hold minority political opinions. Even a character assassin is entitled to develop his own political philosophy and put the hard sell behind it.

Similarly, a newspaper doing its duty in a democratic society is entitled to bring every political philosophy into the light of day for public examination. It is entitled to discuss the sales technique being used, too—particularly if it is secret or semi-secret in nature—and express its own opinion about both the philosophy and the sales technique.

I don't know what the real purposes are behind the Birch facade of anti-communism and the acknowledged but de-emphasized aim of reversing the economic, social and political trends of the twentieth century in America. But it is worth pondering the possibility that the organization, unwittingly, is following a Communist-inspired line to destroy Americans' faith in their most respected leaders and institutions.

The Communists will adopt any tactic, even pseudo-anti-communism, if they see a chance to divide and weaken their enemy. And certainly the agitation and character assassination the Welchers have practiced have served only to make Americans distrust each other, undermine popular support for a strong national defense force and weaken our ties with our allies.

In the end, the only protection against such aberrations as the John Birch Society and such ridiculous leaders as Robert Welch lies in the informed good sense of the people. Air the ideas of the radical extremists, and you will find in a hurry, as we did in Santa Barbara, that the moderates—conservative and liberal—are in control.

THAT knowledge makes all the difference in the world to the church and school leaders and others who have been under attack. When they realize that they have strong support behind them, they are unlikely to buckle under pressure.

In a letter to The News-Press last April, a research associate who was studying John Birch and other extremist movements for the California Teachers Association asked, "Am I correct in noting that since there has been so much publicity * * * there have been no more open attacks—at least on schools?"

He is correct, as far as Santa Barbara is concerned. School administrators have expressed their thanks to me for bringing the Birch Society into the arena of public discussion. So have ministers of the gospel.

IF John Birch meetings are being held now in the Santa Barbara area, they have not come to the attention of The News-Press. Administrators of the University of California at Santa Barbara have noted that both the John Birch cell on the campus and its front organization, the Freedom Club, have ceased to exist. Disclosure of their activities is all that was needed. Parents and the students themselves took care of the rest.

It is true that The News-Press went a step beyond disclosure, as far as the John Birch Society in general was concerned. I spoke out editorially in plain, honest language that I don't think anyone could misunderstand.

I have published my own daily newspaper in Santa Barbara for sixty-one years. During that time I have learned at least one lesson well—that a newspaper will not be listened to or win respect if it pussyfoots in stating its editorial beliefs.

I have learned that you can't kill a rat with a feather duster.

underdeveloped countries. An intelligent labor leader like Tom Mboya of Kenya does not interest them nearly as much as a demagogic orator like Patrice Lumumba of the Congo. The figure who has most won their imagination is Fidel Castro, who dared tweak Uncle Sam's nose, fought heroically, spoke rhetorically and dressed spectacularly. Castro suggested to these young radicals the possibility of a politics that was not yet functionally rationalized, and meanwhile they neglected to notice that it had become totalitarian. They were drawn to figures like Lumumba and Castro out of a distaste for the mania for industrial production which the Soviet Union shares with the United States, but they failed to see that these leaders of underdeveloped countries, who seemed attractive because they represented spontaneity and anarchic freedom, were themselves fascinated by precisely the same mania for industrial production.

"Such moods among the young were both encouraging and frustrating for the Communists. Encouraging, because for the first time in some years there is accessible to them a small milieu in which to function with at least some freedom. Frustrating, because they cannot really take organizational advantage of this fact. The old Leftists are tired, the 'progressives' too distant or cautious, the pacifists too sophisticated or suspicious. And the young radicals are too indifferent to traditional leftist politics even to consider the CP a serious option—for if they oppose efforts to persecute the Communists, they usually have no hesitation in brushing them aside. All the CP can do, then, is to wait." ("New Styles in Fellow-Traveling," Dissent, Autumn 1961)

William S. White

"An aberrant and unique Right-wing movement is on the rise in this country. While it calls itself Conservative, it confronts true Conservatism, far more than any other view of life, with a still-distant but potentially serious challenge.

"It requires some calm and clinical analysis. But such analysis should come last of all from the throbbing ultra-Liberals, some of whom have in fact helped to start this prairie fire. For all we need to set off a big and nasty blaze indeed is for frenetic Liberals to rush into this area. Their capacity for auto-ignition is no less high than that of the New Rightwingism—which is not, of course, 'Conservative' at all. For the moment, I refer to these people as the 'Reactionary Irresponsibles,' and to certain ultra-Liberals as the 'Precious Irresponsibles.' . . .

"Since the job of inquiring into the New Rightwingism should fall to the moderately Conservative, and since I consider myself more or less in that category, I offer the following observations. For I believe that the task is now imperative. I have long held the view that all such aberrations, whether from Far Left or Far Right, should be met to the last possible moment by a conspiracy of silence. If ignored, often they will at length go away; if widely commented upon, often they will only wax upon notoriety. But it is plain that this aberration isn't going away.

"What is developing here is a political nihilism far more complex and sophisticated than any we have known in my lifetime. Its anger—and anger is the core of its motivating force—is large and ill-defined rather than narrow and all too defined as in the past. It is not caused by racial malice, nor by religious hate, as was the Ku Klux Klan movement of the Twenties. Again, it does not feed specifically and solely upon fear of communism, as did the McCarthyism of the late Forties and early Fifties.

"Nor is it 'anti-intellectual' in the sense that it scorns those who read much and write well. On the contrary it both values and makes use of these pursuits, these talents. This is no Know-Nothingism, nor can it be defined fairly as a hate movement. It cannot be said to appeal to one social or economic class at the expense of, or in hostility to, another.

"For the anger of the New Rightwingism is directed not against race or religion or class but against the whole nature of the world in which we live. It rejects the whole present—not merely that part of the present which all sensible men would like to reject: the aggressive international communism that arrogantly threatens all that we have and are. The New Rightwingism does not merely—and rightly—deplore softness toward communism; it also recoils from rational recognition that these threats are terrible realities. Thus it demands that the West give no inch to Soviet imperialism—and at the same time bitterly condemns every practical step to prepare resistance, as, for example, foreign aid. It obstructs a program for arming Turkish, Belgian, French, and Italian soldiers (as well as our own) to fight Communists if need be—and also suggests that the sponsors of such programs are practically Communists, or at the very least 'pinkish.'

"The new Far Right questions the value of America's association with neutrals (whether these be Soviet stooges or merely such as Nehru's India). It also fiercely challenges our association with long-proved Allies, some of whom, notably Britain, have given more lives in fighting against totalitarianism, proportionately to national population, than we have.

"It does not merely object—and rightly, in my view—to vast and dubious welfare programs at a time when the one big welfare problem of this country is its physical safety in the Cold War. It objects to all programs, good, bad, or indifferent, which would cost any money at all. In this sense, the New Rightwingism has a marvelous impartiality: Its rain of disapproval falls equally on the just and the unjust—and on every shade between. It is, at bottom, against planning itself, simply as a concept, even planning for a hard line against communism. Or, more exactly, it is simply against government itself. . . .

The Reactionary Irresponsibles

"How did these people, these Reactionary Irresponsibles, get that way? It is a difficult question, and I do not delude myself that I can give clear or comprehensive answers. It is possible, however, to offer some provisional and partial answers. The mind turns at once, of course, to the Cold War and the Atomic Era; to the fact that this is the uneasiest in all the ages of man. McCarthyism unquestionably fed in part upon a national disillusion that the Second World War had not brought that world-wide peace and freedom for which so many had hoped. The Communists took China; in many other places they were sweeping forward.

"A people convinced, absurdly, that the war would solve most everything (FDR's Four Freedoms and all that) now found that it seemed to have solved little. Our national motives had been truly generous. So the Communist advance obviously was the work of evil men on our own side, of traitors. This state of mind . . . caused a far uglier Rightwingism than that which now we face in the Sixties. The New Rightwingism has not—at least not yet—gone in for wholesale character assassination, or for piecemeal destruction of the Bill of Rights.

"All the same, though the danger now is less acute, the problem is more complex. For this movement has no easily identifiable leader, or leaders, or any easily identifiable aims. This is another way of saying that it is largely spontaneous, self-generating, and that it is in truth a 'grass-roots' affair as anonymous as that term suggests. It protests against not one or two policies or situations, but many: it is as bellicose toward any extension of the medical-care system for Americans as it is toward the extension of Soviet communism.

"The fact that it has no chosen victims—such as religious or racial minorities—is, of course, welcome. Still this very circumstance promotes the anonymity which nearly rules out the traditional techniques of opposition: first, identification, then exposure, of leaders; then argumentation against them. Men in public life hear from many of the Reactionary Irresponsibles as individuals, true enough, as do those of us who write for national publication. But in each such case, one tends to feel he is in communication with somebody who is a Follower of a True Believer, but not with the True Believer himself.

The Precious Irresponsibles

"Again, the letters one receives from these Reactionaries are both like and unlike those from the Precious Irresponsibles, that is, the Rather-Red-Than-Dead people. The venom from both sources is about the same, if perhaps rather more expertly distilled in that from the professional ultra-Liberal. But—and here is the distinction—the Reactionary Irresponsibles do not, and probably cannot, clearly disclose the source or sources of their twisted philosophy. Nor do they maintain any reasonably consistent theme.

"A fellow knows immediately what kind of mind is engaging him when he is dealing with the Precious Irresponsibles. This is exactly the sort of mind which in the late Thirties held that Hitler Germany and Chamberlain Britain were about equally evil—until Hitler Germany invaded the sacred soil of the Soviet Union. That mind now takes the line, if more cautiously, that there is not really much to choose between the motives and purposes of John Kennedy and Nikita Khrushchev. It goes into transports of rage when we resume nuclear testing. When Khrushchev resumed it, and acting first at that, this was passed off as a kind of inevitable act of Soviet self-defense, or something of the sort.

"But the mind of the Reactionary Irresponsibles on this same issue is incapable either of such sophistry or such practical concentration on an objective. The Precious Irresponsibles work, consciously or not, toward a situation favorable to imperial policies of the Soviet Union. The Reactionary Irresponsibles, consciously or not, work toward an irrational objective that can only be described as the slow destruction of the power and unity of the United States, in most any field you could name.

"In summary, they are in angry flight not simply from the Atomic Age, not simply from the Cold War, not simply from disillusion, but from current life itself and from all of its intractable realities and unavoidable restraints—from taxes and tonsillitis to the military draft, from communism to overcrowded schools and highways and crime and punishment. This is not merely Brogan's devil hunt of past decades; this is the destructive withdrawal of children from the playground which persists in being different, in every way, from a playground of their illusions.

"For the Reactionary Irresponsibles have no heroes at all, though some superficial observers may say otherwise. For example, the leader of the traditional Right in this country, Senator Barry Goldwater, is not their leader. On the contrary, Goldwater is himself the recipient of some of their mail of denunciation. However wrongheaded he may be, he is a decent and responsible politician. Since they had already begun attacking such a politician as Richard M. Nixon as intolerably 'soft' on communism, welfarism, foreign aid, spending, or whatever, one can say with reasonable certainty that Goldwater's head will be next on their block.

"So, just as the responsible Liberals have long suffered the curse of involuntary association with the Precious Irresponsibles, the responsible ultra-Conservatives such as Goldwater now fall under the course of involuntary association with the Reactionary Irresponsibles. Labels are tiresome things; but they do have some meaning. At present there are six main political divisions involving the terms 'Liberal' and 'Conservative.' There is Conservatism in the true and classic sense, as typified by the late Senator Robert Taft. There is ultra-Conservatism in the acceptable if myopic sense, as typified by Goldwater. And there are the Reactionary Irresponsibles. At the other end of the spectrum there is responsible Liberalism, as typified by people like Kennedy and Hubert Humphrey and Dean Rusk. There is acceptable if woolly Liberalism, as typified by such as Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. And there are the Precious Irresponsibles, who are either crypto-Communists or unwittingly in communism's service.

The role of responsible Conservatism

"The New Rightwingism offers the greatest peril to Conservatism itself if only because Conservatism has here the most to lose. It is Conservatism's historic role to defend ordered liberty; and the New Rightwingism menaces that most of all. Moreover, in my view at least, it is Conservatism's historic and unique obligation to defend that most vital requisite to ordered liberty, the maintenance of public and private responsibility. This is so, as I see it, because Liberalism, even the decent Liberalism of which I have spoken, does not always apprehend the deep meaning of responsibility, perhaps because of its preoccupation with another good but not synonymous concept called reform.

"The inside story of the breaking of Joseph R. McCarthy illustrated that point. It was Conservatism that condemmed McCarthy at last, in the Senate and then in the country. The well-meant exertions of Liberalism in the end did more harm than good. For in their understandable zeal, the Liberals wanted to convict McCarthy in the Senate without a hearing. The Conservatives were only barely able to avoid this unfair action; instead they caused the appointment of a select committee which, in full due process, brought about the censure.

"I have not idly selected the epithet 'Irresponsibles' for the new Reactionary Irresponsibles—nor for the Precious Irresponsibles, either. I consider it an accusation of rare gravity, which in the most precise way describes their mortal offense against our political system. The single greatest domestic curse of our times is precisely this—irresponsibility. It is this which we need to fear more than subversion and treason.

"For irresponsibility runs amok with a vague and terrible strength, terrible because it cannot be identified and mastered. It is not manifested always in such shabby Bircher talk as suggesting that Dwight Eisenhower didn't really wish to defeat communism. It is sometimes manifested in guilt-by-association techniques from the Left as well as the Right. There is, for illustration, the notion spread by some in recent months that the whole of the military establishment, the whole of the 'military mind,' ought to be held suspect because some officers held or spread Right-wing political views. Whoever irresponsibly contributes, in such an hour as this, to an unfair and generalized attack on the military services is completing a dreadful act of discredit which the New Rightwingism itself began—by putting its unwelcome embrace upon those services." THE COMMITTEE FOR THE MONROE DOCTRINE
79 Madison Avenue
New York 16, New York

EMERGENCY APPEAL 31 October 1962

FROM: Edward V. Rickenbacker; Admiral Ben Moreell; Charles Edison; William F. Buckley, Jr.; James Burnham

RE: Preservation of the Monroe Doctrine

At 8 a.m. this morning, we met in emergency session to undertake the organization of The Committee for the Monroe Doctrine and to draft the attached Statement which sets forth our views and expresses our deep concern over the dangerous concessions offered by President Kennedy to Premier Khrushchev regarding Cuba.

The Administration's propaganda machine is working overtime to present the so-called Cuba settlement as a great Kennedy victory and a stunning Communist defeat. In fact, the exact reverse is true. Khrushchev is now firmly entrenched in Cuba and Communism on that island is guaranteed against attack from any quarter by the President of the United States. We believe it is imperative to register a public protest—and quickly—or we will lose the ball game by default.

We are telegraphing our Statement to hundreds of candidates for Federal office requesting their endorsement. We plan to release the Statement and its endorsers to the press immediately.

We hope you will see fit to join with us in endorsing our Statement and becoming a charter member of The Committee for the Monroe Doctrine by writing or wiring us your acceptance. We call on you to do your utmost to publicize this effort in every way possible. Further, we ask you to immediately approach all candidates running for Federal office in your district and state to take a stand on this issue by endorsing the enclosed Statement.

If we are to proceed with this undertaking, we must have funds in hand. We call on you to wire or air-mail us your maximum financial pledge and/or contribution at once so that we may effectively plan just how far we can go in the critical days before November 6.

Time is truly of the essence. This is an historic moment and the Nation is in critical danger. We hope you will join with us in what we consider an enterprise of transcendent urgency.

Please make your check payable to The Committee for the Monroe Doctrine and mail it to the above address.

STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE FOR THE MONROE DOCTRINE

1. President Kennedy assured the United States on April 18, 1961, that at the very least our government would not tolerate the arming of Cuba with offensive weapons.

2. We never doubted the President would be true to his word, and endorse his recent ultimatum to the Soviet Union insofar as it faced up to the problem of Cuba's offensive military potential. However,

3. The President has apparently guaranteed the Soviet Union that in return for dismantling the missile bases the United States will guarantee that Cuba will not be invaded.

4. But the Monroe Doctrine declares that the United States will not permit the imposition by any foreign power of its "system" in any nation in the Western Hemisphere.

5. Therefore, the Presidential guarantee would appear to amount to a guarantee that Cuba will, without forcible interference by the United States, be permitted to remain as a Communist colony and therefore as a base for the continued political and psychological subversion of other nations in this hemisphere: i.e., that Khrushchev's control over Cuba, including an arsenal of tanks, MIG fighters and bombers, radar anti-aircraft batteries, and a "fishing fleet" in Havana harbor—is underwritten in effect by the President of the United States.

6. This renunciation of the Monroe Doctrine—the key defensive doctrine of this nation—should not be sanctioned without a Congressional debate.

7. WE THEREFORE CALL on all members of Congress and all persons running for Congress to pledge to consider the President's guarantee as given to Chairman Khrushchev on Sunday, October 28, immediately upon the convocation of the 88th Congress in January, 1963. And we call upon the members of that Congress there to RESOLVE:

8. That the maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine continues to be an essential plank of American foreign policy.

Freedom Under Fire

by WILLIAM BOTWRIGHT

Radical Rights

THE JOB I took last November with the Contra Costa Times was my first one as editor. The Times is a flourishing tri-weekly in the pleasant bedroom town of Walnut Creek, just east of Oakland, California. I was enjoying my new role, and thought I might stay.

But I had not counted on Dr. Drummond J. McCunn, superintendent of the Contra Costa Junior College District, which operates two campuses supported by a county tax levy and governed by a locally-elected board. Shortly after I arrived in Walnut Creek, McCunn launched an energetic assault upon what he perceived to be the Communist conspiracy that eventually cost me my new job, and ultimately cost him his.

McCunn's concern about subversion first came to public attention during a state conference of college superintendents in San Francisco, where he warned that red-blooded Americanism had been "washed out" of textbooks and that many were now "slanted toward socialism." As evidence, he pointed out that the more truculent sayings of Patrick Henry and Nathan Hale had been inexcusably excised.

McCunn, a former physical education instructor, reported he had been researching for years on collectivist "brainwashing" of American youth. Asked for an example, he cited a school songbook standard which begins "Swing the shining sickle. . . ."

"You drip, drip through the hammer and sickle—the words of Lenin," he said by way of expanding upon the devilish subtlety of it all.

A reporter familiar with the song observed it was no more than an innocent bucolic hymn to the American Thanksgiving, written twenty years before the Russian Revolution when the sickle was used, in Kansas as in the Ukraine, to cut grain. This did not faze McCunn. It just shows, he said, how long the collectivists have been up to their sinister stratagems.

The character of McCunn's scholarship was best disclosed in a list of sources appended to the text of his speech. It was a who's who of the lunatic fringe in education—John T. Flynn, E. Merrill Root, Anthony Bouscaren, Veritas, America's Future, the Daughters of the American Revolution. Also listed were a pamphlet by veteran anti-Semite Merwin K. Hart and a "speech on psychopolitics by Lavrenti Beria" fabricated by Kenneth Goff, a lieutenant of Gerald L. K. Smith.

It was McCunn's embrace of the John Birch Society, however, that made headlines throughout California. He said the Society was putting up a gallant fight against the Communist menace.

I editorially challenged McCunn and the Birch approach to Communism, but then dismissed the matter until one of my reporters turned in a rousing account of a meeting of the board of governors of McCunn's college district. Teachers and citizens had demanded that board members divorce themselves from McCunn's approval of Birchism. (Only William Kretzmer, the board chairman, did.) There were highly-charged ideological wrangles between a delegation of labor union spokesmen and a detachment of Birchers.

Almost lost in the shouting were two disturbing revelations:

The first was that McCunn had been hunting closer to home. He had told a Richmond newspaper that two texts and some teachers in his own district were pumping socialist notions into students contrary to California law. But he would not say which texts or what teachers.

The second was that seventy per cent of his outraged faculty had voted that he be fired.

I then wrote in an editorial that public, unsupported charges of subversion were not only unprofessional but pure McCarthyism. I also observed that the crushing faculty censure demonstrated clearly that something in the administration of the college district was seriously wrong.

When I covered the next college board meeting, I learned that to cry "Red" is still a reliable device for making your way in the Golden West. McCunn demanded that newly-selected texts be sifted once again for subversive content. He had never before mentioned his misgivings about textbooks to the board. Perhaps in fear of being thought "soft on Communism," three board members meekly voted acquiescence over chairman Kretzmer's protest.

A revealing incident occurred then. An elderly woman stepped up to denounce as degenerate The Shape of English, a textbook by faculty member Richard Worthen, used for years at the Concord junior college campus. A John Birch Society member moved through the audience handing out copies of the book. Kretzmer said he would tolerate no such attacks without advance notice, and silenced the critic. A Birch member rose angrily and told Kretzmer to "shut up." Birchers and labor union spokesmen shouted at each other.

When I called Worthen following the meeting, he charged that McCunn had conspired with a pressure group to ambush the board with a surprise attack on his book, a recent edition of which contains a comment by a state official critical of the "pathetic" Birchers. It made a good story, and a scoop, for the Times.

A few days later McCunn spoke to 700 students at one of the two junior college campuses. I reported in the Times that he had embraced the Birchers again: McCunn had promoted the Fred Schwarz anti-Communist crusade, then playing in Oakland; he had handed out Merwin K. Hart's nonsense that the "One Worlders" were scheming to station Irish Catholic troops in California; he had refused to say what he thought of Adolph Hitler. In an editorial entitled "McCunn Shows his True Colors" I called him a peddler of extremism of the most pernicious kind.

A storm of letters and telephone calls, obviously organized, broke upon the Times. Some said I was soft on Communism and others bluntly called me a Communist.

I ignored it all and kept digging into the Worthen book affair. A student had asked McCunn at the meeting if he had bought the ninety copies of The Shape of English passed out during the attack at the college board meeting. McCunn denied that he had. I was able, however, to turn up a sales slip from the college bookstore, dated the day before the affair. It listed ninety copies of The Shape of English and was signed by Drummond J. McCunn.

Meanwhile, telephone calls from advertisers started pouring into the newspaper office. Customers, the advertisers reported in dismay, had been threatening to boycott them because they advertised in a paper assailing McCunn. Jim Hughes, the newspaper's manager, became alarmed. When he read the text of my editorial, written for that day's edition, stating that the Times would not be bullied into silence, he telephoned the publisher, Dean Lesher, who lives in another town. On the basis of Hughes' description of the editorial, Lesher killed it.

I did not argue then, but when Hughes strode into the office just before deadline and killed my exclusive story about the sales slip, I resigned immediately in protest against clear suppression of news.

Hearing of the incident, the San Francisco Chronicle front-paged my resignation and the sales-slip story. Scores of letters poured into the Times, most of them supporting my position. The Times backed down sheepishly, and ran not only the suppressed news story but the editorial as well—over my signature.

Even though my resignation stood, I stayed in Walnut Creek for a couple of weeks before going on to another job. First, I wanted to nail down the facts in the McCunn case. I had observed that they were liable to be brushed aside as subversive propaganda if they were unfavorable to McCunn. So I put together a brief of minutes, transcripts, and photostats which told without adjectives just what McCunn had said and done. This brief was reproduced in quantity and it served as an anchor for a program to counter McCunn and his supporters.

Meanwhile, the junior college teachers had united against McCunn for the first time in the thirteen years of his tenure. They hired a lawyer and demanded an investigation. There was such a community uproar that the college district board had no choice but to consent. The body which took on the probe was the Personnel Standards Commission of the California Teachers Association, made up of administrators, teachers, and board members, whose role it is to guard against abuse of the profession.

Achieving an investigation was half the battle. There remained the malleable stuff of public opinion, and the McCunn faction had been hammering expertly upon it. Members of Birch Society chapters and other backers of extremist causes formed a pressure group, seemingly well-financed, called the Parents and Taxpayers for Better Education. This group championed McCunn with briefs and delegations to the college board, letters and advertisements in newspapers, telephone campaigns, outside "expert" speakers, reprints, and smear sheets. McCunn's supporters steadfastly maintained the issue was one of loyalty. The choice, one of them declared, was "between this great, patriotic American, Drummond McCunn, and a bunch of leftist teachers of questionable backgrounds."

The line their propaganda took was that the investigating panel was a kangaroo court rigged by the profession's entrenched "progressives" and "collectivists" to pillory a man courageous enough to disagree with them. We were fearful that the McCunn partisans might intimidate the college board into sweeping the investigating panel's report out of sight. This was not an unreasonable view, because it had happened before. It is a measure of McCunn's influence that two earlier investigation reports highly critical of him, one in 1959 and another in 1961, had been quietly shelved.

This danger made it clear that responsible citizens would have to take action to prevent such an event from occurring again. I suggested to a few people that we organize for action. The response was revealing. From all parts of the county came people who were troubled and angry about what was happening to their junior colleges. They included a banker, a chemist, educators, clergymen, lawyers, Republicans and Democrats, conservatives and liberals.

A committee was formed called the Friends of the Junior Colleges. With housewife Dorothy Powell as gadfly, the Friends served notice they would tolerate no tampering with facts and no smothering of findings. They worked effectively to inform the public of what had been happening in the colleges.

The Teachers Association investigating panel convened without delay. McCunn spurned repeated invitations to testify. Some 130 other witnesses—teachers, administrators, and laymen—told what they knew.

The McCunn faction worked overtime during the weeks between the closing of the hearings and the investigating panel's report. In one gambit, McCunn told newspaper reporters the district was in danger of losing a million dollars in state grants because the curriculum did not meet state requirements in the teaching of American ideals. College board chairman Kretzmer checked with state authorities and found this purported danger was an invention; there had been no suggestion of withholding state funds. He rebuked McCunn at the next meeting of the college board. A band of McCunn partisans, nevertheless, demanded the floor for an "expert analysis" of subversive elements in the curriculum. The "experts" included a number of veteran far Rightists from nearby Oakland and San Francisco.

The college board refused to be intimidated. The McCunn group trooped out, announcing a rival meeting in a building nearby. Students who went along to question the McCunn supporters' "analyses" were shouted down, pushed into chairs, and even spat upon.

In early May, the investigating panel's report was released to the college board and to the press. The report destroyed what was left of the McCunn cause. The San Francisco Chronicle termed it "one of the most scathing criticisms ever made of an educator." The report largely ignored McCunn's Birch statements on the grounds that he could say whatever he pleased. But in what he had done the report found enough to brand him incompetent, dictatorial, boorish, Machiavellian, and ignorant.

"Where the superintendent should be the chief spokesman and leader of public education," the report stated, "he has become its chief critic and focus of discord," creating a condition "deplorable, disastrous, and beyond all hope of being restored to an acceptable level."

The report reviewed a dozen years of turmoil and an astonishing array of charges: McCunn had been guilty of changing students' grades, countermanding administrators (thirty-four had resigned in twelve years), running secret "security checks" on teachers, using faculty "informers and fomentors of discord," publicly humiliating employes, expressing racial and religious prejudice, handing out propaganda in the schools, and using college district postage for anti-Communist crusade promotion. How could all this have gone on for so long? Obviously, the report said, McCunn had deftly insulated and "courted" a college board "grossly remiss in its responsibilities."

The report demanded McCunn's resignation. He refused to resign. The college board then voted four to one to fire him.

The uproar has subsided now. The colleges are now functioning without McCunn, and the teachers are free to return to the real problems of education. Contra Costa County rallied in time to save its junior colleges.

But this upheaval is just one of scores that have broken out across the land. In many school districts bewildered citizens have recovered from initial disarray only to find the battle lost, books banished, and teachers silenced. School boards, in the absence of strong and timely public backing, frequently capitulate to extremist pressures mantled in aggressive anti-Communism.

Nor can the press always be counted upon to resist. News media in a distressing number of cases have proven incompetent, indifferent, cowardly, or shamelessly irresponsible.

Teachers, board members, Parent Teacher Associations, and citizens would do well to appraise themselves in detail of the purposes, organization, strategy, and tactics of extremism on the Right. The John Birch Society and numerous similar organizations have mobilized their members and sympathizers into disciplined guerrilla units using "dirty tactics" unabashedly borrowed by Robert Welch from the Communists and the Fascists. Every school system must be on the alert to such attacks, and repel them, for the Right has borrowed goals as well as tactics from the totalitarians they purport to fight.

There is a glowing light in true education, and in democracy itself, which the adherents to the Right cannot endure. It is something frequently on their lips, but rarely in their hearts.

It is freedom.

cans for Democratic Action—now refuse to register under the act because they say influencing legislation is not their "principal purpose."

Chief Justice of the United States Earl Warren made it clear in explaining the Court's ruling that the court did not mean to kill the effectiveness of the law. In fact, he said that the ability of elected representatives to "properly evaluate... pressures" was important to a "full realization of the American ideal of government." But the Court's ruling did kill the act as an effective instrument. Today the Registration of Lobbying Act is a farce. It provides little information, and even that is misleading and inaccurate.

Organizations and individuals register only voluntarily. If a notorious lobbyist fails to register no one is assigned to tell him he must. Some 6,000 have registered, but the total number of lobbyists probably is at least twice that number. Organizations which do register decide for themselves what expenses they are going to list, and there is no one to challenge them.

The expenses of the American Medical Association in lobbying against the hospital care for the aged program have been estimated on the floor of the House at more than $7,000,000. The AMA's reported lobbying expenses have been less than $200,000. One of the AMA's lobbyists listed his expenses for "travel, food, lodging and entertainment" for a three-month period during the height of the campaign at fifty cents.

The reports on file under this toothless act give no indication at all of the scope or nature of the massive lobbying campaigns conducted in 1962 by the U.S. Savings and Loan League against withholding or of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association campaign against the drug bill.

These are only the most obvious shortcomings of the act. The law does not even pretend to cover lobbying among executive agencies where, in an age of big government, many key decisions are made. Most of the nation's big defense contractors, for example, who maintain plush Washington offices in part to lobby for defense contracts, do not bother to register under the act. They do not work primarily with Congress, but rather rove the corridors of the Pentagon. Yet this is where the big money goes today. Dr. Frances Kelsey reported dozens of attempts by drug manufacturers to influence her executive-branch decisions on thalidomide. These activities are not covered under the act.

The American Telephone and Telegraph Company was granted a virtual monopoly in space communications by the Administration and Congress, a deal on which it will make millions. Yet AT&T solemnly insists that it did no lobbying to obtain that legislation. One would have to be naive indeed to accept that as fact, yet no citizen or member of Congress can readily prove what AT&T did.

Perhaps the most disturbing aspect of the lobbying picture is the fact that an act is on the books, and stories regularly emanate from Washington identifying so-called big lobby spenders, as they are listed in existing records. This creates the impression that lobbying is regulated and that relatively accurate reports are made, when in reality lobbying is almost completely unregulated and the reports made are a joke.

In a day when each great American political party seeks to follow a "middle road" in politics, each party vies for support from great commercial and business interests. Neither wants to offend them. Politicians of each party find it convenient to ignore the weakness of the lobbying law—and can have some confidence that those of the opposite party are equally willing to ignore it.

The loser is the citizen, for he is rendered helpless in his efforts to protect himself and further the public interest against the well-organized, free-wheeling, big-spending lobbyists.

Bad Rights Dem

The Devil and Dean Manion

by BURTON MOORE

AT FIRST the Dean's voice conveys warmth and authority as it comes over the radio into more than a million American homes each Sunday night. He sounds the very model of an educator and jurist, gravely concerned with the fate of the republic, with freedom in the American tradition. Then the voice sharpens with urgency as it intones its ominous warnings: freedom is betrayed, liberty is compromised, this nation is ravished by greed, conspiracy, and malice. A moment later, politics becomes theology, and we hear how the Communists muster the legions hostile to God, while Lucifer, the root cause of all the trouble, stalks the land unchallenged.

This astonishing mixture of extreme Right doctrine and fundamentalist theology is broadcast weekly by Clarence E. Manion over more than 250 radio stations across the land. A leading citizen of South Bend, Indiana, Mr. Manion is a banker, lawyer, lecturer, John Birch Society councilor, and, most important, for prestige purposes, a former dean of the Law School of Notre Dame University. He speaks (or introduces a Rightist guest) every week on the Manion Forum, a radio program now in its eighth year. Behind the scenes of the Manion Forum is a dingy studio on Chicago's near north side, a staff of free-lance copywriters, a highly mechanized mailing operation in South Bend, and the hopes and cash support of many American businessmen.

Ultimately, it is the businessmen who are duped the most. The Manion Forum now costs more than $10,000 a week. To raise this formidable sum, letters of solicitation pour out of South Bend at a rate of 100,000 a week. Usually they bear such earthy salutations as, "DEAR FELLOW-AMERICAN ON HOT SEAT OF WORRY." Occasionally, in a comedy vein, a letter begins: "DEAR FELLOW-AMERICAN WHO DOESN'T KNOW WHERE THE BODY IS BURIED." Then follows a shameless defamation of whatever groups or agencies Mr. Manion feels might be worrying businessmen at the time. In the spring, the income tax is a favorite topic. In June, the Dean worries about liberal influences on college graduates. In the fall, he laments that many businessmen must answer long and complicated government questionnaires.

The Dean's special style favors lurid adjectives: "the Marxist income tax," "the silk-gloved hand of the grasping bureaucracy," "the poisonous breath of campus liberalism," "creeping Welfare-State socialists," and other purple phrases. The hot breath of the Kremlin blows across the businessman's desk as he is urged to invest in a counterattack. In the last paragraph comes the hook: "Please make check payable to Mr. Charles H. Beutter, St. Joseph Bank and Trust Company, South Bend, Indiana."

In the early days of the Forum any small contribution was welcome. When it developed that too many businessmen were buying only five dollars worth of Dean Manion's brand of insurance, the letters began to ask for bigger money. "Corporate support normally ranges from $100 to $5,000," the letters now say. Whenever possible, Manion uses the letterheads and signatures of his corporate friends. A businessman who sells to corporate backers of the Dean, and who receives an appeal of this sort, is hardly able to refuse. The pressure for contributions is so naked and so inescapable that the Chicago office of the Internal Revenue Service now rules that such contributions by suppliers are reasonable and legitimate "sales expenses" and therefore deductible.

The Forum's yearly receipts are not known, but its expenses (including the endless and costly task of raising money) cannot run less than $600,000 a year by the most conservative estimate. They may run as high as a million dollars, but, happily for the Dean, among the Forum's supporters are some sizable firms, including Burny Brothers, a large Chicago bakery; the General Finance Corporation; Thomas McDonald & Company, a Chicago investment firm; Van Camp Hardware & Iron Company, Indianapolis, Indiana; Technicolor, Inc., in California; and the Kohler Company of Wisconsin, manufacturer of plumbing fixtures, which also provides the services of its president, Herbert V. Kohler, for an occasional guest appearance on the Forum.

Sometimes the Dean sounds like the Reverend Billy James Hargis, or Robert H. W. Welch, the founder of the John Birch Society, or any other Super-Rightist. But there are three major differences between Manion and these other leaders which may have significant consequences if the extreme Right gains more political power.

First, Dean Manion is a reputable and important figure in Indiana politics and education. He began to teach history and government at Notre Dame in 1919, and then trained nearly a generation of young lawyers as Dean of the Law School from 1941 to 1952. The Dean plumped for both America First, the pre-World War II anti-interventionist movement, and the so-called Bricker Amendment, a constitutional amendment proposed by the late conservative Republican Senator John Bricker of Ohio which was designed to limit severely executive power in foreign affairs. In 1956 he split with the "International Socialists" in the Republican Party and tried to organize enough Indiana delegates to nominate Senator Robert A. Taft for President. He served briefly on one of the numerous commissions of the Eisenhower Administration and on the Indiana State Board of Education. Today Manion is a banker, something of a conservative authority on constitutional law, and a widely sought lecturer. He is also one of the twenty-eight national councilors of the John Birch Society.

Secondly, the objectives of the Manion Forum are deeply rooted in Midwestern conservatism, in a traditional plea for "small government." The Dean considers big Federal government useful only if it is "controlled, harnessed, checked, balanced, and restrained." Accordingly, any real or fancied encroachment on states' rights infuriates him. He would stop this "creeping bureaucracy," just as many other Midwestern politicians would, by strict enforcement of the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution, the "states' rights" section of the Bill of Rights. Strictly and literally applied in the Manion spirit, the Amendment would prohibit such follies as American participation in the International Covenant on Human Rights, a document which the Dean assures us is "a vital part of a well-financed, diabolically-determined drive to sink our singular constitutional system in a mad merger with Old World despotism."

Dean Manion makes other familiar Rightist demands, including immediate repeal of the Federal income tax and an immediate and clear-cut victory in the Cold War. How the latter can be achieved without Federal money, or without a thermonuclear holocaust, is never explained. He is quite clear, however, concerning action against the "labor bosses." Anti-trust action, anti-monopoly laws, and a flat prohibition of industry-wide bargaining will curb labor, the Dean assures us. His rationale is a simple exercise in theology and Manion logic: like the sex motive, God created the profit motive for man's happiness. It is plain to any man in business that profits are endangered by the "labor bosses." Therefore, runs the inference, labor violates the divine plan.

The Manion Forum also is pledged to the death of the United Nations, which is not only soft-headed and infiltrated by Communists, but also interferes with certain constitutional rights. In his statement of aims and program, the Dean phrases his objection in a manner calculated to please both worried businessmen and conservative constitutional lawyers: "The power to make tariffs and foreign trade regulations is exercised by international bodies in defiance of the Constitution."

Broadcast from a region of sub-surface isolationism, the Dean's language conforms to what many want to hear. It is traditional, as sociologist Daniel Bell has pointed out, for the Midwest to look for powerful devils in international affairs. Because foreign policy is frequently a proper subject for moral discourse and Christian absolutes, the Dean's outcries of betrayal, conspiracy, subversion, and anti-Godism are in tune with the fiery cliches of Indiana politics. He is much less interested in the handiwork of Adlai Stevenson than in the handiwork of the true enemy of the people: Lucifer, who has taken earthly shape as Communism and big government. "The tragedy now is that Lucifer is winning his race against Christianity," the Dean told his radio audience on one occasion. "This is an all-out struggle with Hell."

With the aid of such demonology, the diverse hues of international affairs are woven into patterns of stark black-and-white, or rather, red-and-white. Again and again, Mr. Manion reminds his radio listeners and his lecture audiences that Communism is materialism, which is activated atheism, which is Lucifer. The formula works just as well in reverse, and is used to diagnose and solve all sorts of problems. In the Congo, we must remember that Moise Tshombe is a second-generation Christian; hence, he is on our side and we should be on his. As for Angola, we must remember that it is, after all, a part of Christian Portugal, and, therefore, is in godly hands. This view of politics as a series of simple moral and chauvinistic choices pervades Manion's entire philosophy.

The third and most significant difference between the Manion Forum and its competitors on the Radical Right is that the Forum is directed with a high degree of professional skill. In charge of all communications is a former film salesman, Emmett Mellenthin, who now heads Creative Productions, Inc., of Chicago. "We think of the Forum as sort of Republican and patriotic," says Mr. Mellenthin. His aides in Chicago are Leo Cummins and Tom Sitkiewicz, both television and film producers recently employed on two of his clients' television shows, "Playboy Penthouse" and "International Cafe." How a moderate degree of success with "girlie shows" qualifies their producers as experts on international affairs, defies explanation. These three men produce all of the radio shows, press kits, brochures, letters of solicitation, and newspaper publicity used by Dean Manion and the Forum. Their admiration for the Dean is unbounded. "You got to admit the Dean's a genius," says Mr. Mellenthin solemnly, in a tone one might reserve for describing Thomas Jefferson. "He just sits down there in South Bend and thinks of all these things by himself. You also got to admit he's got a good thing going."

It is a good thing the Dean has going. It is good enough to permit Mr. Mellenthin to spend probably $500,000 annually for radio time and production costs. But Mr. Mellenthin has his problems. Dean Manion's lurid Rightism is not popular among communications people in Chicago, a group of citizens concerned with projecting a "wholesome public image" of their industry, and the appearance, at least, of political impartiality. As a consequence, Mr. Mellenthin has not been able to buy time for the Forum on any Chicago radio station. His firm also tries to keep its other clients (mostly advertising agencies) unaware of Creative Productions' services to an extreme Right organization. The most serious of Mr. Mellenthin's problems is that his more temperate approach has failed to bring in money so readily and rapidly as during the Forum's earlier hard-sell era.

The Manion Forum is usually indifferent to any response from its listeners except money. Occasional newspaper editorials appear in smaller papers applauding the Dean's crusade, and a small but steady flow of letters, nearly all congratulatory, reaches South Bend. Most of this feedback is ignored at the present time because the clerical staff is small and can scarcely handle the vastly more important out-going appeals for the money that keeps the Forum on the air.

No effort is made directly to influence Congressional action unless money or useful mailing lists can be secured as a result. The real test of Mellenthin's performance is not his publicity yardage in small newspapers, although that helps, but the amount of money deposited to the Forum's account.

Dean Clarence Manion is sixty-six years of age, white-haired, modest, and unquestionably sincere. Much of the Forum's appeal can be attributed to his attractive personality. As far as money is concerned, Mr. Manion appears to gain nothing from the Forum. Every available dollar is put to work by Emmett Mellenthin for more publicity, more letters of solicitation, and more radio time. The Dean's favorite word for his Forum is "crusade," and without question he believes it is precisely that. It is a "crusade against conspiracy," a theatrical term in keeping with harangues delivered every week on the Forum.

Justus in The Minneapolis Star

Quick, Somebody—A Tranquilizer!

The talks generally begin with a calculated note of nostalgia for the dreamy Eden-like republic conceived by demi-gods, and built by a yeomanry of rude but talented citizens who understood the Constitution far better than anyone since. In glowing words, the Dean describes the Great Ones, the Fathers of 1776. Then he asks his radio audience to contrast this ideal with today's reality of fear, insecurity, Communists, betrayal, perversion, and income taxes. "Ever since then," says the Dean, "we have been prodigally spending the principles coined on that bright July day when America was born." The "spenders" are the viciously immoral friends of "big government" who do not understand that the Constitution was designed to "cage and confine" government.

Manion approvingly quotes the decision of President Grover Cleveland to veto a Congressional appropriation for drought relief in 1889. Since then, "passing time has calloused the constitutional conscience of both Presidents and legislators." Increasingly, the Dean tells us, government was expected to cure human weakness. Then came the New Dealers and the Communists, and with them the Dean sees the beginning of the end.

Once the Dean establishes the "historical background," he leads his rapt businessmen and other listeners straight into the simple, easy moral absolutes in which he excels. As he sees it, big government, constitutional excesses, the Communists, the welfare-staters, socialistic spenders, and the internationalist Left-wing educational cabals are all in league with Satan. "Wherever Christ's Gospel could sow love," asserts Manion, "Communism entered to harvest hate. Wherever Christianity exalted the spirit of Man, Communism sneaked in to murder the spirit with materialism. Both Communism and Christianity are supernatural forces. One is from Heaven, the other from Hell, and the war of one upon the other is eternal."

Unhappily, the Dean's personal war is against not only the Devil, but against certain concrete realities of the modern world. He is still persuaded that we have a take-it-or-leave-it choice on international cooperation, on the reality of nuclear war, on taxation, on social welfare, on education, even on whether or not the Federal government can make treaties with other governments.

He pretends that the Forum is non-partisan, but his guest "experts," who appear frequently, offer only familiar and poisonous testimonies of the extreme Right: Herbert Philbrick, on the nature of Communism; Herbert V. Kohler, on labor relations; Captain Eddie Rickenbacker, on the responsibilities of business enterprise; T. Coleman Andrews, on the theory of the income tax; and Spruille Braden, on responsibility in foreign affairs.

Estimates vary on the size of the Manion radio audience. Most of the radio stations which carry the Forum are small, but the Dean buys good time—early Sunday evening if possible. His approach to the inroads of Lucifer in the modern state has probably won him the better-educated (and wealthier) segment of Rightist opinion, among whom the Dean's reputation as an educator and constitutional lawyer lends weight to his ultra-Rightist doctrine.

Clarence Manion is now the most respectable leader of the extreme Right. It may be that some of his glamor as a former law school dean is wearing off after ten years of Rightist activity, but he is still a heavyweight compared with such Rightist leaders as the Reverend Billy James Hargis and Robert Welch. The Manion Forum has woven together a combination of respectability and public relations that skillfully exploits the fears and anxieties of the most influential segment of the far Right. Of all the extreme Right movements, Dean Manion's is the one that appears to be the most effective in hammering at our hopes for peace among nations and our traditions of freedom, however imperfectly realized, here at home.

The Turning Wheel of India's Foreign Policy

by ANAND MOHAN

When Communist China attacked India, the wheel of Indian foreign policy might well be said to have turned full circle. There was the cleansing confession of Prime Minister Nehru that his nation had been "out of touch with reality." There was his belated acknowledgement: "We have suffered a severe shock. We were living in an artificial atmosphere of our own creation and we have been shocked out of it—all of us, the government and the people."

It is not enough for the American people to know that Mr. Nehru went wrong; it is necessary for them to know exactly to what extent, where, and how he went wrong. Only then can the United States, which has a great stake in the Indian subcontinent, be able to formulate South Asian policies that are sound in their essentials.

To what extent did events show India's foreign policy to be unsound? While rushing generously to assist India against Chinese aggression, both President Kennedy and his Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, Averell Harriman, have said that they did not expect India to change her policy of non-alignment as a precondition to receiving military aid. Their unstated assumption here is that the core of Indian foreign policy is sound. In this assumption they are altogether right.

Stripped of all its sentimentality and moralistic overtones, Mr. Nehru's foreign policy was designed, as it should be, to serve India's national interest. Here was an underdeveloped country of 400 million underfed, underclothed people, fired by the frenzy of freedom in the evening glow of World War II, born to independence in the dawn of their country's partition, and forced to wade through rivers of blood let loose at the high noon of insensate religious passions.

Such a country was being shepherded by a government whose annual budget was less than that of New York City. There was no way the government could immunize the people to the new epidemic of rising expectations. To cater to their multitudinous needs in normal times would have been impossible for the most seasoned of governments. For an infant government to do so at an abnormal time when law and order had become casualties, when thousands of refugees had to be resettled, and a war-affected economy rehabilitated, was nothing short of a nightmarish experience.

India's foreign policy was formulated in this context. It was determined by the demands of the time and the situation. Her foreign policy was merely a reflection of the magnitude and complexity of her domestic tasks. All foreign commitments were forbidden by commitments at home. To that extent, India's foreign policy of non-alignment and non-involvement was the product of realism and expediency (in the best sense of the term). To the extent, also, that rational foreign policy is largely a matter of correlating ends with means, India's policy was as sound as the policy of avoiding entangling alli-

As a citizen, it is your duty to learn more about WOMEN FOR CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT. Come to the New National Guard Armory in Selma, Friday morning April 19th at 10:30 sharp, and hear Mrs. Mary Cain Editor of the Summit Sun and other informed speakers. They will tell you why women must come to the rescue of our nation and how they can do it.

WOMEN FOR CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT was founded in Jackson Miss. by almost 2000 indignant women meeting spontaneously after the Federal Government had violated numerous provisions of our Constitution of the United States. Women came from seven states to this meeting on October 30th, 1962.

On January 17th, 1963 1100 women met and organized with thirteen states represented. Several were northern states. They are just as alarmed as those in the southern states because their constitutional rights are being violated too.

WOMEN FOR CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT is conservative. It is not politically affiliated with any party and is not denominational. It is opposed to liberals of both parties. Members of this organization vote for the man and not the party! Our organization is opposed to communism. We believe in a return to God and morality in the affairs and functions of America, regardless of the beliefs of other nations. We ask the guidance and understanding of God, our Father, in all we do.

Need to support local govt.

To date, over 66 tons of AIM tools for freedom have been shipped from Boston to 24 schools in 11 countries—Colombia, Costa Rica, India, Jordan, Kenya, South Korea, West Pakistan, Philippines, Taiwan, Tunisia, and Venezuela—and much more machinery and equipment is awaiting shipment, with still more continually being donated and assigned for ultimate delivery to schools overseas. The need is great, because over 350 vocational schools in 26 underdeveloped countries of the free world are seeking tools for freedom assistance.

Oversea shipping arrangements have been made by such other charitable, nonprofit organizations as CARE, Catholic Relief Services, American-Korean Foundation, Church World Service, and National Council of the YMCA's. Recently, the U.S. Navy, through its own people-to-people program, Project Handclasp, undertook the task of transporting more than five tons of AIM tools for freedom to India.

Under the AIM tools for freedom program, not only are Massachusetts manufacturers—and some in other States—contributing machinery and equipment, but individuals and nonmanufacturing concerns also donate such services as crating, trucking, use of forklifts, storage space, etc. In recognition of participation in the program, AIM presents Tools for Freedom Awards to all who assist, including those who make monetary contributions to help finance the project.

Convinced that it is a hopeful approach which serves both the economic and philosophical struggles for freedom, while being of broad public relations value for both the contributor and the U.S. image abroad, the Associated Industries of Massachusetts began its tools for freedom program as the result of a pilot effort by what was known as the Technico Foundation in the Worcester-Providence area. Members of the AIM board of directors who participated in that pilot program were instrumental in the Bay State manufacturers' association establishing tools for freedom. They serve on the program's steering committee, headed by Philip M. Morgan, president of the Morgan Construction Co., Worcester.

The newer national tools for freedom organization has as its president Mansfield D. Sprague, vice president, American Machine & Foundry Co., and former Massachusetts Gov. Christian A. Herter, the President's Special Representative for Trade Negotiations, is one of the members of the board of trustees.

These Are the Guilty

OF

HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 30, 1963

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, on February 12, 1963, Hon. Carleton Putnam addressed a Lincoln's Birthday dinner at the Willard Hotel in Washington. Mr. Putnam is the author of "Race and Reason," a current best seller, which deals with race relations from an objective viewpoint.

Mr. Putnam's brilliant Lincoln Day address is of such significance that I feel it worthy of being included here as part of my remarks:

THESE ARE THE GUILTY

(Address by Carleton Putnam)

Mr. Chairman, Mr. German, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, let me begin by acknowledging a debt—a debt of gratitude and appreciation to Clifford Newell and Mark German for arranging this impressive meeting tonight. An attendance of over 600 is more than any of us expected, especially in the face of an ice storm in Maryland and Virginia. I'm proud and grateful to your committee for inviting me to speak here, and I'm proud and grateful to you for coming.

It's true that about 2 years ago I wrote a short book—hardly more than a monograph—called "Race and Reason" which has caused some controversy. A few attacks have even been made on it. Therefore, every now and then, friends of mine, here and there, have been good enough to give me a platform—like this one tonight—from which to answer those attacks.

So far it hasn't been an overwhelming task. I won't say that I expected a somewhat higher caliber of opposition, for that might be discourteous to our opponents. But there are only a few loose ends to clean up this evening, and then, ladies and gentlemen, I propose to launch an attack of my own. If I were a lay preacher I would take as my text the 16th chapter of Paul's epistle to the Romans: "Now I beseech you, brethren, mark those who cause divisions and offenses in opposition to the doctrine which you have learned * * *. For such persons * * * by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple."

I propose to suggest to you tonight, in this world of rising racial tensions, just who they are who have caused divisions and—however sincere their motives and beliefs—have deceived the hearts of the simple. And in view of the fact that the last time I made a speech one of the press services complained because I referred to a certain individual "whom I did not name," tonight I intend to name names—not all, indeed, because large organizations are involved—but enough to satisfy the press. And I intend to say to you, and to them: these are the guilty.

But first let's go back to where it all began. I suppose nobody in this room doubts that the crusade for racial integration and the claim that races are all alike has its roots in the same soil in which most of the leftwing movements of our time originated. The socialism of Saint-Simon in France, of Marx in England and Germany, of Lenin in Russia, the Fabian Society of Bernard Shaw and the Webbs in England, all were, at least in part, an attempt to meet a horrifying problem among those who worked primarily with their muscles and their hands. They all had one valid common denominator among their objectives—improving the condition of the poor.

I will go so far as to say that many of us here, facing the situation that reformers found in England in the eighteen fifties and sixties, would have thought and felt exactly as they did. Here is the death notice in the London papers of Mary Anne Walkley, 20 years old, who in June of 1863 after sewing in a dressmaking establishment an average day of 16½ hours—during the season often 30 hours at a stretch—simply died of overwork. The doctor's words at the inquest were: "Mary Anne Walkley died from long hours of work in an overcrowded room. * * *" Because she could not stop for Death, Death kindly stopped for her.

As for the food the poor ate, their bread was bought mostly from what were called the undersellers and was adulterated with alum, soap, pearl ashes, chalk and Derbyshire stone-dust. Here is a description taken from official reports concerning conditions in the baking trade: "He [the poor man] had to eat daily in his bread a certain quantity of human perspiration mixed with the discharge of abscesses, cobwebs, dead blackbeetles, and putrid German yeast, without counting alum and sand." Of course, many of the poor simply starved. It wasn't until well along in the next century that the government stopped publishing statistics of deaths from starvation in London for lack of casualties.

Forgive this repetition of what will be to many of you an old story, but it seemed wise to refresh our recollections concerning the origin of today's leftwing ideologies. In those times and in those conditions were born all sorts of emotional attitudes and intellectual concepts, as well as practical schemes. Some of them succeeded and some of them did not, but progress was certainly made. The radical of 1963 inherits a legacy which we must understand. A year or so ago a reported for Time magazine interviewed me on the race question and it wasn't until our talk was practically over that I finally managed to make him give me his view on the subject. He was from the South and he was an integrationist. As he spoke, tears welled up in his eyes. But I could tell from what he said that those tears didn't have their source in the Negro problem, which he hadn't really thought through. They were part of the old legacy. They went back much further than Mary Anne Walkley.

There is no reason to doubt the humanitarian purpose of many of the welfare movements of those earlier days or to question their considerable accomplishments. Much poverty has been relieved. The problem now is to keep the floor under misery and failure without slapping a ceiling on everybody else—and to winnow out the large company of those who use the cry of humanity and brotherly love as an excuse for creating legal ways to break the Eighth Commandment. But that is a topic for a different forum from ours tonight.

I want to touch on only one aspect of that problem which leads us directly into our own field. Implicit in much leftwing theory and rhetoric, because it seemed to make existing conditions all the more reprehensible and in need of correction, was the doctrine of the equality of man. Few Socialists ever took the doctrine seriously in practice, I doubt if the Fabians ever took it seriously in theory, but we have all heard the slogans of the French Revolution and the Declaration of Independence.

I shan't go over again here what the evidence clearly shows regarding Jefferson's meaning—both as to the word "men" and as to the word "equal" in the phrase "all men are created equal"—nor need I repeat Hamilton's recognition that liberty and equality are mutually exclusive. It is obvious the Founding Fathers had no illusions about the equality of men in any sense except in equal rights to justice, and the Negro was not included even in that. But in America as the years went on, helped by the controversial Franz Boas, the notion of a utopian social, economic, and even biological equality persisted as a sort of demagogic fetish until things reached the point where the Swedish Socialist Myrdal actually dared to write in his "American Dilemma" that in the conflict between liberty and equality in the United States "equality is slowly winning," and Handlin, the Harvard professor, could bring himself to declare: "There is no evidence of any inborn differences of temperament, personality, character, or intelligence among races."

This last remark lands us finally in the middle of our subject with a splash. For the benefit of the press I give the full name, Oscar Handlin, professor of history at Harvard University, and while again I do not impugn his motives or sincerity, I assert that in my opinion Handlin's declaration is one of the most groundless and dangerously misleading statements to be found in print today.

Let us quickly review the evidence. All that we need is contained in that short, concise little book, "The Biology of the Race Problem," which I shall cite hereafter simply as the George report. In spite of the example of the equalitarians, a thousand pages are not required to come to the point on this subject.

If you will consult section IV of the George report, you will note the findings of Bean, Connolly, and Vint on the differences in frequencies of occurrence of certain features of white and Negro brains. The importance of these differences is plainly set out in quotations and citations from and to Penfield, Halstead, Brodmann, and Herrick. I repeat, you will find it all in the space of 10 pages in section IV. If you want more data, I can refer you to the leading article in the Mankind Quarterly, volume 2, no. 4, which amplifies and still further documents Dr. George's material. The differences in question are physical and hereditary. That they account for differences in temperament, behavior, and intelligence between the two races is beyond doubt. That these differences make the amalgamation of the races undesirable is just as clear. All the other sections of the George report confirm these facts.

There isn't time enough tonight to discuss the full report. But I will call your attention to something on which Dr. George does not touch: In 1940 the illegitimacy rate for Negroes throughout the United States was eight and a half times the rate for whites. Nineteen years later, 19 years in which Americans have struggled hard to raise Negro standards, the rate is 10 times that for whites. In other words, as their environment has been improved, their performance has gone down. Taking the single State of Virginia in the 20 years between 1938 and 1958, the white illegitimacy rate declined slightly from 2.6 to 2.3 percent. In this same period which witnessed astonishing gains in Negro education, Negro housing, Negro income, and Negro job opportunities, the rate of Negro illegitimacy increased from 19.5 to 22.9 percent. This is difficult to explain if the Negro's limitations are due solely to his environment.

Speaking of explanations, it's going to be still more difficult for the professors to evade Bean, Connolly, and Vint. They've already begun to say: "Oh, but the samplings aren't adequate." [These samplings varied from 30 brains in some cases to 165 in others.] Well, I have a question to ask these professors and all those who criticize the George report on this most vital point. If you don't like the samplings of Bean, Connolly, and Vint, why have you never produced anything better? You have most of the money, you have the captive foundations—they have hundreds of millions—and there are plenty of other sources anxious to help you. Yet to the best of my knowledge you haven't even tried to assemble any contrary evidence. Don't tell us that you can't be bothered or that this isn't important. This is the most important point in the whole controversy. Either the Negro's limitations are innate or they're not, and this evidence settles the matter. So I ask again, why have you never even tried to produce any other samplings?

The answer is simple. You haven't tried because you don't dare. You know well enough what the results would be, provided you had an objective study and included a Dr. George or two on the panel. I suggest that you now make such a study—a series of any size you like of average West African Negro brains, because there you get the least diluted essence of the Negro, against a series of average white brains—the study to be jointly run by scientists on both sides of the question. Meanwhile we have Bean, Connolly, and Vint; Penfield, Halstead, Brodmann and Herrick. I dislike being rude to amiable Harvard professors but I must say to Oscar Handlin (and I'm going to say it to several others this evening): the time has come to put up or shut up. Either answer Bean, Connolly, and Vint, or explain to the public why you can't.

While I'm on the subject of the George report I have another suggestion to offer. The press quotes George F. Carter, a professor of geography at Johns Hopkins University, as having said about this report: "The arguments they put up in that booklet are Swiss cheese—full of holes." It so happens that early last fall a mutual acquaintance communicated to me Carter's complaints about the George report—this acquaintance listed 50 of them, acting as a sort of agent for Carter. I considered these 50 points carefully, and then I submitted them to Dr. George. Thereafter they were submitted to scholars in New York. All of this occurred before the Putnam committee undertook the distribution of the report, and it was unanimously decided that, apart from three or four points about which some shadow of argument might be made but which did not bear on any essentials, the 50 points were without any substance whatsoever.

There was one item which Carter considered to be a quotation out of context and which we corrected with an erratum sheet. Jerry Doolittle of the Washington Post made much out of this correction in the Post for December 9. So I have a question to ask Doolittle: Assuming Carter is right in his statement that differing climates had identical effects in the way they "sharpened the wits" of all mankind, can either you or Carter honestly believe that the climate of the tropics and the climate of northern Europe over tens of thousands of years had identical effects on the development of those special qualities of the civilized forebrain; namely, foresight and long-range planning? Carter's dwelling on one aspect of molding does not exclude the existence of other aspects. If Doolittle thinks it does, he had better consult someone else besides a geographer. He will find experts on that subject in other sections of the George report.

But let me come to Carter's 50 points and give you 2 examples: On page 27 of his report, Dr. George cites the work of Bean which was published in 1906. On this Carter remarks: "Reference from Bean is nearly 60 years old. Haven't there been any developments or thoughts in this long period?" If Carter had read the report with any attention he would have found that Connolly's work was published in 1950 and Penfield's in 1957. This brings Bean right up to date. But are we in some sort of competition here on dates? Does its date make Newton's law of gravitation invalid?

Secondly on page 68 Dr. George writes: "If there were more Negroes with talents for civilization, we would have no race problem or it would be a very different one." To which Carter remarks: "Again nonsense. Boston had a race problem with the Irish. Many people have a Jewish race problem even though these races have talents for civilization." Well, ladies and gentlemen, is not this what Dr. George has already just said? He has just said, "or it would be a very different one." And that is precisely what the Irish and Jewish problems were, "very different ones."

I leave you to judge where the nonsense lies in these two examples, and I invite Carter to publish in the newspapers all of his 50 criticisms of the George report, just as he has seen fit to publish his Swiss cheese. I have a science degree but I am not a professional scientist and I do not debate with professional scientists. However, I dare say scientists can be found who will answer Carter—also in the press. I simply suggest to Carter that he prepare better criticisms than the ones our mutual acquaintance submitted to me, unless he wants to lose the game by a score of 50 to nothing. And I warn him that before he can walk with Alive in the wonderland of unbridled environmentalism he must first get by the narrow gate of Bean, Connolly, Vint, and Penfield. I could have sat next to Caruso for dinner every night for a lifetime and never sung as Caruso sang. No amount of cultural contact, no amount of integration would have made the slightest difference, except that if I had tried to sing with Caruso I would have spoiled the opera. And what is true of the vocal chords is true of the frontal lobes.

Out at the University of Chicago, there is another professor who thinks he can brush Dr. George aside. For the benefit of the press, let me name him, Manning Nash, associate professor of anthropology. Nash had begun by attacking "Race and Reason" in a long article in Current Anthropology last June which was answered by me in a few short sentences on Bean, Connolly, and Vint which I put in a letter I sent to Sol Tax, editor of the magazine. Thereupon Nash wrote me saying he doubted if my letter would ever be published so he was going to answer me right off privately. He proceeded to ignore all the substantive issues by calling Dr. George, who is considerably above him in academic status, unscientific, and then he urged me to read the Constitution of the United States, the Declaration of Independence, and the Articles of Confederation so that I might learn something about the legal equality of all human beings.

To Nash I answered: "Regarding your paragraph on the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, you appear never really to have read 'Race and Reason,' or much American history. Jefferson, who wrote the Declaration, refutes you on page 62, lines 4–8, of 'Race and Reason'; Lincoln refutes you on pages 8–9. It so happens that Lincoln was a lawyer and you are not. Until the aberration of the 1954 Supreme Court decision no competent lawyer supposed that there was any legal right on the part of the Federal Government to force Negroes into white schools. And that Court reached its decision on sociological and pseudoscientific rather than legal grounds."

But to get back to the George report, when this report was first issued there appeared in many newspapers throughout the South, by some sort of spontaneous combustion, an answer from a man named Charles C. Perkins, chairman of the department of psychology at Emory University in Atlanta. Perkins was very patronizing, very sure that no even moderately reputable psychologist would come up with findings such as the report contained, quite forgetting Dr. Garrett, for 15 years head of the department of psychology at Columbia and a past president of the American Psychological Association. Perkins then went on to remark that while there "just aren't many facts that allow positive conclusions" and while he didn't want even his rebuttal evidence to be taken too seriously, nevertheless "Alpha examinations given World War I soldiers indicated the average northern Negro was smarter than the average southern white man."

It is difficult to understand Perkins' willingness to use this material even with apologies. This is the well-known and long-discredited Klineburg twist, and for the benefit of the press I am referring to Otto Klineburg, professor of psychology at Columbia University. What Klineburg did in this case was to take the four Southern States where the white averages were lowest and compare them with the four Northern States where the Negro averages were highest. If we take the whites in the same Northern States as the Negroes, these whites scored far above the Negroes. It's an old equalitarian trick to compare the best of one group with the worst of another and, of course, such a procedure has no validity whatever. If you take an above-average Negro and give him a lot of advantages he will do better than a below-average white man who has had very few. Wherever you have overlapping statistical distributions, the top of one will always exceed the bottom of the other. This is not the problem under discussion. The thing we are interested in is what the average Negro will do when compared with the average white man under like conditions. Anyone interested in the latter question will find decisive answers in the George report. This is the only issue, and it is the issue Perkins is clouding and confusing. I urge you in dealing with these people to keep them to the point. Their specialty is irrelevance.

I might say that I think the championship in this respect goes this year to a man up at the University of Connecticut. I refer to one Donald C. Simmons who is listed as a member of the department of sociology and anthropology. It would hardly seem proper to take your time with this 36-year-old assistant professor were it not for the fact that the New Republic magazine has seen fit on two separate occasions to publish his attacks which now include both "Race and Reason" and the George report.

My first brush with Simmons occurred last summer when the New Republic printed a review by him of "Race and Reason" in which he accused me of quoting scientists out of context. When I asked him for one example he was able to give none. Perhaps he was basing his criticism on hearsay from an article by Howard Margolis of Science magazine. Margolis made the same accusation, and when asked to provide an example gave my quotation from Kluckhohn on page 51 of "Race and Reason." I answered this accusation in a letter which Science published. I also answered it in a speech in New Orleans a year ago. I have heard nothing from Margolis since. And I doubt if I hear any more on this subject from Simmons either.

Simmons' most recent effort appeared in the New Republic for January 5 and is of a somewhat more specific nature. He begins by referring to the George report and the measurement of intelligence by brain size. Simmons mentions a group of male Negro brains which he says were found to weigh more than a certain group of female white brains. You will remember that on page 61 of the George report there is a footnote which reads in part as follows: "The essential point here is that, other things being equal [such as sulcification and microscopic structure of the cortex] and considering higher animals in general perspective the larger the brain relative to body size, the greater the intelligence." Note the phrase "relative to body size." Among other factors, the average body size of women is notably smaller than that of men. Thus their brain size would be expected to be smaller without lessening of intelligence. Apparently we have another case here of a man who hasn't read with any attention what he's attacking.

Next Simmons dances the Klineburg twist, about which no more need be said, and then he gives us a quotation from the Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues which reads as follows: "The more comparable the background of white and Negro groups, the less the difference in intelligence." However, if you will turn to the American Psychologist magazine for May of 1962 you will find that Dr. Garrett answered that statement by showing that there have been six studies on the subject and all of them contradict the Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues.

Our Connecticut friend then moves on to comment about some experiments in Baltimore purporting to show that no difference can be found between white and Negro infants up to 40 weeks, and that differences thereafter must be due to socioeconomic factors. But the lower centers of the brain and nervous system, in human beings and in animals, are the ones which mature first; the higher centers mature last. Therefore similarity of performance in the early stages of life signifies nothing as to adult potentiality.

Finally Simmons remarks on what he calls the racist accusation that the Negro never invented an alphabet and points out that many other races didn't either. But if he will read the "Biology of the Race Problem" he will see that George makes no such accusation. George says that the Negro never invented a system of writing. It is true that alphabets are rare. Systems of writing are not. The Negro never invented either. I shan't weary you further with Simmons. My only comment must be one of surprise at the acceptance of this sort of material for the second time by the New Republic.

Well, we've had a look at Harvard, Columbia, Johns Hopkins, Chicago, Emory, and the University of Connecticut. Let's return to Harvard for a moment, the university where the FBI had to arrest Zborowski, a research associate in the department of anthropology. I do not mention this in any criticism of the department at Harvard. It might have happened anywhere. I cite it as an example of how important the Communists consider it to be to corrupt the minds of our young people in this field.

The New York Times on December 9, 1962, ran a review of Dr. Carleton Coon's book, "The Origin of Races." This review was written by Prof. William W. Howells, chairman of the department of anthropology at Harvard. Up until the last two paragraphs Howells sticks to his subject and I have no comments to make. However, in the last two paragraphs he launches a thinly veiled attack upon my pamphlet, "Evolution and Race: New Evidence." He opens the first of these paragraphs with the remark that certain parts of Coon's book have been "pounced on with delight by the present cohort of racists." This opening gambit is the usual introduction used by these people in order to arouse anger rather than reason in their readers. If a man acknowledges the facts of race, he's a racist. I suppose if he acknowledges the facts of sex he's a sexist.

But I move on. Howells next says that even if Coon is correct, it is not possible to use his hypothesis to measure modern racial differences. Let's think about that for a moment. If Coon is correct, the Caucasian race passed the threshold of evolutionary development in brain structure from homo erectus to homo sapiens 200,000 years ahead of the Negro. This matter of brain structure is biological, inherent, hereditary. Evolution is a continuing process. If one race has a head start of 200,000 years over another, does Howells mean to suggest that this head start has no significance—does he see no possible relation between it and the differences found by Bean, Connolly, and Vint in white and Negro brains, or the results of intelligence tests, or the figures on crime and illegitimacy, or the level of civilization in Haiti, or the stability of governments in the Congo? Nobody is trying to take a pair of calipers and declare what is the exact measure of difference in the two races today. But I will tell Howells it makes enough difference to the southern mother when she puts her girls in school.

This amiable Harvard professor, furthermore, is not above playing a guessing game in these final paragraphs. At one place he refers to a passage from page 9 of the introduction to Coon's book which reads as follows: "It is a fair inference * * * that the subspecies which crossed the evolutionary threshold into the category of homo sapiens the earliest have evolved the most and that the obvious correlation between the length of time a subspecies has been in the sapiens state and the levels of civilization attained by some of its populations may be related phenomena." On this passage Howells makes the comment in parenthesis: "Those who are to tickled with page 9 of the introduction might try continuing to page 661."

Of course the average reader of Howells' review will not have at hand a copy of "The Origin of Races" and hence will not be able to evaluate the parenthesis because he will have no access to page 661. Does Howells intend to leave the implication of some contradiction? Page 661 deals both with selection and with the tendency to eventual resegregation of genetic chartcers in racial interbreeding. I wonder if Howells supposes this to be compensation to southern society which, after many generations of chaos, might look forward to such an eventuality. Thereafter the chaos would start all over again.

And while we're jumping about from page to page I might call Howells' attention to page 336. I shan't keep you in the dark about what is on that page. Here Coon refers to "the great variability of 20th century human beings, in evolutionary grades as well as in racial lines." Coon calls these differences important. He also says that from the perspective of life as a whole, they are slight. Obviously if you run the gamut from the amoeba to man they are slight. But what a whale of a difference a few brain cells make. You can find that discussed in the George report at page 34.

Finally our amiable Harvard professor sums up his view of my pamphlet in this extraordinarily penetrating remark: "Anyhow I see no way of using such arguments (the 200,000-year evolutionary lag) to disprove the Constitution of the United States." Would anyone in the audience care to tell me where the Constitution mentions the integration of schools? If we look at the 14th amendment, do we see any reference to schools? Ladies and gentlemen, I would like to share with you a not very well kept secret. The people who put the integration of schools into the Constitution were Howells and his kind, the equalitarian anthropologists and sociologists who misled the Supreme Court and the American people with their mess of half-truths and slanted evidence.

I say now to Howells and all his crowd: You have not only misled the Supreme Court and the American people, you have fooled the Negro about himself. You have poisoned his mind with expectations that cannot be realized and inflamed him with an arrogance that has no justification. You have set him against the white man. You have made him think he has a grudge against the white race when the truth is he owes the white race a greater debt than he can ever repay. Offer a few Negroes one-way tickets to Africa, where they can enjoy the culture of their own race, and see how many takers you get.

I tell you without fear of contradiction that the American people are as kindly a people as any in the world, that nowhere else in the world would Negroes in such numbers have found a better haven. Yet James Baldwin and these much publicized "angry black men" writing books and long articles for the New Yorker magazine damn the white American. Baldwin writes pityingly about his ancestor who was dragged to America in chains. But I say to Baldwin that if his ancestor had not been brought here in chains, he would have died a far more terrible death as a slave in Africa. Baldwin is lucky to be here.

And I say to Leopold Stokowski that I revere him as a musician but when he appears on David Susskind's "Open End" TV program and declares that the white man owes the Negro an apology he is guilty of a groundless and inflammatory statement on a subject about which he is incorrectly informed. He is encouraging the Negro to violence and revenge against a race to which the Negro owes an infinite debt.

In this matter Susskind and Stokowski and other public figures across the Nation run blindly with the pack. Yet standing here tonight it is not primarily these that I indict, nor the New Republic, nor even the Supreme Court. Least of all is it the average Negro. I indict the men who have fooled and goaded the Negro—the men who have made it necessary for the rest of us to point out truths which the Negro might otherwise have been spared the telling. I indict the Howells, the Nashes, the Perkins, the Carters, the Klinebergs, the Handlins, the Herskovitses, the Simmonses, and the Sol Taxes who have spawned our racial tension here and abroad.

And I indict their associations. These men indeed run in packs. They have provided the basis for this whole house of cards that is starting to fall around their heads. If white settlers are being dispossessed and murdered in Kenya, if nuns are being raped in the Congo, if white men and girls are being slugged on the streets of our northern cities, if the Supreme Court has to warn its employees about going home at night, look to the source. "Mark those who cause divisions and offenses * * * and deceive the hearts of the simple."

Here I would like to incorporate by reference what I said a year ago in New Orleans (in "The Road to Reversal") about my exchange of correspondence with the president of the American Anthropological Association, Sherwood Washburn. Then I would like to ask: Have I now given you enough cases to demonstrate the utter lack of facts on the equalitarian side of this controversy and the poverty of their arguments? Out of all these universities and the resolutions of these associations not one iota of evidence or one shred of argument has come that cannot be exploded in 30 seconds. It is all as stale and empty as the notion that the sun revolves around the earth.

Have I also provided enough illustrations of the way these scientists operate? Because, if not, I could go on. I could mention the fact that on one occasion when a certain scientific association was about to pass a resolution condemning "Race and Reason" there was a pause in the proceedings. And someone asked for a show of hands on how many had read the book. In a room full of people how many do you suppose had read it? Three. And yet they were about to pass, and did pass, a resolution damning something they'd never read. Does that episode need any further comment from me?

Listen to what the man who was for 15 years head of the deparment of psychology at Columbia University (he was a member of the faculty for 30 years) has to say about these political resolutions by scientist. I quote you Henry Garrett in a letter to me last October:

"I knew Franz Boas personally. I was able to observe the influence of Boas as founder of the science of anthropology in America and to evaluate the extent to which Boas' socialistic ideology dominated his thinking and permeated the teaching of his disciples, first at Columbia and later at other universities fed from the Boas cult. I was also able to observe the increasing degree of control exercised by this cult over students and younger professors until fear of loss of jobs or status became common in the field of anthropology unless conformity to the racial equality dogma was maintained.

"I will go so far as to assert that the supporters of the equality dogma in science in America today fall into three classes—those who are intimidated, those who are driven by leftwight political motives and those who are honest but mistaken humanitarians. I can testify from repeated personal observation to the intimidation and to the pall of suppression which has fallen upon the academic world in the are of which I speak. It encompasses not only anthropology but certain other related sciences. In the light of this situation the resolutions are not surprising."

Dr. Robert Gayre has told me that not since the days of Galileo has science seen anything like it. When Simmons reviewed "Race and Reason," he asked if I were looking for an "apostate" anthropologist. You know what that word means. An apostate is one who departs from a dogma. Here, in other words, is one of the younger generation who doesn't even realize his self-betrayal—who has never learned that science is a matter of research and facts, not dogma.

In the face of this grotesque state of affairs I'd like to ask the Kennedy brothers a question. Next to population control, the race problem is undoubtedly the most urgent in the world today; it is basic to everything else, even to the cold war. Do you, or do you not, consider it desirable that you inform yourselves on both sides of this matter? All your lives you have been listening to political propaganda masquerading under the name of science. It would take you less than an hour to read section IV of the George report and the article in the Mankind Quarterly, less than an hour to talk to Dr. George or Dr. Garrett. Have you done either?

The decision of the Supreme Court does not relieve you from studying the subject. You've seen what that decision has done to the Nation. You are not President and Attorney General solely for the Negro population or the northern or western radicals. You also happen to be serving millions of people who believe the decision was viciously wrong and who know more about the matter firsthand than you'll ever know. Why have you never given a hearing to the scientists on their side? Are you afraid of losing some votes? Are you afraid of the Catholic Church? I have been told that this is the case, but I refuse to believe it. Any man who buys a vote by doing the wrong thing, or the ignorant thing, in a job like yours is on the skids of history, and you're smart enough to know it. And as for the Supreme Court, it would switch fast enough if you discovered the truth and went out and told it on the mountain. The American majority would respond with a roar and these minority-group arguments would vanish like last year's snow.

Stop and think for a minute. You have the record of the centuries and of today in Africa, you have the facts in certain countries of South America and you have them in Haiti. In the United States you have crime records and you have illegitimacy records. You also have 40 years of intelligence tests. All these point in one direction; namely, that the Negro has created his history and environment (not vice versa) and will create it again wherever he's allowed to. Next you have the microscopic studies of Vint, the morphology of Bean, Connolly, Halstead, and Penfield, and the recent evidence presented by Dr. Coon, president of the American Association of Physical Anthropologists. You have pages of other evidence in the George report. Finally you know the background of the equalitarian school, you know who started it and the political and social views of most of its leaders. All of this points in one direction.

For each of the above items some far-fetched excuse might be conceived. Any one of them might possibly be debated. But consider them all together.

Let me suggest a parallel. You are walking along a hotel corridor, and as you pass a bedroom door you hear loud, angry voices. Then you hear one of the voices say, "Take that, you dirty dog!" and you hear two shots and the sound of a body falling. So you open the door, and you find one man standing with a smoking gun in his hand, looking down at another man with two bullets in his heart.

After some personal risk and minor injuries you manage to capture the man with the gun, and at the trial the following facts develop. The dead man was shortly to have married his childhood sweetheart and was said by several witnesses to have been joyful over this, having courted her long and earnestly. Further, it appears that the dead man, the week before, had inherited $1 million, after taxes, from an uncle he had never seen. The accused, on the other hand, according to reliable testimony, had coveted the dead man's sweetheart and had been repulsed my her. In fact, he had several times sworn he would kill the deceased. The gun is found to have been the property of the accused.

The defense pleads that the death is a suicide. The point is made that the dead man might just conceivably have changed his mind about his fiancee and have become depressed at the thought of marriage. As for the million dollars, after taxes, this might not have been enough to compensate for the death of the uncle he had never seen. Regarding the remark, "Take that, you dirty dog!" this may have been the deceased talking to himself. Upon your telling the court that you knew the voice of the dead man, with whom you had been associated for many years, and that the voice was not his, the defense replies that the deceased was only 30 years old, and his voice may have been changing.

Concerning the gun, which turns out to be a Smith & Wesson, the defense proposes that this might just possibly have been stolen by the deceased from the accused, because, although the deceased had a Colt of his own in the bottom of his suitcase, he preferred suicide with a Smith & Wesson. Finally, in regard to the threats of the accused, these might by a remote chance have been unrelated to the shooting and due instead to cultural deprivation on the part of the accused.

On the basis of this evidence, the Court takes the case away from the jury and directs a verdict in favor of the accused. Although the accused has threatened to kill two other men in the community, his gun is returned to him and he is complimented and set free. The newspapers are loud in their praise of this verdict. A few weeks later you read in one of them that the other men who were threatened have indeed died under mysterious cricumstances thought by the staff writer for this paper to be suicide. On the following Sunday your turn on your TV and you see and hear certain prominent men apologize to the accused for the inconvenience the community has caused him. In the press that same Sunday appear editorials bitterly attacking the prosecuting attorney in the case. Clearly the whole tragedy, according to these papers, was a matter of cultural deprivation on the part of the dead man. As a matter of fact, you read in the news section that the prosecuting attorney has lost his job and is on relief.

At this point you might be forgiven if you put down your paper with a sigh, particularly after hearing on the radio that counsel for the defense was a fraternity brother of the judge.

A man with a weak, confused mind might perhaps be persuaded that some one or two of the following things were true, namely, that the deceased was depressed at the thought of marrying his childhood sweetheart, or that he could not bear the loss of his uncle he had never seen in spite of the million dollars after taxes, or that he preferred to steal a Smith and Wesson rather than kill himself with his own Colt, or that his voice was changing at the age of 30, or that the threats against him were due solely to cultural deprivation—but a man who could believe all these things ought to be in a mental institution.

By the same token, anybody who can believe that the Negro's limitations are solely environmental in the face of African history, and of Haitian history, and of U.S. crime records, and of U.S. illegitimacy records, and of 40 years of intelligence tests, and of the microscopic studies of Vint, and of the morphology of Bean, Connolly, Penfield, and Halstead, and of the latest synthesis of Carleton Coon, and of the other evidence in the George Report, and of the unmasking of the infiltration of the life sciences by political dogma—any person, I say, who can believe the Negro is the product of his history and environment (instead of vice versa) in the face of all those facts may not belong in a mental institution, but I dread the thought of his teaching any child of mine.

I must warn you that on the equalitarian side of this controversy there is great cleverness and great evasiveness. Do not let yourself be distracted from the point. There is just one issue, and I will put it in this way: In one group you have masses of brains which, on the average, are at a certain evolutionary level. In a separate group you have other masses of brains which, on the average, are at a different evolutionary level. Is it wise to adopt public policies which will encourage the biological mixing of those two groups of brains?

You must not be confused by the mulatto red herring, or the overlap red herring, or the religious red herring, or the legal red herring, or the civil rights red herring, or the red herring of American democracy. These matters are all of the greatest importance but they have nothing to do with the fundamental issue. If the mixing is wrong, then public policies leading toward it cannot be Christian, they cannot be American, they cannot be civil rights—and they ought not to be legal.

Cleaning up the situation is going to require inspection of the evidence by intelligent public leaders, it is going to require listening to both sides and studying both sides. It is going to require going down to the end of the road on each item—statement and answer, rejoinder and surrejoinder, rebuttal and surrebuttal, until neither side has anything left to say. But I assure the President and the Attorney General: if you will investigate this matter and hear both sides impartially and to a conclusion, there is no doubt what that conclusion will be. You ought to have done it long ago. Eisenhower ought to have done it in 1954.

With particular reference to the Supreme Court, do you realize that most of the material we've been discussing tonight never was put before it? The whole record in the school cases is a scientific travesty. What is needed now—and has been needed since 1954—is executive leadership in channeling a new case based on new evidence up to the Court. I suggest to the President and the Attorney General that, having satisfied themselves as to the facts, they throw their weight behind getting a new case heard, instead of blindly talking about their duty to enforce a judicial decision which is a nightmare scientifically, legally and morally.

Let me add one last remark about my hotel drama. Any similarity between that episode and the groups in our racial controversy is purely a coincidence. Actually and in all seriousness I intend no parallel whatever between the Negro and the accused. I leave you to judge how I feel about counsel for the defense and the other characters in the story.

The time has come for me to draw these comments to a close. Today we have celebrated the birthday of a great man. He was not only an America hero. He was beloved throughout the world. He was a devout Christian, a man of wide compassion and sensitive tenderness. We know what he thought and said about the Negro and I shan't quote him on that subject again. We know that in 1858 he made it clear that he did not favor in any way the social or political equality of the white and black races. We also know that in 1864, when his days were nearly done, he wrote a letter to the Governor of Louisiana barely suggesting his hope that some very intelligent Negroes might be admitted to the franchise—of course under the control, and at the discretion, of the States. Surely with this we may agree.

However, I think we may be equally sure that Lincoln would have had nothing but contempt for these latter-day reconstructionists sitting here in Washington and elsewhere who at bayonet point would force the Negro into schools and other social situations with white children against the wishes of their parents. He would have had nothing but contempt for a welfare agency which farms out helpless white orphans to a Negro foster home. He would not have blamed the Negro for this. If ever there was a leader who would have cleansed the temple with a lash on the backs of the real culprits, Lincoln was the man.

But Lincoln was kind. I think he would have liked Dr. Garrett's way of expressing the difference between the white and Negro races. Dr. Garrett prefers to speak less of inferiority than of racial immaturity, and I have changed this slightly so that I speak now of racial youth. Indeed I have tried to make it clear wherever I have used the word inferiority that I am referring solely to limitations in adaptability to our specific Western culture. But watch the scientists and the equalitarian press—they will always drag out the phrase "Negro inferiority charged" and put it in headlines when they attack us. Like the word racist, it is a badge of their demagoguery.

Lincoln was kind, too, in his attitude toward the South. Had he lived he would have bound up the South's wounds as well as the North's. There would have been no Reconstruction period. And although the 14th amendment was passed after Lincoln's death, I will go so far as to say that if he could see the manner in which that amendment is being abused today, and hurled against the South, he would turn in his grave.

So tonight I am not going to end this talk with a quotation from Lincoln about the Negro. I am going to end it with a different quotation from Lincoln which I recommend to the meditations of the two anthropological associations, and of the Supreme Court and of John F. Kennedy and of Dwight Eisenhower: "You can fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all of the time."

I might add that you can't fool nature any of the time. Genetic racial differences in intelligence, character, and behavior are the basic reality of life. As Dr. Coon has said, there is great variability in the evolutionary status of human populations all over the earth. This is the fundamental fact in the world today. National or international policy built on any other foundation is a house built on sand.

Near East Report Commemorates Israel's 15th Anniversary

HON. HENRY S. REUSS

OF WISCONSIN

Monday, April 29, 1963

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, Near East Report, a newsletter edited in Washington by Mr. I. L. Kenen, has published a most interesting issue in commemoration of the 15th anniversary of the State of Israel on April 28. I am including an article setting out a view of Israel's position in the world and excerpts from a second article reporting some of the aid Israel has extended to other nations.

The first article follows:

ISRAEL'S 15TH ANNIVERSARY

Many years ago, a contemporary Jewish prophet made a significant prediction about the Jewish state that would some day come into existence.

"It will be unique," he said. "In traditional colonization, the motherland exploits the colony economically, while the colony exploits the motherland culturally and spiritually. With Israel, it will be the reverse."

This was profoundly true. The Israel that was established in May 1948 had a Jewish population of 650,000. More than a million newcomers made their home there and Israel needed substantial assistance to settle them. The motherland, the Jewish diaspora, gladly helped Israel to absorb her immigrants, to build her economy, to insure her survival.

Friendly nations—most of all our own Government—generously provided grants and loans. And, as a result, Israel's economy and defenses have been strengthened. Today, she is a sturdy democracy, on the road to economic independence.

But what has Israel given in return? Has she in fact become the spiritual and cultural center she promised to be? What message does she have for others?

Jews who are old enough to remember when Hitler came to power, just 30 years ago, recall their horror at the brutality of nazism, the callous indifference of it collaborators, the paralysis of its opponents. They sank into a nadir of despair, numbed and shocked at the vast betrayal of conscience.

The struggle which culminated in the establishment of Israel restored the faith of Jews in their capacity to shape their future. It promised Jewish survival. Is Israel had done nothing more than that, it would still have made a glowing contribution to the regeneration of the Jewish people.

In the begininng there was Israel's act of humanity. Her doors would always be open to every Jew in need of a home. She took them all—the old and the young, the sick, the strong and the dying, the educated and the illiterate. This act of compassion was also an enactment of judgment, eloquently reminding the world that too many doors had been closed to the Jews when barbarians turned Europe into a vast charnel house.

In that act, Israel counseled a world that had become obsessed with material things and the art of destruction that it must cherish and honor people.

But Israel has come to mean much more. She has a message, not merely for Jews, but for the peoples of many lands. For Israel has come to symbolize respect for the right of the individual man to be free in his own home, to work with others in the common effort toward a better life and to be safe from the oppression of masters and the hostility of neighbors.

Israel was not overwhelmed by the squalor and desolation of the Near East slums and deserts. She forged a head to higher standards of living. Her example challenged her neighbors to raise their sights and to become restless and unwilling to dwell in the stagnation of the past. And, most significantly, she has literally become a light around the world.

Overleaping the frontier of ignorance and hostility, she has sent her teachers and

KENNEDY'S SHAMEFUL PROPOSAL

By Silas Moore, Editor

John Fitzgerald Kennedy has recently topped all of his previous efforts to lead, entice, or drag America down the road toward totalitarianism. He has proposed federal legislation which would smash the basic right of a man to determine who may be admitted to his property. The new bill would invent a new "right" alien to the highest concepts of Western civilization. It would invent the right to trespass.

A civil right is a right specified by a valid law. Therefore, it is totally incorrect to describe "sit-ins" at private establishments and other demonstrations against property rights as "civil rights demonstrations." Many agitators, politicians, and newsmen flagrantly misuse the term to further their collectivist aims.

Other words which leftists have tried to redefine are "public" and "private." The confusion peddlers would have us believe that when an enterpriser opens his doors for trade, he automatically forfeits property rights, and his private establishment becomes akin to a public city street. Nonsense!

"We reserve the right to refuse service to anyone." This writer once read those familiar words on the menu of a Chinese restaurant in Pasadena, California. And why not? That simple statement succinctly expresses a vital principle of the free, capitalist society.

We are proud that Georgia's senior Senator, Richard B. Russell, is leading the freedom fighters in battle against J.F.K.'s shameful proposal. In a magnificent 900-word reply to the Chief Executive's radio-TV speech Senator Russell said that "the President of the United States has a higher call to leadership than to use threats of mass violence and disregard of reasonable local laws as a means of securing action in the courts and Congress, however desirable he may regard it to be."

Senator Russell also made this observation: "The outstanding distinction between a government of free men and a socialistic or communistic state is the fact that free men can own and control property, whereas statism denies property rights."

That the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution has been twisted before does not justify Kennedy's attempt to introduce a far more monstrous distortion. The Challenger supports whatever legal means are necessary to prevent the enactment of his terrible legislation.

GEORGIA YOUNG REPUBLICANS VOTE RIGHT

An outspoken Goldwater supporter has been elected chairman of the Georgia Federation of Young Republican Clubs. Meeting in Atlanta on May 11, the YR convention chose Allen Jones over a self-styled "moderate" opponent.

Mr. Jones told The Challenger that he believes all of Georgia's delegates to the '64 Republican Convention will vote for Goldwater.

ARMS AND THE CITIZEN

By James S. Davis

The United States citizen has been besieged by lawmakers for a large part of two generations. Prongs of the attack have penetrated into almost every area of free choice. One bulwark showing signs of crumbling under the blows of restrictive legislation is "the right of the people to keep and bear arms" (Bill of Rights, article II).

Many states have passed laws designed to discourage--if not prohibit--dealings in firearms by the average citizen. Many more have attempted to pass such laws. Until the last session of its legislature Georgia was free from restrictive and ambiguous gun laws.

Georgia House Bill 622 had been rejected by committees of both the House and the Senate. Nevertheless, it was pushed through both legislative bodies, the Senate passing it at the end of the session when most of its members had already gone home. Then despite great protest from Georgia citizens Governor Carl Sanders signed it into law.

In its original form Bill 622 would have required anyone selling a firearm less than fifteen inches long to purchase a $25 license and post a $1000 bond. Fortunately, protests from arms enthusiasts prompted the legislators to insert a sentence exempting individuals engaged in "casual sales."

But the bill is still ambiguous and vague. It repeatedly uses the words "any person," as well as "dealer" and "pawnbroker." A big chunk of freedom balances on the word "casual." Will the Department of Public Safety make its own interpretation?

Clifford R. Martin, president of the Georgia Arms Collectors Association, wrote the following: "Our main concern is that this bill will set a precedent for more severe laws to follow. This one, in its present ambiguous form, would be very difficult to enforce and for that reason, like the 'fire cracker law,' will be subject to changes. Remember, the 'Do Gooders' will not let up. Look out in the future for clamp-downs on ammunition, permits to buy, and registration laws."

Young Americans for Freedom and other conservatives must stand ready to defend the right to possess and enjoy firearms. As always, the price of liberty is eternal vigilance.

EMORY AND TECH SEE YAF FILM

A Generation Awakes was shown at Emory University and Georgia Tech last month. On May 16 the Emory YAF chapter presented the half-hour sound movie about Young Americans for Freedom. The film includes highlights from the mammoth YAF rally at Madison Square Garden, documents a verbal clash between YAF members and far-left "peace" propagandists, and features speeches by Goldwater, Tower, Thurmond, Buckley, and several YAF leaders.

Newly elected officers for the Emory chapter are as follows: Peery Grant, chairman; Claude Tison, vice-chairman; Spencer Howell, treasurer; Angie Stadler, corresponding secretary; and Alan Quarterman, recording secretary. Dr. Helmut Schoeck, professor of sociology, and Dr. Ralph N. Traxler, associate professor of business administration, have recently accepted positions on the chapter advisory board.

Emory YAF set up a booth on campus where students could sign a "Goldwater for President" petition between classes. Result: 250 signatures!

On May 21 Georgia Tech YAF members sponsored the screening of A Generation Awakes and the old stand-by, Operation Abolition. The audience of seventy was addressed by State Chairman Richard Wilson and Tech Chairman Edward Sullinger.

PATRIOTS--OLD AND NEW

By Richard Wilson, Chairman, Georgia YAF

Let us go back 187 years to the darkest days of the Revolutionary War.

General Washington asks for someone to go behind enemy lines and gather information. A young man volunteers, undertakes the dangerous mission, and is captured. The enemy pronounces the usual sentence for spying--death.

Beyond all hope of rescue he stands surrounded by a jeering foe, the rope already knotted around his neck. He speaks one short sentence, and it echoes down the centuries. "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country."

Not long ago I saw his statue in a green park in New York City. With arms pinioned and throat bared, the stone likeness captures the pride and defiance of Nathan Hale.

Three years ago a modern American had the opportunity to follow in the same heroic tradition. He was being tried as a spy by a Soviet court. But while the world watched and listened, the American said: "I didn't know what I was doing. . . . I know now that I was risking world peace. My superiors were responsible."

Nathan Hale could have blamed George Washington, I suppose. But he did not.

Then there were the turncoats in Korea. Were they the result of years of indifference to our American heritage and apathy toward the insidious methods of Communism?

Through the efforts of Young Americans for Freedom many of our youth are renewing their love for their country, are becoming alert to the enemies we face, and are being inspired to seek victory.

MEETING NOTICE

All YAF members living in the Atlanta area are invited to a meeting of the Atlanta chapter on Tuesday, July 9, at 7:30 p.m. in the penthouse (18th floor) of the Atlanta Federal Savings and Loan Building at 22 Marietta Street. New officers will be elected.

"Civil rights . . . is one of the most badly understood concepts in modern political usage. . . . As often as not, it is simply a name for describing an activity that someone deems politically or socially desirable. A sociologist writes a paper proposing to abolish some inequity, or a politician makes a speech about it--and, behold, a new 'civil right' is born! The Supreme Court has displayed the same creative powers.

"A civil right is a right that is asserted and is therefore protected by some valid law."

HORROR STORY (It can not come true in Georgia--yet.) By Silas Moore

Once upon a time there was a man named Smith. He was employed as a shoe repairman for twenty years, and by saving regularly and living frugally he finally accumulated enough capital to open his own shoe repair shop. This he did after buying a small plot of land, erecting a building, purchasing the necessary machines and materials, and hiring three assistants.

Mr. Smith was a very devout follower of the Brand X Religion. In fact, he believed that his life would be happier if his close friends and associates were fellow believers in the Brand X Religion. Therefore, the three employees in Smith's Shoe Repair Shop were chosen because they were members of Smith's church.

Not long after the grand opening an important-looking gentleman carrying a briefcase strode into the shop. The visitor gave Mr. Smith a perfunctory handshake, flashed a brief smile, and in a detached but well-modulated voice spoke the following:

"I represent the Fair Employment Practices Commission, which was established during the last session of our state legislature to eliminate discrimination in hiring because of race, color, or creed. After receiving a complaint from Mr. Wendell Johnson we made an investigation and found that you refused to hire him simply because he was a member of the Brand Z Religion rather than a believer in the Brand X Religion. Mr. Johnson has had four years of experience in shoe repairing, whereas Mr. Ernest Mills, whom you did hire, has had no previous experience in your trade at all. Clearly, you have violated state law by practicing religious discrimination, not to mention your poor business judgment demonstrated by employing the less qualified applicant. We suggest that you replace Mr. Mills with Mr. Johnson. We remind you that if you insist on not cooperating, we are empowered to bring suit to compel your compliance. What do you say, Mr. Smith?"

The graying, middle-aged enterpriser stroked his chin and stared at the bureaucrat. "Oh, well," drawled Mr. Smith philosophically, "that's the way the Republic crumbles."

WHAT IS THE RADICAL RIGHT?

The following is a transcript of remarks by Senator Jacob K. Javits on "Senate Report", a television program broadcast on WNEW-TV, New York City, and WKBW-TV, Buffalo, New York, on Sunday, August 11.

* * * * *

My colleague and friend, Senator Barry Goldwater, in a statement reported in the New York Times the other day asked me to define what I meant by "the radical right." He thought it would be helpful if I did so, and I'd like to address myself to it now.

By the radical right, I'm not talking about those people who are trying to overthrow tne government by force, as the Communists are, and I hope that Senator Goldwater would not be confused on that score. I'm talking about those who proceed within the Constitution, but outside what I call the mainstream of American public life.

Now who does that mean? It means, specifically, those groups who call Dwight D. Eisenhower a crypto-communist, or an associate of Communists, or as being influenced by them --- all of which the radical right does not hesitate to do. It means calling for the impeachment of Earl Warren, Chief Justice of the United States, because the radical right doesn't agree with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Indeed, it means seeking to erect a "super court" composed of the chief justices of all state courts and putting the Supreme Court, as it were, out of business. It means not over-hauling the income tax but repealing it. And it also means similar radical moves in respect to labor, in respect to management. It means isolationism in the foreign policy of the United States. For example, the radical right has already started a dedicated campaign against any concept of a test ban treaty or anything remotely approaching it.

This is what I mean by the radical right; and it's a grave danger to our country. Many people have discussed the radical right in more detail. For example, I have here, a couple of recent books on the subject. (The Far Right, Janson and Eismann, McGraw-Hill; and The Sixth Column, Burlingame, Lippincott). There is a recent article in Look Magazine on the radical right invading the Republican Party. There have been a couple of eloquent and important speeches on this subject in the Senate made by my colleague, Senator Tom Kuchel, deputy minority leader. The highly-respected Congressional Quarterly, which digests all of our affairs in Congress has published a list of all these groups. So all this information is available on the radical right.

In addition, it is very interesting -- and perhaps Senator Goldwater has forgotten, although I don't think he has --- that a book called The Great Ideas Today, published by the Encyclopaedia Britannica in 1962, featured a long debate between him and me on this very subject.

I would like to quote from that particular debate between Senator Goldwater and myself, in which I said: "The radical right is attempting to take over the conservative label -- to which it is not entitled -- by exploiting anti-communism and appealing to the normal conservatism of a large segment of our people. But the differences between the radical right and conservatism are clear. The radical right is isolationist in its approach to foreign affairs and negative in its approach to domestic policy. It stresses what it is against. It attacks civil liberties under the guise of anti-communism. It shows mistrust and lack of faith in our governmental institutions and casts suspicion on leading government officials by using the familiar technique of dogmatic and unproved charges, stubornly maintained."

Now that is what the radical right is doing in our country today -- it's very much like the "Know-Nothing" movement in the 1850's and the Ku Klux Klan in the 1920's. And that is why people like myself condemn the radical right and we are against allowing it to infiltrate the Republican Party.

Fellow American:

The Kennedy Administration is continuing to pursue the dangerous strategy of appeasement. Within the past month, we have seen two indications of this: the passage of the Treaty of Moscow, which can only help to weaken our own defense capacity against Communist aggression; the "wheat deal" which, in effect, will serve to bail Khrushchev out of economic disaster. Khrushchev has recently suggested that the United States must take still another step to relieve "tensions" -- acceptance of Communist rule in Cuba. We have grave fears that President Kennedy is prepared to comply and even seek ways and means of assisting the Castro regime.

The following quote from the INSIDER'S NEWSLETTER, a usually authoratative publication, should cause great concern to all Americans:

> "The Kennedy administration will extend a helping hand to hurricane-torn Cuba -- if it can arrange to be pushed into this action. Attorney James B. Donovan, who negotiated the drugs-for-prisioners swap, is involved again, this time retained by the American Friends Service Committee, who want to send help to victims of Hurricane Flora. While the Administration would like to go along, White House advisers feel that JFK cannot afford to look like the initiator of a move to bail out Castro. The test-ban treaty and decision to sell wheat to the Russians have already made him vulnerable to 'soft-on-Communism' charges, they say, and a move to help Cuba would be just too much. The strategy: Kennedy will approve humanitarian steps to help the Cubans if those who urge them can arrange for major religious groups in the U.S. to join together and demand such action, with as much publicity as possible. The religious groups are being lined up now for a 'spontaneous,' united plea to the White House."

We urge you -- together with others in your community -- to keep careful watch on this situation and to take all immediate citizens' action to block this new effort to build the power of an enemy with American food and dollars. Any American help will only serve to continue the enslavement of the Cuban people and the strengthening of Cuba as the central Communist military and subversion base in the Western Hemisphere.

The Committee for the Monroe Doctrine was organized to serve as a "watchdog" on all such moves. We need your help to continue this function. We hope you will find it possible to send us your contribution so as to enable us to continue our efforts to preserve the security of the Nation against any jeopardy, whether it be from within or outside our borders.

We hope we may hear from you soon.

Sincerely,

Eddie Rickenbacker

Organized labor's initiative in Los Angeles has demonstrated that ultra-right attempts to invade the schools can be beaten back—by marshalling the facts, alerting community leaders and informing the public.

In southern California ultra-right crackpots and more respectable reactionaries find a common meeting ground in their unending campaigns of pressure on the school system. They make common cause in their efforts to transform the Bill of Rights into a museum piece—ritually venerated on holiday occasions but very dead in practice.

Among the more substantial groups striving to substitute indoctrination for education and retrogressive mass propaganda for public information are the Coast Federal Savings and Loan Association (third largest business of its kind in the nation) and its two adjuncts, the Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee and the Free Enterprise Department.

Not that Coast Federal stands alone. Far from it. Los Angeles seems to be the capital of authoritarian extremism.

This area hosts the national headquarters of rabble-rouser Gerald L. K. Smith and Dr. Fred Schwarz of the Christian Anti-Communism Crusade; sports three ex-congressmen who were apologists for the John Birch Society while in office, one of whom is now on the Birch paid staff; boasts the headquarters of the President of the California Young Republicans, who openly sought Birch support for his election; serves as the fountainhead of what the immediate past President of the California Republican Assembly called a Birch "conspiracy to capture control" of the Republican Party; and prolongs the uproar over the baseless charges of an "imbalance to the left" on state college faculties.

"Thank you for your nice publicity about Coast Federal in your Los Angeles Citizen," said a spokesman for the loan association when the projected public exposure of its authoritarian extremism was announced by the County Federation of Labor's weekly paper.

The words were in the arrogant tone adopted by Coast Federal President Joe Crail and his staff as the house style for dealing with criticism and opposition.

The statement was uttered, however, before the series of events which culminated in repudiation of Crail's activities by the prominent civic leaders who had served unwittingly as his figureheads. And before the exclusion of his material from the schools which had served for so long as a transmission belt for his propaganda.

Crail's confidence was bred of the power commanded by the lavish use of money—over $250,000 spent by Coast Federal annually for staff, materials and mass media to promote his personal views and programs. It seemed justified by years of acquiescence on the part of many community leaders, government authorities and school officials.

The first major challenge to Crail's influence resulted from the study of his operations issued as a pamphlet by the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor. It was a part of "a systematic program of examining and exposing to public scrutiny the activities of authoritarian extremist groups."

In introducing the pamphlet, W. J. Bassett, Secretary-Treasurer of the Federation, declared: "Of particular concern are the increasing number of businessmen who have lately come to believe that they can safely indulge their far-out political fancies under a newly discovered foolproof disguise—an ostensible fight against the communist danger as a cloak for espousing an equally evil and perilous ultra-right reaction."

The pamphlet described a questionnaire circulated by Coast Federal's "Free Enterprise Department" under the title "Knowledge Is Freedom—Rate Your Americanism I.Q." Its 133 questions apparently reflected a cross-section of the ideas and attitudes of Crail and his staff.

For example, the questionnaire directed those answering to "Score 2 points for each 'approve' answer . . ." on such items as "Right To Work Law" (question 32), "John Birch Society" (question 45). Similarly, scores could be improved by checking the "disapprove" space beside the following:

Minimum wage laws; extension of Social Security; nationalized medicine; subsidies to farmers; Tennessee Valley Authority; federal aid to education; long-range foreign aid; the International Labor Organization; the Human Rights Convention; the United Nations; Radio Free Europe; Voice of America; The Peace Corps; League of Women Voters.

Thus, too, one's "Americanism" rating went down if the following statements were perchance marked as truths rather than "myths" on the questionnaire:

—"Human rights are above property rights."

—"By assisting backward nations, the U.S. Government will teach them the ideals of freedom."

—"Society benefits from minimum wage laws as the standard of living is increased."

—"The Government must provide medical care for the aged for they are unable to provide for themselves."

A score of over 110 on the questionnaire "rating scale" was adjudged "libertarian" by Coast Federal standards. Below that score the classifications were:

"Varying degrees of Republicans and Independent Democrats 51-109
"New Frontiersman 30- 50
"Are you sure you wouldn't prefer England or points farther East? . . . . . Under 30"

Ironically, it was the so-called "Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee," chaired by Joe Crail, functioning under tight control of one of his staff members and housed in Coast Federal's building, that produced the most pernicious propaganda. Most of the prominent public figures whose names appeared over the years on the "Executive Committee" of this group apparently had little to do with preparing the material it published and were largely unaware of its activities.

Among them were the Mayor of Los Angeles, the Chairman of the County Board of Supervisors, the President of the University of California, the superintendents of city and county school systems and leaders of business, church and civic groups, both liberal and conservative.

The Commemoration Committee sponsored an essay contest on the Bill of Rights among high school students in the county school system. Prize money was furnished by Coast Federal—to the tune of thousands of dollars over the years.

Some of the prize-winning essays were then reproduced in an elaborate booklet published annually under the imprint of the Commemoration Committee with the designation "Program and Speakers Manual" or "Digest."

As the contest winners were chosen by a committee established by the school system, the student essays were of a consistently higher quality than other material by "experts" reprinted in the Manuals.

Some of the statements, articles and speeches circulated in the name of the Commemoration Committee over the years were balanced, sound and thoughtful. But viewed as a whole, the material was distinctly slanted—and sometimes made a mockery of the Bill of Rights itself. Frequently this resulted from a subtle shading of tone, a particular emphasis in theme, a choice of writers. Just as often, however, the material was blatantly biased, vulgarly anti-democratic and politically partisan.

Thus the Speaker's Manuals (or Digests) placed heavy stress on alleged usurpation of states' rights by the federal government and courts to the purported detriment of the people; the imminence of total loss of freedoms, particularly property rights; the evil of social welfare and social security programs; the alleged undermining of freedom by programs of federal aid for solving social and economic problems. No counter-balancing view was presented.

Within the recurrent theme of the evils of federal government action, a constant refrain was encroachment by the federal judiciary. The 1955 Manual quoted from a speech by Congressman Howard W. Smith of Virginia:

"We have reached a point of centralized government that has swallowed up the reserve states' rights. We have transferred the administration of justice away from home into the strange and faraway hands of the federal courts."

One of the strong motivations for the attacks on the U.S. Supreme Court was opposition to its decisions against racial discrimination and segregation. This was made clear by the following words of Spruille Braden in a three-page reprint of his speech in the 1960 Speakers Digest:

"Abuses and distorted interpretations of the Bill of Rights have been fortified in recent years by the Supreme Court's and other judicial findings or decrees usurping legislative powers, making policy and, in effect, amending the Bill of Rights and Constitution . . .

"But what deference for the first 10 amendments can we expect from a Supreme Court which based a most important decision, not on the Constitution or Bill of Rights, on law or precedent, but on philosophical speculations in a book by Gunnar Myrdal . . ."

In most instances where federal "encroachment" was attacked in the Manual, what was really involved was the issue of the federal protection of human rights against infringement by state or local authorities. So the Manuals are slanted against not only equal rights action but also against safeguards of the right of collective bargaining.

For example, the concluding paragraph of an article in the 1961 Manual by the Honorable M. T. Phelps (former Arizona judge) reads:

"Even the jurisdiction of courts of sovereign states in labor disputes, where it is alleged (whether true or not) that the Fair Labor Practice Act has been violated, has been denied until consent of the National Labor Relations Board has been procured. This is true even though the NLRB had previously rejected jurisdiction of the dispute."

Disparagement of the democratic process was combined with hostility towards federal programs of social concern and the "welfare state."

In this vein, President Franklin D. Roosevelt was assailed in an article by Felix Morley in the 1959 Manual:

". . . there is little doubt that in this way we have been chiseling at freedom for a long time . . . President Roosevelt's 'four freedoms' statement, made nearly a year before Pearl Harbor, is a case in point . . .

". . . This is emphasized by a glance at the other pair of freedoms—'from want' and 'from fear'—which Mr. Roosevelt said it is the duty of government to provide. These have actually no relation to freedom, properly defined and understood . . .

". . . One could wish that the 'four freedoms' speech had been a mere oratorical gesture, with no continuing significance for the problems of today. Unfortunately, it was the basis of the whole so-called 'Economic Bill of Rights' and therefore the fountainhead from which the current flood of welfare spending continues to pour forth . . ."

Even as the Manuals assailed programs of social concern in general, so did they also attack specific measures—with never a word of reply.

Thus in a page-and-a-half of excerpts in the 1960 Manual, Senator Barry Goldwater was quoted as saying:

". . . You and I must decide whether we intend to continue down the road of federal aid and federal subsidies. Last year the federal Congress passed the so-called 'Defense Education Act.' This year they are being urged to pass a federal subsidy for the construction of schools. We have federal aid for highways. These programs always start small and end big . . .

". . . If we continue down this road, we will become a people who will be leaning on Uncle Sam . . ."

The Manuals, together with other materials, were over the years widely distributed to teachers and students, PTA leaders, civic groups and the general public.

When the County Federation of Labor's pamphlet on Coast Federal began to circulate, intense interest was generated—within the Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee itself no less than among other civic leaders and school-centered groups.

Further evidence, gathered independently of the Federation, was made available. Additional information was submitted to the school system administrators from various sources. Protests were made to the City and County Boards of Education and public hearings were proposed.

A closed meeting of the Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee was called by the Chairman of the County Board of Supervisors. Members present discussed the establishment of objective standards for materials issued in the Committee's name and the possible formation of a screening committee.

In the meantime, the New York Times' western edition carried a lengthy story on the expose by the Federation and quoted Joe Crail as replying:

"They're unwitting dupes of the Communists. They are just carrying out the Communist line. They're pretty ignorant about what's going on. They'll learn."

In the ensuing weeks, newspapers reported several public resignations from the Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee, including that of the Mayor and the Chairman of the County Board of Supervisors. Others resigned without public fanfare.

What had happened to the Committee was made glaringly evident when the new Manual was issued in December of 1962. For the first time the list of Committee members was entirely omitted, except for the name of Chairman Joe Crail.

An offshoot of the Committee, a separate committee with the sole function of conducting an annual observance at the City Council, requested permission in January 1963 to once again conduct its ceremonies. Crail's name was nowhere mentioned in connection with the request. There was a minor flurry of excitement as Councilmen endeavored to learn whether the group was part of Crail's operation.

The observance was subsequently held, but without Crail. Even so, several of the Councilmen protested.

During the same period the County school system quietly dropped the essay contest which had been backed by Coast Federal contributions and the city schools ceased using his material.

Since then Crail has abandoned all pretense that his Free Enterprise Department and his controlled Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee were separate entities. Interested persons are provided materials from both at the same office in the Coast Federal Building.

Despite these setbacks for Crail, it cannot be said that the last battle has yet been fought. He will undoubtedly try a new offensive to regain access to the schools, restore his community position and redeem his prestige.

Perhaps the answer lies in part in another direction. Citing Coast Federal as a case in point, the California Assembly Subcommittee on Tax Administration declared last November:

"We believe that the public should not be required to subsidize, through tax deductibility, the propagation of political opinions of corporate executives."

The subcommittee recommended specific revision of state tax laws. Federal tax reform along similar lines would appear to be an imperative need.

But in any event, labor has shown that by exposing authoritarian extremist groups to public scrutiny, they can be driven into retreat.

low inmates of Ivan Denisovich's – a naval captain, a film operator who knew Eisenstein, a young Baptist with whom Ivan Denisovich has a very interesting conversation about God and religion, a brigadier who was expelled from the army as the son of a kulak, a deaf peasant who during the war ran away three times from captivity; some Latvians and Estonians. They are all portrayed with a sure touch, their speech highly individualized. We see everything through the mind of this simple, honest, hardworking peasant, who loves work, despises easy money (there is a very interesting sidelight on the possiblity of making easy money in the Soviet Union in the account of the village carpet-makers, told very effectively in the give-and-take of Shukhov's wife's letter to him and his thoughts on it, without either the one or the other being "quoted"), and more or less goodhumoredly adjusts himself to his plight, with all his thoughts bent on "surviving" until his sentence expires. It is strongly spiced with bits of camp slang, for which even a Russian may need a special glossary. It is quite unlike the pedestrian manner and the often emasculated language of the run-of-the-mill socialist realism writers. The author has no hesitation in using either dialecticisms or coarse words, of the type which Sholkhov was forced to prune from his Quiet Don when he revised the work just before Stalin's death.

For the Westerner who has read many first-hand accounts of Soviet labor camps there are no revelations in Solzhenitsyn's story. It merely confirms – and does so with great artistic effectiveness – what was long known. Nor was it probably new to a great many Soviet readers: even among the Soviet intelligentsia there are a number of people who went through all this. What was new was the chance of reading it in a well-known Soviet magazine and of discussing it freely. Private reports from Moscow say that the entire "liberal" faction of Soviet literary community has hailed the story as a symbol and a hopeful omen. So far, however, there have been very few reactions in print. One of the first was an article by Konstantin Simonov in Izvestia (November 18). Coming from Simonov, a noted timeserver, an active participant in the Zhdanov campaign against "rootless cosmopolitans," many of the things he said must have sounded as somewhat hypocritical. He welcomed the story as the final and incontrovertible revelation of the "black and bitter truth" about the iniquities of Stalin's reign of terror. It is significant, however, that Solzhenitsyn himself never mentions Stalin by name (one of the characters on one occasion refers to "the big mustachio'd one"); nor are there any hackneyed references to the "cult of personality." But, scattered here and there throughout the story, are remarks and observations which may make a thoughtful reader question some of the basic premises of the Communist experiment and of the Soviet regime.

Whether Khrushchev's surprising permissiveness with regard to Solzhenitsyn will give rise to a new crop of works exposing the evils of Stalinism is difficut to say. Two more of Solzhenitsyn's stories were to appear in the January issue of Novy Mir; one of them is about collective farms and is reported to be extremely "crude." It is possible that this "expository" line will be continued in literature and will run parallel with the clamping-down on avant-garde trends. Those who represent the latter will probably once more go underground, and their work will reach the outside world through clandestine channels. The emergence of this clandestine literature is one of the most interesting things about the Soviet literary scene since 1957, but this is another story.

Reapportionment and the Courts

by Malcolm E. Jewell

The decision of the Supreme Court last March in Baker v Carr, opened the way to judicial review of state legislative apportionment and made possible, but not inevitable, a major change in the balance of power in American states. The Court declared that malapportionment in the states may be so "invidious" as to constitute a violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. But the Court provided no definition of invidious discrimination; it set no guidelines for the lower courts to follow. Since the decision, the lower courts, both federal and state, have acted more swiftly than many had expected. Lawsuits have been filed in at least 35 states, and in 18 states there have been judicial decisions holding the existing legislative apportionment of one or both houses invalid. In Alabama, Maryland and Tennessee the action was taken in time to affect the 1962 elections.

But although the courts have acted swiftly and in many states have forced quick action by the legislatures, they have not acted with unanimity. Three paramount questions remain unanswered: How much equality in apportionment is required by the equal protection clause? Do the same standards of equality apply to both houses of a state legislature? Will the courts accept the judgment of the voters concerning apportionment? The Supreme Court will have the opportunity to provide answers to these questions, if it chooses, since each of these issues is involved in one or more of the cases already appealed to the Court from Virginia, New York, Alabama, Maryland and Michigan.

The Supreme Court did not require that legislative apportionment be based exactly on population, and the concurring opinions of Justices Clark and Douglas explicitly stated that mathematical equality is not necessary. Lower courts have varied widely in trying to set standards. Courts in Tennessee, Oklahoma, Vermont and Virginia, for example, demanded greater equality than did the courts in Florida and New York. In November, a federal court invalidated the Virginia apportionment enacted in April which had increased urban representation but left disparities of 2.5 to 1 in the Senate and more than 4 to 1 in the House. Last August a federal court upheld the apportionment provisions in the New York constitution even though these have produced disparities up to 14 to 1 and have effectively guaranteed Republican control of the state legislature. These two contrasting decisions have both been appealed to the Supreme Court, and Justice Warren has granted a stay in the Virginia case.

The courts are unlikely to agree on mathematical standards, in part because they believe that other factors are relevant, factors that may be summed up in the favorite judicial phrase – a "rational" system. The court in New York believed that the apportionment formula there is well adapted to the needs of New York because it balances factors of population, area, accessibility and character of interest of the districts. But judicial standards of rationality differ ultimately, the Supreme Court will probably have to establish some mathematical limits to inequality in order to prevent judicial confusion and contradictions.

The most serious contradiction emerging from lower court opinions to date involves the question of whether the equal protection clause applies to one or both houses of the legislature. The Virginia case is one of several in which the lower court has insisted on "substantial equality" in both houses. Likewise, the federal court in Alabama determined that population must be used to some extent as the basis for apportionment in both houses. The court ordered into effect certain portions of a package plan adopted by the Alabama legislature in response to judicial pressure, but it rejected one part which would have allotted a single Senator to each county, varying in population from 11,000 to 634,000. This decision has also been appealed to the Supreme Court.

By contrast, the Maryland Court of Appeals has upheld a decision by Circuit Court Judge O. Bowie Duckett, who argued that a geographical base for apportionment in one house is not only permissible but is an essential part of the system of checks and balances, an important ingredient in a republican form of government, and a vital protection to minorities. The Judge ordered reapportionment of the House, which has now been accomplished, but the Senate remains unchanged pending an appeal to the Supreme Court.

In July, the Michigan Supreme Court, in a 4 to 3 decision along party lines, ruled that the apportionment system in the Senate, which is weighted heavily in favor of rural areas, violated the Fourteenth Amendment. The Democratic majority ordered reapportionment within a month, but Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart stayed the decision pending review by the Supreme Court. His comments during the hearing indicated a belief that a state could use some bases other than population alone for apportioning one house of the legislature.

The term "federal plan" is often used for an apportionment system based on population in one house and geography in the other. Its proponents argue that the method used for apportioning Congress should be good enough for the states, but the Congressional analogy is specious because the states are not federations of counties. Moreover, such a system at the state level is designed to discriminate against urban areas and results in legislative deadlock and frequently divided partisan control of the two houses. This is neither the purpose nor the result of the apportionment plan for the US Senate and House.

The Michigan case also raises the question of whether the courts should try to interpret or ignore the mandate of the voters. The present Senate apportionment plan was approved by Michigan voters in 1952 in preference to a population plan. If the Court does not act soon, it may face the further problem of interpreting the meaning of the Michigan voters' decision concerning a new constitution to be voted on April, which contains only limited revisions in Senate apportionment along with many other controversial changes in the constitution. If the courts try to interpret the meaning of the voters' actions in such a case, they will be embarking in a venture for which the pollsters are better suited. The federal judges in New York, however, speculated that the voters in that state did not want reapportionment because in 1957 they rejected a proposed constitutional convention that might, among other things have acted on reapportionment. There has been no uniformity of judicial behavior on this point. The Federal court approved a Florida reapportionment subject to popular approval, and the voters disapproved. But in Alabama the court ordered reapportionment to take effect before the voters could act on the legislature's plan.

The fundamental argument against judicial reliance on the popular will is that the Fourteenth Amendment applies to minorities as well as majorities. In fact it has been traditionally used by the courts to protect minorities. Under-representation of urban counties is no less a denial of "equal protection" simply because a minority of voters live in the urban counties.

This babel of lower court decisions has provided few guidelines for the legislatures that will meet this year. The time is ripe for a decision from the US Supreme Court that will give answers at least to these major questions. If the Court fails to provide some mathematical definition of rationality, the legislatures will be encouraged to provide a bare minimum of reapportionment. If the Court accepts the principle of the federal plan, it will encourage political deadlock in the states and largely negate the effect of its original decision. If the Court tolerates inequalities because of explicit or implicit approval by the voters, it will be emasculating the principle of equal protection of the law by applying it only to majorities. The logic of the March, 1962, decision, rooted as it is in the equal protection clause, seems to require that substantial equality of representation should apply to every legislative body in all states.

Tennessee's legislature debates reapportionment: After 61 years, foot-dragging

The U.S. Voting Map: A Year of Change

A year ago next week, the U.S. Supreme Court decreed that Federal courts had the right to review apportionment of state legislatures wherever antiquated, distorted districting robs voters of "equal protection of the laws" guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. The decision, in the now-famous case of Charles W. Baker vs. Joe C. Carr, struck a blow at a major U.S. political malady—and loosed a phenomenal outburst of judicial and legislative activity.

It has been a year of greater stir toward reapportionment than the nation had witnessed in a whole half century:

▶Legislatures in 36 states have come under attack in the courts for malapportionment. (In the other fourteen states—with the glaring exception of Texas*—experts consider that apportionment is mostly equitable.)

▶In nineteen states—such as Oklahoma, where outmoded districting gave a single vote in one senatorial district the weight of 26 in another—courts have found existing apportionment unconstitutional. In six other states, hearings are still in preliminary stages.

▶In fifteen states, reapportionment plans have been passed for one or both legislative bodies, and ten more states are now likely to take such action.

Actual results are spotty in terms of genuine reform and political impact. But nowhere has a state legislature refused to heed the courts—and nowhere have the courts attempted to pre-empt the actual blueprinting of how to reapportion before the legislatures could come to grips with it. Everywhere observers have been struck by both the volume and the smooth course of reapportioning activity. After the disorder that dogged the 1954 school desegregation decision, some officials feared a "nationwide explosion" would follow the Baker ruling. "But," said one at the Justice Department last week, "the court apparently touched a nerve common to most Americans—that malapportionment was indeed unfair."

Curiously, though both racial and rural issues are prevalent there, the Southern states as a group are the ones that have acted most promptly to redraw the voting map. Indeed, the desegregation process itself may well have made the South more conditioned to change than the North.

In states that reapportioned, some of the old prejudices that stemmed from the rural domination of the legislatures began to die. Examples:

▶After Maryland's urban areas got nineteen new House seats through stopgap reapportionment, the legislature of the former slave state passed a previously rejected law that guaranteed Negroes the right to eat and sleep in public accommodations in the urban counties.

▶Reapportionment of Georgia's Senate on a population basis gave Fulton County (Atlanta) six new senators. One of them, Leroy Johnson, is a Negro. His Republican opponent in November's general election was a Negro, too.

Yet despite such bright spots, and for all the sheer activity generated by Baker vs. Carr, progress so far falls short of liberal hopes of meaningful reform on a nationwide scale. Indeed, some experts believe it is too soon even at the end of a busy year to say just how substantially legislative power will follow the steady movement of the nation's population away from the farms.

Most reapportioning legislatures try to do as little as possible—as long as they seem to pass muster with court rulings. The "apple knockers," the "pork choppers," the "wool hats"—those powerful rural legislators—are understandably reluctant to vote themselves out of power. In Florida, for example, 14 per cent of the population was able to elect a majority in the House, 12 per cent in the Senate; under the legislature's revised plan, 29.5 per cent can elect a majority in the House, 14.5 per cent in the Senate.

Criteria? The nub of the problem is that the Supreme Court decision did not lay down clear-cut criteria for fair apportionment; it merely sent the case back to a lower court for reconsideration. Nowhere is this brake on action plainer than in Tennessee, where the legislature's adamant refusal to reapportion itself for 61 years brought on Baker vs. Carr—and where the legislature is still dragging its feet.

At Nashville this week, the Senate is scheduled to act on a bill to make its membership reflect more fairly the shift in population from the country areas to the city. With little doubt the bill will pass; it was drawn up by a committee controlled by the very bloc that dominates the Senate as a whole—a majority of rural members. But it would barely make a dent in the present apportionment that now allows 26.9 per cent of the electorate to choose a majority.

The senators from the state's five underrepresented urban areas were prepared for the real fight—not the one under the huge bronze chandelier that lights the Senate chamber.

Back to Court: "We're going to have to go back to the Federal Court," said state Sen. Hobart Atkins and former Congressman Walter Chandler. As two of the battery of lawyers who had brought Baker vs. Carr to the Supreme Court, they were used to litigation. They already had obtained an order from a three-judge Federal court panel insisting that the Tennessee legislature apportion properly by June 3 or face the possibility that the panel would do the job itself.

So far reapportionment in action has dashed another fond liberal hope of reapportionment in theory—notably that it would boost the political fortunes of liberal Democrats at the expense of conservative Republicans. The hope is based on the assumption that normally Democratic cities now will get better representation, and that the reapportioned legislatures eventually will create Congressional districts more favorable to Democrats. Democratic National Chairman John M. Bailey was still hoping last week when he said: "We are sure that if there is fair apportionment, we will win and increase our Democratic membership in the Congress and in the legislatures . . ."

After an extensive survey for the Brookings Institution, Cornell political scientist Andrew Hacker came to a different view: "Remember the American voter is a queer character. He'll vote for a liberal Democratic President like JFK, then go down the line and elect conservative congressmen from the other party." Hacker concluded that reapportionment would help the suburbs far more than the cities—and the suburbs are conservative strongholds. GOP National Chairman William Miller agrees that Republicans will generally benefit: "Underrepresentation is most flagrant in the fast-growing suburbs, not in the solidly Democratic urban districts."

Newsweek—Tony Rollo

Miller: . . . But suburbs aren't

Despite the possibility that the legislatures will become more progressive and give the urban areas—with their racial tensions, their financial deficits, their slums, and their overcrowded schools—a better deal, the implications of the Federal courts' actions during the last year worry some legal experts. One of them is tweedy, pipe-smoking, crewcut Phil C. Neal, new dean of the University of Chicago law school.

"It's really a much more difficult problem than the court seemed to realize," he said last week. "It has created a kind of momentum for getting into great difficulties . . ." As Associate Justice Felix Frankfurter (one of the two dissenters) had put it, Baker vs. Carr led the Court into the "political thicket."

Loose Ends: Most of Neal's "great difficulties" are the loose ends of the Baker decision. Already the lower Federal courts have handed down conflicting answers to the questions that the Supreme Court skipped over. The litigation pressing upward to the high court may force the nine justices to make some hard-and-fast rules about legislative apportionment—and hard-and-fast rules can be dangerous.

Does the Baker decision imply, Neal asks, that every vote in a legislative election should have approximately the same weight—the "one man, one vote" theory? If not, what is fair representation? "It can't be answered by arithmetic. The notion of one man, one vote seems so plausible, so superficially fair. But what if you said that everybody should pay the same taxes?" Neal demands. The Justice Department's view, expressed by Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, leans strongly toward "one man, one vote" as an ideal.

What about the 36 states that apportion one house or both according to area, geography, or a combination of area, geography, and population?

'Federal Plan': Many states—particularly those in the West where a single populous city could easily dominate a legislature—give each county or town an equal number of senators—a "little Federal plan." It's so named because its proponents feel it parallels the U.S. Congress where the House is apportioned by population, yet each state has two senators, regardless of size. Yet the Justice Department rejects the parallel on the ground that states were independent to begin with, while the smaller governmental units within them are merely creatures of each state. It argues that towns and counties may be represented in a state legislature "as long as there is no more than a modest departure" from the ideal of one man, one vote.

Some Federal judges have drawn strict mathematical guidelines for apportionment, claiming the right to apportion the legislatures in the courts if the legislatures fail to do the job themselves. Some have suggested apportionment by population in both houses; still another court accepted New York's popularly apportioned assembly along with its senate, districted according to a formula involving both area and population.

Congress Ruling: Still another case could be more important than all the others. In Wesberry vs. Vandiver, a lower court said that it couldn't rule on the constitutionality of Georgia's Congressional districts because the U.S. Congress is a branch of government "coequal" with the Federal judiciary. This case also has gone to the Supreme Court.

Where the year's backlog of debates and decisions and appeals will lead, no one can be sure. But at least the growing concern over reapportionment has emphasized the importance of those governmental orphans, the legislatures, to the Federal union.

In a simpler age, before America moved from the farm to the awesome complexities of the cities, the legislatures were powerful enough to elect U.S. senators and astute enough to solve state problems without turning to Washington for help. But the states failed to cope with economic depression; their legislatures were ill prepared for the urban population explosion. The Federal government's aid became more and more necessary, and the states began to atrophy in power.

Yet can a nation as diverse in geography, social attitudes, business, and agricultural interests govern itself entirely from Washington? Can the Federal system be revitalized to balance the cry of "states' rights" against the need for "states' responsibilities"? Baker vs. Carr and its aftermath still can jar the states into the twentieth century, and show that the prickly trip through Mr. Justice Frankfurter's thicket is not only necessary but worthwhile.

INTEGRATION: ALBANY

Officially Unofficial

Peach and wild-plum trees were blooming pink and white under a balmy sky in Albany, Ga., last week, and to the Negroes of that racially tense community it seemed for a while that things were really thawing out. After more than a year of futile integration efforts by the Negro coalition group, the Albany Movement, the city council suddenly announced it was junking a whole slew of segregation ordinances.

At first the Negroes of Albany (pronounced "all-benny") were jubilant. "We are overjoyed at the decision," said Charles Sherrod, director of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee's voter registration project in southwestern Georgia. "Albany can now show the way to the country and the world." Dr. W.G. Anderson, osteopath and president of the Albany Movement, proclaimed "a great moral victory."

Doused: But the jubilation was short-lived. The arch-segregationist Albany Herald doused it with a city commissioner's explanation: "This action simply lets the city out of the business of attempting to compel any action of any individual operating a business. Now the decisions on integration and segregation rest solely with individual citizens and not with the city of Albany. In our view this will strengthen the existing social pattern of segregation."

Negro leaders determined to learn just how much integration—if any—abolition of the Jim Crow ordinances meant. The answer came swiftly.

When four Negro teen-agers sat down at a lunch counter at the rear of the Lee Drug Store, the manager produced a sign reading, "We reserve the right to refuse service to anyone," and ordered them out. City police suddenly appeared and arrested the four for trespassing. The same day, two Negro youths were arrested for sitting on "white" benches in recorder's court; two Negro leaders were refused service in a Howard Johnson restaurant.

The next day five Negro girls tried to buy tickets at the Albany movie theater and were told: "Go away. We don't want your business." A pair of teen-agers who tried to enter a "white" cab received this brusque response from the driver: "I'm sorry. I can't haul niggers."

Newsweek—Karl Fleming

Matinee at the Albany: 'We don't want your business'

Albany's Negroes found one crack in the color wall. The city's Carnegie Library, which along with the parks and playgrounds had been shut down since August, reopened for a 30-day trial period of "vertical" integration: Negroes could borrow books—but reading room chairs and tables had been removed.

By the middle of the week, Negro leaders had clearly established that abolition of Albany's segregation laws was only a legal tactic by stubborn foes; a stronger, unwritten law prevailed. Yet members of the movement kept testing the use of public facilities with small groups. "We must show the nation that segregation is not suddenly dead in Albany," explained Dr. Anderson.

No one was in more agreement with that conclusion than Police Chief Laurie Pritchett, flanked by the U.S. and Confederate flags in his City Hall office. When a reporter asked what the situation was now that the city was out of the segregation business, Pritchett laughed heartily and replied: "You look around and see if you can find anything integrated. If you do, call me."

THE HIGH SEAS:

'Jolly Good Show!'

Little Andrew McLeod of Killam, Alta., was broken up when his dog Ben, suddenly stricken and paralyzed, had to be shot. The dog, it was true, had nipped him on the cheek a few days before, but it was just being playful. There was not much time to mourn though, because in a few days Andrew, age 4, and his mother and sisters, Caroline, 6, and Allison, 2, were off on an ocean voyage to England, for a visit to grandmother in Sussex.

Andrew's father, Dr. H.R. McLeod, thought Ben's trouble was distemper, but just to make sure he sent the dog's head to a province lab for a check. Last week, with Mrs. McLeod and the little ones well out at sea on the Queen Elizabeth, there came a report from the health officer in Calgary: possible rabies.

Canadian officials called Washington; the U.S. Public Health Service called the Coast Guard, and soon a Coast Guard C-130 was taking off in a soupy fog at the Elizabeth City, N.C., air station, with several canisters of anti-rabies serum aboard.

Two hours later Lt. Comdr. Paul Tifft brought his four-engine transport down like a crop duster over the red-and-black smokestacks. Two serum canisters chuted gently down and were picked up minutes later in the water.

"Jolly good show!" exclaimed an amazed sailor. The passengers applauded and the ship's captain radioed warm regards. "Dropped serum at 12:13," pilot Tifft reported, turning for home, 500 miles back. "Picked up by ship's boat at 12:16 . . . departing." A little later Andrew got the first of his fourteen shots. His mother said: "He's fit as a fiddle."

Snooping

As the Soviet skipper told it to Tass last week, two U.S. cruisers and a destroyer hove up on the horizon, sounded a battle alarm, uncovered their gun muzzles, and lobbed four non-explosive dummy shells at his trawler, SR-TR-0997, plunking one shot within 75 yards to starboard. This odd assault, the skipper alleged, occurred March 8 while the SR-TR-0997 was fishing some 70 miles east of Norfolk, Va.

Reapportionment – General

Breaking the Rural Strangle Hold . . Will Maslow

The momentous decision of the U. S. Supreme Court in Baker v. Carr, the Tennessee reapportionment case, and the thirty-odd state and federal decisions which it evoked, indicate that we are on the threshold of a development that may vastly improve our legislative bodies. More than fifty suits have been started in thirty-eight different states in the twelve months that have elapsed since the Supreme Court ruled that "invidious discrimination" in the apportionment or districting of a state legislature violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Although none of these suits has yet resulted in the permanent and equitable "remap" of a state legislature, enough has already been accomplished to quicken hope that the rural strangle hold of our state legislatures may soon be broken. There has been more action on reapportionment in this last year than in the prior twenty-five years. However, no equivalent attack has yet been mounted on the gerrymandering of Congressional seats.

The decision in Baker v. Carr was handed down on March 26, 1962. Heroic efforts were at once made by disfranchised urban voters to enjoin the 1962 primaries to compel reapportionment of the state legislatures to be chosen in the general elections. But while fifteen state and federal district courts moved with unprecedented speed to find that existing legislative apportionments denied certain voters equal protection of the laws, they were not prepared, in the summer of 1962, to fashion judicial remedies until this year's state legislatures had an opportunity to correct glaring discrepancies in voting power. However, federal courts in Alabama, Florida, Georgia and Tennessee, and the state courts in Maryland, prodded state legislatures into special session, and temporary arrangements were hurriedly devised which increased urban representation in one or both chambers.

Forty-seven of the state legislatures will be in session this year. Even those that have not been warned by the courts are on notice that failure to reapportion equitably may result in judicial remedies for malapportionment.

Perhaps the greatest gains from last year's litigation were achieved in Georgia. The infamous "county unit" plan—whereby candidates for state offices and Congressional districts were required to obtain not a popular majority, but only a majority of the units assigned to counties and districts—was invalidated. On March 18, the Supreme Court not only sustained this decision, but went further: by a vote of 8 to 1, it outlawed any voting system in which votes were weighted. The Court stated that our "conception of equality . . . can mean only one thing—one person, one vote." The opinion, of course, does not affect apportionment of state legislators, but the overtones are unmistakable.

Another law suit in Georgia led to a reapportionment of the state senate hastily enacted by a special legislative session. Metropolitan Atlanta and other urban areas were assigned twenty-three of the fifty-four senate seats. In one senatorial district in Atlanta, with a heavy Negro concentration, two Negroes ran against each other in the general elections and Leroy Johnson, the Democratic candidate, was elected—the first Negro to serve in the Georgia legislature since Reconstruction.

In Tennessee, the legislature was called into special session even before the Supreme Court had remanded Baker v. Carr to the Federal District Court. The legislature enacted measures increasing the representation of the state's four metropolitan counties from about one-half to three-quarters of the number to which they would have been entitled on population standards. The federal court held, however, that the remap was still inadequate, and decided that the legislature to be elected in 1962 on the basis of the improved apportionment should have until June, this year, to revise the apportionment. The Court stated that "at least one house [of the legislature] should be based fully on population."

There have been surprisingly few setbacks in the coast-to-coast effort to overcome districting frozen for a generation. (Twenty-seven states have not reapportioned their state legislatures in twenty-five years; in eight states in more than fifty years.) A three-man federal district court upheld the apportionment in New York State fixed by its 1894 constitution; an appeal to the Supreme Court is now pending. New Hampshire's singular arrangement, whereby senate seats are divided according to direct taxes paid, was ruled constitutional. (The plan, though odd, is probably equivalent to representation based on population.) Suits in South Dakota and Wyoming were dismissed on technical grounds and efforts to challenge the reapportionment of Congressional seats in Florida, Georgia and Texas failed.

The federal and state courts that were suddenly confronted with reapportionment issues had little guidance from the Supreme Court. Baker v. Carr laid down no guide lines, substantive or procedural, and deliberately refused to indicate the extent of discrimination that would render an apportionment plan unconstitutional. After its decision in the Tennessee case, the Supreme Court reversed the decision of the Michigan Supreme Court and of a district court in New York, remanding both cases for further consideration in the light of Baker v. Carr, but giving no further clarification. Whether the Court can continue to avoid coming to grips with the thorny problems involved remains to be seen. On its fall docket are no less than ten reapportionment cases from Alabama, Georgia, Maryland, Michigan, New York, Oklahoma and Virginia.

Many questions must be decided. Must a state apportion both houses of its legislature on a population basis, or is a "federal plan" (with representation in one house based on geography or political subdivisions) sufficient? May a federal court set aside an inequitable distribution that was approved originally by popular vote? Must a federal court refrain from judicial intervention if a state allows its voters by initiative and referendum to by-pass the state legislature and place an apportionment plan on the ballot? Are federal courts limited to situations, like Tennessee, where apportionment plans violate state constitutions, or may they strike down discriminatory plans required by such constitutions? May an apportionment originally valid become unconstitutional by reason of the passage of time or changed circumstances? Is an apportionment constitutional because it is rational, i.e., based on some plan or principle, such as geography, even though it is obviously inequitable and discriminatory? And, finally, and perhaps most difficult: How discriminatory must a system be to violate the Fourteenth Amendment?

Some courts have been beguiled into sanctioning the so-called federal plan under which one house of a state legislature is apportioned on the basis of geography, not population. Others have explicitly rejected the federal analogy, pointing out that while a sovereign state may be entitled to equality of representation in the U.S. Senate, a political subdivision, like a county, is not. After all, small states gained equality in the original Constitution because, without such representation, there would have been no union. But our notions of voting equality have advanced since the eighteenth century and no such sacrifice of principle is required now.

Apart from the sixteen states which sanction the federal plan, there are twenty-five others in which the population basis of apportionment is qualified, usually by the requirement that each county, no matter how small, is entitled to at least one representative in one or both houses. The inevitable result of such qualifications is rural over-representation.

Some lower courts have struggled to find a numerical formula for voting inequality. A federal district court in Georgia indicated that it would sanction discrepancies in voting power provided the ensuing discrimination did not exceed the disparity that exists against any state in the Electoral College. But Alaska has one vote in the Electoral College for each bloc of 75,000 persons, whereas California has one elector for each 393,000. Thus the Electoral College analogy would sanction districts having a five-to-one advantage over others. On the other hand, a three-man federal court in New York found no constitutional discrimination in the 1894 apportionment under which it was alleged that state senate districts varied in population from 146,000 to 344,000 and assembly districts from 14,000 to 115,000.

"Paw, I've come back for Sis."

Congressional districting presents simpler problems. The apportionment of seats in the House of Representatives among the states is done automatically each decade in accordance with census figures. But each state legislature is then free to draw its own Congressional district lines, dividing the seats allotted to it. Rurally dominated legislatures then proceed to gerrymander, diluting the value of urban and Negro votes. In Michigan, Congressional districts range in population from 177,000 to 802,000; in Texas, from 216,000 to 951,000; in Georgia from 272,000 to 823,000. In Florida, the state supreme court last October found nothing improper in a system whereby Congressional districts varied from 237,000 to 660,000.

Wherever there are large blocs of Negro voters, they are concentrated in one Congressional district instead of being dispersed among several which they might control or carry. According to a study published in Ebony magazine, Negroes constitute 17.8 per cent of the population of our thirty largest cities, yet there will be only five Negro Congressmen in the 88th Congress.

But Congress has the power not only to require "compact and contiguous" districts, but to forbid large population variances. Congressman Celler's bill, which will undoubtedly be pushed in 1963, forbids any Congressional district to vary from a state-wide average by more than 20 per cent, a minimum range enjoyed today in only a dozen states.

Perhaps the best way of appreciating the speed and forthrightness of the courts in coping with these unprecedented problems is to describe some of the most striking cases. On April 14, 1962, a three-judge federal district court, having before it an application for a temporary injunction to prevent the holding in Alabama of the state primary elections of May, 1962, and the general elections of November, 1962, did not wait for the introduction of evidence. It quoted the Alabama constitution requiring that "representation in the legislature shall be based upon population" and revised decennially, and took judicial notice of an Alabama state court decision that there had been no reapportionment based on population changes since 1901. It then postponed the suit until July 16, 1962, to give the Alabama legislature opportunity to comply with the state constitutional mandate.

The Alabama legislature was called into special session on June 5 and on July 12, four days before the judicial deadline, approved a proposed constitutional amendment (subject to popular ratification) reapportioning the state senate and lower chamber. It also adopted a stand-by statute, apportioning each chamber on a different basis to become effective if the constitutional amendment were rejected by the federal court or the people.

On July 21, the federal district court found that both the constitutional amendment and the stand-by measure were inacceptable and voided both. It then promulgated a temporary reapportionment plan solely to elect the 1963 legislature, incorporating the house apportionment of the constitutional amendment and the senate apportionment of the stand-by measure, choosing for each house the plan closest to true equality of representation. The court specifically rejected a "federal plan" which, indeed, would have been worse than the existing malapportionment. This was the first time a federal court had ever actually reapportioned a state legislature and was the first reapportionment in Alabama since 1901. Two days later, Gov. John Patterson (who has earned national notoriety for his intransigence on Negro suffrage and desegregation) accepted the order of the federal court. An effort to obtain a stay of the order from Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black proved unsuccessful and a second primary election was held in August, 1962.

The representation of urban areas has been increased in the new legislature, the Birmingham delegation being enlarged from seven to seventeen and that from Mobile County from three to eighteen. Nevertheless, 27.6 per cent of the people of Alabama still elect a majority of the Alabama senate.

The district court has meanwhile retained jurisdiction of the case (Sims v. Frink) in order to give this year's Alabama legislature an opportunity to provide for a true reapportionment of both houses and to break what the court called "the strangle hold." But the court warned that if the 1963 legislature failed to act, it would exercise its "solemn duty" to prevent a denial of the equal protection of the law.

Not all courts have been as forceful in seeking to achieve equality of representation. On July 23, 1962, a federal district court invalidated Florida's 1961 reapportionment and ordered a new plan to be promulgated for the 1962 elections, warning that if it were not done, the court would itself "fashion a remedy of judicial apportionment by judicial decree." The legislature met in special session in August, 1962, and drew up a new plan, which the court approved on September 6.

The apportionment plan was, however, rejected by the voters, the opposition being greatest in the more populous counties and cities. The Florida legislature was again called into special session to draft a new apportionment, but after twenty days of deadlock it adjourned without any action, leaving the matter once more in the hands of the federal court.

State courts were no less forceful than federal courts. On April 23, 1962, the U. S. Supreme Court, in a one-sentence opinion, reinstated a complaint in an apportionment suit brought by August Scholle, head of the Michigan State Federation of Labor, which the Michigan supreme court had dismissed (by a 5-to-3 vote) in 1960. On July 18, 1962, Michigan's highest court invalidated (by a 4-to-3 vote) the apportionment for the state senate which had been frozen into the constitution and approved by the voters in 1952. It also enjoined the primary election only three weeks off. The court "respectfully advised" that a new apportionment was urgently required, but warned that if it were not forthcoming, state senators would be chosen at large in a state-wide primary to be held on September 11.

The majority of the court found the largest senate district contained twelve times as many people as the smallest, and that 53 per cent of the state's population chose only 29 per cent of the senate. It ruled that such a discrepancy violated the Fourteenth Amendment.

At this juncture, Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart stayed the Michigan court's ruling pending an appeal to the U. S. Supreme Court, thus reinstating the August primaries and making impossible any revision of Michigan apportionment until 1963. If the Supreme Court now agrees to hear Scholle v. Hare, it will have to decide whether one house of a state legislature may be chosen on the basis of geography, not population.

The litigation in Maryland demonstrates that rural domination of a state's legislature can only be broken by a court or the threat of court action. The Maryland constitution allots one senator to each county and six to Baltimore City, and also apportions the 123 members of the House of Delegates. The state legislature is given no express power to apportion. As a result, Baltimore and its four suburban counties, which contain 76 per cent of the state's population, elected only 34 per cent of the senate and 49 per cent of the house. Bills to call a constitutional convention have repeatedly failed because of rural opposition, even after proposals for such a convention had been approved by the voters.

On April 25, 1962, after reciting the above facts, the Maryland supreme court directed a lower court to receive evidence whether unconstitutional discrimination existed in the apportionment of either Maryland house. On May 24, 1962, Chancellor Duckett ruled that the Maryland senate might properly be chosen on the basis of geographical areas, but that the house apportionment was illegal. On May 24, the Maryland General Assembly met and reapportioned the Maryland house by creating nineteen new seats, which for the first time gave Baltimore and its four suburban counties control of that chamber. On July 23, the Maryland supreme court approved the house reapportionment, but ruled that the senate did not have to be chosen on a population basis. An appeal has been taken to the U. S. Supreme Court.

The litigation I have described above and the other cases for which a detailed description is impossible because of space limitation demonstrate that all of Justice Frankfurter's gloomy prophecies in his Baker v. Carr dissent have been disproved. The state legislatures have not played "ducks and drakes with the judiciary." The same courts which acquiesced in the patent circumvention of the Supreme Court's mandate in the school-segregation cases were quick to see and forceful to reject counterfeit reapportionment. The legislatures have heeded the courts' "admonitions." The courts have not been sunk in a "mathematical quagmire" because of the lack of judicial standards on voting inequality. There has been no flouting of any court's decision.

St. Louis Post-Dispatch

Rural Free Delivery

And most important, there has been no weakening of the popular will in exclusive reliance on the judiciary. On the contrary, the litigation has revealed the extent of urban disfranchisement and released pent-up resentment.

Legislative redistricting referenda were on the ballot in twelve states in the last elections. In seven states, the voters approved easier procedures for future apportionments or defeated plans unfair to urban voters. In five others, however, including California, voters either rejected plans to give urban areas more representation or else approved plans unfair by population standards.

A great debate is now developing and political scientists and good-government groups can testify that more hard thinking is being done about legislative apportionment than the country has witnessed in decades. "One man, one vote" is becoming a rallying cry. Voter apathy is being replaced by voter determination and the courts are playing a catalytic role in stimulating legislation, shaping popular attitudes and preserving the fundamental principle of our democracy: the equality of man under the rule of law.

Much remains to be done. A recent study by the National Municipal League shows that less than 30 per cent of the population is able to elect a majority of the lower house in thirteen state legislatures and a majority of the upper house in twenty states.

This year's state legislative sessions—if they heed the responsibilities imposed on them by the courts and the Fourteenth Amendment—must address themselves to the ultimate goal: A system of legislative apportionment that is as automatic and mechanical as possible, in which rural domination of our state and federal legislatures is broken and in which the needs of the people, by now primarily urban, are filled by a legislature that is responsible, and responsive, to them.

Legislative Balance Shifts Under Redistricting Ruling

Reapportionment Gen.

High Court to Begin Hearing Arguments on Whether Apportionment Must Be Based on Equality in Population

By ANTHONY LEWIS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Nov. 10—The Supreme Court's decision in the Tennessee legislative districting case, still less than two years old, has had an extraordinary impact on the country's law and politics.

A survey of the 50 states shows repercussions on a scale that few had foreseen. These are some of the survey's findings:

¶Lawsuits have been brought in 39 states to challenge existing legislative apportionments.

¶In 20 states legislative districts have been revised by legislative action or constitutional amendment, usually under the compulsion or threat of a court order.

¶The courts have found a number of the new apportionments still inequitable and have struck them down. In three cases a court itself has drawn new district lines.

The final result of these developments is still uncertain. It is not yet clear, for example, whether the United States Constitution requires the districts in either house of a state legislature, or neither, or both, to be approximately equal in population.

That large question is now back on the doorstep of the Supreme Court. The Court will explore it in a series of apportionment cases to be argued beginning Tuesday.

The cases come from New York, Alabama, Maryland and Virginia. Another, from Delaware, will be heard in December. Together, the cases could produce definitive constitutional guidelines for districts in every state.

It is no exaggeration to say, therefore, that these cases may significantly shape state politics into the indefinite future. For the districting system goes a long way toward deciding what kind of legislature a state has—rural or urban in outlook, Republican or Democratic, moderate or intransigent on racial issues in the South.

The current ferment on legislative districting is the more remarkable in light of past history. Until 1962 it was a history of legislative inactivity and judicial forbearance.

Urban Areas Disregarded

For years those in control of state legislatures—mostly rural politicians—had simply refused to draw new district lines to reflect population changes. The fast-growing cities and suburbs had been frozen out of power.

In many states there had been no redistricting for 30 to 50 years, or longer. Rural control reached such extremes as the situation in Florida, where districts including only 12 per cent of the state's population elected a majority of the State Senators and 15 per cent a majority in the House.

The courts had said that it was not their business to remedy the condition. The Supreme Court seemed to put its seal on this view when it said, in 1946, that it would not enter the "political thicket" of districting.

Then, on March 26, 1962, the Supreme Court changed its mind. In the Tennessee case it held that the Federal courts were free to examine the constitutionality of state legislative districts.

The court did not then give any hint of what standards would decide whether districts were constitutional. That is the question in the new cases.

But the lower courts did not wait for guidance from above. They moved ahead in the expansion of a new constitutional doctrine with a speed for which legal observers can find no recent parallel.

Tennessee Case Discussed

Both state and Federal courts have been involved. There have been Federal court suits, so far, in 39 states and state court percentage of population needed to elect a majority in the House from 15 to 27 but increased the Senate figure from 12 to only 14.

In 1962, Colorado voters adopted a "Federal plan" that holds down urban influence in the Senate. Iowans will vote Dec. 3 on a proposal to have Senate districts equal in population but give each of the 99 counties one seat in the House. Several other states have similar propositions pending.

The explosion of reapportionment activity involves all sections of the country. In Mississippi a state court has forced the first redistricting since 1916. In Vermont an apportionment unchanged since 1793 is before a Federal court.

Suits have been brought by state officials, by state legislators and by individual voters. There has been support from such groups as the League of Women Voters, the American Civil Liberties Union and labor unions.

In addition to state legislative districts, the Supreme Court will consider what constitutional standards, if any, cover Congressional districts. Two cases are scheduled for argument next week.

The first case, from Georgia, attacks gross inequalities in that state's Congressional district populations. In the second, from New York, the assertion is that the Legislature unconstitutionally drew Manhattan's 17th, or "silk stocking," District to bar most Negroes and Puerto Ricans.

The survey by The New York Times dealt with apportionment of the state legislatures. The information was gathered from correspondents, political scientists and public officials.

The general trend reported was toward some reduction in rural overrepresentation. But several sources made the point that rural legislators were retaining much of their power through other means—their seniority, cohesiveness and parliamentary skill.

There follows a summary of the apportionment situation in each state.

In each state figures indicate the smallest percentage of the population that could elect a majority of the members in each house. Experts regard this as the best test of the representative quality of legislatures.

For example, a 10 per cent figure would indicate that the inhabitants of sparsely settled districts elect a majority in that house. In a legislative house with districts of equal population, it takes something near 50 per cent of the public to elect a majority.

Justices May Upset New York's Balance of Power

By R. W. APPLE Jr.

"The average citizen in the rural districts," said a delegate to the New York State Constitutional Convention, "is superior in intellect, superior in morality, superior in self-government, to the average citizen of the great cities."

Because most of his fellow delegates agreed with him, they wrote into the state Constitution a series of unusual apportionment formulas designed to give the virtuous country man a commanding voice in the Legislature.

That was in 1894. Ever since, the city dwellers of the state have been complaining, to little effect, that they are denied their proper role in the management of its affairs.

Tomorrow the Supreme Court will hear arguments in the case of WMCA v. Simon. Should the court decide, as WMCA has asked it to, that the formulas established in 1894 are unconstitutional, the effect could be revolutionary.

"It would change the whole balance of power in this state," Senate Minority Leader Joseph Zaretski asserted last week. "For the first time, the urban and suburban areas would have their proper voice in Albany."

The Prevailing Opinion

Said Controller Abraham D. Beame:

"Reapportionment would go further toward solving New York City's chronic financial problems than any other single thing that could be done."

Theirs is the prevailing opinion—that court-ordered reapportionment, by increasing the legislative leverage of the city and its suburbs, would tend to ease, if not solve, many of the problems that plague the metropolitan area.

State Senator Robert C. McEwen, the Ogdensburg Republican who heads the Joint Legislative Committee on Reapportionment, holds the contrary view:

"Any benefits that would flow to the cities and the suburbs, and I don't think there would be very many, would be far, far outweighed by the destruction of representative government upstate.

"I don't care whether a man lives in Canarsie or in Plattsburgh, he ought to have someone from his immediate area to speak for him in the Legislature. If the Supreme Court moves in on us, the man from Plattsburgh will be out of luck."

City Has 43 Per Cent

At the moment, with another apportionment based on the old formulas due sometime before 1966, this is the situation in the Assembly:

New York City, with 47 per cent of the state's population suburbs are under-represented (that is, their share of the seats is smaller than their share of the population), and the rural counties upstate are over-represented.

Proponents of reapportionment like to point out that Assemblyman Jerry W. Black, who represents the 14,974 people of Schuyler County, had an equal vote with Assemblyman Edwin J. Fehrenbach, who represents the 314,721 people who live in Nassau County.

Those on the other side, including Senate Majority Leader available to it dozens of model formulas. One document alone, a report prepared in 1960 for the Peck Commission by Dr. Ruth C. Silva of Pennsylvania State University, contains 34 plans.

Still another proposal has been advanced by the New York State Committee for Fair Representation, a committee including representatives of civil, labor and minority groups.

Link to Population

It would tie Senate representation directly to population growth of those counties, the size of the Nassau and Suffolk delegations would be doubled. And because this plan would abandon the rule of at least one Assemblyman for each county, the upstate rural areas would lose strength.

The political implications of all this, however, are considerably less clear than is generally thought.

Under the old system in 1958, 1960 and 1962, the Democratic candidates for the Senate and the Assembly had a larger total vote than the Republicans. Nevertheless, the Republicans won control of both houses.

System Favors G.O.P.

So strongly does the system favor the G.O.P., in fact, that only once since 1894 (in 1935) have the Democrats been able to win control of the Legislature—even though during the same period they have occupied the Governor's Mansion for 30 of 69 years.

The Wagner administration considers reapportionment the closest thing yet to a municipal panacea. Mr. Beame has been especially outspoken on the subject.

"All our financial problems stem from the Legislature," he said last week, "whether you're talking about its failure to grant us adequate powers to raise money as we see fit or its inequitable distribution of state aid."

"If the city and its suburbs, which have the same problems, were given fairer representation, we would make progress on these problems," he went on. "For example, we'd have no trouble at all getting off-track betting."

In an affidavit prepared last year in connection with its suit, WMCA described instances of what is called "legislative discrimination against New York City."

School Aid Cited

"New York City," the affidavit said, "received $197 in school aid for each student in its public schools [in the fiscal year 1961-62]. The average for each student in the rest of the state was $314." Republican legislators, however, insist that there is ample justification for the difference.

Three national organizations — the American Jewish Congress, the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, and the American Civil Liberties Union — have been allied with WMCA in its reapportionment campaign. They joined in an amici curiae brief for the appeals to be argued tomorrow.

R. Peter Straus, the slight, energetic, 41-year-old president of WMCA, explained that the station had begun its campaign because "everything our public affairs department looked into led us back to this community's vetoed by the Democratic Governor, Matthew E. Welsh. The Legislature proposed the same plan as a constitutional amendment, which would require repassage in 1965 and then approval by the voters.

Last Friday, a three-judge Federal court held unconstitutional the present districts, drawn in 1921. It gave the Legislature two years to redistrict, enjoining any elections under the 1921 apportionment after that. Current electoral percentages: Senate 35, House 38.

IOWA

A three-judge Federal court has held the present apportionment unconstitutional but has delayed a final order to see what Iowa's voters say Dec. 3 about a proposed amendment to the state constitution. The amendment would make Senate districts equal in population but depart entirely from population as the basis of House districts, giving one member to each of the 99 counties. Gov. Harold Hughes is fighting the amendment; its principal support comes from the Iowa Farm Bureau. Present electoral percentages: Senate 35, House 27.

KANSAS

The state courts held the Senate districts invalid, and the Legislature promptly revised them strictly on the basis of population. The change raised the percentages necessary to elect a Senate majority from 27 to almost exactly 50. The House figure remains at 19.

MICHIGAN

After Baker v. Carr the State Supreme Court held the Senate districts invalid. But this decision was stayed by Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart and was presumably superseded this year when Michigan adopted a new constitution. This constitution apportions House seats mainly, though not entirely, by population, but for the Senate uses a formula giving population four-fifths weight and area one-fifth. A new Federal court suit challenges the Senate formula. The electoral percentages are now 29 in the Senate, 44 in the House. The districts to be drawn under the new constitution are expected to raise these to 40 and 45, respectively.

MINNESOTA

Judicial action brought some reform here before Baker v. Carr. A three-judge Federal court in 1958, perhaps looking ahead to the new constitutional doctrine, suggested that it might take action. Reapportionment followed. The electoral percentages: Senate 40, House 35.

NEBRASKA

The state's one-house Legislature was theoretically required to be strictly representative of population but had not been redistricted since 1935. After a Federal court suit was filed, the Legislature proposed, rural weight in the Senate. This raised the electoral percentages from 30 to 36 in the Senate, 32 to 45 in the House. But the Senate percentage will decline in the future if urbanization continues. A three-judge Federal court has sustained the new apportionment, but an appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court.

IDAHO

In an effort to indicate good faith to the courts, the Legislature this year redistricted the House, raising the necessary percentage of the voters to control from 33 to 44. The figure remains 17 in the Senate. The new apportionment has been challenged in a suit now under consideration by a Federal court.

MONTANA

Regular reapportionment of the House in 1961, no further legislative or legal action. Electoral percentages: Senate 16, House 37.

NEVADA

A pending Federal suit attacks the most unequally apportioned State Senate in the country, in which 7.6 per cent of the voters can elect a majority. In the House the figure is 35.

NEW MEXICO

A state judge, denouncing the Supreme Court for "judicial legislation," has nevertheless directed the Legislature to redistrict its House by Dec. 1. The House electoral percentage is 27. The Senate, with one member a county and a percentage of 14, is not under legal attack.

UTAH

The Legislature redistricted both Houses this year under the threat of judicial action, but made no significant alteration in the urban-rural balance. The electoral percentages remain at 21 in the Senate, 34 in the House. A suit has been filed in Federal court against this apportionment.

WYOMING

A reapportionment this year made the Senate less representative of population, the House more. Electoral percentages moved from 27 to 24 in the Senate, 36 to 47 in the House. The new apportionment has been challenged in a Federal court suit to be argued next month.

PACIFIC

ALASKA

No legal or political action since Baker v. Carr. Automatic reapportionment provision of the state constitution revised House districts in 1961; Senate lines are fixed in the constitution. Electoral percentages: Senate 35, House 49.

CALIFORNIA

A state court suit has been dismissed, but an action brought by Mayor Sam Yorty of Los Angeles is pending in the Fed-

The court did not then give any hint of what standards would decide whether districts were constitutional. That is the question in the new cases.

But the lower courts did not wait for guidance from above. They moved ahead in the expansion of a new constitutional doctrine with a speed for which legal observers can find no recent parallel.

Tennessee Case Discussed

Both state and Federal courts have been involved. There have been Federal court suits, so far, in 30 states, and state court actions in 14. (The total of 44 is five more than the 39 states with apportionment litigation because five states face suits in both state and Federal courts.)

The interplay between legislature and court can be illustrated in the Tennessee case itself. Before the decision of 1962, in the case known as Baker v. Carr, the Tennessee Legislature had not redistricted since 1901.

Shortly after Baker v. Carr, a special session of the Tennessee Legislature passed a reapportionment act. It made some concessions to urban voters but it still gave them fewer representatives in each house than their numbers would indicate.

A three-judge Federal District Court ruled that the Legislature could, constitutionally, deviate somewhat from strict population representation in the House. But it found the new Senate districts invalid.

The Legislature had given Tennessee's five urban counties, with 46 per cent of the state's population, 12 of 33 Senate seats. In 1963, after the Court's judgment, a new bill was passed giving the urban counties one more seat, a total of 13.

The urban voters went back to court. Last Oct. 10 the judges approved a plan giving the urban counties the 16 seats they were demanding. The Court said that it would issue a final order Feb. 3 making this the new Tennessee apportionment unless something happened to change the situation before then.

Convention Is Called

A Times correspondent in Tennessee drew this moral from the record there:

"The refusal of rural legislators to give up some of their power led to the present litigation and court orders. Many people regret that the final decision on apportionment seems now to have passed permanently from the legislative to the judicial branch.

"But the rural bloc has demonstrated that it will seek every means of avoiding compliance—or cheating, even by a few seats—in an effort to preserve as much of its authority as possible."

The correspondent noted that rural legislators had set up a convention to revise the Tennessee Constitution in 1965. Of the 99 delegates only 9 will be from urban areas—unless the courts again intervene.

A number of states have reacted to judicial pressure for reapportionment by adopting a "Federal plan" in which one house represents population more or less equally and the other house gives extra weight to sparsely settled areas.

The analogy is drawn to the Federal Congress, in which the House of Representatives represents people and the Senate the states. Whether this analogy meets the 14th Amendment's requirement that the states afford "the equal protection of the laws" will be decided by the Supreme Court.

In Florida, for example, a redistricting this year raised the figure would indicate that the inhabitants of sparsely settled districts elect a majority in that house. In a legislative house with districts of equal population, it takes something near 50 per cent of the public to elect a majority.

NEW ENGLAND

CONNECTICUT

The main issue here is the House, which represents townships instead of people. Hartford, population 162,000, has two members; so does Union, population 383. The apportionment has not been changed since 1876. A three-judge Federal court head argument Oct. 22 on suits to compel redistricting of both Houses. The Democratic and Republican parties were represented and agreed that there should be changes in the Senate, last revised in 1903. But the Republicans defended the township basis of the House. Electoral percentages: Senate 33, House 12.

MAINE

The Legislature did not wait for litigation, although Maine's districts were among the country's more representative of population. The electoral percentages were 47 in the Senate, 40 in the House. Last week the voters approved a constitutional amendment to make House district populations more equal. The Legislature will draw the new districts next month.

MASSACHUSETTS

A state court has forced action on new House districts, which are now being drawn by a commission. The present electoral percentage is 45 in both House and Senate.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

The state courts have upheld the state's unusual constitutional provision apportioning the Senate on the basis of direct taxes paid. A constitutional convention next May is expected to consider a change to population as the basis of apportionment. Electoral percentages: Senate 45, House 44.

RHODE ISLAND

Litigation has focused on the House, where 47 per cent of the population elect a majority but where there is some bias against some fast-growing suburbs. Thus far there has been no challenge to Senate districts fixed in the state constitution, although the percentage for control is only 18.

In 1962, in a suit brought by two legislators from the suburbs, the State Supreme Court said that the House districts were so unequal as to violate the Federal Constitution. It noted especially a state provision that every town must have at least one seat. To be equitable, the Court said, that rule must be abandoned and small towns lumped into one district, or else the House must be increased to a point where the smallest town would be entitled to a seat—perhaps 800 members.

The Legislature passed a reapportionment act depriving some small towns of their House seats. But Gov. John H. Chafee vetoed it on the ground that it violated the state constitutional formula. The issue is now in a Federal court.

VERMONT

Under compulsion of a state court suit, one Senate district has been changed; but the real issue is the House, apportioned by towns and unchanged since 1793. A three-judge Federal court heard argument Oct. 29 on the House districts. A recent study shows that 40 towns are so small that the state income taxes paid by their residents do not even cover the salaries of the legislators they elect. The electoral percentages are 47 in the Senate, 12 in the House.

MIDDLE ATLANTIC

DELAWARE

In the hope of avoiding court action, the Legislature approved a constitutional amendment this year to make the first reapportionment since 1897. It raised the electoral percentage in the House from 19 to 28 but reduced it in the Senate, from 22 to 21, by giving each of the state's three counties seven Senators. A three-judge Federal court held the new apportionment unconstitutional and enjoined any election under it. This order was stayed pending review in the Supreme Court.

NEW JERSEY

Before Baker v. Carr, the State Supreme Court forced the Legislature to revise Assembly districts in 1961. It now takes 47 per cent of the voters to elect an Assembly majority. The Senate has one member for each county, and the disparities in county populations allow 19 per cent of the voters to control it. The Senate provision is under attack in a suit now before the State Supreme Court.

NEW YORK

The state's intricate apportionment formulas are based partly on population but limit the seats for more populous counties in both Houses. Electoral percentages are 37 in the Senate, 38 in the Assembly. In practical terms, the effect is to freeze the Democrats out. In this century, though often electing a Governor, Democrats have controlled the Legislature for only two years. A three-judge Federal court upheld the system, took a fresh look on the Supreme Court's orders after Baker v. Carr, upheld it again. The appeal is about to be argued in the Supreme Court.

PENNSYLVANIA

Gov. William W. Scranton has called the Legislature into special session tomorrow under the compulsion of a state court promise to act if necessary. Electoral percentages: Senate 33, House 38.

BORDER

KENTUCKY

After the filing of a suit in Federal court, but before decision, the Legislature passed the first reapportionment act in 20 years. It raises the electoral percentages from 42 to 45 in the Senate, 34 to 47 in the House.

MARYLAND

Under a state court order the Legislature gave urban and suburban areas more seats in the House, raising the percentage of voters needed to control from 25 to 35. The Senate was left unchanged, with 15 per cent of the population electing a majority. The state's highest court upheld the new apportionment, the majority embracing the "Federal analogy" and the minority urging that the Senate should also reflect population more closely. The case will be argued in the Supreme Court this week.

MISSOURI

Two Federal court suits are pending, both aimed at the House. Electoral percentages: Senate 48, House 20.

OKLAHOMA

A three-judge court held the districts invalid in August, 1962, but gave the Legislature until March, 1963, to act. Legislation did pass, but the court found it inadequate. Last July 1, it ordered into effect a reapportionment plan of its own. State officials are seeking review in the Supreme Court. The old electoral percentages were 25 in the Senate, 30 in the House. Under the 1963 legislation they would have been 33 and 31, respectively. The court's plan makes them 50 and 42.

WEST VIRGINIA

Under the pressure of a Federal court suit, the Legislature reapportioned this year, leaving the percentage of voters needed to control the Senate at 47 but raising the House figure from 40 to 44. In addition to the Federal suit, new districts are under challenge in the state courts on state constitutional grounds.

SOUTH

ALABAMA

In 1962 the districts, unchanged since 1901, allowed 25 per cent of the state population to elect a Senate majority and 26 per cent a House majority. A three-judge Federal court indicated shortly after Baker v. Carr that it would strike the districts down.

The Legislature, under that pressure, proposed a constitutional amendment to equalize House districts somewhat but to base the Senate on one member from each county. It also passed standby legislation, in the event the voters rejected the amendment, to make Senate districts slightly more representative.

The court found both plans inadequate. It adopted its own scheme, combining the House features of the proposed amendment and the Senate provisions of the standby bill. This raised the electoral percentages to 28 in the Senate, 42 in the House.

This apportionment was used in last year's elections. The lower court's order will be considered by the Supreme Court next week.

ARKANSAS

No action. House redistricted under automatic provision in 1961, Senate lines frozen. Percentages: Senate 44, House 33.

FLORIDA

Under pressure of a lawsuit the Legislature this year redistricted both houses but left power firmly in the hands of the rural voters. Electoral percentages rise from 12 to 14 in the House, 15 to 27 in the Senate. A three-judge Federal court upheld the new apportionment. Review is being sought in the Supreme Court.

GEORGIA

Immediately after Baker v. Carr a Federal court ordered that at least one house be reapportioned. The Legislature thereupon revised the Senate districts to make them almost exactly equal in population. The electoral percentage rose from 23 to 49 in the Senate but remains at 22 in the House.

LOUISIANA

After a Federal suit was filed, the Legislature revised the House districts for the first time in 32 years, but made no significant change in urban-rural balance. Electoral percentages remain at 33 in both Senate and House. The suit is still pending.

MISSISSIPPI

A state court held existing districts invalid in 1962. The Legislature first proposed a plan that would have given underrepresented urban areas even fewer seats, but that was defeated at the polls in 1962. A second plan was approved this year. Electoral percentages are raised, as a result, from 35 to 37 in the Senate, 29 to 41 in the House.

NORTH CAROLINA

On Oct. 17, with a group of Republicans threatening to sue, the Legislature revamped the Senate districts to give cities and suburbs more voice. The Senate electoral percentage was raised from 37 to 47, the House left at 27. At the same time, a constitutional amendment was proposed to drop population altogether as the basis of the House apportionment, allotting one member to each of the 100 counties. The amendment goes to a popular vote Jan. 14.

SOUTH CAROLINA

No action. Electoral percentages: Senate 24, House 46.

TENNESSEE

The apportionment under attack in Baker v. Carr allowed 27 per cent of the voters to elect a majority in the State Senate, 29 per cent in the House. Legislation passed this year put the percentages at 45 in the Senate and 40 in the House. The Federal court has now revised the Senate districts further, raising the percentage of voters needed for control to nearly 50. The court order becomes effective Feb. 3 unless there is legislative action first, or a judicial stay.

TEXAS

A Federal suit is pending. The electoral percentages: Senate 30, House 39.

VIRGINIA

A reapportionment in 1962 raised the electoral percentages from 38 to 41 in the Senate, 37 to 41 in the House. A three-judge Federal court found the new districts still unconstitutionally disparate in population and enjoined any election under them. Chief Justice Earl Warren stayed the District Court decision pending Supreme Court review. The case will be argued this week.

The state constitution calls for a bipartisan commission to redistrict the House if the Legislature fails. Such a commission is now wrestling with the problem, and it is making so little progress that there is talk of having to elect all 177 House members at large. Senate seats are fixed in the constitution, but this provision is under attack in a Federal court suit. Present electoral percentages: Senate 29, House 40.

City Has 43 Per Cent

At the moment, with another apportionment based on the old formulas due sometime before 1966, this is the situation in the Assembly:

New York City, with 47 per cent of the state's population, holds 65 of 150 seats, or 43 per cent; the four suburban counties—Nassau, Suffolk, Westchester and Rockland—with 17 per cent of the population, hold 16 seats, or 11 per cent.

The nine urban upstate counties—Erie, Monroe, Onandaga, Albany, Oneida, Niagara, Broome, Schenectady and Rensalaer—with 20 per cent of the population, hold 25 seats, or 17 per cent; all the others, with 16 per cent of the population, hold 44 seats, or 29 per cent.

In the Senate, the picture is similar. Again, the city and its suburbs are under-represented (that is, their share of the seats is smaller than their share of the population), and the rural counties upstate are over-represented.

Proponents of reapportionment like to point out that Assemblyman Jerry W. Black, who represents the 14,974 people of Schuyler County, had an equal vote with Assemblyman Edwin J. Fehrenbach, who represents the 314,721 people who live in Nassau County.

Those on the other side, including Senate Majority Leader Walter J. Mahoney of Buffalo, make a point of observing that New York City and its suburbs already have between them a majority of the seats in both houses. Why do they need more?

If the Supreme Court does throw out all or part of the present system of apportionment, it will probably be up to the Legislature to draft, or have drafted, a new one. Although they disagree on details, spokesmen for the two parties agree that in that event, the rural areas upstate will lose votes.

The Legislature would have available to it dozens of model formulas. One document alone, a report prepared in 1960 for the Peck Commission by Dr. Ruth C. Silva of Pennsylvania State University, contains 34 plans.

Still another proposal has been advanced by the New York State Committee for Fair Representation, a committee including representatives of civil, labor and minority groups.

Link to Population

It would tie Senate representation directly to population in such a way that New York City and its suburbs would elect 64 per cent instead of 56 per cent of the chamber, with 60 instead of the present 58 seats.

In the Assembly, under the committee's plan, the city would retain its current 65 seats; but because the new Assembly would be slightly larger, New York's share of the total membership would decline. If the Assembly were reapportioned according to the old formula, the city's loss would be much more severe.

Reflecting the rapid post-war

Three national organizations—the American Jewish Congress, the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, and the American Civil Liberties Union—have been allied with WMCA in its reapportionment campaign. They joined in an amici curiae brief for the appeals to be argued tomorrow.

R. Peter Straus, the slight, energetic, 41-year-old president of WMCA, explained that the station had begun its campaign because "everything our public affairs department looked into led us back to this community's lack of effective influence in Albany."

"Underlying it all—housing, city finances, education—was this one big disease," he said.

It has been a difficult and expensive campaign, with out-of-pocket expenses so far amounting to more than $50,000.

WMCA v. Simon was originally filed on May 1, 1961. It bears the name it does because Caroline K. Simon, the Secretary of State, was the first of many public officials listed as defendants.

Court here before Baker v. Carr. A three-judge Federal court in 1958, perhaps looking ahead to the new constitutional doctrine, suggested that it might take action. Reapportionment followed. The electoral percentages: Senate 40, House 35.

NEBRASKA

The state's one-house Legislature was theoretically required to be strictly representative of population but had not been redistricted since 1935. After a Federal court suit was filed, the Legislature proposed, and the voters approved, an amendment requiring that area be given between 20 and 30 per cent weight in drawing districts. Even with this factor, new districts were more equal in population than the old, raising the electoral percentage from 37 to 44. The Court has been asked to hold the new formula unconstitutional.

NORTH DAKOTA

The House was reapportioned in 1963 to give urban areas more seats. The electoral percentage rose from 40 to 47. The Senate, with a figure of 32, was not touched. A Federal court dismissed an attack on the apportionment as it stood after the new legislation.

OHIO

An attack on a constitutional provision guaranteeing each county a seat in the House regardless of population was rejected by a Federal court. An appeal has been filed in the Supreme Court. Current electoral percentages: Senate 41, House 30.

SOUTH DAKOTA

A Federal court dismissed a suit brought by the state's Democratic Attorney General, John Reynolds, in 1962 but told him to return in August, 1963, if the Legislature had not acted. This year the Republican-controlled Legislature passed a bill but Mr. Reynolds, now Governor, vetoed it as unfair to Milwaukee. The Legislature then passed a joint resolution purportedly reapportioning without his approval. Mr. Reynolds has asked the State Supreme Court to hold the Legislature's resolution ineffective and to force redistricting by statute. The electoral percentages are: Senate 39, House 42.

NEGRO EDUCATOR OPPOSES SHIFTS

Calls Harlem Schools Unfit for Pupil Transfers

By IRVING SPIEGEL

Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, Negro educator, yesterday rejected suggestions for sending children of white and Negro middle-class parents to Harlem schools. He described these schools as "clearly and woefully inferior."

If such an attempt to send them by buses were made, Dr. Clark said, it will be done "only under conditions of intense and prolonged protest." It will "clearly lead to a disruption of the educational process, and will not affect positively the education of any child," he added.

Dr. Clark, whose research into the psychological evils of school segregation was cited in the 1954 Supreme Court decision, spoke at a luncheon meeting of the New York Chapter of the American Jewish Committee at the Plaza Hotel.

Dr. Clark, professor of psychology at City College, asserted that the suggestions "are unrealistic, irrelevant, emotional and diversionary." He said that "they do not meet the central problem of integration and the high quality of education to be provided for all children."

Attitudes Are Criticized

Dr. Clark also criticized educators for their attitudes toward Negro and Puerto Rican children. He compared the tendency of those responsible for the education of these children "to blame the children and their parents for the pervasive educational retardation with the earlier argument that Negroes were biologically or innately inferior."

Dr. Clark said that the reading and arithmetic skills of the children of these schools "are consistently below city and national norms."

"This disparity," he added, "increases with grade. The evidence adds up to a pattern of criminal neglect, educational inefficiency and a major social disgrace having all of the ingredients of a future political crisis."

The educators, Dr. Clark asserted, act according to the assumption that Negro and Puerto Rican children "are unable to learn."

He said that since the curriculum was based on this assumption the children "of course, do not learn." He termed this a "self-fulfilling prophecy."

"The retardation," he continued, "is cumulative. As the children become more retarded, they become more and more disaffected from school—they become restless, often unmanageable over discipline problems, or withdrawn, seeking escape with lowered motivation, and desire to leave school at the earliest opportunity."

Dr. Clark said that the taxing problems in the Harlem public schools could be resolved "with maximum positive effect only by the development of a program which makes effective teaching the exclusive concern of these schools."

He urged a better quality of education in schools now predominately attended by Negro students as the first step in the realistic integration of the schools. He urged a "thorough reorganization of these schools in terms of personnel, curriculum, teaching methods, supervision and accountability."

Dr. Clark deplored that nothing had been done in the last several years to rectify teaching conditions in Harlem schools. "It is a normative, consistent pattern of criminal neglect," he added.

Historic Virginia Plantation Will Be Open to Public

Carter's Grove, historic plantation near Williamsburg, Va., which will be opened to public

Plans for Carter's Grove, historic James River plantation near Williamsburg, Va., to be open to the public were announced yesterday by the Sealantic Fund, Inc. The fund has arranged to purchase the 400-acre property.

The plantation house is noted for its beauty. It once belonged to the Carter and Burwell families, who were related to many prominent Virginians.

According to tradition, Washington and Jefferson proposed to early sweethearts and were turned down in the drawing room of the 20-room Georgian mansion.

David Rockefeller, president of Sealantic, said the purchase had been arranged with the estate of Mrs. Mary C. McCrea, who died in 1960. Her husband, the late Archibald McCrea, Pittsburgh industrialist, acquired the property in 1927.

The executors will soon petition the Circuit Court of James City County for approval of the sale.

In her will Mrs. McCrea asked that Carter's Grove be sold to a Government agency or a foundation to preserve and display to the public the Colonial house and its grounds.

The house stands on part of the original Robert "King" Carter plantation, which dates to the 17th century.

Sealantic Fund, a philanthropic organization, was set up by the late John D. Rockefeller Jr. in 1938.

Zuber to Enter Primary For President in March

Paul B. Zuber, Negro civil rights lawyer, disclosed yesterday that he was making plans to enter the New Hampshire Republican Presidential primary on March 10.

Mr. Zuber, who has played a key role in several school integration cases in the North, said his aim was to conduct an "educational campaign setting forth the Negro's position on civil rights" to New Hampshire voters.

"No one is better equipped to do this," he insisted, "than a Negro, who is more affected by it than anyone else." He contended that neither Governor Rockefeller nor his prospective rival in the primary, Senator Barry Goldwater, was qualified to discuss the civil rights issue.

DRIVE WILL OPEN ON JAYWALKERS planned the safety campaign before he had a heart attack on Oct. 24, issued a statement asserting that "jaywalking is worse in New York than in any other city where I've worked."

Mr. Barnes noted that he had received assurances from Assistant Chief Inspector John J. King, who commands the Police Department's Safety Division, that his men would pay special attention to jaywalking summonses.

As part of the campaign, the Traffic Department will post 40,000 signs warning of the danger of jaywalking. The posters will illustrate the theme of the drive—"Cross at the Green, Not in Between"—with another showing a father and daughter walking hand in hand.

Figures on Summonses

Some prodding for the safety drive has come from the Automobile Club of New York. In an appraisal of the pedestrian program here, it showed that deaths and injuries dropped sharply in 1960 when an intensive campaign was in progress, which included the issuance of 100,000 jaywalking summonses. In 1961, only 46,000 summonses were issued, and in 1962 the number dropped to 40,000.

A spokesman for the Automobile Club said that though pedestrians' awareness of traffic laws had increased somewhat, the drop in summonses resulted largely from a gradual let-down in enforcement of the laws. Great numbers of pedestrians, in short, have still been jaywalking and getting away with it.

Those guilty of jaywalking must pay fines of $2, by mail if they wish, and may have to pay more if the judge decides for higher penalties.

Under the anti-jaywalking statute, wich became effective here in December, 1958, pedestrians receive summonses for crossing against Don't Walk signs and for crossing intersections diagonally. Those who cross against a red traffic signal can be given either a warning or a summons. Persons crossing in midblock can be given a summons for failing to yield the right of way to vehicles.

The Toll in 1962

Last year 435 pedestrians were killed and 14,566 injured. Of these, 91 were killed and 2,362 injured in November and December.

The Police Safety Bureau reported last Tuesday that 26 persons were killed in traffic in the previous week, 5 more than in the similar 1962 period. Injuries rose by 179 to 1,364. Since Jan. 1, 525 persons were killed in the city; of this figure 327 fatalities were ascribed to pedestrian accidents.

The pedestrian safety campaign may result in less noise from car, truck and taxi horns. Under city law motorists may not blow their horns except when they are in danger or to give warnings, often to jaywalkers.

The police report that the provision for not blowing horns is strictly enforced around hospitals and similar institutions, but that the law is less rigidly enforced elsewhere. Unofficial estimates are that about 25,000 summonses or arrests involve horn-blowing each year.

The minimum fine for unnecessary horn-blowing is $5, but the judge can order higher penalties.

The early safety campaign, which lasted from July, 1958, to December, 1960, was credited with preventing 101 pedestrian fatalities. That campaign, like the one starting next week, was preceded by an educational drive.

The early phase of the current campaign got under way several weeks ago. The Traffic Department enlisted the aid of 6,000 teachers in the first three grades of public and parochial elementary schools. They gave pupils pedestrian safety pledges to take home for their parents' signatures.

The return of the signed pledges entitles the youngsters to wear a lapel pin as members of the "New York City Traffic Safety Corps," and thus prod adults into being good examples.

"When adults jaywalk," Commissioner Barnes said, "they are not only staking their own lives on a sucker bet but they are putting the lives of their children in jeopardy by setting them a foolhardy example of carelessness. To teach a child to jaywalk is to make him a statistic on its way to a pedestrian accident."

Benefit Brings In $1,500 For Library at Palisades

Special to The New York Times

PALISADES, N. Y., Nov. 10—A benefit show and food sale last night raised $1,500 toward the $10,000 needed to enlarge the library and cultural center here.

More than a third of the village's 1,300 residents took part in the benefit, held at the American Legion Hall.

The proceeds brought to $3,800 the amount collected thus far. A new wing for the library has been designed, which among other things, will provide more space for children's reading classes.

Since 1891, the library has been the center of the residents' cultural activities. Concerts, wildflower contests, a cooking school, amateur theatricals and lectures have been held there at various times.

"I didn't know how easy it is to borrow thousands of dollars from The Dime if you own a home!

"Boy, was I worried! It seemed as if every expense possible had happened all at once. Among other things, we had back bills to pay, there were repairs to the house, and my son starting college. I didn't need just a few hundred dollars. I needed thousands!

"I thought of taking out another personal loan. But the monthly payments were high. I might only be jumping from the frying pan into the fire.

"Then I heard about how homeowners are 'preferred borrowers' at The Dime, whether their current mortgages were held by The Dime or not.

"I went to The Dime. I discovered I could borrow up to 90% of the current appraised value of my home — enough to pay off all my debts and cover all my other cash needs, too! It didn't matter what the price of my home was when I bought it. What counted was its current appraised value.

Compare The Dime way with the higher monthly payments of other plans

*These same low monthly payments apply for regular mortgages if you plan to buy or build a home as well as for refinanced mortgages. Payments figured at 5½% interest. Payments will be slightly higher for loans made at 5¾% or 6%. Liberal pre-payment terms. Taxes and fire insurance can be included in the single monthly payment.

"I found out too that the interest rate was low. And was I surprised how low the monthly payments were! I wouldn't have any trouble meeting the one low payment each month.

"I arranged with The Dime to re-finance my present mortgage. There was a small closing fee. Within 24 hours after I walked into the bank, my home was appraised and soon after I had a check for $8,000—the amount I needed. It was easy as pie.

"My advice to homeowners who need money is this: Don't pay costly financing charges. Don't take on high monthly payments which will be difficult to meet. Don't pay higher interest rates than you need to. Compare The Dime's low monthly payments with other plans before you borrow anywhere else. You'll be glad you did."

Showdown on Reapportionment . . . South

Will Maslow

The United States Supreme Court has on its docket no less than nine cases arising in six different states (Alabama, Georgia, Maryland, Delaware, New York, Virginia) challenging the apportionment of state legislatures and the districting of Congressional seats. The Court was to hear arguments on them during the week of November 12. Although appeals in some of these cases were filed as early as September, 1962, the Court deliberately let almost nine months pass before it announced which appeals it would allow. It followed a similar strategy in 1952 when, after some delay, it agreed to hear five school-segregation cases from four states and the District of Columbia, presenting a variety of problems. The advantages of such a strategy are that the Court can consider various aspects of the problem of reapportionment and also have the benefit of the soul-searching of many lower courts, not merely one.

Since the order issued by the Supreme Court last June granting review in eight cases, new appeals have been filed, and others are on their way, in reapportionment litigation arising in Florida, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Oklahoma and Washington. The only new issue is that of a Federal District Court in the state of Washington, requiring elections-at-large for members of both houses. It is the first such order issued since Baker v. Carr, and came down only after the state legislature was unable to agree upon a reapportionment plan which the court had required in an earlier decision.

It will be recalled that the Supreme Court's decision in Baker v. Carr (the Tennessee reapportionment case) merely held that "invidious discrimination" in the apportionment of state legislature seats constituted a violation of the "Equal Protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and that federal courts had jurisdiction to enjoin such discrimination. But, like other landmark decisions, it raised more questions than it answered. The courts of the country thus found themselves without guide lines when there developed an unprecedented wave of apportionment litigation — eighty cases arising in forty-one different states. Not unexpectedly, the lower courts disagreed. Conflicts among them must now be resolved.

Three main questions (and a host of subsidiary ones) must now be decided by the Supreme Court. Perhaps the most momentous is the validity of the so-called "Little Federal Plan." Must both houses of a state legislature be apportioned on the basis of population? Or may states, following the example of the federal government, apportion one house on other than population standards — for example, can they allot seats to counties regardless of population or deliberately enhance the representation of rural areas?

The Maryland Supreme Court, by a 4 to 3 vote, upheld the allotment of one seat in the Maryland Senate to each of the state's counties, although the most populated county in the state contained 32 times as many people as the least populated area and 14 per cent of the state's population could elect a majority of the Senate. On the other hand, a three-judge Federal District Court in Virginia rejected the federal analogy and found the state Senate to be malapportioned. Similarly, a Federal District Court in Alabama found invalid a proposed amendment to the state constitution that would have allotted one Senate place to each county. Pointing out that existing discrimination would have become worse under the new plan and that Senators elected by 20 per cent of the population could block any legislation, the District Court declared that the analogy with the United States Senate "cannot survive the most superficial examination," since a county is a creature of the state possessing only those powers conferred upon it by the state.

At stake are state Senate apportionments throughout the country. In twenty-one states, the disparity between the most-populated and least-populated Senate district exceeds 10 to 1, and in twelve states, less than one-fourth of the population can elect a majority of the state Senate.

The second great task of the U.S. Supreme Court is to clarify the meaning of "invidious discrimination." What variances are allowed from a strict population standard even in one house before the apportionment becomes constitutionally unfair? The issue is presented squarely in the New York case, WMCA v. Simon, to be reviewed by the Supreme Court. There, a Federal District Court had upheld New York's complex apportionment formula which allowed a disparity of 2 to 1 in Senate districts and 15 to 1 in Assembly districts, and which gave control of the Assembly to 34.7 per cent, and of the state Senate to 41.8 per cent of the population. The federal court rejected strict population standards, upholding New York's formula on the basis of its "rationality," its historic origin and the opportunity voters have of deciding every twenty years whether to convene a state constitutional convention. The federal court relied heavily upon a 1948 dictum of the Supreme Court that the Fourteenth Amendment does not "deny a state the power to assure a proper diffusion of political initiative as between the thinly populated counties and those having concentrated masses, in view of the fact that the latter have practical opportunities for exerting their political weight at the polls not available to the former."

In Virginia, the Federal District Court took a different tack. It held that population, while "predominant," was not the "sole or definitive measure" of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court ruled, however, that where the plaintiff has proved malaportionment on the basis of population, the burden of justifying such disproportions passes to officials of the defending state. Such a procedural ruling considerably lightens the task of those challenging grossly unequal legislative districts.

The Supreme Court is not likely to devise a mathematical formula by which constitutional inequality can be determined. Absolute equality of legislative districts is impossible, if for no other reason than that constant shifts of population occur. It may follow Solicitor General Cox's view that at least one house of a state legislature should be apportioned strictly on a population basis and that in the other house, apportionment may take into account historic, political and geographical subdivisions, "provided that the departure from equal representation in proportion to the population is not too extreme." Less likely is the acceptance of the Michigan Supreme Court's holding that whenever apportionment results in some districts having more than double the population of others, "the range of discretion is violated." Judging by past experience, a definition of what constitutes "invidious discrimination" is likely to result from a process of exclusion and inclusion, each case helping to fix the boundary line of what is constitutionally permissible.

The third great issue is whether federal courts have the authority to correct gross inequalities in Congressional districting. The apportionment of seats in the House of Representatives among the fifty states is done automatically each decade in accordance with census figures. (But each state is entitled to at least one representative, regardless of population.) Each state legislature is then free to draw its own Congressional district lines, dividing its allotment as it sees fit. As a result, Congressional districts vary enormously in population — in Michigan, from 177,000 to 802,000; in Texas, from 216,000 to 951,000. Eighty districts are now more than 15 per cent larger in population, and ninety districts more than 15 per cent smaller, than the state-wide numerical average for a Congressional district.

From 1862 to 1929, a federal statute required Congressional districts to contain "as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants." (From 1901 on, these districts were also required to be "compact" and "contiguous.") However, the 1930 Federal Apportionment Act failed to repeat this triple standard of equality, compactness and contiguity, and in 1932 the Supreme Court held that Congress had thereby intended to repeal these requirements. In the Georgia case, Wesberry v. Vandiver, which the Supreme Court will hear in December, a Federal District Court had dismissed a challenge to Georgia's Congressional districts, which range in population from 272,000 to 833,000. The court action was taken to allow the Georgia legislature and/or the U.S. Congress a reasonable time (unspecified) to correct the obvious inequalities.

A Florida state-court decision (not before the United States Supreme Court) gave shorter shrift to a suit challenging that state's Congressional district lines. It simply held that such districting was a "political question" and that Baker v. Carr did not apply to Congressional seats. To date, not one court, federal or state, has sustained a challenge to Congressional district lines.

Therefore, the issue before the Supreme Court is whether the theoretical possibilities of corrective legislation by Congress are sufficient to immunize Congressional districting from judicial supervision.

The last issue before the Supreme Court, arising in the challenge to New York's 17th "silk stocking" Congressional District, is a charge of gerrymandering, the manipulation of boundary lines to effectuate a partisan result. It is not enough to have districts approximately equal in population if district lines can be drawn like jigsaw puzzles to exclude or include blocs of voters. In Wright v. Rockefeller, a Federal District Court, by a 2 to 1 vote, held that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that the boundaries of the 17th Congressional District had been juggled to exclude Negroes and Puerto Ricans. The population of the 17th consisted of 5.17 per cent Negroes and Puerto Ricans, contrasted with the nearby Harlem district which had 86.3 per cent Negroes and Puerto Ricans. The issue was complicated by the intervention of Adam Clayton Powell and other Negro and Puerto Rican Democratic district leaders, who saw in the litigation a plot to disperse Negroes and Puerto Ricans among the four Congressional districts in Manhattan and thus diminish their political influence.

During the sixteen hours allotted for the argument of the eight cases in December, the Supreme Court will ponder not only its decision in each case but, more significantly, its role in the entire problem of apportionment. Ideally, the democratic process would be most strengthened and the most durable results achieved if popular movements in the various states themselves compelled reapportionment of state legislatures. But always in the background to goad recalcitrant legislatures must be the threat of quick and effective judicial intervention. These pressures are most effective if they come from the lower courts. The Supreme Court must, therefore, avoid its colossal errors in the school-segregation litigations and encourage the lower federal and the state courts to intervene in apportionment controversies whenever the democratic process is blocked or unduly delayed. To do so, it must now lay down guide lines to correct misconceptions of these courts and be ever ready to correct their mistakes. Above all, it must affirm as a democratic principle of the twentieth century that the Fourteenth Amendment stands as a bulwark to protect voters against any contrivance that would deny them their fair representation in the legislative process.

SIR ALEC TAKES OVER . . . . . Norman Birnbaum

The Conservatives, someone observed during the battle for Macmillan's succession, have ceased to be gentlemen but have not become democrats. The discretion and circumspection with which the British elite usually conducts its affairs has indeed been missing for the past fortnight. Lord Home became Prime Minister after a semi-public process which combined the rancor of a family quarrel with the arrogance of a court intrigue. At first glance, he owes his success to his appearance of ineradicable mediocrity. The race, in Great Britain, often goes to the contender who evokes no strong negative responses. The Tories, in rejecting the three more talented and experienced contenders (Butler, Hailsham and Maudling) in favor of the least promising one, were behaving in accordance with prevailing standards of selection elsewhere in British life. However, since the result of the next General Election may be determined by their decision, we ought to examine it more closely. It is not, upon a second look, without a certain political logic.

Macmillan's own role in the succession was enormous. His hospitalization, on the eve of the party's annual conference, threw the party into disarray. He allowed the struggle to dominate the conference and then took charge of the selection from his hospital bed. Nothing as vulgar as an election among Con-

Race Charge At Hospital Investigated

St. John's Episcopal Accused of Bias; L. I. Diocese Acts

A charge that St. John's Episcopal Hospital, Bedford-Stuyvesant, segregates Negro patients is being investigated by the Long Island Episcopal Diocese, the World-Telegram learned today.

A church official in charge of the probe emphasized that the investigation started only two weeks ago and that no findings had been presented to either confirm or disprove the complaint. A hospital spokesman denied the charge.

St. John's, a 275-bed institution at 480 Herkimer St., is run by the Church Charity Foundation of Long Island, associated with the Episcopal Church. The Rt. Rev. James P. DeWolfe, bishop of the Long Island Episcopal Diocese, is president of the hospital's board of managers.

Chapter Made Charge.

The discrimination charge was made by the Long Island chapter of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, which is not an official agency of the church. The group said Negro and white patients were segregated in private and semi-private rooms at the hospital.

Lloyd A. Johnson, Brooklyn vice chairman of the chapter, told this newspaper that a continuing investigation by the group since March has shown that white and Negro patients are mixed only in wards at the hospital. He charged, on behalf of the chapter, that "very rarely" were white and Negro patients put together in semi-private rooms.

"And there seemed to be a pattern in private and semi-private quarters to keep Negroes at one end of a corridor and whites at the other," he told a reporter.

Panel Gets Report.

He said the chapter had notified Bishop DeWolfe that there were race relations problems at St. John's and that the matter had been turned over to the diocese's Committee on Race Relations.

The Rev. Canon R. Thomas Blomquist, rector of St. Luke's Episcopal Church in Forest Hills, head this committee. He told the World-Telegram that the complaint was referred to his unit two weeks ago.

Canon Blomquist said he had appointed a two-man investigating team to study the charge. He said the investigators—one white and one Negro—might report to him in a week or two weeks. He stressed that the final report on the study would have to come from Bishop DeWolfe.

A spokesman for the hospital said: "St. John's does not practice segregation. We have had good race relations here."

100 Ward Beds.

The four-story institution has about 100 ward beds. A hospital official said these were occupied nearly exclusively by Negroes and Puerto Ricans from the low-income Bedford-Stuyvesant area.

He said about 75 percent of the patients in the private and semi-private rooms were white and 25 percent Negro. He said rooms were assigned by ability to pay and not by race.

The hospital has 20 Negro doctors in a regular staff of 135. A spokesman said there had been reports that the institution had more Negro doctors than all other voluntary hospitals in Brooklyn combined.

Mr. Johnson's group, which he said was formed in February to fight discrimination and now has 200 members, charged that on the fourth floor of the hospital there were only one or two Negroes and about 75 whites at any one time. Mr. Johnson called this floor "the most desirable" and said it consisted only of private and semi-private rooms.

Bishop Rejects Plea to Integrate Semi-Private Rooms in Hospital

The Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island has overruled a recommendation by a Diocesan Committee on Race Relations that all semi-private rooms in St. John's Episcopal Hospital, Brooklyn, be integrated.

The Right Rev. James P. DeWolfe, in a statement issued yesterday, said that the hospital "provides a constant demonstration of integration of integration in the mixing of the races" in almost all its facilities.

"On the other hand," he said, "many of the patients referred to us, for one reason or another, would enjoy greater peace of mind if placed in semi-private rooms with members of their own race."

Bishop DeWolfe, who is chairman of the hospital's board of managers, said the board had voted to adopt his statement as its policy.

Critics of the hospital administration had charged that Negro patients were not placed with white patients in semi-private rooms on the fourth floor, and that Negro patients had difficulty getting private rooms on this floor.

Bishop DeWolfe appointed a Committee on Race Relations last October to investigate the charges and make recommendations. The committee, which reported in March, said that in the admission of patients from the predominantly Negro community around the hospital "some segregation results." The hospital is at 480 Herkimer Street, Brooklyn.

While praising the church-supported hospital for steps it had taken to end segregation, the committee urged "the elimination of any and all practices which do not promote racial unity, but tend to destroy the brotherhood of man."

Bishop DeWolfe said he did not believe the charge of segregation was fair. In a telephone interview from his residence in Garden City, he said:

"It is my opinion that this is the most integrated hospital in New York."

He pointed out that when he came to the diocese twenty years ago, there were no Negro physicians or nurses on the staff, and he had fought successfully for their inclusion.

But, he said, the hospital's administrators report that Negro patients seem to show more improvement when they are placed together, and whites when they are placed together.

The Bishop said "the principle of consent" had to be regarded in assigning a white or Negro to a room with a person of the other race. The principle, he said, "has been widely and dangerously overlooked in the present agitation regarding racial segregation in this country."

Church Group Asks DeWolfe To Relent on Hospital Bias

A Long Island Episcopal group yesterday expressed its "shock" and "deepest regret" over Episcopal Bishop James P. DeWolfe's refusal to act on charges of racial discrimination at St. John's Episcopal Hospital in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn.

On Saturday, Bishop DeWolfe of the Long Island diocese, who is also chairman of the board of managers of the hospital, told the Diocesan Committee on Race Relations that he did not believe a charge of segregation at the hospital "is fairly applied." The committee had contended that "some segregation" exists in admission of patients; that Negro and non-Negro patients are seldom mixed in private and semi-private rooms and that both Negro patients and doctors had difficulty obtaining rooms on the hospital's fourth floor.

Bishop DeWolfe had replied that "to recognize racial differences is not to deny the equality of all men under God nor is it to impute or imply superiority or inferiority."

On Sunday, the Rev. George Lawrence, pastor of Antioch Baptist Church, Brooklyn, called the Bishop's statement "un-Christian and unGodly" and "unworthy of a distinguished high churchman." He called for the Bishop's resignation from the hospital's board of managers.

Yesterday's statement from the Episcopal Society for Cultural & Racial Unity, Long Island chapter, said the group had conducted its own investigation at the hospital a year ago, had found racial discrimination there, and met Bishop DeWolfe in May "in an effort to terminate this abominable practice."

This group, headed by Lloyd A. Johnson, of 264 New York Ave., Brooklyn, is composed of white and Negro clergy and laymen.

ESCRU said that "the practice of discrimination at St. John's Hospital, in terms of room assignment of non-white patients, is illegal, immoral and inefficient." It held that such practices conflict with the State Anti-Discrimination Law, "which forbide owners of a place of public accommodation to deny its occupancy to anyone because of race" and the State Civil Rights Law "which provides that all persons should be provided with full and equal facilities in places of public accommodation."

The ESCRU statement held that discrimination at the hospital "is immoral because it encourages hospital staff to lie in implementing this practice of segregation" and "inefficient" because "it involves considerable administrative detail and double-checking as a means of insuring that this policy be carried out in secrecy and avoid embarrassing incidents."

The group asked Bishop DeWolfe to reconsider the policy and "maintain the integrity of the Church which for so many years has provided leadership in the area of social justice."

Bishop DeWolfe was reported to be on vacation in North Carolina and unavailable for comment yesterday.

The Urban League of Greater New York also issued a statement yesterday condemning Bishop DeWolfe's action as "a particularly horrifying disclosure since the Episcopal Church itself has been in the vanguard of the integration struggle" and because the Bishop was "on record as supporting integration."

"It is therefore beyond our comprehension that the leader of the Church in Long Island would in this instance seize upon the old, old segregationist falsehood that the races fare better when kept apart to support a ruling against total integration of patient services at St. John's Hospital," the Urban League statement said.

The statement was signed by Edward S. Lewis, executive director.

PICKETS AT HOSPITAL OPPOSE SEGREGATION

Pickets, including a group from the Antioch Baptist Church in Brooklyn, marched in front of St. John's Episcopal Hospital yesterday to protest segregation there.

The marchers demonstrated against the recent refusal by the Right Rev. James P. DeWolfe, Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Long Island, to order the integration of semi-private hospital rooms.

Among the 150 demonstrators were groups from the local chapters of the Congress of Racial Equality, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and Local 1199 of the Drug and Hospital Employes Union.

The march continued for about 45 minutes along Herkimer Street in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section. The marchers from Antioch Baptist Church were led by their pastor, the Rev. George Lawrence.

In ruling against a recommendation to integrate semi-private rooms, Bishop DeWolfe had declared on June 30 that the "principle of consent" was to be observed in assigning a room to a white or Negro patient with a person of the other race.

He said later that he did not consider charges of segregation fair. He said St. John's was "the most integrated hospital in New York."

Church Hospital Faces Bias Inquiry

By JOHN WICKLEIN

The City Commission on Human Rights has begun an investigation into charges of racial discrimination at St. John's Episcopal Hospital in Brooklyn, a commission official said yesterday.

Madison S. Jones, executive director, said the commission had sent a telegram to the Right Rev. James P. DeWolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, requesting an immediate conference with him.

Last Saturday Bishop DeWolfe, who is chairman of the hospital's board of managers, overruled a recommendation by a Diocesan Committee on Race Relations that all semiprivate rooms in the hospital be integrated. He said that "the principle of consent" had to be regarded in assigning a white or a Negro patient to a room with a person of another race.

Mr. Jones remarked that "in this day and age it is just a little ridiculous" to have an institution in New York exercise such a principle. He continued:

"In a city where people of all creeds and ethnic groups are working and getting along together, and where we have a city Commission on Human Rights to further this kind of understanding, to have this kind of thing happen is just unthinkable."

Bishop DeWolfe was unavailable yesterday for comment.

Role of the Commission

Mr. Jones said the commission was looking into the hospital's practices in light of a newspaper account of the Bishop's statement.

Under Local Law 55, he pointed out, the commission has the right "to initiate its own investigations of racial, religious and ethnic group tensions, and prejudice, intolerance, bigotry and disorder occasioned thereby."

Where it finds discrimination exists, the commission tries to adjust the situation through its good offices, he said. It does not have the power to force an institution to discontinue discriminatory practices.

Last fall, after Bishop DeWolfe had received complaints of racial discrimination at the hospital, he appointed a special committee on race relations to investigate. The committee reported that "some segregation results" from the hospital's policy of assigning only persons of the same race to semiprivate rooms on the fourth floor. It urged that the practice be ended.

HOSPITAL FACING AN ANTI-BIAS VIGIL

Church Unit to Act Today in St. John's Dispute

By JOHN WICKLEIN

Clergy and laity of the Protestant Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity will mount a vigil outside St. John's Episcopal Hospital in Brooklyn this afternoon.

The group—unofficial though sanctioned by high officials of the denomination—is protesting what it says is the hospital's policy of keeping Negroes from being placed with white persons in semi-private rooms on the fourth floor.

A hospital official declared yesterday that this was not the hospital's policy. The admitting office, he said, places patients on the basis of availability of beds, without regard to race. This means, he explained, that Negro patients have been placed with white patients involuntarily on the fourth floor as well as on all other floors of the hospital.

On July 1, the Right Rev. James P. DeWolfe, Episcopal Bishop of the Long Island Diocese and chairman of the hospital's board of managers, overruled his own race-relations committee, which had found discrimination in placing white and Negro patients on the fourth floor—the most expensive area—of the hospital. The Bishop said he considered that in most of its facilities, St. John's was "the most integrated hospital in New York."

"On the other hand," he said, "many of the patients referred to us, for one reason or another, would enjoy greater peace of mind if placed in semi-private rooms with members of their own race."

It is this stand that the Episcopal Society, and the New York City Commission on Human Rights, are protesting. On Monday the commission sent a telegram to the Right Rev. Arthur C. Lichtenberger, Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, asking that he use his influence to make certain that there would be no discrimination at the Brooklyn hospital.

The Presiding Bishop, who is out of the city on vacation, authorized the Rev. Arthur Walmsley, associate director of the denomination's Department of Christian Social Relations, to make this reply:

"The position of the Episcopal Church opposing segregation in church institutions and elsewhere has been made clear by our General Convention and other bodies. The situation at St. John's Hospital in Brooklyn is a direct responsibility of the Diocese of Long Island and the board of the Church Charity Foundation [which governs the hospital].

"The appropriate authorities to carry on conciliation proceedings are the Bishop of the Diocese and the officers of the board. We hope this matter can be brought to a swift resolution."

Madison S. Jones, executive director of the Human Rights Commission, said the city's investigation at the hospital was continuing. The commission offers its good offices for conciliation in instances of discrimination, and if that fails, is empowered to hold public hearings on charges.

Bishop DeWolfe, who is traveling on vacation in North Carolina, could not be reached yesterday for comment.

The executive director of the Episcopal Society, who has arrived here from its headquarters in Atlanta, said the group had negotiated with Bishop DeWolfe to change his stand and the hospital's admission policies.

"We regret that negotiation and appeal have failed," the executive director, the Rev. John B. Morris, commented. For this reason, he said, clerical and lay members of the race relations group "will express their concern for the bishop's intransigence" by the vigil. He said he hoped that the protest at the hospital, and possibly a later demonstration outside Bishop DeWolfe's diocesan office in Garden City, L. I., would be "efficacious for effecting change."

Prayers Replace Picketing As DeWolfe Indicates a Shift

By LEE TOWNSEND,
World-Telegram Staff Writer

". . . Then shall I teach Thy ways unto the wicked and sinners shall be converted unto Thee . . ."

Fifty worshipers spoke these words aloud yesterday as they knelt in the chapel of St. John's Episcopal Hospital to pray for an end to the segregation which, it has been charged, exists in the Bedford-Stuyvesant institution.

Then the worshipers—some white, some Negro; some clergymen, some laymen -- sang Hymn No. 263 and quietly filed out of the peaceful, spacious chapel, ending what had been advertised as a "demonstration" protesting alleged segregation of Negro patients in semi-private rooms at the hospital.

Message From Diocese

The group, mostly members of the Long Island chapter of the Episcopal Society for Racial and Cultural Unity, had received a message relayed by the office of the Long Island Diocese of the Episcopal Church minutes before the start of the planned demonstration.

The message came from the Rt. Rev. James P. DeWolfe, bishop of the diocese, who is enroute to New York from a North Carolina vacation.

It read:

"If there is any purposeful segregation at St. John's Hospital of any kind on the part of anyone, director, doctor, board, nurse or anyone on the staff, the bishop will take immediate steps to stop and prevent this condition and to use his office to see that this is corrected."

Offer of Meeting

It also said that the bishop would be willing to meet with clergymen from his own diocese on the segregation charges upon his return, scheduled for sometime this weekend.

The chapter, which, along with the city's Commission on Human Rights, has been trying in vain for more than a week to reach the bishop, viewed the message as "giving some hope that accord can be reached."

Therefore, the Rev. John B. Morris, of Atlanta, Ga., national executive director of the cultural and racial unity group, announced that a planned march on the diocese office in Garden City would be postponed, as well as another demonstration scheduled for Saturday in front of the hospital.

'To Enter Chapel'

"Today, we shall merely seek permission to enter the chapel here at the hospital and pray for an end to the segregation," he said.

Hospital officials granted the permission and the small, quiet group walked inside to pray.

Before they did, however, Father Morris read aloud a statement that had been issued at a press conference earlier in the day.

It was a lengthy criticism of Bishop DeWolfe's statement made public July 1, in which he refused to seek changes in the hospital's admission policy even though the bishop's Committee on Race Relations found that segregation did exist at the institution, "consciously or not."

The bishop said patients had the right to choose with whom they wished to share a room and called this the "principle of consent."

The society's answer asserted that the bishop's stand violated state and federal discrimination laws and added:

"It is evident . . . the 'principle of consent' is for whites only. Whites only are asked whether or not they prefer convalescing with other whites. Whites only have free access to the choicer fourth floor . . ."

Hospital officials have repeatedly denied any policy of segregation. Even the group bringing the charge of segregation in semi-private rooms admits that the hospital - 60 percent of the patients of which are non-white—in many ways is one of the "most integrated" in the city. It has, for instance, more Negro doctors than all other private hospitals in Brooklyn combined.

While the small group stood in front of the hospital, at 480 Herkimer St., nurses and doctors glanced casually at them through windows. A few members of the hospital staff came to the front steps to listen to the brief speeches. There were no police stationed in front of the hospital.

One of the speakers was William M. Chisholm, an attorney and one of the two investigators appointed last fall by the diocesan Race Relations Committee to study the segregation charge.

He called Bishop DeWolfe's latest statement a "step in the right direction," but added he thought it was "rather innocuous."

THE NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM AND SUN, THURSDAY, JULY 12, 1962

(This appeared with preceeding account)

Here's Part of Report Criticizing St. John's

Here, made public for the first time, are detailed excerpts from the church report which concluded that segregation existed, "consciously or not," at St. John's Episcopal Hospital in Bedford-Stuyvesant.

Mimeographed copies of the report were circulated at a news conference yesterday of the Long Island chapter of the Episcopal Society for Racial and Cultural Unity, which first brought the segregation charge.

The report was written by William M. Chisholm, an attorney and one of the two investigators who studied the charge for the Race Relations Committee of the Long Island Church.

The World-Telegram showed Chisholm a copy of the report, and he identified it as the one he wrote and the one which was later adopted by the committee and sent to the Rt. Rev. James P. DeWolfe, Bishop of Long Island.

In his decision on the segregation question, the bishop included highlights from the report. The following are sections not before made public:

". . . At a meeting with the Negro members of the staff of the hospital, the doctors agreed that a problem does exist concerning the admission of Negro patients to the fourth floor, and the assignment of Negro patients to certain wings of other floors.

"It would appear from statements made to this committee that these doctors must make strong protestations to the admitting office, and even to the medical director to have a qualified Negro patient [admitted] to the fourth floor. It is their considered opinion that a policy definitely exists to exclude non-white patients from this floor.

"These doctors further stated that many of them had spoken to Mr. Connor (the hospital director, who was not available for comment yesterday) about this situation and had also spoken to a member of the board of managers about this situation, but that the conditions continue to exist

"A further contention of the doctors is that on the first and third floors, Negro patients are assigned primarily to wings which have but one bath for the entire wing while other wings have share-bath accommodations. Also that on the obstetric floor, the policy seems to be assignment of white patients to even numbered rooms and Negro to odd numbered rooms . . .

"It was also stated that some white physicians insist on having a "lily-white" floor, and sections of some floor, and are unsympathetic to mixing of patients, either private or semi-private.

"These (the Negro) doctors contend that as a result of these alleged practices, many of their patients refuse to be admitted to St. John's and, indeed, according to the doctors, many of the Negro personnel of the hospital refuse to become patients . . ."

Bishop Will Confer on Hospital Racial Issue

DeWolfe Will Review Policy With City Rights Unit

Bishop James P. DeWolfe, responding to public protests against segregation in semi-private rooms at St. John's Episcopal Hospital in Brooklyn, told the City Commission on Human Rights yesterday that he would be willing to meet with it to review the situation.

The commission's executive director, Madison S. Jones, had sent two telegrams to the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island at his office in Garden City, requesting a conference.

Mr. Jones acted after Bishop DeWolfe had announced he would not move to change the hospital's practice of putting only patients of the same race in the semi-private rooms on the fourth floor. Mr. Jones said it was "a little ridiculous" to have a hospital in New York carry out such a practice.

On Wednesday, about fifty clergy and laity of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity held a protest vigil outside the hospital at 480 Herkimer Street.

The Bishop, who expects to return from a vacation over the week-end, sent word to the group that he would use his office to correct "any purposeful segregation" at the institution.

Yesterday he asked the office of the Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church here to send the human rights commission the following message:

"In response to public concern I will review the situation at St. John's Hospital in consultation with the city and state commissions on human rights and will report to the public at the earliest opportunity in concert with these commissions."

The Rev. Arthur Walmsley, acting for the Right Rev. Arthur C. Lichtenberger, the Presiding Bishop, addressed the telegram to Mr. Jones, adding: "We trust conciliation proceedings will begin immediately and that a satisfactory solution will be found for the disputed issue."

He explained that the Bishop had mentioned the state commission, which has not acted in the case, to indicate that he wished to cooperate with any official agencies that might become interested.

At the office of the State Commission for Human Rights a spokesman said that it could act only if a complaint were placed officially before it, and that no complaint had been filed.

A spokesman for the City Commission on Human Rights said it had not yet received the telegram. It is not empowered to act jointly with the state commission, the spokesman said, but will meet separately with the Bishop.

The city commission's procedure in a case of this kind, it was noted, is to investigate the situation on a confidential basis and then offer its services of conciliation. Should conciliation fail, public hearings could be authorized.

BISHOP URGES END OF HOSPITAL BIAS

De Wolfe Calls on St. John's to Bar Segregation

Bishop James P. De Wolfe requested the board of managers of St. John's Episcopal Hospital in Brooklyn yesterday to direct the staff to carry out a policy of assigning patients to all rooms without regard to race.

The Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island made known the request after he had met in his Garden City, L. I., office with representatives of the City Commision on Human Rights.

The commision had requested the meeting to discuss accusations that the Brooklyn hospital assigned patients to semi-private rooms on the fourth floor on a segregated basis.

Bishop DeWolf's statement said in part:

"It is the policy of St. John's Episcopal Hospital not to practice any kind of segregation based on race, creed, color or national origin in any of its departments and facilities. It has ben stated that semi-private and private rooms on the fourth floor are denied in some instances to people because of race, creed, color or national origin. No segregation concerning their use is or will be a matter of hospital policy."

On June 30, the Bishop, commenting on hospital practice, said the "principle of consent" had to be regarded in assigning a white or Negro to a room with a person of the other race.

Vigil Held at Hospital

The Protestant Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, which had brought the charges of discrimination to the Bishop's attention, held a vigil outside the hospital last week to protest this practice. The hospital is at 480 Herkimer Street.

The Bishop sent word to those protesting that he would use his ofice to correct "any purposeful segregation" at the institution.

That was followed by yesterday's meeting with the Human Rights Commission and the Bishop's statement. Madison S. Jones, executive director of the commission, hailed the agreement reached.

The city's Human Rights Commission is empowered by law to investigate charges of discrimination in public and private institutions. It first offers conciliation where discrimination is found, and then may hold public hearings if the discrimination persists.

Interfaith "Dialogues" Ease Religious Conflicts In U. S.

DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL-HERALD
Nov. 23, 1962

By George W. Cornell
Associated Press Religion Writer

They were men of different religions, discussing their opposing policies. But they found that they agreed on basic purposes and principles, and that they also were concerned with the same problems.

This was the result of an interfaith "dialogue," a spreading practice in America today, aimed at easing community conflicts related to religion.

It is an approach to troublous issues such as religion and schools, birth control policies and Sunday closing laws, that involves talking plainly with each other, instead of one-sidedly about each other.

And the ensuing better understanding, and extent of shared views, often surprises even the participants.

"The difficult problems can be ameliorated through patient and honest exchange of ideas and the intelligent analysis of issues," says Dr. Lewis Webster Jones, president of the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

The agency, including representatives of Catholicism, Protestantism and Judaism, is engaged in a far-reaching, new project to bring the groups together, nationally and locally, to seek solutions to points of friction.

Set to run for five years, or longer, the program is called the "religious freedom and public affairs project."

This week it held its first national institute in Washington, D.C., dealing with religious liberty, and to a large degree, the Jewish, Protestant and Catholic experts found themselves voicing common basic ideals—and objectives.

The same underlying concordant note has turned up in many local interfaith sessions, now increasing across the country.

"In several communities there was clear evidence of a changed atmosphere within the community as a result of the understanding and the good feeling that had emerged from the dialogue," a project report said.

This doesn't mean differences in policies are overcome, but it does offer fuller joint understanding, and often brings out that the principles behind the differing policies correspond.

LEWIS WEBSTER JONES,
President, NCCJ

"The nature of the conflict is changed," said Rabbi Arthur Gilbert, project consultant. "It allays the mistaken, hysterical stereotypes, and to a large extent, makes clear that the differences are not in principles, but only in applications of them."

So far, in its beginning year, the project reports that regular meetings are going on between the three faiths in 30 communities, and the number is increasing. Clergymen and lay civic leaders meet monthly or more often.

Unlike the theological "dialogue" now expanding between Protestants and Catholics, the three-way talks are concerned with public and social questions arising from different religious approaches to them.

Such questions as religious observances in the public schools, textbooks for parochial schools, gambling laws, religious political pressure and other matters producing disputes are among those taken up.

"It is time we got beyond the interfaith smile," said Dr. Jones, an Episcopalian. "It is time we got down to facing the hard questions of what it really means to practice our respective faiths in a free society."

In addition to forming the "dialogue" groups, the project also sponsors special seminars in major cities, and a broad program of studies, both of specific situations and general subjects.

It also has launched a number of publications, including "Background Reports," on current problems, and has plans under way for university seminars for professional groups, such as lawyers and church publishers, who deal with the issues.

A Ford Foundation grant of $325,000 helped finance the start of the project a year ago, and other foundations also are expected to provide further support as it goes along. President Kennedy has hailed the plan.

At the Washington meeting, the key addresses, from the different religious leaders, often had a common ring. For example:

"Religious liberty is fundamental," said the Jew, Rabbi Robert Gordis, of New York. It is "an absolute need of the human spirit," said the Protestant, Rev. Dr. Roger L. Shinn, also of New York. "The citizen's civil rights are not and cannot be conditioned by his confessional allegiance," said the Catholic, Rev. Edward Duff, of Weston, Mass.

Dr. Gordis said Judaism is deeply worried about "widespread religious illiteracy." Father Duff expressed fear that America is excluding the "religious dimension from the training of its young." Dr. Shinn said Protestants also were worried about schools "excluding Judaeo-Christian traditions that are authentic elements in our history."

Their concerns were similar. The question is how to deal with them.

Said Dr. Jones:

"The goal of our program is to work out the difficulties in a truly democratic manner—not asking anyone to sacrifice his religious convictions, but perhaps to modify his demands about the public applications of those convictions."

PUBLIC LIFE and MORALS

BOSTON, MASS.
PILOT
Nov. 24, 1962

This week in Washington a couple of hundred people gathered together to talk about the relationship between religion and public life. The meeting was sponsored by the National Conference of Christians and Jews, the thirty-year old agency which works for improved interreligious relations in the United States. It was, by design, a heterogeneous assembly representing all religious groups on the American scene and even those who had no religious affiliations whatever. The discussions covered a wide range of topics—nearly every subject that is a source of community abrasion on the American scene. The central point is worth considering.

The background of the discussions is the indisputable fact of a changing America. Formerly, in our country, the religious commitment was for the most part totally Protestant. It is still true in larger areas of the rural midwest and south that the Protestant church is so strong a force in the local community that the public life and action reflect Protestant values, and in some measure, even sectarian practice. For the most part the cities and the urban areas in general have ceased to be Protestant, and are now made up of Protestant, Catholic, Jewish, and the un-churched. Some cities have become predominantly Catholic and at least one—New York City—heavily Jewish. In those areas the size of the Catholic (and Jewish) community is a force to be reckoned with in public affairs.

The present problem that seeks solution is in its simplest terms—what should be the influence of religious bodies in the formation of law and public administration? Should public life reflect the specific religious views of the majority group, whatever it may be? Or should it be independent of all religious groups? In this last case is it not the easiest thing for government to be neutral, to be essentially secular and leave religion to the churches?

An affirmative reply to this last proposition is especially attractive to many Americans. Instead of choosing among competing religious allegiances, keep all religion out of public life. Those who feel this way are pleased with every effort that can be made to remove what vestiges of religion remain from earlier traditions and they labor to see that no new incursions become successful. This solution has of course the advantage of simplicity, but this is practically all that can recommend it. For the rest, it relegates religion—all religion—to the sanctuary and suggests that our public institutions are independent of any religious claims whatever. It "establishes" secularism on the official public attitude of this country and sets out to remove whatever traditions may conflict with this proposition.

It should be possible, in the face of this proposition, for religiously minded people to find some acceptable formula which would return religion to its proper place in the public life of America. Such an effort would be faithful to our best traditions as a nation and not at all inconsistent with the demands of religious freedom. Our laws and administration should seek to reflect the moral consensus of the community without at the same time favoring any specifically sectarian practice. Not in any sense seeking a lowest common denominator of religious acceptance, we should seek to discover and formulate that body of moral values which are accepted by the overwhelming majority of Americans. Once this consensus is found—and we presume that it is possible—we should unashamedly express it in our public life and institutions in the manner of our fathers in an earlier time in this republic. Not secularism, then, but moral values should undergird the official and public life of America. Unless we are prepared to set our minds and hearts to this task we will have soon lost by default what first set this nation on the road to greatness.

A Study of Freedom

FAIRMONT, W. VA.
TIMES-WEST VIRGINIAN
DEC. 2, 1962

Americans like to talk about religious freedom, and to swear allegiance to this principle. The fondness for insisting that the principle must be upheld is not matched by popular knowledge as to what religious freedom entails.

This heightens the importance of a broad undertaking, by the National Conference of Christians and Jews, to study the attitudes and practices of various faith groups in relation to public questions. The First National Institute on the Responsibilities of Religious Freedom, held in Washington for three days, is a part of this project.

The institute can only be a beginning, clearly. The NCCJ is aware of this, and has mapped out a long-range effort intended "to raise the general level of public discussion and understanding among religious groups differing on issues of public concern." It is expected that this will continue for a number of years. The project should do a great deal to clarify thinking on a question of great importance.

HOW DO YOU ACCOUNT FOR IT?

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NATIONAL JEWISH
POST AND OPINION

An odd occurrence—the Jewish attitude towards the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

For a while, the NCCJ was so apologetic and so careful to do nothing except make pretty speeches—it changed its title from National Conference of Jews and Christians because of this attitude—that knowledgeable Jews lost faith in it.

The fearful Jews—who believed in Jews hiding behind the ramparts instead of speaking out as Jews—loved the NCCJ then.

Now that the NCCJ has become vigorous in the fight to eliminate prejudice and has not been afraid to take controversial positions, it seems to have little impact in the Jewish group. A year or so ago we wrote an editorial praising the NCCJ for this courageous shift when this new policy became obvious. Yet one hears little of the NCCJ in Jewish circles now.

Our remarks now are prompted by the forthcoming first national institute of the NCCJ Nov. 18-21 in Washington, D.C. A parade of the subjects shows that the NCCJ now goes where angels fear to tread. Among these subjects are: Controversy over Christmas Celebration in Schools, Birth Control, Gambling, Sunday Closing, Religion a Factor in Conditioning Attitudes That Reflect Themselves at the Ballot Box, A Look at Religious Pressure Groups at the Level of City Government and A Jew, A Catholic, A Protestant Look at Religious Liberty, and so on.

Where can you get more dangerous subjects?

Their airing is the best catharsis, and the NCCJ is the ideal body before which these controversial subjects can be aired and still avert internal civic explosions.

In view of the value of the NCCJ to a pluralistic society today, how do you account for the apathy to it of the Jewish community?

N.C.C.J.'s NEW DIRECTION

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY
EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
Nov. 21, 1962

Church-State and interfaith relations are entering a new phase in the U.S. Up to now most of us have been living on the complicated middle ground that lies somewhere between "the more we get together the happier we'll be" and "familiarity breeds contempt." In the past, when Protestants, Catholics, Jews, and the nonreligious led their separate lives, each group condoned any myth about the others. In the present, when citizens of all faiths and nonfaiths live in closer physical and psychic proximity, new patterns of competition and understanding are developing.

Early in its history, the National Conference of Christians and Jews took its stand on that complicated middle ground and devoted itself to promoting "brotherhood." As the years went by, however, this N.C.C.J. stance came under criticism. The sentiment of brotherhood did not seem by itself to have enough durability, boldness or energy to cope with interfaith tensions. That the N.C.C.J. became aware of this fact and has set out in a new direction is proved by the First National Institute on Religious Freedom and Public Affairs, which it convened in Washington, D.C., this week.

Backed by Ford Foundation funds, President Lewis Webster Jones and Staff Consultant Rabbi Arthur Gilbert of the N.C.C.J. brought together at Washington's Mayflower hotel a hard-working hard core of people who have special interest in religious liberty and affairs bearing on church-state conflict. While it built on the theoretical basis of institutes of the type initiated by the Fund for the Republic four years ago, this institute differed from them in its practical concern. The accent, Rabbi Gilbert reminded the conferees, should be on process and method, on the dynamics of alleviating tensions. Representatives of many interest and pressure groups were on hand, and this was all to the good. The tone of the meeting was a curious combination of amiability and frankness, acceptance of persons and rejection of positions.

To promote frankness, an agreement was made not to quote participants without permission. Hence any report on the institute may make it appear that the ideas it considered were shots into the wild blue. They were anything but that! They were contended for warmly and vigorously by people who had much at stake. On no issue was this personal interest more clear than when the various Roman Catholic spokesmen argued for federal aid to parochial elementary schools. In an N.C.C.J. occasional paper George La Noue referred to the fact that no case brought before the Supreme Court in its first 158 years tested the First amendment; but in its 1961-62 session alone the court rendered seven decisions bearing on that amendment, and many more cases involving it are on the docket.

The institute emphasized that we can expect life in the church-state realm to look like that for some time to come, with schools the chief focus of contention. The Supreme Court decision on the New York regents' prayer colored everything said here, just as talk of the election of a Roman Catholic as chief executive would have done two years earlier. This preoccupation with the actual marks a basic change in the legal and theological interpretation of the American religious and educational experience. It also sets the agenda for interfaith discussions.

The more secular wings of Judaism, the more belligerent elements of Catholicism were underrepresented at the institute. But urban American religion, with which "power" now lies, was certainly treated fairly. In the four days November 18-21 an accurate picture of the complaints and hopes of religious groups emerged. As a matter of fact, the institute may have given outsiders the impression that all American religious groups do is fight. But the agenda called for discussion of conflict, and so reservoirs of good will in the laity and the more fair-minded clergy were not often drawn upon. It was the competitive elements of institutional religion that were revealed in clear detail.

On Sunday night Father John Tracy Ellis set out to prove that the consistent strand of American Catholic thought, official and unofficial, has been in support of the American pattern of church-state relationships. Professor Franklin H. Littell concentrated on Protestantism's burden of reinterpreting itself now that the Protestant cultural hegemony is being replaced by a generalized national religion. Later in the week, Rabbi Robert Gordis tried to deal with the embarrassments to religious liberty where Jews are in control, as they are in Israel. These speakers made it clear that each tradition has its uncertainties and ambiguities.

Moreover, in America each tradition finds it difficult to understand why its own moral-legal concerns are not fully grasped by others: Catholics on legislation effecting birth control; Protestants, on gambling; Jews, on Sunday closing. There seemed to be a three-way or four-way parity of conflict and concern in regard to every legal illustration presented during the institute.

In my oral summary to the conference I suggested that the changes in church-state relations we are experiencing today are largely the result of the general trend toward centralization. Issues that were once settled on a regional or local basis are now given national publicity and tend to land in the lap of the federal government. A corollary to this trend, I believe, is overexpectation as to what part elementary schools, both public and private, ought to play in the interpretation of the American experience. Can the school, should the school carry all the burdens? Are the religious groups abdicating because of their own inability or unwillingness to teach, to hold loyalties? I see the beginnings of a mystique which implies that the pluralist process should acquire a new theological justification and a new practical part in settlement of conflict.

One can take heart from the consistent criticism of ideologies, the general interest in theories that do not harden into dogmas, the painstaking concern for legal redress, the openness with which various positions in American life were discussed at this institute. The church-state and interreligious fields have become highly complex, highly technical. Conviction that the American laity can and will solve these problems by "brotherhood" alone is disappearing: the good will across lines of religious institutions tends to dissipate when tested. Technical skill is needed, in addition to good will. The decade ahead will call for restraint, closer study, an occasional moratorium on debate, moderation in pressing of claims. Nobody at this institute expected a utopian breakthrough. But everyone left with a clearer conception of the hopes that America's religious and nonreligious groups bring to a time of rapid change.

NCCJ PROJECT —
Religious Freedom and Public Affairs

Since its founding, NCCJ has been deeply concerned about those matters of public policy in which religious differences threaten to divide the American people. Failure to find some consensus on such church-state issues as public support of parochial schools, religion and public education and Sunday closing laws, to mention but a few, pits American against American at a time when, as a nation, we should be working together as never before to combat threats to our freedom at home and abroad. A solution to these difficult problems can only be brought about through patient and continuing conference and confrontation and exchange of ideas—which is the program method of the National Conference.

The National Conference has expanded its work in the field of interreligious relations by the inauguration of a new project: RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AND PUBLIC AFFAIRS. This project is designed to raise the general level of public discussion and understanding among religious groups differing on issues of public concern.

To this end, the NCCJ is sponsoring a series of conferences, institutes and seminars that will allow civic leaders, scholars and clergy of various faith groups to discuss together specific problems of religious and political action. Each of the sixty-five NCCJ regional offices assists in the program.

The NCCJ is planning a program of sufficient intensity and excellence to exert appreciable influence on American public opinion. The Ford Foundation has generously appropriated $325,000 over the first four years for partial support of the program. It is hoped that other foundations, and philanthropic individuals, will join in providing the additional necessary funds.

Your Child

Your Child and His Attitudes

By DONALD M. MAYNARD

Once upon a time there was a father who had no interest in bugs or crawling things. In fact, he didn't like them. To him they were objects to brush quickly from one's clothes, and to avoid when possible. One evening his young son, who was having his first experience with catching fireflies, rushed up to him and asked him to hold a firefly he had just caught. The father's first inclination was to withdraw his hand quickly and to refuse his son's request with an exclamation of disgust and irritation. Fortunately, he caught himself just in time, and gingerly held the firefly in his hand, and then another, and then still another, as the son delightedly continued what was to him a thrilling experience.

It is worthy of note that this young boy continued his interest in all phases of nature, and today, many years later, is carrying on significant research in the field of zoology and teaching in one of the great universities of our land. The father has been grateful through the years that in this every-day, and yet crucial experience with his son, he did not pass on to him his own attitude of dislike for bugs. How easy it would have been for him to transmit the feeling to his son that bugs and crawling things were to be avoided, or to be crushed and killed. And how impoverished the life of the son would have been had the father's attitude been passed on to him.

The purpose of this illustration is to remind us that it is during the formative years of a child's life that many of his basic attitudes are established, attitudes that will do much towards determining whether or not he has confidence in himself, whether or not he has wholesome attitudes towards others and can get along with them, and the kind of values around which he builds his life. As a parent contemplates this responsibility, it is almost frightening.

But it is equally important that we do not let this illustration give us the wrong impression. Important as the parents may be in the formation of children's attitudes, he is not the sole determiner of them. Other people, the child's peers, and his first hand experiences with objects and people in his environment, all influence him. This particular boy, for example, even though he had at first caught from his father a dislike for bugs, might have changed when he discovered that many of his peers were interested in objects of nature. A teacher in the school might have directed him into many interesting contacts with, in this case, bugs, and later on the teaching of science in school might have created an interest in the whole field of zoology. Nevertheless, the influence of parents, especially during the earlier years, is likely to be more important than any other factor.

By the term "attitudes," we are thinking primarily of the feeling that a child or a person has towards objects, events, people, or ideas. It is the feeling aspect of attitudes that is as important. And although it is true that we feel more intensely about some things than others, we think of an attitude as having an intensity of emotion connected with it that leads to a certain type of behavior. Attitudes give direction to our behavior and our lives. If I have a favorable attitude towards someone, I want to be with that person, in my behavior I tend to approach him. If I have an attitude of dislike, I try to avoid the person, and I tend to go away from him. I tend to be favorably inclined toward the ideas of people whom I admire and like; I tend to be critical of the ideas of those whom I do not like or admire.

It is important, then, for you to ask yourself two basic questions: What are the more basic attitudes I want my child to develop? And second, what part do I have to play in the development of my child's attitudes?

The child is not born with attitudes about people or ideas. He is not born with prejudices toward others; he is not born with a deep-seated sense of inferiority. These are attitudes that are acquired, that grow out of his experiences. Because they are acquired, they may either be prevented in the first place, or changed after they have been developed. This, of course, is why you, the parent, have such a significant role to play. Your child is in your care during the formative years when many of the most basic attitudes are created.

As you think of your child and his attitudes, keep in mind the following:

I. Your child, very early in life, learns to behave in ways that bring about the gratification of his needs, some of which are physical, others psychological and social. He discovers that how well they are satisfied depends upon how well he gets along in his interpersonal relationships which, for a small child, means with you, the parent. The behavior that he discovers is pleasing to you becomes associated with certain attitudes. These attitudes consequently influence his future interpretation of his environment and create within him a readiness to act in a certain way.

Your child, for example, has a great need for your approval. If he discovers that whenever he exercises initiative and resourcefulness in his play, or manifests great curiosity about the world of nature and of people, you seem to be a bit irritated and express your disapproval, he may decide that it is better to stifle creative thinking and curb impulses to express himself freely and enthusiastically. He is likely to develop a basic attitude towards life that says life must be lived cautiously, rather than with an adventuresome spirit. In the future, therefore, he responds negatively to creative opportunities.

Again, in his play with his peers it is inevitable that he should run into conflicts and difficulties. This is a normal part of the process of learning how to get along with others. But one evening he comes home and says he has been in a fight, and he speaks disparingly of his adversary. It soon is revealed that the boy is one of another race, or creed. You may not realize it but this may be a very crucial moment in your child's life. How you respond to the situation may determine whether your child develops racial prejudice or exemplifies a feeling of tolerance and appreciation for others. If you, too, speak with contempt for the lad of another race, and encourage your son to feel that he is "no good" or inferior, the seeds of racial prejudice may be firmly entrenched. On the other hand, if you show disapproval of such evidences of racial prejudice, your child's attitude towards others may become one of respect and appreciation. Behavior, you see, helped influence the development of attitudes, which attitudes, in turn, influenced future behavior.

II. Although your child's attitudes may be affected by what you say, other means of communication are likely to be more effective. And of course what you do is more important than anything else. But do not forget that it is important that you offer verbal expressions of approval and appreciation to your child. Do not take for granted that he knows you love him and are proud of him. Tell him so, in no uncertain terms.

Far more important than your words, will be the more subtle means of communication. The smile on your face and the light in your eye as you congratulate your son on something he has done, are far more significant than the words you may utter. And a scowl, or a shrug of the shoulders, or the pursing of the lips when your child shares with you a mediocre report card conveys your disappointment more eloquently than scolding or recrimination. Saying nothing in such a situation may be more devastating to the spirit of your child than the honestly facing of the facts in the situation.

Actions have special significance as you try to help your child develop wholesome attitudes toward religion. You can tell your child that you believe in God, but if in the telling you are unenthusiastic and seem to be expressing shibboleths that you have learned, your child is not fooled. If, in addition, he sees no evidence that you ever pray to God; if you never speak of Him in connection with the ongoing life of the family; and if your grace at the table is purely perfunctory, he soon senses the fact that God isn't a very vital factor in your life. You can take your child to church school and tell him it is good for him, that you went as a child. If you then return home to read the Sunday paper, and do not bother to attend the services of your church, your son will look forward to the time when he is big and can stay home. In other words, your child's attitude toward religion is likely to reflect your own.

III. Your child will tend to assume the attitudes of persons and groups with which he identifies himself. When he is small, you may note that he frequently expresses the attitudes of a beloved character in his favorite story. Later on he tends to emulate the athletic heroes with whom he identifies himself. There is considerable evidence that children who watch television extensively reflect the attitudes of their favorite characters.

In later childhood, and especially during adolescence, your child will be particularly concerned about the approval of those who belong to a special group of which he is a part. Sometimes the expectations and attitudes of these peer groups are quite different from your own. Your child thus finds himself in a quandary. He wants to please you—although this may be news to you—and he also wants the approval of his group. He may find himself vacillating between espousing the attitudes of the group, and those of the home. He may be genuinely concerned as to what is right or wrong, as attitudes are closely related to values. Try to be as sympathetic as possible with him in his predicament. Watch for moments when you can share with him the reasons for your attitudes; give him a chance to express his own viewpoints, and encourage him to make up his own mind.

Recognizing the importance of peer groups upon the formation of attitudes, it is perfectly proper that you should be concerned about the groups to which your child belongs. You will try to provide for your children friends and companions whose basic attitudes you deem to be commendable, although they may not always be identical with your own.

IV. Far less important than the influence of peer groups, is the influence of logical argument, or the acquisition of factual information, although they both have some influence upon attitudes. Encourage your child to think logically and to get the facts that form the basis of judgment and thus of attitudes. Remember, however, that these are not all important. It may be well, also, to remember that the attitudes of your child will not be markedly changed by threats or punishment.

V. Your child's first-hand experiences with his environment help determine his attitudes toward himself and others. A child who is guided into a creative activity in which he achieves something that seems to him and to others to be significant, develops confidence in himself. Happy experiences with those of other races provide a foundation for attitudes of respect and appreciation for them. A role-playing experience in which he tries to feel as others feel, may bring about changes in his attitudes.

VI. Do not forget the influence of the community in which you live upon your child's attitudes. In your efforts as a citizen to see to it that you have honest officials, that your schools and teachers are held in high regard, and that throughout the community there is respect and appreciation for the various racial and religious groups, you will be trying to provide your child with that kind of an environment which will help produce wholesome, worthwhile attitudes.

EDITORIAL

The National Conference of Christians and Jews takes pleasure in bringing to "Dialogue" readers of all religious groups the articles sent from Rome during the eight weeks October 11 to December 8, 1962, by Religious News Service's two special correspondents, Rev. Robert A. Graham, S.J., and Dr. Claud D. Nelson. These articles do not constitute complete news coverage, but are of a supplementary and interpretive character, often including European comments; Roman Catholic, Protestant, and secular.

They constitute an illuminating background for understanding the proceedings of the second round of Council sessions, scheduled to begin on September 8.

For convenience, the reports of the two correspondents are printed as separate sections of this enlarged issue of the Bulletin.

VATICAN COUNCIL MAKES DEEP IMPRESSION ON DELEGATE-OBSERVERS

ROME (RNS) 10/19/62 – For the non-Catholic delegate-observers and guests, the pomp and splendor, not to mention the high spiritual fervor, attending the opening of the Second Vatican Council added up to an unforgettable experience.

But far more memorable, by common agreement, was their personal encounter with Pope John XXIII, the great dominant figure of the Council, whose irenic spirit and broad human understanding have won him universal admiration and respect.

Some of the Protestant observers remarked to this correspondent that since they were all seated very close to His Holiness, they were able to observe the expression in his eyes as he read various parts of the opening services in St. Peter's Basilica, and then delivered the address in which, as many times before, he voiced his deep personal interest in the cause of Christian unity.

What they saw in the Pope's eyes, they said, was a profound benevolence and sincerity. Later, the observers, mostly from major Protestant Churches and international bodies, but with a sprinkling of Eastern Orthodox, were received in a special audience which confirmed and deepened their original impression.

As the Council began its work, much emphasis was placed on evidences that Pope John, in his person and through the history-making assembly which he convened, may well prove to be the introducer of a new era and a new spirit in Roman Catholicism which – it may well be added, would be of maximum interest to Christians of other confessions.

In looking beyond Rome toward a Christianity surrounded by a world in political ferment, Pope John was not anxiously defensive. "There have been worse times than these," he said in his address to the members of the foreign missions in Rome for the opening of the Council. He made it clear he wishes to proceed by persuasion, exhortation, trusting to the power of truth and love, not resorting to denunciation or anathema.

The Pope's words were held by many to presage Catholic support for a peaceful co-existence among the nations rather than a reinforcement of the West in the cold war. They also raised, inevitably, certain questions. One Italian newspaper, for example, felt moved to comment that if Christians must indeed turn the other cheek, men who carry political responsibility must all the more look after national defense.

The Italian press, whether of the right or the left, was properly respectful in its reception of Pope John's allocution on the opening day of the Council. That and the proceedings and processions were well presented also on television for several hours. One leftist paper applauded the way in which, it said, the pontiff left the Council free to determine its own attitudes and approaches, being content merely to indicate areas of urgent and general human concern. However, the paper

An Appeal to the Conscience of the American People

FROM THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON RELIGION AND RACE
JANUARY 17, 1963, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

✦ We have met as members of the great Jewish and Christian faiths held by the majority of the American people, to counsel together concerning the tragic fact of racial prejudice, discrimination and segregation in our society. Coming as we do out of various religious backgrounds, each of us has more to say than can be said here. But this statement is what we as religious people are moved to say together.

I

Racism is our most serious domestic evil. We must eradicate it with all diligence and speed. For this purpose we appeal to the consciences of the American people.

This evil has deep roots; it will not be easily eradicated. While the Declaration of Independence did declare "that all men are created equal" and "are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights," slavery was permitted for almost a century. Even after the Emancipation Proclamation, compulsory racial segregation and its degrading badge of racial inequality received judicial sanction until our own time.

We rejoice in such recent evidences of greater wisdom and courage in our national life as the Supreme Court decisions against segregation and the heroic, nonviolent protests of thousands of Americans. However, we mourn the fact that patterns of segregation remain entrenched everywhere—north and south, east and west. The spirit and the letter of our laws are mocked and violated.

Our primary concern is for the laws of God. We Americans of all religious faiths have been slow to recognize that racial discrimination and segregation are an insult to God, the giver of human dignity and human rights. Even worse, we all have participated in perpetuating racial discrimination and segregation in civil, political, industrial, social and private life. And worse still, in our houses of worship, our religious schools, hospitals, welfare institutions and fraternal organizations we have often failed our own religious commitments. With few exceptions we have evaded the mandates and rejected the promises of the faiths we represent.

We repent our failures and ask the forgiveness of God. We ask also the forgiveness of our brothers, whose rights we have ignored and whose dignity we have offended. We call for a renewed religious conscience on this basically moral evil.

II

Our appeal to the American people is this:

SEEK a reign of justice in which voting rights and equal protection of the law will everywhere be enjoyed; public facilities and private ones serving a public purpose will be accessible to all; equal education and cultural opportunities, hiring and promotion, medical and hospital care, open occupancy in housing will be available to all.

SEEK a reign of love in which the wounds of past injustices will not be used as excuses for new ones; racial barriers will be eliminated; the stranger will be sought and welcomed; any man will be received as brother—his rights, your rights; his pain, your pain; his prison, your prison.

SEEK a reign of courage in which the people of God will make their faith their binding commitment; in which men willingly suffer for justice and love; in which churches and synagogues lead, not follow.

SEEK a reign of prayer in which God is praised and worshiped as the Lord of the universe, before whom all racial idols fall, who makes us one family and to whom we are all responsible.

In making this appeal we affirm our common religious commitment to the essential dignity and equality of all men under God. We dedicate ourselves to work together to make this commitment a vital factor in our total life.

We call upon all the American people to work, to pray and to act courageously in the cause of human equality and dignity while there is still time, to eliminate racism permanently and decisively, to seize the historic opportunity the Lord has given us for healing an ancient rupture in the human family, to do this for the glory of God.

Interracial Ministry in North Carolina

What it was like for a southern white church to have a Negro assistant on its staff one summer.

Religion

ROBERT SEYMOUR

✦ IN the March 16, 1962, issue of this magazine readers were introduced by Stephen C. Rose to the Student Interracial Ministry, the creative movement wherein young seminarians spend the summer as assistants to ministers of churches whose members are wholly or predominantly of another race than their own. As one who had participated in the project as a student, Mr. Rose wrote from the "sending" viewpoint. Now, as pastor of a southern white church which has participated by welcoming a Negro seminarian to its summer staff, I can testify to what it can be like on the "receiving" end.

My first contact with the movement came one morning late in May when I answered the telephone in the office of the Olin T. Binkley Memorial Baptist Church, which was organized four years ago in Chapel Hill, North Carolina, and—until we are able to build on our own property—carries on in facilities offered by the University of North Carolina.

The caller got right down to cases. "Can you make a place for a Negro on your church staff?" he asked, and proceeded to explain that the ministry he represented is designed to bring Negroes and whites together in leadership of the local church.

I waited a moment before replying. "I cannot answer for our congregation," I finally said. "But it sounds like an opportunity we ought to consider." After I put the receiver back on its hook I wondered whether I should have been at all encouraging; I was not sure that our people were ready for such a move.

A New Situation

The time was short, so events had to move quickly. I learned that our prospective guest's name was James Forbes, that he had just been granted the B.D. degree, that he was a member of a Pentecostal church, and that he hailed from Raleigh, North Carolina. That last bit of information was providential, for southerners are sensitive to the intrusion of "outsiders" where anything having to do with race is concerned. But what about Forbes's Pentecostal background? Would that prove a stumbling block for our Baptist congregation?

We had faced the racial issue before. Four months after the congregation was organized a Negro freshman at the university had applied for membership and been received. That first step had proved a traumatic experience, even though all were convinced that we had acted in the right. Later two more Negroes joined the church, and several others regularly attend our worship services. But the proposed arrangement posed a new situation: we would be receiving a ministry from a Negro, not simply offering it to him.

At a called meeting of the deacons only two reservations were voiced—whether there would be enough work during the summer to warrant adding anyone to the staff, and whether we could afford the financial cost. One deacon did say he was "less than enthusiastic" about the proposal, but he agreed to stand with the others in recommending to the church council that we enter into the program.

Approval from the council followed immediately. We arranged for Mr. Forbes to live with two white students in the church's activities house, and several families promised to play host to him at mealtime. The recommendation then went to a congregational meeting for final consideration. It was adopted with one negative vote and several abstentions. So the Rev. James Forbes came to Chapel Hill.

'Feeling Each Other Out'

It happened that on the day our new assistant was introduced to the congregation more guests than members were present. Chapel Hill was host to 300 high school students at a state choral clinic, and they made up our choir that Sunday. When Forbes walked forward to be received "under watchcare," along with a white student making the same request, disbelief could be read on many young faces.

Vacation church school was the first responsibility assigned to Forbes. Immediately the children fell in love with him; they couldn't stop talking about "Jim," as they called him at his invitation. One mother told me that her young son had served notice that he would not attend vacation church school another year, but then he met Jim and nothing could keep him away. The children's acceptance naturally predisposed their parents in Jim's favor and almost every day he was asked to someone's home for dinner. Many of his hosts had never before had a Negro in their home except as a servant, but if there was awkwardness in the new relationship it failed to show itself.

ut of response he would meet in the church and the community at large. I sensed that though he knew he was officially accepted he was apprehensive about the reaction of individual members to his presence. There was an initial period of "feeling each other out" in relationships that were as new and strange to him as to anyone else. We decided that it would be wise for Jim to establish personal ties with our members before taking over major leadership responsibilities. So he and I together visited in the homes of the parish. He sang in the choir, taught a class in the church school, attended all meetings of the diaconate, council and committees. I apologized for not being able to make full use of his ability at once, and I kept reminding him that the fact of his presence was in itself of incalculable importance.

Unprecedented Participation

Observance of the Lord's Supper on the first Sunday in July seemed a good occasion to have Jim share the service with me. So he and I walked into the sanctuary and took our places together. He read the Scripture and offered the prayer of thanksgiving. Then, standing together behind the table, we served the elements to the congregation. As we did so I felt the miracle of reconciliation as I have seldom felt it before, and it was apparent that the worshipers shared my feeling. In the witness of our standing side by side the Word was preached, and the singing of "Who loves my Father as a son is surely kin to me" resounded like a hearty Amen. Most of the people in the church that day had never seen a Negro and a white man sharing in a situation of this kind, and their appreciative comments afterwards suggested that this experience satisfied a hunger of which they had been unaware.

Forbes's leadership those months brought about unprecedented participation in our Sunday evening ministry to summer school students. He was invited to give two lectures at the Baptist student center on the campus. As he prepared his material on the assigned topic, "Social and Political Movements in the Negro Community," he complained that every Negro is expected to be an authority on everything that has to do with race. Students on the campus sought him out.

Inevitably, perhaps, there were regrettable incidents. The chairman of one of our committees invited Jim to lunch with him at an establishment he mistakenly believed to be "open"; as a result, they inadvertently staged a sit-in! My wife, confident that he would be welcome, asked him to go with our family to the community Fourth of July celebration. But it turned out that he was the only Negro present, and we were embarrassed on his account when teen-agers taunted us with "Nigger-lovers!"

Such incidents, however, made our people more aware than they had ever been before of how restricted is the world in which the Negro lives. Jim's presence confronted them with the need to think twice before suggesting that he join them for this or that occasion, lest they create a crisis in the larger community. They began to understand in a more personal, direct way what it means to be a Negro in a southern town. As their color-consciousness lessened through their friendship for him, they were increasingly incensed by customs of the community which they had theretofore taken for granted.

The genuineness of the congregation's warm response to James Forbes was put to a test during my month's vacation. The diaconate and the church council asked him to assume responsibility for both pastoral and administrative leadership during my absence, and the pulpit committee invited him to take his turn at preaching along with other ordained ministers in the congregation.

His acceptance was most dramatically revealed in pastoral relationships. The parents of a new baby welcomed his visit to the hospital's maternity wing and expressed deep appreciation of his prayer of thanksgiving for their child—though the nurses stood in the hall outside, shocked that a Negro minister should be calling on a white woman. Another family —recently come to the city from Mississippi—turned to Jim for support in the crisis that arose when both husband and wife were unexpectedly hospitalized. In talking about that situation with me later Jim said, "I could have wished for you, but I would take nothing for their looking to me; I have never felt so completely a person!"

A Vital Witness

The community as a whole was not aware of the interracial nature of our summer ministry. We were glad that it escaped the notice of the press, for wide publicity might have generated unpleasant repercussions. Two groups in town were, however, very much aware of what was happening in our church: the Negro community and the foreign students on the university campus. The local Negroes were obviously proud of all James Forbes and his ministry symbolized; the students from overseas saw in his acceptance evidence of a new south in the making.

Our summer activities were climaxed by a retreat at the beach attended by 60 members of the congregation. Jim led a discussion group and conducted the evening vesper services. A football team from Columbia, South Carolina, happened to be on the grounds for preseason practice, and they asked permission to join in our final worship service. When Jim stepped forward to conduct the service they were obviously surprised, but no one was anything but cordial.

Realizing that this was Jim's last weekend with our church, members of the group at the retreat made the final meal a time for informal testimony to him. A recurring theme was "Your coming has been the best thing that has ever happened to us." Some expressed the wish that there were some way to continue the relationship on a permanent basis. In the weeks that have followed I have continued to hear such sentiments from members of the congregation, and I have yet to hear a dissenting opinion. I have been particularly gratified that people who early in the summer were apprehensive about the ministry speak of it now with unqualified praise.

And what of James Forbes's response? In the following excerpt from his midsummer report to the sponsoring agency he spoke for himself:

> This is very much like the work I would be doing if I were working in a church predominantly of my race, but because most of the members of this church are white I have had an opportunity to approach my work from a slightly different perspective. . . . One thing has become increasingly clear, and it is that real understanding requires genuine confrontation. . . . I feel that my working at this church in a leadership role has been a vital Christian witness to the larger Chapel Hill community.

A vital Christian witness indeed it has been! And though his own Pentecostal church has assigned James Forbes to a congregation in Wilmington, North Carolina, Binkley Memorial Baptist will continue to regard him as a member of its larger fellowship. We look forward to his being our pulpit guest in the days ahead.

Refuting Conclusions on Seminary Enrollment

✦ YOUR EDITORIAL "Ministers Are Not Quitters" (Dec. 5, 1962) asserts that there has been this year "an increase in Protestant seminary enrollments," in refutation of reports to the contrary in recent issues of Look and the Saturday Evening Post. As evidence you cite an increase in enrollments of member schools of the American Association of Theological Schools—which is almost, but not quite, the same thing. The "whole truth" is more difficult to ascertain than you imply. An "erroneous impression" is not necessarily a result of "indifference to the facts."

Jesse H. Ziegler, associate director of the A.A.T.S., includes in his annual tabulations and press releases detailed warnings against hasty interpretations. His suggestions for careful analysis regularly note that the list of A.A.T.S. members changes from year to year with effects on statistics which must be taken into account in responsible interpretation and reporting.

Dr. Ziegler's final report on 1962 enrollments (released Dec. 6, 1962) indicates a total of 20,729 students registered this fall in member seminaries in the United States and Canada. (This is an adjusted total, higher by 33 students than his preliminary report cited in your editorial and in a news note in the following issue.) The corresponding figure for 1961 was 20,466. The increase hailed by the ad hoc committee, and uncritically reported in your editorial, is created by counting 515 students in four new member schools for the first time in 1962. (Another school which had 14 students in 1961 has since been dropped from membership, leaving a net gain of 501 from the five schools which are not listed in both years.) If we refer only to schools listed both in 1961 and 1962, we find that the 121 so listed decreased in their total enrollments by 238 students (1.16 per cent).

Those who would argue that this decrease as reported in the official tabulation is more than offset by increases in the four new member schools and in some nonmember schools unlisted in either year will need to produce the figures. On the basis of those now available, the case for a slight decrease this year looks better than the case for a slight increase. In either case, Dr. Ziegler's description of seminary enrollments as having been on a "plateau" for the last few years has the advantage of not attaching great significance to small changes. His press release this year stated that "there is no basis for complacency." Relative to population and other educational indexes, "to maintain the same absolute numbe means relatively to move backward."

In previous years Dr. Ziegler has warned that even when there are increases in seminary enrollment, they may be more apparent than real. The 1961 tabulation showed an increase in students from other lands, most of whom will not become ministers in the United States and Canada. If increases in this category have continued, there were corresponding hidden decreases in the number of United States and Canadian students studying for the parish ministry. If last year's increase in unclassified and part-time registrants is repeated, total enrollments are th reby inflated. As more men enter internship programs requiring a fourth year, they too are counted again. It is not yet clear whether registering for more terms improves the educational programs of the students who, for various reasons, prolong their education. From the standpoint of the seminaries, this may seem to be a desirable trend. However, an increase in extended registrations by the same students should not be interpreted as an increase in the number of men deciding to train for the Protestant ministry.

Perhaps you have been misled by a partial reading of what Martin E. Marty wrote on the subject in your Nov. 7 issue. Unwilling to wait for "the I.B.M. machines of the A.A.T.S.," he did his survey, but did not claim for his findings the accuracy you ascribe to them. What you describe as the "seminaries sampled"—actually those reporting from a number of "representative" seminaries—were less representative than he assumed. The 23 A.A.T.S. members he lists had an increase this year of 54 students (0.7 per cent), while the 98 schools which were not included in his responses had a decrease of 292 (2.25 per cent). This gives weight to his own suggestion that nonresponding presidents might be off recruiting for next year.

Dr. Marty added other qualifications, making the las: two-thirds of his balanced report as sobering as anything in the Look and Post articles. He gave reasons for the "almost universal uneasiness expressed" in the presidents' letters —the apathy of the churches and an image of the ministry that is "obscured, diffuse, undramatic, purposeless"; "none of the respondents really feels that the problem of downward trends has been fully solved"; "many of the respondents declared that things will get worse before they get better." This is less optimistic than the interpretation supported in your Dec. 5 editorial.

Regarding dropouts from the ministry, there is a natural tendency to interpret any newly observed phenomenon as if it were a trend and to hail or deplore it depending on one's values. Laymen apparently find it shocking that any ministers quit. You protest that a minis-

The Ethical Demands of Integration

By MARTIN LUTHER KING

IT IS MY FIRM CONVICTION that men often hate each other because they fear each other and they fear each other because they don't know each other and they don't know each other because they fail to communicate with each other, and they don't do that because they are separated from each other. God grant that something will happen so that we will be able to bridge these gulfs and these barriers and bring about real brotherhood.

I have been asked to speak from the subject, "An Analysis of the Ethical Demands of Integration." The problem of race- and color-prejudice remains America's greatest moral dilemma. When one considers the impact it has upon our nation both internally and externally its resolution might well determine our destiny. History has thrust upon our generation an indescribably important task—to complete a process of democratization which our nation has too long developed too slowly but which is our most powerful weapon for world respect and evaluation. How we deal with this crucial situation will determine our moral health as individuals, our cultural health as a region, our political health as a nation, and our prestige as a leader of the free world. The shape of the world today does not afford us the luxury of an anaemic democracy. The price that America must pay for the continued oppression of the Negro is the price of its own destruction. The hour is late and the clock of destiny is ticking out. We must act now before it is too late.

Marks of Progress

Happily we have made some meaningful strides in breaking down the barriers of racial segregation. Ever since 1954 when the Supreme Court examined the legal body of segregation and pronounced it constitutionally dead, the system has been on the wane. Even the devout diehards who used to cry "never" are now saying "later." Much of the tumult and the shouting, interspersed with tirades against race-mixing, mongrelization of the races, and outside agitators, represent the fanatical death-throes of a dying system. As minimal as may be the across-the-board statistics, desegregation is in process. The bells of history are definitely tolling for segregation. And while I hope I am not a superficial optimist, I am convinced that in less than ten years desegregation will be a reality throughout most of the South. However, when the desegregation process is 100% complete the human relations dilemma of our nation will still be monumental unless we launch now the parallel thrust of the integration process.

Although the terms "desegregation" and "integration" are often used interchangeably, there is a great deal of difference between the two. In the context of what our national community needs, desegregation alone is empty and shallow. Therefore the theme of this conference goes to the heart of the matter. We must always be aware of the fact that our ultimate goal is integration, and that desegregation is only a first step on the road to the good society.

A significant conference was held in Nashville, Tenn., at the end of 1962, summoning people of religious motivation to consider "The Ethical Demands of Integration." The conference was sponsored by the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen and the Southern Regional Council. Some of the addresses and reports presented at that conference appear in these columns.

Perhaps this is the point at which we should define our terms. And now I become a victim of the "paralysis of analysis" that is sometimes spoken of. The word "segregation" represents a system that is prohibitive. It denies the Negro equal access to schools, parks, restaurants, libraries and the like. Desegregation is eliminative and therefore negative, for it simply removes these legal and social prohibitions. Integration is creative and is therefore more profound and far-reaching than desegregation. Integration is a positive acceptance of desegregation and the welcomed participation of Negroes into the total range of human activity. Integration is genuine inter-group, interpersonal living. Desegregation then is rightly only a short-range goal. Integration is the ultimate goal of our national community. Thus, as America pursues the important task of respecting the letter of the law, that is, compliance with desegregation decisions, she must be equally concerned with the spirit of the law; that is, commitment to the democratic dream of integration.

We do not have to look very far to see the pernicious effects of a desegregated society that is not integrated. It leads to physical proximity without spiritual affinity. It gives us a society where men are physically desegregated and spiritually segregated, where elbows are together and hearts are apart. It gives us spatial togetherness and spiritual apartness. It leaves us with a stagnant equality of sameness rather than a constructive equality of oneness. Therefore our topic leads us to an analysis of the "oughtness" of integration. On the basis of what is right, why is integration an end and desegregation only a means? In the context of justice, freedom, morality and religion, what are the basic ethical demands of integration?

Personality

First, integration demands a recognition of the sacredness of human personality. Deeply rooted in our political and religious heritage is the conviction that every man is an heir to a legacy of dignity and worth. Our Hebraic-Christian tradition refers to this inherent dignity of man in the biblical term, "the image of God." This innate worth referred to in the phrase, "the image of God," is universally shared in equal portions by all men. There is no graded scale of essential worth, there is no divine right of one race which differs from the divine right of another. Every human being has etched in his personality the indelible stamp of the Creator. This idea of the dignity and worth of human personality is expressed eloquently and unequivocally in the Declaration of Independence—"All men are created equal," it says. "They are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights. Among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Never has a socio-political document proclaimed more profoundly and eloquently the sacredness of human personality. Frederick Douglas stated the same truth in his lecture on "The Constitution of the United States," when he said, "Its language is, 'We, the People,' not, 'We, the white people,' not even, 'We, the citizens,' not, 'We, the privileged class,' not, 'We the high,' not, 'We, the low,' but, 'We, the people,' We, the human inhabitants. And if Negroes are people they are included in the benefits with which the Constitution of America was ordained and established."

Segregation stands diametrically opposed to the principle of the sacredness of human personality. It debases personality. Immanuel Kant said in one formulation of the categorical imperative that all men must be treated as ends and never as mere means. The tragedy of segregation is that it treats men as means rather than ends and thereby reduces them to things rather than persons. To use the words of Martin Buber, segregation substitutes an "I-It" relationship for the "I-Thou" relationship. The colloquialism of the Southern landed gentry that referred to slavery and our Negro labor as "hands" betrays the "thing" quality assigned to Negroes under the system. Herein lies the root of paternalism that persists even today. The traditional Southerner is fond of "his Negro" as he is of a pet or a finely tooled firearm. It serves a purpose or gets a job done, the only concern is performance, not well being. But man is not a thing; he must be dealt with not as an inanimate tool, but as a person sacred in himself. To do otherwise is to de-personalize a potential person and desecrate what he is. So long as the Negro is treated as the means to an end, so long as he is seen as anything less than a person of sacred worth, the image of God is abused in him and consequently and proportionately lost by those who inflict the abuse. Only by establishing a truly integrated society can we return to the Negro the quality of "thou-ness" which is his due because of the nature of his being.

DR. KING has become a national figure in his leadership of Negroes of the South, as president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. He is the author of Stride Toward Freedom, telling of the Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott experience.

Denial of Life

A second ethical demand of integration is a recognition of the fact that a denial of freedom to an individual is a denial of life itself. The very character of the life of man demands freedom. In speaking of freedom at this point I am not talking of the freedom of a thing called the will. We have had endless debates between the determinists and indeterminists and it usually turns out that they are arguing over something called "the will." Now in such an argument the determinist always wins because the very phrase, "freedom of the will," abstracts freedom from the person to make it an object, and an object, almost by definition, is not free. But freedom cannot be thus abstracted from the person who is always subject as well as object, and who himself still does the abstracting. So I am speaking of the freedom of man, the whole man and not one faculty called the will. Neither am I implying that there are no limits to freedom. Always freedom is within predestined structure. Thus a man is free to go north from Atlanta to Washington, or south from Atlanta to Miami, but he is not free to go north to Miami or south to Washington except by a long around-the-world journey. And he is not free to go to both cities at one and the same time. We are always free and destined. Freedom is the chosen fulfillment of our destined nature.

With these qualifications we return to the assertion that the essence of man is found in freedom. This is what Paul Tillich means when he declares, "Man is man because he is free." Or what Tolstoy implies when he says, "I cannot conceive of a man not being free unless he is dead."

What is freedom? It is, first, the capacity to deliberate or weigh alternatives. Shall I be a teacher or a lawyer? Shall I vote for this candidate or the other candidate? Shall I be a Democrat, Republican or Socalist? Second, freedom expresses itself in decision. The word, decision, like the word, incision, involves the image of cutting. Incision means to cut in; decision means to cut off. When I make a decision I cut off alternatives and make a choice. The existentialists say we must choose, that we are choosing animals, and if we do not choose we sink into thing-hood and the mass mind. A third expression of freedom is responsibility. This is the obligation of the person to respond if he is questioned about his decision. No one else can respond for him. He alone must respond, for his acts are determined by the totality of his being From this analysis we can clearly see the evil of segregation. It cuts off one's capacity to deliberate, decide and respond.

The absence of freedom is the imposition of restraint on my deliberation as to what I shall do, where I shall live, how much I shall earn and the kind of tasks I shall pursue. I am robbed of the basic quality of man-ness when I cannot choose what I shall do, or where I shall live, or how I shall survive. It means, in fact, that someone or some system has already made these a priori decisions for me and I am reduced to an animal. I do not live, I merely exist. The only resemblances I have to real life are the motor responses and functions that are akin to humankind. I cannot adequately assume responsibility as a person because I have been made a party to a decision in which I played no part in making. Now, to be sure, this is hyperbole in some degree, but only to underscore what actually happens when a man is robbed of his freedom. The very nature of his life is altered and his being cannot make the full circle of person-hood because that which is basic to the character of life itself has been diminished.

This is why segregation has wreaked havoc with the Negro. It is sometimes difficult to determine which are the deepest, the physical wounds or the psychological wounds. Only a Negro can understand the social leprosy that segregation inflicts upon him, the suppressed fears and resentments, and the expressed anxieties and sensitivities make each day of life a turmoil. Every confrontation with the restrictions imposed is another emotional battle in a never ending war. He is shackled in his waking moments to tip-toe stance. Never quite knowing what to expect next in his subconscious he wrestles with this added demon. Is that any argument to support the withdrawing of life quality from groups because of the color of their skin or the texture of their hair, or any external characteristic which has nothing at all to do with the life quality? Certainly not on the grounds of morality, justice or religion. Nothing can be more diabolical than a deliberate attempt to destroy in any man his will to be a man and to withhold from him that something which constitutes his true essence. Desegregation then is not enough for it only travels a part of the distance. It vouchsafes the lack of restraint against one's freedom, but it does not prohibit the blocking of his total capacity. Only integration can do this for it unchains the spirit and the mind and provides for the highest degree of life-quality freedom. Integration demands that we recognize that a denial of freedom is a denial of life itself.

Human Solidarity

A third ethical demand of integration is a recognition of the solidarity of the human family. Integration seems almost inevitably desirable and practical because basically we are all one. Paul's declaration that God has made of one blood all nations of the world is more anthropological fact than religious poetry. The physical differences between the races are insignificant when compared to the physical identities. The world's foremost anthropologists like Ruth Benedict, Margaret Mead, Melvin Hershkovitz and others, all agree that there is no basic difference in the racial groups of our world. Most deny the actual existence of what we have known as race. There are four major blood types found in every racial group. There are no superior and inferior races. . . .

The next truth is evidential in the history of mankind. Not only are all men alike, generically speaking, but man is by nature a societal creature. Aside from the strength and weakness found in homosapiens, man has been working from the beginning at the great adventure of community. Whenever Cro-Magnon under whatever strange impulse decided to put away his stone axe to cooperate with his neighbor, it marked the most creative turn of events in his history.

That seemingly elementary decision set in motion what we now know as civilization. At the heart of all that civilization has meant and developed is community—the mutually cooperative and voluntary venture of man to assume a semblance of responsibility for his brother. What began as the closest answer to a desperate need for survival from the beast of prey, the danger of the jungle, was the basis of present-day cities and nations.

Man could not have survived without the impulse which makes him the societal creature that he is. The universe is so structured that things do not quite work out rightly if men are not diligent in their concern for others.

The self cannot be self without other selves. I cannot reach fulfillment without thou. Social psychologists tell us that we cannot be truly persons unless we interact with other persons. All life is inter-related and all men are caught in an inescapable network of mutuality, tied in a single bundle of destiny. This is what John Donne meant when he wrote, "No man is an island entire of itself.

Every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main," and toward the end he goes on to say that any man's death diminishes me because I am involved in mankind. "Therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee."

Now let me hasten to say, while all of the three aforementioned points are basic, they represent Christianity's minimal declaration of human unity. In the final analysis, the Christian ethic says every man must be respected because God loves him. Man's worth is derivative. The worth of an individual does not lie in the measure of his intellect, his racial origin or his social position. Human worth lies in relatedness to God. An individual has value because he has value to God. Whenever this is recognized, whiteness and blackness pass away as determinants in a relationship, and son and brother are substituted.

For me, this is a welcome conference. In the last few years we have had to face admittedly some very sharp changes in our customs and mores in the South. They have been difficult changes, not only to whites, but also at times to Negroes. Nevertheless, as difficult as the changes may be, it is change produced by that which is right. Yet it is a simple truth that has escaped the focus of the nation and the South's attention. It is sad that the moral dimension of integration has not been sounded by the leaders of government and the nation. During the Little Rock and Oxford, Mississippi, crises they staunchly supported the principle of the court's decision, but their rationale fell far short of being prophetic. They sounded the note that has become the verse, chorus and refrain of the so-called calm and reasonable moderates: We must obey the law. The temper of acceptance might be far different if our leaders would say publicly to the nation: "We must obey the mandate of the court because it is right."

Experience in India

Some years ago I had the privilege of visiting the great country known as India and I spent a great deal of time studying their problem of caste and untouchability which is quite similar to our own internal problem in race relations. And I discovered that India had made much more progress in grappling with this problem than we have made in grappling with our problem in the United States. In trying to determine why, I discovered two or three things. Of course, caste untouchability is a crime in India; it is a crime to discriminate against an untouchable, a crime punishable by imprisonment. But it is deeper than that. The leaders in India have made it powerfully clear that caste untouchability is morally wrong. Mahatma Ghandi went to the point of adopting an untouchable as his daughter. And while I was in India I remember reading several speeches of Nehru and, though I was there only six weeks, I remember five different speeches that Prime Minister Nehru made in which he morally condemned untouchability.

One day this will have to become a reality in the United States. Yes, we must insist on obeying the court's orders and the desegregation decisions. We must insist on that at every point. But on the other hand someone must remind the nation that this must be done because it is morally right. Someone must remind the mobsters of Mississippi as a James Meredith seeks to attend the university not only that the court has issued an order, but that James Meredith is your brother and that as you throw stones at James Meredith you throw stones at your brother; that integration is not only a decision of a court, but it is a part of the ethical demands of the universe.

Let me hasten to say that despite the tremendous difficulties that integration imposes, nonetheless work toward its implementation is not to be abandoned for the sake of approximating the more accessible goal of desegregation. Further, a word of caution might be said to those who would argue that desegregation should be abandoned and all of our energies invested in the integration process. It is not an either-or, it is a both-and undertaking. Desegregation is the necessary step in the right direction if we are to achieve integration. Desegregation will not change attitudes, but it will provide the contact and confrontation necessary by which integration is made possible and attainable.

I can summarize all that I have been saying on this issue by affirming that the demands of desegregation are enforceable demands, while the demands of integration fall within the scope of unenforceable demands. Some years ago Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick made an impressive distinction between enforceable and un-

CHURCH STAND IS NOT EXPECTED

Williams Says Church Is Not Brave Enough to Meet Need

Sam Williams, who is pastor of the Friendship Baptist Church and professor of philosophy and religion at Morehouse College, Atlanta, made a report to the Nashville conference on "The Role of the Church in Desegregation Efforts in Atlanta." This had been assigned as a group project for study and report, but Mr. Williams indicated that his remarks represented only his own point-of-view. He also explained that his observations referred to white and not Negro congregations. He said in part:

"It is asking too much of the church as an institution to take any forthright stand on any issue, especially if it is controversial.

"The very nature of an ecclesiastical organization is such that it will never rise to the occasion when decisions are called for.

"The burden of the desegregation problem rests upon the white churches because they are the ones who started and maintain the system of discrimination.

"The white church is the segregated church. Segregation has been created and preserved by white Christians and when it goes it will have to go in the main through the action of white Christians."

The "Manifestos"

Discussing two "manifestos" prepared and signed by white ministers in Atlanta in 1957 and 1958, Mr. Williams said both statements "were prepared too late, were too tame to come from Christian ministers and neither was a Christian statement.

"Both deplored 'extremism' without ever defining what they meant by this, both asked that all efforts to 'preserve the integrity of the race' be made and the final appeal in both was to 'law and order.'

"The latter is the argument one would expect to be the core of that of the police department, but not of the argument of the Christian community. Nowhere did they say anything about the wrongfulness, sinfulness or immorality of segregation."

He dealt with Atlanta's "newest innovation—the Atlanta Wall which has the support and defense of the mayor and which consists of a wooden barrier set up across streets to indicate where housing is to be segregated. Not a single white church has said a word of condemnation of this insult by the mayor and the board of aldermen." He said so-called token integration has become the policy in Atlanta's public schools, "but not a single white church has come out against this un-Christian practice." He had special praise for the Society of Friends and the Unitarians. The first, particularly, he said "have done more Christian work and practiced more Christianity than all the other white church groups in Atlanta.

"I don't think the churches are brave enough or believe in God or Jesus enough to take the stand they should take in regard to race relations.

The Church Will Wait

"The church will wait, as it always has, until the time is safe. Once the political and social institutions announce the 'all clear' signal, the churches will speak out and speak out fervently.

"The church follows, it does not lead. It can come along after a decision has been made by the community and hallow that decision and make it holy, but it cannot or will not make the decision and lead others to it."

enforceable obligations. The former are regulated by the codes of society and the vigorous implementation of law enforcement agencies. Breaking these obligations spelled-out on thousand of pages in law books has filled numerous prisons. But unenforceable obligations are beyond the reach of the laws of society. They concern inner attitudes, genuine person-to-person relations and expressions of compassion which law books cannot regulate and jails cannot rectify. Such obligations are met by one's commitment to an inner law, a law written on the heart. Man-made laws assure justice, but a higher law produces love. No code of conduct ever compelled a father to love his children or a husband to show affection to his wife. The law court may force him to provide bread for the family but it cannot make him provide the bread of love. A good father is obedient to the unenforceable.

The Role of Law

And so in our nation today a mighty struggle is taking place. It is the struggle to conquer the reign of an evil monster called segregation and its inseparable twin called discrimination, a monster that has wandered through this land for well nigh one hundred years, stripping millions of Negro people of their sense of dignity and robbing them of their birthright to freedom. Let us never succumb to the temptation of believing that legislation and judicial decrees play only minor roles in solving this problem. Morality cannot be legislated, but behavior can be regulated. Judicial decrees may not change the heart but they can restrain the heartless. The law cannot make a man love me but it can keep him from lynching me—and I think that is pretty important also. The habits, if not the hearts of people, have been and are being altered every day by legislative acts, judicial decisions and executive orders. Let us not be misled by those who argue that segregation cannot be ended by the force of law.

But acknowledging this, we must admit that the ultimate solution to the race problem lies in the willingness of man to obey the unenforceable. Court orders and federal enforcement agencies are of inestimable value in achieving desegregation, but desegregation is only a partial, though necessary step to the final goal which we seek to realize—genuine intergroup and inter-personal living. Desegregation will break down the legal barriers and bring men together physically, but something must touch the hearts and souls of men so they will come together spiritually because it is natural and right. A vigorous enforcement of civil rights laws will bring an end to public, segregated facilities which are barriers to a truly desegregated society, but it cannot bring an end to fears, prejudice, pride and irrationality which are the barriers to a truly integrated society. These dark and demonic responses will be removed only as men are possessed by the invisible inner law which etches on their hearts the conviction that all men are brothers and that love is mankind's most potent weapon for personal and social transformation. True integration will be achieved when men are willingly obedient to unenforceable obligations.

Discipline

I cannot conclude without saying that integration places certain ethical demands on those who have been on the oppressed end of the old order. Perhaps this is why it is my personal conviction that the most potent instrument the Negro community can use to gain total emancipation in America is that of non-violent resistance. The evidence of the last few years supports my faith that through the use of non-violence much can be done to raise the Negro to a sense of self-respect and human dignity. The Gandhian concept of non-injury parallels the Hebraic-Christian teaching of the sacredness of every human being. In the context of the Negro's thrust for the full exercise of constitutional privilege, non-violence has introduced an additive that has helped the Negro stand taller. When a library is declared to be desegregated the presence and practice of non-violence allows him to seek the use of these facilities without fear and apprehension. More than this, it has instilled in him the nerve to challenge segregation and discrimination in whatever form it exists. Non-violence in so many ways has given the Negro a new sense of "somebody-ness." The impact of the non-violent discipline has done a great deal toward creating in the mind of the Negro a new image of himself. It has literally exalted the person of the Negro of the South in the face of daily confrontations that scream at him that he is inferior because of the accident of his birth.

Non-violence has also helped the individuals to adhere to proper means and proper goals. If we are to move into a truly integrated society it must always do this, for the Negro must not seek to rise from a position of disadvantage to one of advantage, thus subverting justice. He must not seek to rise from or substitute one tyranny for another. That is why I am convinced that black supremacy is as dangerous as white supremacy and God is not merely interested in the freedom of black men and brown men and yellow men, but God is interested in the freedom of the whole human race and the creation of a society where all men will live together as brothers and very man will respect the dignity and worth of human personality.

Means and Ends

The non-violent method helps us not only to be concerned with proper goals but with proper means for achieving these goals. The means must be as pure as the end. Throughout history men have debated the whole question of ends and means and there have been those who have argued that the end justifies the means. But non-violence goes to the point of saying that in the long run destructive means cannot bring about constructive ends because the end is pre-existent in the means and the means represent the ideal in the making, the end in process. This is why we can say to our most violent opponents that in the process of our struggle toward an integrated society, we will match your capacity to inflict suffering by our capacity to endure suffering. We will meet your physical force with soul-force. Do to us what you will, we will still love you. We cannot in all good conscience obey your unjust laws because non-cooperation with evil is as much a moral obligation as is cooperation with good. So, even though you throw us in jail, we will still love you. Send your hooded perpetrators of violence into our communities at the midnight hours and drag us out on some wayside road and beat us and leave us half-dead—and we will still love you. But be assured that we will wear you down by our capacity to suffer, and one day we will win our freedom. But we will not only win freedom for ourselves; we will so appeal to your heart and conscience that we will win you in the process and the victory will be a double victory. I believe this is the message and this is the method that will take us on and lead us into that integrated society which is the dream of our nation.

The Assurance of Faith

In conclusion, let me say that we must have faith in the future, the faith to believe we can solve this problem and the faith to believe that as we struggle to solve this problem we do not struggle alone; we have cosmic companionship. There is a little song that we sing in our movement and it has become something of a theme song. It goes like this:

We shall overcome,
We shall overcome,
Deep in my heart,
I do believe
We shall overcome.

Well, this is my faith and those of you who are engaged in this difficult and yet challenging task of making brotherhood a reality in this nation must somehow believe this. Before the victory is won, some will have to get scarred up a bit, but we shall overcome. Before the victory of brotherhood is won, some will lose their jobs, but we shall overcome. Before the victory is won some may have to face physical death, but if physical death is the price some must pay to free their children from a permanent psychological death, then nothing can be more redemptive.

Somehow we must believe we shall overcome. We shall overcome because the arc of the moral universe is long, but it bends towards justice. We shall overcome because Carlyle is right: "No lie can live forever." We shall overcome because there is something in this universe which justifies this faith. As William Cullen Bryant says, "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again." We shall overcome because there is something in the structure of the cosmos which justifies James Russell Lowell in saying, "Truth forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne—Yet that scaffold sways the future, and, behind the dim unknown, Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above his own."

This is our faith. And with this faith we will be able to adjourn the councils of despair and bring new light into the dark chambers of pessimism. With this faith, we will be able to transform the jangling discords of our Southland into a beautiful symphony. This will be the day when all of God's children, right here in the South and all over the nation, will be able to join hands—black men and white men, Jews and Gentiles, Protestants and Catholics—and sing, in the words of the old Negro spiritual:

"Free at last, free at last;

Thank God Almighty, we are free at last."

Exodus to Genuine Freedom

We cannot ask the peoples who are moving toward freedom to turn back on their road. Theirs, too, is an exodus and, if we believe in the ancient exodus, I think we should believe in these modern ones as well, and try to help. ¶ There is also an exodus of the Negro people in the United States of America. Theirs has been a notable movement up from slavery, but a movement which, even here, is yet far short of its proper goals on the way, with a kinship of experience with the ancient Israelites, they have put the inmost meaning of the story of Moses and the exodus into their spiritual song: Go down, Moses, Way down in Egypt land, Tell ole Pharaoh, Let my people go. . . . ¶ If we believe in the ancient exodus, I think we should believe in the exodus of the Negro people from the land of oppression, and help them too. ¶ What, then, are the elements in a real exodus? According to Exodus 3:9, it was God who heard the cry and saw the oppression of his people. Therefore, in the last analysis, it is God whose purpose and intention it is that men should be free. In Exodus, too, it is people in whom—no matter how oppressed and how lacking in opportunity they are—there is still some spark of freedom's light, some desire to be free and to have what freedom means. God—even if sometimes he is not recognized—and people—even if sometimes they are pitifully confused and badly mistaken: these are the indispensable elements in every exodus. Therefore, if any exodus is really to succeed, the people who become free must also become the people of God. "Let my people go" was only one part of what God said; "that they may serve me" was the other part of what he said. If poor, ignorant, and misguided folk become free and then use their freedom as occasion for new injustice against their fellows, they have not yet made any true exodus. They must yet learn to be God's true people. "Let my people go," says the Lord God, "that they may serve me." Until they do that they have not found real freedom. It is the business of the church, therefore, in all lands, to help men become free physically and also spiritually—for only then will exodus be really accomplished.

Infallible Bible, Pro and Con

Opportunity and a Need

The articles in the symposium, "Do We Need an Infallible Bible?" (OUTLOOK Dec. 14) are a clear and cogent exposition of the point-of-view maintained today not only by the authors but also by thousands of teachers, ministers and laymen in the Presbyterian Church, U.S. The doctrine here represented is based upon a scholarly and devout approach to the Scriptures, and stresses the vital authority of both Old and New Testaments for Christian faith and practice.

Let us recognize that a large number of men and women support this position and that they are in good standing with their presbyteries and local churches. Let us recognize too the fact that another considerable segment in the church holds to a stricter and more literal interpretation of Biblical inspiration. These members of our communion believe sincerely that the Bible is verbally inspired in every detail and kept free from any kind of human limitation and error.

Our church should be great, mature, and charitable enough to include both the liberal and conservative viewpoints. We need conversation and open discussion, not simply on generalities but also on specific questions of Biblical exegesis and exposition. We need to learn humbly, one group from the other. We need to seek together the illumination of the Spirit who will "guide us into all the truth." We need to avoid "heresy hunting" and to emphasize our "unity in Christ," based on our common faith in the fundamentals of the gospel. Let us pray that all the speaking and writing on this vital question of Biblical revelation and authority may not divide us as a church but may bring us closer together in mutual understanding, confidence, and Christian affection.

Continuing Discussion

I want to thank you for the symposium on "An Infallible Bible." . . . I feel that this presentation by the selected professors of our seminaries is a good thing to clear the air so that there may be a more objective discussion within our church.

In reading the opinions of these men, some questions come to mind that I would like to lay before them for their clarification. With your permission I would like to ask:

1. How do you deal with the statements of Jesus Christ equating quotations from the Old Testament with the Word of God?
2. What do you think of the Confession of Faith when it describes the sixty-six books of the Old and New Testaments as being "the Word of God written"? (Conf. of Faith, Ch. I, p. 2)
3. Is there any objective revelation? If so, would a righteous God give an erroneous revelation of himself?
4. If we accept the Bible as our source of doctrine about our faith, what do you consider its teachings about itself to be?

You have the beginnings of an engaging gentlemen try to prove the unprovable. see encouraged. You are to be commended for initiating and fostering it, and if you would do so by considering these questions, I would appreciate it very much. . . .

Dissent Is Expressed

In response to the invitation to express reaction to THE OUTLOOK symposium on the question "Do We Need An Infallible Bible?" we offer the following brief comments:

1. The real issue is what the Bible claims for itself. And this is nothing less than infallibility. We are not wiser than our Lord, who said, "The Scripture cannot be broken" (John 10:35); nor should we try to be.
2. A readiness to accept the Bible's testimony to itself is not embarrassed by scholarly investigation. Every negative point raised or suggested in the symposium has been faced, dealt with and soundly answered by competent students of the Scripture.
3. The symposium opens the door to skepticism. All the facts and teachings of the Bible become subject to the individual's judgment. The symposium thus invites the rule of an unbounded subjectivism.
4. The Confession of Faith, in chapters I and XIV, declares that the Scripture is the very and pure Word of God and is to be believed in whatever it says. This is the historic Presbyterian position and to it ministers, elders and deacons should with sincerity of heart subscribe. We are ourselves happy to do so.

If a Woman Were Called

As usual your excerpt from a current book on the front page of the January 7th OUTLOOK was thought provoking. I wondered as I read what would happen to a young girl in the Presbyterian Church, U. S., if she were to hear a "still small voice" leading her into the ministry. That "still small voice" would have to lead her out of her church into another denomination.

Who is to say whom God will call or how he will make use of their talents?

Prescription Offered

What is wrong with the Presbyterian Church? It might be very presumptuous for anyone to give a categorical answer; and who could give an answer satisfactory to everybody—even if true?

However, to study again the Ten Commandments, giving thoughtful attention especially to the first and the tenth, might be revealing.

SMOG IS NEVER WHERE YOU ARE

By HARRISON RAY ANDERSON

Smog is smoke under fog and it is never where you are. Today it was down in the valley. Yes, up where we were our eyes burned, but we saw no smog. It was over there in the valley or on those other hills. Said the lawyer's wife in Long Beach, "We have no smog." Said the ex-Middle Westerner in Santa Monica, "We have no smog." Said the real estate man in Riverside, "No smog here"—of course not! Smog is never where you are. It's always where you can see it—over there. In a summer of forest fires (1961) in Western Montana, the smoke was always over there—on another mountainside—in another valley. Then we went for a drive and looked back and there it was where we had been—only we had not seen it!

Paganism is never where you are, in your cultured set. It's over there in an African jungle.

Juvenile delinquency is never in your comfortable suburbs. It's only in the city.

The alcohol problem is not in your group of social drinkers. It's on Rush Street or in the night clubs or taverns.

Racial intolerance is not where you are, with only a handful of people unlike you. It's in the South—always over there!

Communism (atheistic materialism) is never where you are, in your political party, in your union, in your patriotic society, in your business association. It's only over there in the Communist Party or in Russia.

Yes, even the hypocrites are never where you are. They are always in the church—over there!

Let us all rise and sing, "It's me, it's me, it's me, O Lord, standin' in the need of prayer."

● NEWS ROUNDUP...

WASHINGTON RIOT. A citizens' committee which investigated a Thanksgiving Day riot following a traditional parochial-public high school football game in Washington, D. C., blamed drinking in the stands, lack of discipline among students and "over-commercialization" of the annual championship contest for the incident.

CONVERSATIONS. Representatives of the Protestant Episcopal Church and the Assemblies of God have held two informal conversations, primarily to discuss the work of the Holy Spirit in the contemporary church. A joint statement reporting the meetings stressed that the talks were "not aimed at arriving at doctrinal agreement between our two churches or at negotiating any ecclesiastical arrangement." The conversations were said to have led to "a deep sense of Christian understanding and mutual trust. We found ourselves a fellowship, open to the leading of the Holy Spirit to a degree which we had hardly dared to expect." (Editorial, page 8.)

VISITORS. Two prominent Roman Catholic leaders from abroad will visit the U.S.A. this spring for a series of conferences. Augustin Cardinal Bea, S.J., president of the Vatican Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity, will participate in a Boston College convocation March 26. Cardinal Cushing, who is sponsoring the visit, said the two would "go anywhere to anyone who will accept us." Father Hans Kueng, a young Swiss theologian, who is dean of the Catholic faculty at the University of Tuebingen, Germany, will also be in this country, speaking at Boston College Apr. 15-16, and elsewhere.

BAPTISTS. Southern Baptists gave a total of $32,647,126 to their national convention in 1962 through its Cooperative Program and designated gifts, for a $2 million increase over 1961.

OPPOSED TO HUAC. Charging that the House Un-American Activities Committee has made "irresponsible attacks upon churches and church leaders," the Department of Church and Society of the National Capital Area Council of Churches has called upon the U. S. House of Representatives to abolish the group. Continued existence of the committee, it said, is "an implied reflection on the FBI and other security agencies specializing in this field."

Special Service Held As Congress Is Opened

The annual service of intercession and Holy Communion was held in the National Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., on the morning before Congress convened, with members of all branches of government responding to the invitation extended by Assembly's moderator, Marshal L. Scott, "to come to the holy table of the Lord to find rest and refreshment for the soul."

Other ministerial participants included Bernard Brunsting, president of the Reformed Church in America; John W. Melton, First church, Baton Rouge, La., representing the Presbyterian, U. S., moderator; Bishop Zoltan Beky of the Hungarian Reformed Church of America; Virgil E. Lowder, executive of the Council of Church's National Capitol area; Stated Clerk Eugene Carson Blake and Edward L. R. Elson, the National church's minister.

Among the ruling elders taking part were Judge Homer Ferguson of the U. S. Court of Military Appeals; Senators Carl T. Curtis and John C. Stennis; Commissioner Robert E. Wilson of the U. S. Atomic Energy Commission, former moderator Paul D. McKelvey; and President Franc L. McCluer of Lindenwood College (Mo.).

Two U.S. Observers Are Named to Merger Talks

Presbyterian, U. S., observers are to be present when the Consultation on Church Union convenes March 19-20 in Oberlin, Ohio.

The General Assembly's Inter-Church Relations Committee has named Stated Clerk James A. Millard, Jr., of Atlanta, and Judge John A. Fulton, Jr., the Inter-Church Relations chairman, of Louisville, Ky., as the observers. This follows a directive of the 1962 Assembly.

Also at the mid-winter meeting of the committee, members were particularly critical of the small amount of money contributed by the denomination to the support of the National Council of Churches and urged a $2,100 increase.

One member was quoted as saying he is "ashamed" of the fact that his church is paying only 15% of what is requested by the NCC, while the average for other denominations is 70%. The increase would raise the amount of support from $12,200 to $14,300 while the NCC asks for $58,280.

Heidelberg Catechism Marks 400th Anniversary

NEW YORK (RNS)—A new translation of the Heidelberg Catechism has been published here by the North American Area Council of the World Alliance of Reformed and Presbyterian Churches to commemorate the 400th anniversary of the historic Reformation document.

Called "the most ecumenical of the confessions of the Protestant Churches," the catechism was written in an effort to bring Lutheran and Reformed groups together in 16th Century Germany. It was first published on Jan. 19, 1563, in the city whose name it bears.

The translators wrote in the foreword to the new volume:

> "We are hopeful that this summary of evangelical teaching may, in our time, become a unitive confession not only for Lutheran and Reformed theologians as it already was in the sixteenth century but also for Congregational Christian and Evangelical and Reformed people in the United Church of Christ, for Presbyterian and Reformed Churches within the Alliance, and for an even wider fellowship of churches committed to the twentieth-century venture of reuniting the church, catholic, reformed and evangelical."

Other events besides the publication of the new translation were scheduled to mark the quartocentenary of the catechism. They included an earlier celebration Jan. 14-17, at Lancaster Theological Seminary in Lancaster, Pa., where the tercentenary was observed in 1863, and observances at Eden Theological Seminary in Webster Groves, Mo., and at a meeting of the General Synod of the

Meeting Held for UPUSA Theologians, Sociologists

More than 100 sociologists and theologians from colleges related to the United Presbyterian, USA, Board of Christian Education, met recently in Evanston, Ill., to discuss the "possibilities of conversation" between their respective disciplines.

Chief speakers were Philip Rieff of the graduate school of sociology at the University of Pennsylvania and Benjamin Reist of San Francisco Seminary.

Out of the meeting it was reported that "significant agreement was reached on one main area of common concern which is perhaps best expressed by Bacon's concept of the purpose of science as a means of alleviating the miseries of mankind."

Another conference is planned for next year.

United Church of Christ in Denver, Colo., to be held in July.

Celebrations were also scheduled in Heidelberg, and the West German government planned to issue a stamp commemorating the anniversary.

Allen Miller Is Chairman

The new translation, published by the United Church Press, an agency of the United Church of Christ, was done by Allen O. Miller of Eden Theological Seminary and M. Eugene Osterhaven of Western Theological Seminary in Holland, Mich.

Other members of the committee responsible for the translation were Aladar Komjathy, pastor of the Hungarian Reformed church in Roedling, N.J.; and James I. McCord, president of Princeton (N.J.) Theological Seminary and secretary of the North American Area Council of the Alliance.

Published along with the new translation was a companion volume with a laymen's commentary to be used for adult education.

In addition to the 129 questions and answers which make up the catechism, the new translation contains the biblical texts cited by the authors in connection with each topic.

The catechism was written by Zacharias Ursinus, 28, a professor of theology at Heidelberg, and Caspar Olevianus, 26, a preacher, at the request of Frederick III, elector of the Palatinate region of Germany at that time, who was attempting to end the controversy between Lutherans and Reformed Church members.

Although the Lutheran and Roman Catholic Churches had been recognized in Germany, the publication of the catechism marked the first official recognition of the reformed teachings of Huldreich Zwingli and John Calvin. The catechism was attacked immediately, but Frederick III defended it before the Diet at Augsburg in 1566, and it was soon used widely in Germany and other nations.

McCord Comments

In commenting on the catechism's significance today, Dr. McCord noted that on a recent preaching mission in Hungary he had been told that one of the reasons for the large number of young people in the churches, in spite of Communist pressure, was the fact that each minister used the Heidelberg Catechism to instruct his young people every Sunday afternoon.

"Here is a living symbol that it is accomplishing in its 400th year that for which it was first prepared in the 16th Century," Dr. McCord said.

"This 400th anniversary celebration, then, is more than a memorial. It is a reaffirmation by one of the great wings of Protestantism of the historic faith of the Bible and of the Reformation."

ANY QUESTIONS?

Questions are answered here by persons serving on a radio-telephone panel: Most questions are submitted by telephone; some by mail (to The Outlook). Answers are recorded and then submitted for amendment or revision. Participants here are: James P. Martin of the faculty of Union Seminary in Virginia; S. Evans Brown, director of family education for the Presbyterian Church, U. S.; Hunter B. Blakely, secretary of higher education for the Presbyterian Church, U. S. (just retired); and James G. Carpenter, missionary-appointee to the Congo. Mr. X, a layman, speaks for laymen.

CHURCH BUILDINGS

Bible studies in the churches recently dealt with the call to rebuild the ancient temple. Do you think there is a tendency today for too much to be spent on church buildings?

BLAKELY: The questions arise out of a Sunday school lesson calling for the rebuilding of the Jerusalem temple. When we consider building churches in our country today, we can spend too much on them and we can also spend too little. A church building should be in keeping with the quality of the buildings that we put up for other than religious purposes, schools or homes or public buildings. The church should be a beautiful building, attractive, appropriate. I do not believe that churches should overspend, in view of the great needs that are present in the world, on the mission fields, in the support of new churches in needy areas in our own country, and all the great work that the church is called upon to do. The answer to this question cannot be an overall reply applicable to any situation; it must be decided in each individual situation.

WHO IS GOD?

When someone honestly and earnestly asks you, What or who is God? how can you give an acceptable answer that is not based on such abstractions as love, good and justice?

MARTIN: It seems to me that if one turns to the Bible one can find the answer because, while the Bible does not speculate about God or use abstractions, it does speak of his love, his goodness and his justice. It speaks of them, however, concretely in terms of God's works and God's acts towards his people, Christians look at the life and the work of Jesus Christ and there we see what God is like, or better, who God is. We could say, I think, that God is Jesus Christ, and if we want to know about the love or goodness or justice of God, we look at the works that Jesus performed, and we see love in action, we see goodness in action, we see justice in action; in concrete dealings with ordinary mortal human beings like we are. To those who are outcast, to those who are sick, to those who are oppressed, to those who have no social privilege, to those who want forgiveness of their sins—Jesus comes and brings gifts which only God can offer. So, I think that when we turn to the Bible and seek Jesus Christ we can answer our question about who God is, because we find God revealed to us in Jesus. What this means we find, for example, in John's first epistle, where he says, "Behold the manner of love the father has bestowed upon us that we should be called the children of God" and also "In this the love of God was manifested, in that God sent his only Son into the world." It is in this concrete action of God in coming to us in Jesus Christ, that we find, I think, the place in which we can answer the question of "who is God." I would turn the person to the Biblical record.

MR. X: Don't you think it takes a certain amount of blind faith with our materialistic society to completely accept something that we can't see other than manifestations of it?

MARTIN: I would think so; Jesus Christ is the manifestation of God's love, goodness and justice in personal form.

BROWN: Christians have a hard time to think about God except in terms of Jesus Christ. We speak of him as the one who is the revealer, and when we think about what God is like we say that he is like Jesus Christ in his love, in his understanding, and in his mercy, and we believe in a God who is personal. So when we think about God we don't think about abstractions. We think about One who has personality, One who knows, One who cares, and One who does something, and what he does and how he does it we see most plainly in Jesus Christ.

ALCOHOLIC

Is the term "alcoholic" just a dressed-up word for what the Bible calls a drunkard?

CARPENTER: The term "alcoholic" is relatively new even to our age. We differentiate and try to draw a clear line between a plain ordinary drunk and an alcoholic. Generally, they define a drunk as one who occasionally over-indulges to the point where he loses self-control. An alcoholic is often defined as one who takes one drink and can't stop until he or she is fully under the weather. Those individuals who acknowledge they are alcoholics have a little saying, "One million drinks are not enough and one is too many." It would appear to me from all the Biblical evidence that the Scriptural term, "drunkard," includes both drunkards and alcoholics.

During the next ten years LAFAYETTE College (Pa.) will engage in a plan for the gradual increase of its enrollment by approximately 300, so that this may reach 1,900 by 1972.

The Ethical Demands of Integration

By MARTIN LUTHER KING

IT IS MY FIRM CONVICTION that men often hate each other because they fear each other and they fear each other because they don't know each other and they don't know each other because they fail to communicate with each other, and they don't do that because they are separated from each other. God grant that something will happen so that we will be able to bridge these gulfs and these barriers and bring about real brotherhood.

I have been asked to speak from the subject, "An Analysis of the Ethical Demands of Integration." The problem of race- and color-prejudice remains America's greatest moral dilemma. When one considers the impact it has upon our nation both internally and externally its resolution might well determine our destiny. History has thrust upon our generation an indescribably important task—to complete a process of democratization which our nation has too long developed too slowly but which is our most powerful weapon for world respect and evaluation. How we deal with this crucial situation will determine our moral health as individuals, our cultural health as a region, our political health as a nation, and our prestige as a leader of the free world. The shape of the world today does not afford us the luxury of an anaemic democracy. The price that America must pay for the continued oppression of the Negro is the price of its own destruction. The hour is late and the clock of destiny is ticking out. We must act now before it is too late.

Happily we have made some meaningful strides in breaking down the barriers of racial segregation. Ever since 1954 when the Supreme Court examined the legal body of segregation and pronounced it constitutionally dead, the system has been on the wane. Even the devout diehards who used to cry "never" are now saying "later." Much of the tumult and the shouting, interspersed with tirades against race-mixing, mongrelization of the races, and outside agitators, represent the fanatical death-throes of a dying system. As minimal as may be the across-the-board statistics, desegregation is in process. The bells of history are definitely tolling for segregation. And while I hope I am not a superficial optimist, I am convinced that in less than ten years desegregation will be a reality throughout most of the South. However, when the desegregation process is 100% complete the human relations dilemma of our nation will still be monumental unless we launch now the parallel thrust of the integration process.

Although the terms "desegregation" and "integration" are often used interchangeably, there is a great deal of difference between the two. In the context of what our national community needs, desegregation alone is empty and shallow. Therefore the theme of this conference goes to the heart of the matter. We must always be aware of the fact that our ultimate goal is integration, and that desegregation is only a first step on the road to the good society.

A significant conference was held in Nashville, Tenn., at the end of 1962, summoning people of religious motivation to consider "The Ethical Demands of Integration." The conference was sponsored by the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen and the Southern Regional Council. Some of the addresses and reports presented at that conference appear in these columns.

Perhaps this is the point at which we should define our terms. And now I become a victim of the "paralysis of analysis" that is sometimes spoken of. The word "segregation" represents a system that is prohibitive. It denies the Negro equal access to schools, parks, restaurants, libraries and the like. Desegregation is eliminative and therefore negative, for it simply removes these legal and social prohibitions. Integration is creative and is therefore more profound and far-reaching than desegregation. Integration is a positive acceptance of desegregation and the welcomed participation of Negroes into the total range of human activity. Integration is genuine inter-group, interpersonal living. Desegregation then is rightly only a short-range goal. Integration is the ultimate goal of our national community. Thus, as America pursues the important task of respecting the letter of the law, that is, compliance with desegregation decisions, she must be equally concerned with the spirit of the law; that is, commitment to the democratic dream of integration.

We do not have to look very far to see the pernicious effects of a desegregated society that is not integrated. It leads to physical proximity without spiritual affinity. It gives us a society where men are physically desegregated and spiritually segregated, where elbows are together and hearts are apart. It gives us spatial togetherness and spiritual apartness. It leaves us with a stagnant equality of sameness rather than a constructive equality of oneness. Therefore our topic leads us to an analysis of the "oughtness" of integration. On the basis of what is right, why is integration an end and desegregation only a means? In the context of justice, freedom, morality and religion, what are the basic ethical demands of integration?

Personality

First, integration demands a recognition of the sacredness of human personality. Deeply rooted in our political and religious heritage is the conviction that every man is an heir to a legacy of dignity and worth. Our Hebraic-Christian tradition refers to this inherent dignity of man in the biblical term, "the image of God." This innate worth referred to in the phrase, "the image of God," is universally shared in equal portions by all men. There is no graded scale of essential worth, there is no divine right of one race which differs from the divine right of another. Every human being has etched in his personality the indelible stamp of the Creator. This idea of the dignity and worth of human personality is expressed eloquently and unequivocally in the Declaration of Independence—"All men are created equal," it says. "They are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights. Among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Never has a socio-political document proclaimed more profoundly and eloquently the sacredness of human personality. Frederick Douglas stated the same truth in his lecture on "The Constitution of the United States," when he said, "Its language is, 'We, the People,' not, 'We, the white people,' not even, 'We, the citizens,' not, 'We, the privileged class,' not, 'We the high,' not, 'We, the low,' but, 'We, the people,' We, the human inhabitants. And if Negroes are people they are included in the benefits with which the Constitution of America was ordained and established."

Segregation stands diametrically opposed to the principle of the sacredness of human personality. It debases personality. Immanuel Kant said in one formulation of the categorical imperative that all men must be treated as ends and never as mere means. The tragedy of segregation is that it treats men as means rather than ends and thereby reduces them to things rather than persons. To use the words of Martin Buber, segregation substitutes an "I-It" relationship for the "I-Thou" relationship. The colloquialism of the Southern landed gentry that referred to slavery and our Negro labor as "hands" betrays the "thing" quality assigned to Negroes under the system. Herein lies the root of paternalism that persists even today. The traditional Southerner is fond of "his Negro" as he is of a pet or a finely tooled firearm. It serves a purpose or gets a job done, the only concern is performance, not well being. But man is not a thing; he must be dealt with not as an inanimate tool, but as a person sacred in himself. To do otherwise is to de-personalize a potential person and desecrate what he is. So long as the Negro is treated as the means to an end, so long as he is seen as anything less than a person of sacred worth, the image of God is abused in him and consequently and proportionately lost by those who inflict the abuse. Only by establishing a truly integrated society can we return to the Negro the quality of "thou-ness" which is his due because of the nature of his being.

DR. KING has become a national figure in his leadership of Negroes of the South, as president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. He is the author of Stride Toward Freedom, telling of the Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott experience.

Denial of Life

A second ethical demand of integration is a recognition of the fact that a denial of freedom to an individual is a denial of life itself. The very character of the life of man demands freedom. In speaking of freedom at this point I am not talking of the freedom of a thing called the will. We have had endless debates between the determinists and indeterminists and it usually turns out that they are arguing over something called "the will." Now in such an argument the determinist always wins because the very phrase, "freedom of the will," abstracts freedom from the person to make it an object, and an object, almost by definition, is not free. But freedom cannot be thus abstracted from the person who is always subject as well as object, and who himself still does the abstracting. So I am speaking of the freedom of man, the whole man and not one faculty called the will. Neither am I implying that there are no limits to freedom. Always freedom is within predestined structure. Thus a man is free to go north from Atlanta to Washington, or south from Atlanta to Miami, but he is not free to go north to Miami or south to Washington except by a long around-the-world journey. And he is not free to go to both cities at one and the same time. We are always free and destined. Freedom is the chosen fulfillment of our destined nature.

With these qualifications we return to the assertion that the essence of man is found in freedom. This is what Paul Tillich means when he declares, "Man is man because he is free." Or what Tolstoy implies when he says, "I cannot conceive of a man not being free unless he is dead."

What is freedom? It is, first, the capacity to deliberate or weigh alternatives. Shall I be a teacher or a lawyer? Shall I vote for this candidate or the other candidate? Shall I be a Democrat, Republican or Socalist? Second, freedom expresses itself in decision. The word, decision, like the word, incision, involves the image of cutting. Incision means to cut in; decision means to cut off. When I make a decision I cut off alternatives and make a choice. The existentialists say we must choose, that we are choosing animals, and if we do not choose we sink into thing-hood and the mass mind. A third expression of freedom is responsibility. This is the obligation of the person to respond if he is questioned about his decision. No one else can respond for him. He alone must respond, for his acts are determined by the totality of his being From this analysis we can clearly see the evil of segregation. It cuts off one's capacity to deliberate, decide and respond.

The absence of freedom is the imposition of restraint on my deliberation as to what I shall do, where I shall live, how much I shall earn and the kind of tasks I shall pursue. I am robbed of the basic quality of man-ness when I cannot choose what I shall do, or where I shall live, or how I shall survive. It means, in fact, that someone or some system has already made these a priori decisions for me and I am reduced to an animal. I do not live, I merely exist. The only resemblances I have to real life are the motor responses and functions that are akin to humankind. I cannot adequately assume responsibility as a person because I have been made a party to a decision in which I played no part in making. Now, to be sure, this is hyperbole in some degree, but only to underscore what actually happens when a man is robbed of his freedom. The very nature of his life is altered and his being cannot make the full circle of person-hood because that which is basic to the character of life itself has been diminished.

This is why segregation has wreaked havoc with the Negro. It is sometimes difficult to determine which are the deepest, the physical wounds or the psychological wounds. Only a Negro can understand the social leprosy that segregation inflicts upon him, the suppressed fears and resentments, and the expressed anxieties and sensitivities make each day of life a turmoil. Every confrontation with the restrictions imposed is another emotional battle in a never ending war. He is shackled in his waking moments to tip-toe stance. Never quite knowing what to expect next in his subconscious he wrestles with this added demon. Is that any argument to support the withdrawing of life quality from groups because of the color of their skin or the texture of their hair, or any external characteristic which has nothing at all to do with the life quality? Certainly not on the grounds of morality, justice or religion. Nothing can be more diabolical than a deliberate attempt to destroy in any man his will to be a man and to withhold from him that something which constitutes his true essence. Desegregation then is not enough for it only travels a part of the distance. It vouchsafes the lack of restraint against one's freedom, but it does not prohibit the blocking of his total capacity. Only integration can do this for it unchains the spirit and the mind and provides for the highest degree of life-quality freedom. Integration demands that we recognize that a denial of freedom is a denial of life itself.

Human Solidarity

A third ethical demand of integration is a recognition of the solidarity of the human family. Integration seems almost inevitably desirable and practical because basically we are all one. Paul's declaration that God has made of one blood all nations of the world is more anthropological fact than religious poetry. The physical differences between the races are insignificant when compared to the physical identities. The world's foremost anthropologists like Ruth Benedict, Margaret Mead, Melvin Hershkovitz and others, all agree that there is no basic difference in the racial groups of our world. Most deny the actual existence of what we have known as race. There are four major blood types found in every racial group. There are no superior and inferior races. . . .

The next truth is evidential in the history of mankind. Not only are all men alike, generically speaking, but man is by nature a societal creature. Aside from the strength and weakness found in homosapiens, man has been working from the beginning at the great adventure of community. Whenever Cro-Magnon under whatever strange impulse decided to put away his stone axe to cooperate with his neighbor, it marked the most creative turn of events in his history.

That seemingly elementary decision set in motion what we now know as civilization. At the heart of all that civilization has meant and developed is community—the mutually cooperative and voluntary venture of man to assume a semblance of responsibility for his brother. What began as the closest answer to a desperate need for survival from the beast of prey, the danger of the jungle, was the basis of present-day cities and nations.

Man could not have survived without the impulse which makes him the societal creature that he is. The universe is so structured that things do not quite work out rightly if men are not diligent in their concern for others.

The self cannot be self without other selves. I cannot reach fulfillment without thou. Social psychologists tell us that we cannot be truly persons unless we interact with other persons. All life is inter-related and all men are caught in an inescapable network of mutuality, tied in a single bundle of destiny. This is what John Donne meant when he wrote, "No man is an island entire of itself.

Every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main," and toward the end he goes on to say that any man's death diminishes me because I am involved in mankind. "Therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee."

Now let me hasten to say, while all of the three aforementioned points are basic, they represent Christianity's minimal declaration of human unity. In the final analysis, the Christian ethic says every man must be respected because God loves him. Man's worth is derivative. The worth of an individual does not lie in the measure of his intellect, his racial origin or his social position. Human worth lies in relatedness to God. An individual has value because he has value to God. Whenever this is recognized, whiteness and blackness pass away as determinants in a relationship, and son and brother are substituted.

For me, this is a welcome conference. In the last few years we have had to face admittedly some very sharp changes in our customs and mores in the South. They have been difficult changes, not only to whites, but also at times to Negroes. Nevertheless, as difficult as the changes may be, it is change produced by that which is right. Yet it is a simple truth that has escaped the focus of the nation and the South's attention. It is sad that the moral dimension of integration has not been sounded by the leaders of government and the nation. During the Little Rock and Oxford, Mississippi, crises they staunchly supported the principle of the court's decision, but their rationale fell far short of being prophetic. They sounded the note that has become the verse, chorus and refrain of the so-called calm and reasonable moderates: We must obey the law. The temper of acceptance might be far different if our leaders would say publicly to the nation: "We must obey the mandate of the court because it is right."

Experience in India

Some years ago I had the privilege of visiting the great country known as India and I spent a great deal of time studying their problem of caste and untouchability which is quite similar to our own internal problem in race relations. And I discovered that India had made much more progress in grappling with this problem than we have made in grappling with our problem in the United States. In trying to determine why, I discovered two or three things. Of course, caste untouchability is a crime in India; it is a crime to discriminate against an untouchable, a crime punishable by imprisonment. But it is deeper than that. The leaders in India have made it powerfully clear that caste untouchability is morally wrong. Mahatma Ghandi went to the point of adopting an untouchable as his daughter. And while I was in India I remember reading several speeches of Nehru and, though I was there only six weeks, I remember five different speeches that Prime Minister Nehru made in which he morally condemned untouchability.

One day this will have to become a reality in the United States. Yes, we must insist on obeying the court's orders and the desegregation decisions. We must insist on that at every point. But on the other hand someone must remind the nation that this must be done because it is morally right. Someone must remind the mobsters of Mississippi as a James Meredith seeks to attend the university not only that the court has issued an order, but that James Meredith is your brother and that as you throw stones at James Meredith you throw stones at your brother; that integration is not only a decision of a court, but it is a part of the ethical demands of the universe.

Let me hasten to say that despite the tremendous difficulties that integration imposes, nonetheless work toward its implementation is not to be abandoned for the sake of approximating the more accessible goal of desegregation. Further, a word of caution might be said to those who would argue that desegregation should be abandoned and all of our energies invested in the integration process. It is not an either-or, it is a both-and undertaking. Desegregation is the necessary step in the right direction if we are to achieve integration. Desegregation will not change attitudes, but it will provide the contact and confrontation necessary by which integration is made possible and attainable.

I can summarize all that I have been saying on this issue by affirming that the demands of desegregation are enforceable demands, while the demands of integration fall within the scope of unenforceable demands. Some years ago Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick made an impressive distinction between enforceable and un-

CHURCH STAND IS NOT EXPECTED

Williams Says Church Is Not Brave Enough to Meet Need

Sam Williams, who is pastor of the Friendship Baptist Church and professor of philosophy and religion at Morehouse College, Atlanta, made a report to the Nashville conference on "The Role of the Church in Desegregation Efforts in Atlanta." This had been assigned as a group project for study and report, but Mr. Williams indicated that his remarks represented only his own point-of-view. He also explained that his observations referred to white and not Negro congregations. He said in part:

"It is asking too much of the church as an institution to take any forthright stand on any issue, especially if it is controversial.

"The very nature of an ecclesiastical organization is such that it will never rise to the occasion when decisions are called for.

"The burden of the desegregation problem rests upon the white churches because they are the ones who started and maintain the system of discrimination.

"The white church is the segregated church. Segregation has been created and preserved by white Christians and when it goes it will have to go in the main through the action of white Christians."

The "Manifestos"

Discussing two "manifestos" prepared and signed by white ministers in Atlanta in 1957 and 1958, Mr. Williams said both statements "were prepared too late, were too tame to come from Christian ministers and neither was a Christian statement.

"Both deplored 'extremism' without ever defining what they meant by this, both asked that all efforts to 'preserve the integrity of the race' be made and the final appeal in both was to 'law and order.'

"The latter is the argument one would expect to be the core of that of the police department, but not of the argument of the Christian community. Nowhere did they say anything about the wrongfulness, sinfulness or immorality of segregation."

He dealt with Atlanta's "newest innovation—the Atlanta Wall which has the support and defense of the mayor and which consists of a wooden barrier set up across streets to indicate where housing is to be segregated. Not a single white church has said a word of condemnation of this insult by the mayor and the board of aldermen." He said so-called token integration has become the policy in Atlanta's public schools, "but not a single white church has come out against this un-Christian practice." He had special praise for the Society of Friends and the Unitarians. The first, particularly, he said "have done more Christian work and practiced more Christianity than all the other white church groups in Atlanta.

"I don't think the churches are brave enough or believe in God or Jesus enough to take the stand they should take in regard to race relations.

The Church Will Wait

"The church will wait, as it always has, until the time is safe. Once the political and social institutions announce the 'all clear' signal, the churches will speak out and speak out fervently.

"The church follows, it does not lead. It can come along after a decision has been made by the community and hallow that decision and make it holy, but it cannot or will not make the decision and lead others to it."

enforceable obligations. The former are regulated by the codes of society and the vigorous implementation of law enforcement agencies. Breaking these obligations spelled-out on thousand of pages in law books has filled numerous prisons. But unenforceable obligations are beyond the reach of the laws of society. They concern inner attitudes, genuine person-to-person relations and expressions of compassion which law books cannot regulate and jails cannot rectify. Such obligations are met by one's commitment to an inner law, a law written on the heart. Man-made laws assure justice, but a higher law produces love. No code of conduct ever compelled a father to love his children or a husband to show affection to his wife. The law court may force him to provide bread for the family but it cannot make him provide the bread of love. A good father is obedient to the unenforceable.

The Role of Law

And so in our nation today a mighty struggle is taking place. It is the struggle to conquer the reign of an evil monster called segregation and its inseparable twin called discrimination, a monster that has wandered through this land for well nigh one hundred years, stripping millions of Negro people of their sense of dignity and robbing them of their birthright to freedom. Let us never succumb to the temptation of believing that legislation and judicial decrees play only minor roles in solving this problem. Morality cannot be legislated, but behavior can be regulated. Judicial decrees may not change the heart but they can restrain the heartless. The law cannot make a man love me but it can keep him from lynching me—and I think that is pretty important also. The habits, if not the hearts of people, have been and are being altered every day by legislative acts, judicial decisions and executive orders. Let us not be misled by those who argue that segregation cannot be ended by the force of law.

But acknowledging this, we must admit that the ultimate solution to the race problem lies in the willingness of man to obey the unenforceable. Court orders and federal enforcement agencies are of inestimable value in achieving desegregation, but desegregation is only a partial, though necessary step to the final goal which we seek to realize—genuine intergroup and inter-personal living. Desegregation will break down the legal barriers and bring men together physically, but something must touch the hearts and souls of men so they will come together spiritually because it is natural and right. A vigorous enforcement of civil rights laws will bring an end to public, segregated facilities which are barriers to a truly desegregated society, but it cannot bring an end to fears, prejudice, pride and irrationality which are the barriers to a truly integrated society. These dark and demonic responses will be removed only as men are possessed by the invisible inner law which etches on their hearts the conviction that all men are brothers and that love is mankind's most potent weapon for personal and social transformation. True integration will be achieved when men are willingly obedient to unenforceable obligations.

Discipline

I cannot conclude without saying that integration places certain ethical demands on those who have been on the oppressed end of the old order. Perhaps this is why it is my personal conviction that the most potent instrument the Negro community can use to gain total emancipation in America is that of non-violent resistance. The evidence of the last few years supports my faith that through the use of non-violence much can be done to raise the Negro to a sense of self-respect and human dignity. The Gandhian concept of non-injury parallels the Hebraic-Christian teaching of the sacredness of every human being. In the context of the Negro's thrust for the full exercise of constitutional privilege, non-violence has introduced an additive that has helped the Negro stand taller. When a library is declared to be desegregated the presence and practice of non-violence allows him to seek the use of these facilities without fear and apprehension. More than this, it has instilled in him the nerve to challenge segregation and discrimination in whatever form it exists. Non-violence in so many ways has given the Negro a new sense of "somebody-ness." The impact of the non-violent discipline has done a great deal toward creating in the mind of the Negro a new image of himself. It has literally exalted the person of the Negro of the South in the face of daily confrontations that scream at him that he is inferior because of the accident of his birth.

Non-violence has also helped the individuals to adhere to proper means and proper goals. If we are to move into a truly integrated society it must always do this, for the Negro must not seek to rise from a position of disadvantage to one of advantage, thus subverting justice. He must not seek to rise from or substitute one tyranny for another. That is why I am convinced that black supremacy is as dangerous as white supremacy and God is not merely interested in the freedom of black men and brown men and yellow men, but God is interested in the freedom of the whole human race and the creation of a society where all men will live together as brothers and very man will respect the dignity and worth of human personality.

Means and Ends

The non-violent method helps us not only to be concerned with proper goals but with proper means for achieving these goals. The means must be as pure as the end. Throughout history men have debated the whole question of ends and means and there have been those who have argued that the end justifies the means. But non-violence goes to the point of saying that in the long run destructive means cannot bring about constructive ends because the end is pre-existent in the means and the means represent the ideal in the making, the end in process. This is why we can say to our most violent opponents that in the process of our struggle toward an integrated society, we will match your capacity to inflict suffering by our capacity to endure suffering. We will meet your physical force with soul-force. Do to us what you will, we will still love you. We cannot in all good conscience obey your unjust laws because non-cooperation with evil is as much a moral obligation as is cooperation with good. So, even though you throw us in jail, we will still love you. Send your hooded perpetrators of violence into our communities at the midnight hours and drag us out on some wayside road and beat us and leave us half-dead—and we will still love you. But be assured that we will wear you down by our capacity to suffer, and one day we will win our freedom. But we will not only win freedom for ourselves; we will so appeal to your heart and conscience that we will win you in the process and the victory will be a double victory. I believe this is the message and this is the method that will take us on and lead us into that integrated society which is the dream of our nation.

The Assurance of Faith

In conclusion, let me say that we must have faith in the future, the faith to believe we can solve this problem and the faith to believe that as we struggle to solve this problem we do not struggle alone; we have cosmic companionship. There is a little song that we sing in our movement and it has become something of a theme song. It goes like this:

We shall overcome,
We shall overcome,
Deep in my heart,
I do believe
We shall overcome.

Well, this is my faith and those of you who are engaged in this difficult and yet challenging task of making brotherhood a reality in this nation must somehow believe this. Before the victory is won, some will have to get scarred up a bit, but we shall overcome. Before the victory of brotherhood is won, some will lose their jobs, but we shall overcome. Before the victory is won some may have to face physical death, but if physical death is the price some must pay to free their children from a permanent psychological death, then nothing can be more redemptive.

Somehow we must believe we shall overcome. We shall overcome because the arc of the moral universe is long, but it bends towards justice. We shall overcome because Carlyle is right: "No lie can live forever." We shall overcome because there is something in this universe which justifies this faith. As William Cullen Bryant says, "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again." We shall overcome because there is something in the structure of the cosmos which justifies James Russell Lowell in saying, "Truth forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne—Yet that scaffold sways the future, and, behind the dim unknown, Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above his own."

This is our faith. And with this faith we will be able to adjourn the councils of despair and bring new light into the dark chambers of pessimism. With this faith, we will be able to transform the jangling discords of our Southland into a beautiful symphony. This will be the day when all of God's children, right here in the South and all over the nation, will be able to join hands—black men and white men, Jews and Gentiles, Protestants and Catholics—and sing, in the words of the old Negro spiritual:

"Free at last, free at last;

Thank God Almighty, we are free at last."

SOME GAINS IN MERIT EMPLOYMENT

Inequities Being Removed in a Number of Plants

IN THE GREENSBORO AREA, one would find Negroes employed in approximately twenty to thirty job categories which were closed to them eight or ten years ago. These are in the technical, skilled, clerical and sales job classifications.

The greatest amount of progress has been made with some of the larger industries such as Western Electric and P. Lorillard. At Western Electric Negroes are employed as engineers, draftsmen, chemist, clerk-typists, electronic technicians, machinists, inspectors, librarian, and bench production workers. P. Lorillard has employed an IBM key punch operator, clerk-typist, junior and senior laboratory technicians in its research division, and an accounting clerk. Burlington Industries hired its first Negro secretary over a year ago in its Executive Offices; Blue Bell likewise hired two clerical workers in its executive offices. For the past several years Acme Engineering Company, makers of surgical implants, has employed highly skilled machinists for precision work. At the present time, its foreman is a Negro. Cone Hospital has two tissue technicians who are well integrated in their pathology department. Loewenstein-Atkinson, architects, has had for many years a Negro architect and draftsmen. Within the past year, several of the retail stores in downtown Greensboro have employed Negro sales clerks and a few clerical workers.

In addition to the specific cases mentioned above, Negroes have a large representation in the post office department and the mail terminal. Several clerks in the district office of Internal Revenue Service, tax listers in the county tax department, a typesetter, one bus driver for public transportation, several craftsmen who design ornamental iron, meter readers, and route salesmen have been employed in recent years in the Greensboro community.

Still Pioneers

With few exceptions, however, the majority of the individuals placed in these positions are still pioneers. For the most part, there has not been the total acceptance and full participation of these persons into the mainstream of company activities. In some instances, certain concessions are made in restroom facilities and in social and recreational activities. Most of the route salesmen cater solely to the Negro community. In firms like Western Electric, many of the Negro employees say that promotions and upgradings are too slow and too few. While most of the cafeterias in larger firms are desegregated, there is great reluctance on the part of white employees to initiate friendliness. This reluctance creates a defensive reaction on the part of Negroes who often seek to save themselves anxiety and embarrassment, and retaliate against the white employees by isolating themselves from the group. This tendency is not difficult to understand as it is the usual response of minorities to prejudice. However, it remains an obstacle to the fuller development of the Negro potential. . . .

Unfinished Business

While it is true that Negroes have moved into some of the non-traditional jobs in the Greensboro area, and have enjoyed occupational status in the skilled and white collar jobs, there is much to be done toward closing the gap which exists between the Negro and white worker. Many firms, agencies and institutions have not begun to tap the Negro labor market for non-traditional employment: Southern Bell Telephone Company, municipal government (in clerical, professional and technical jobs in City Hall), banks, insurance companies, State Highway Patrol, television and newspapers. While recent changes in union practice and apprenticeship training have resulted in some improvement, inequities remain and there is yet a long way to go before complete equality between Negro and white workers can be achieved.

Because the bulk of the Negro work force is unskilled, and automation is cutting wide inroads into unskilled labor, the plight of the Negro worker as a whole is becoming worse. The lack of adequate training facilities, both on and off the job; inferior schools, crowded classrooms, outmoded curricula, and inadequate counseling all serve to increase the handicaps Negro youth must face.

In addition to the physical handicaps, there is the psychological barrier which prevents Negroes from preparing themselves for fields in which doors have long been closed. Paradoxically, opportunities are beginning to open up, but qualified candidates are not available.

North Carolina Industry

Former Governor Luther Hodges started a successful campaign to attract new industries to North Carolina. This has resulted in approximately 500 new firms entering the state each year. The North Carolina Employment Security Commission recently stated that 8,000 technical workers will be needed in the state within the next five years.

In spite of the industrial developments and manpower projections, this has not really penetrated the Negro community. A program of re-education which convinces the entire Negro community is needed to motivate youth to prepare for a new place in American life. Their horizon needs to be broadened to include, not more jobs, but all jobs. The task ahead requires the cooperative efforts of the entire community.

Excerpts from two of the reports made to the Nashville Conference appear here. One on the movement toward equal employment opportunities in Greensboro, N.C., was made under leadership of the American Friends Service Committee, with Tartt Bell and Mrs. Charles Herbin, presenting the case, with the assistance of James A. Nelson, manager of administration, Douglas Aircraft Corp., Charlotte, N.C., and Geraldine Siler, first Negro secretary to be employed in the executive offices of Burlington Mills in Greensboro.

Paul Gaston and Thomas T. Hammond of the University of Virginia made a study of public school desegregation in Charlottesville, with a 44-page report of findings and analyses. From Mr. Gaston's presentation, only "some general observations which we hope will shed light on the direction of events in the future" are given here.

For these conclusions to the Charlottesville report, see next page.

CHANGES IN THE WHITE COMMUNITY

Continued School Desegregation, "Slow but Steady"

NEARLY ALL SIGNS point to a continued and slow but steady advance of desegregation. In the first place, recent School Board actions give some cause for encouragement. Before the decision had been reached to appeal the lastest decision of the Fourth Circuit Court (a political decision in which Richmond played a part), the School Board chairman indicated his feeling that it would be a waste of money and effort to appeal. The Board also requested—and City Council enacted—a compulsory school attendance ordinance, even though the assignment plan had been upset. The apparent switch of the Board away from the new high school to the junior-high school idea was made despite the fact that the latter plan will involve more desegregation considerations.

In the past, the School Board has been accustomed to receiving criticism primarily from segregationists. This situation has changed markedly as educational matters have come to the forefront. Many parents, no longer fearful of desegregation, criticize the Board for what they consider to be lack of Board leadership in school problems. They maintain that school decisions based primarily on racial considerations frequently interfere with constructive planning. Continued desegregation, they point out, is inevitable, and greater educational gains will be made by accepting it rather than by seeking further useless means of resisting it.

P-TA Attitudes

The shifting attitude of the P-TA is another indication of the general change in viewpoints now being expressed to the Board. When the public schools were closed in 1958, a resolution protesting school closing died in one P-TA meeting for lack of a second. The subject was considered too controversial to discuss at P-TA meetings. Today, the P-TAs have lost their hesitancy, and, under active leadership, play an important role in leading community acceptance of desegregation. For example, last year the School Board banned all school dances when they heard that Negroes were to attend a high school dance. The high school P-TA executive committee protested to the Board, and the P-TA members overwhelmingly supported the protest.

The firmness of Negro leadership, backed by an NAACP branch with over 1,400 members, is another factor which indicates continued expansion of desegregation. To date, the NAACP's principal role has been in keeping the Charlottesville case in federal court, where the School Board's containment policy has been subjected to continuous scrutiny. A possible step in the future (although not now apparently under serious consideration) would be to request rezoning of the elementary school districts on the grounds that the present lines have the effect of containing nearly all of the Negroes in one school—a school which has 40% more students than any other city elementary school. The size of the Jefferson district might be reduced, with the result that more Negroes would be assigned to desegregated schools.

Continued Growth

In conclusion, then, shifting sentiments within the white community and continued firmness in the Negro community indicate a steady and continued growth in desegregation. For many years to come, however, there is likely to be a considerable amount of voluntary segregation, especially among those who have had several years of segregated school experience. True integration — defined as the glad welcoming and full participation of Negroes in the public schools—is not just around the corner.[1] Progress toward that end is apparent, but its achievement will depend heavily upon strong support for public schools and upon the extent to which those who understand the goal are willing to work for it.

---

[1]It should be noted that, so long as public schools are supported, there is little reason to expect that complete integration would result in what some segregationists refer to as "engulfment." Only about 25% of the city school children are colored, and Negroes will, therefore, always be a distinct minority in the school system.

Race Relations Sunday Message for February 10

"... The Truth Will Make You Free"

"Jesus then said to the Jews who had believed in him, 'If you continue in my word, you are truly my disciples, and you will know the truth, and the truth will make you free.'"—John 8:32.

FREEDOM IS DEAR to the hearts of men everywhere in the world today. The search for freedom and the effort to preserve it have one thing in common. The common element is the universal stress upon deliverance from that which binds or threatens to bind. Very few men in any community are in search of genuine freedom. But multitudes want to be released from or to remain independent of historic institutions or powers which they judge to be binding. In short, most people define freedom in negative terms.

Release from that which binds is only the beginning of freedom. It only makes possible that true self-determination which is freedom. Release from that which binds is not self-determination; it is only the removal of the barrier to it. True self-determination is the expression of inner power.

"Jesus . . . said to the Jews who had believed in him, 'If you continue in my word, you are truly my disciples, and you will know the truth, and the truth will make you free.'"

What Truth?

What is the truth of which Jesus speaks? What is this new determining and directing power for life? It is Jesus Christ himself. The eternal reality is manifested through Christ. It is through him that men know the truth. "I am the way, and the truth, and the life . . ." (John 14:6).

The knowledge of God involves acknowledging him in his works and responding to his claims. God discloses his love and man responds in faith. We reach the truth which makes us free by doing it. And doing the truth does not mean mere obedience to commandments, but rather living from him who is the truth. It means abiding in him, participating in him, continuing in his word, being determined in our very being by the grace of God through Christ.

During this year, we observe the one hundredth anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. The United States has the peculiar history of being a modern country settled by Europeans in search of freedom, many of whom in turn became slave masters. Slavery is, of course, the lowest point of unfreedom. But it was not the slaves alone who were unfree; it was also the masters. The masters were also unfree because master and slave are correlatives. Neither of them can exist without the other. The master was just as dependent upon the slave for his being as the slave was dependent upon the master. In other words, formerly free Americans created an unfree system of meaning, value and loyalty. Thereafter the lives of those who lived on the system were determined by the values and purposes of the system. The system constituted a new center of meaning, value and direction. Only a few rare spirits found the freedom to transcend the system. Others became slaves to it and all that it stood for, whether their roles were those of master or slave. They were slaves because they lived by the untruth—a system of pride and domination.

The Root Remains

We can now thank God, on this one hundredth anniversary, that chattel slavery has been legally abolished. But racism, the false religion which remains, is at the root of all forms of racial segregation, discrimination and doctrines of racial superiority. The racist, like the slave master, makes himself a correlate of the object of his hatred and pride. He says that he hates the object because the object is hateful; but the fact is, hatefulness is the product of the presence of hate, and it is hate which fills the racist's own heart. We are that in which we abide, in which we participate.

Racism must be understood for what it is—a religion competing with the Christian faith. The racist affirmation of superiority and inferiority is not, as is commonly supposed, merely a social theory. Rather, it is an affirmation of faith, a declaration concerning the nature of human being. The racist consciousness affirms the condemnation of one race and the creative destiny of another by Nature. This is conviction concerning the nature of human being, concerning the giveness of human nature. As such it is an ultimate claim.

In contrast to the Christian faith, the racist faith asserts that the essence of man is his own possession. Racism is self-deification. The power of being is man's own possession.

In God's Image

This view is diametrically opposed to the insights of Christian faith. According to Christian faith, man is made in the image of God. Herein lies his dignity. The gift of the image is an act of pure grace. The dignity of man is accordingly bestowed. It is not an acquisition, nor is it a quality which he possesses. The glory of the image of God is only reflectively in man. Man finds his life as man only in so far as he lives by love, the Divine Word. The idea that man is created in the image of God means that he is created in, by, and for love. Man is a being-in-relation. He is truly man and is truly free when he responds to God in obedient love.

". . . you will know the truth and the truth will make you free."

SUGGESTIONS FOR ACTION

Prepared by the Department of Racial and Cultural Relations

The 100th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation challenges churches and community groups to take more vigorous action to achieve genuine freedom for all people without regard to race or color to participate in all aspects of society.

I. Local church groups can take community action by:

1. Working to bring about desegregation and integration of public schools through (a) securing facts about the situation; (b) discussing, formulating and evaluating concrete proposals for constructive action; (c) making the facts and proposals known to the community; (d) cooperating with other community organizations which work to improve race relations.
2. Supporting legislation designed to guarantee full opportunity for all people regardless of race, color or nationality.
3. Protesting against legislation aimed at maintaining segregation and racial discrimination.
4. Urging the elimination of segregation on buses and public transportation.
5. Supporting the movement to eliminate racial discrimination at lunch counters, restaurants and other places of public accommodation.
6. Working with employer's groups, professional organizations and unions to establish employment practices based on character and ability rather than on race, color, creed or national origin.
7. Discussing the facts regarding segregation in housing and cooperating with agencies working to develop "open occupancy" housing.
8. Working to assure all persons the opportunity to register and to exercise the right to vote.

II. Local churches can take action within their own organization by:

1. Re-examining continuously in the light of the gospel their attitudes and behavior regarding race relations and committing themselves to carry out their Christian responsibility.
2. Finding out what the policy of their denomination is regarding race relations and studying the implications of the policy statement in the light of the Christian gospel.
3. Organizing a church committee to develop and carry out a program of race relations.
4. Opening membership in the local church and its organizations to all people, making this fact known in the community and seeking to win others to Christ regardless of race.
5. Exhibiting firm behavior patterns of acceptance when the question of a racially inclusive fellowship is discussed in the church and when the first persons of another race visit or are received into the church.
6. Selecting professional and volunteer church leadership on the basis of qualifications rather than race.
7. Conducting study groups, forums and other activities to gather the facts about race relations in the community, and making plans for a race relations program that runs throughout the year.
8. Conducting worship services for God's guidance in the improvement of race relations. (A "Worship Program for Race Relations Services" is available from the Department of Racial and Cultural Relations, National Council of Churches, 475 Riverside Drive, New York 27, N. Y. 4¢ each; $3.00 per hundred.)

For Open Channels

What the Episcopalians and representatives of the Assemblies of God have been doing (see page 3) in their discussions of the work of the Holy Spirit in the contemporary church appeals to us as something that is right and proper that should be done in many other relationships. Too long have doors been closed and conversations made impossible between those who profess a common commitment. It is not required that anyone be able to predict what might or should happen as a result of such an exchange. It is not required that anything that could ever be publicized to the outside world must take place.

This is simply a symbol of a willingness to follow the divine prompting, to admit that we have not yet arrived at some lodging place, that we recognize our need of others along the way.

Whatever may or may not come out of what began as a possible four-way merger in which Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Methodists, and the United Church of Christ are participating, a significant opportunity for meaningful conversations is being provided. If God can use this to his glory, who should not rejoice?

All this serves to underscore a more pressing local question: With whom are you in vital conversation in your community, reaching across lines that may not have been broken in the past, seeking out those who share a common concern and a common hope, and talking together in earnest conversation about some of the deeper issues of life and destiny?

Right Ideas and More

It is doubtless a widespread temptation for many people to feel that they have the "right" attitude on race relations. Others may be too far to the right or to the left, too active or too passive. If they could only be brought to the vantage point which "we" have attained, many of the most critical problems might well be on their way to a fair solution!

We are pointing up a danger that may be faced when people have had what might be called an "intellectual conversion" on this matter. They come into new territory; they are glad they have moved from a position which they see to be no longer tenable, and they may even be tempted to congratulate themselves that they have reached what they feel to be "the" or "a" Christian position on race. They may even find themselves in harmony with and in genuine support of what most church bodies around the world have long been saying on the issue. If we can do this without self-righteousness or smugness, it may mark a genuine attainment that deserves commendation—but is that the end of it all?

The enlargement of one's point-of-view and the expansion of his concern should never be minimized, but it is possible for people to reach such a point and be completely detached from any objective in the great struggles that are in progress. The result is that they find themselves involved in no meaningful or significant movement to fulfill the implications of their convictions. With great issues at stake, they may never be among those who can be identified actively with a group moving on toward attainable objectives of social justice. They are well-wishers but that is about all. In our cover quotation for this issue, Jack Finegan underscores the reminder that it is not enough to be delivered from a cramped, confining past; we must move up and out into a true and relevant identity with the people of God who are seeking to realize his purposes at the frontier.

There is a much unclaimed territory ahead. It is to be hoped that emphases made in churches across the land on Feb. 10 will help many more of us to see the place of relevant witness which we are being called to take at this time—beyond simply holding to "right" ideas about race.

Editorial Notes

A UPUSA publication raises questions as to what church members watch on television, what effect this has upon their Christian faith and life, and what local groups might do to capitalize on some aspects of television for Christian training and mission. The twelve-page booklet is called Television and Christian Training. Among other things it suggests that with the application of intelligent criteria many of the most popular television programs (like, it says, "The Defenders") can become occasions and springboards for study and discussion. Other specific ideas are advanced with reference to different types of programs. The publication is offered free from Presbyterian Distribution Services.

The December issue of Social Progress deals with problems made critical by anticipated population trends that will be faced by American society. A USA population of 342 million is forecast by demographic experts by 2000 A.D.—in 37 years. By 2050 it is predicted that there will be one billion people in the USA.

PONDERABLES . . .

Although the ceremony [of public school prayer] is in form voluntary, the atmosphere of the schoolroom and the conformist psychology of school children are such that in a meaningful and realistic sense such exercises are in fact coercive. They are thus interferences with the free exercise or non-exercise of religion on the part of non-conformist groups.—PAUL A. FREUND, Harvard University legal scholar and authority on constitutional law.

Church and ministry are thought to exist on behalf of the worshiping devotees of a god who is to be at our beck and call, answering our needs, pandering to our undisciplined desires, and keeping our American way of life intact and free from harm. . . .

The finance reports of our flourishing churches on the American scene can tell an embarrassing story. Self-preservation of the church as an institution receives unquestioned priority—more and more comfortable pews and more and more comfortable kneeling cushions . . . for less and less painful prayers of repentance.

It may shock us to be told that many a congregation of our time is, in the Biblical view, guilty of idolatry.

FELINE SOCIETY

By KENNETH J. FOREMAN

"God made the beasts of the earth . . . and God saw that it was good."—Genesis 1:25.

"A just man cares for the safety of the beasts he owns; the wicked are heartless through and through." — Proverbs 12:10, R. Knox translation.

FOR $250 you can be a life member of the American Feline Society. On a scale running down to $5 a year, you can choose one of various grades of memberships down to a humble subscription. The great aim of the Society is to abolish the surplus cat problem. It appears, from the official literature, that there are in America twenty-one million cats; and that one-half this number, or ten and one-half million cats are homeless. The society optimistically believes that if 20% of all American families could be persuaded to adopt a cat, America would no longer have this cat problem.

Now before the Feline Society writes me off as a heartless cat-hater for anything I am about to say, let me say that I like cats very much, though having no ambition to own one, especially not one from the alley. I even know one word in the cat language. It is unprintable for two reasons, one purely linguistic, and the other being that I don't rightly know what it means. I said it to a cat sitting on a paving block one night, and that cat got off its perch and followed me through city traffic for blocks; what the word meant I never knew, but perhaps it had something to do with fish.

However, while able to speak to a cat's condition, I do not mistake cats for human beings. A cat is (or can be) beautiful, graceful, affectionate, and as smart as he needs to be; but he is a beast all the same. For a week I once had the gift of a house, with the sole stipulation that I should feed the two cats who for twelve years had observed (if not shared) their owner's joys and sorrows. Now those two cats had lived together for twelve mortal years; but not once in that week did either of them show the slightest consideration for the other, especially not at meal times. God made cats; but he made mice too, and also sharks. How many homeless mice there may be, or wandering unwelcomed sharks, nobody knows; but I am not going to contribute to a fund to make them more comfortable; and the same goes for cats.

NOW HERE is the point: one human being is of more worth than ten million cats. Or if that seems an exaggeration to you, then let us be modest and say that one human being is worth more than one cat. (Just how many cats, on this reckoning, would equal one human being, is your guess.)

Let it be granted that owning a cat is owning a good thing; caring for a cat is a kind act. It should also be added that cats are easier to take on or take in, easier to take care of, and easier to get rid of, than human people are. A cat owner who turns the cat loose to become a member of that ten-million-cat horde of alley haunters and night fighters, is doing a disservice to society and really doing the cat a great injustice. Contributing to the delinquency of cats is nothing to be proud of. Nevertheless and notwithstanding, a Christian should not forget the divine commonsense of Jesus. "You are of more value than many sparrows!" "Of how much more value is a man than a sheep!" Jesus said these things, each one against a background of concern for animals. It is not callousness to brute suffering that leads to human compassion. One who hates and mistreats animals is not likely to be a friend to man. But for all that, if you have a hundred dollars for the homeless, do remember that there are more important animals than cats going hungry tonight. There are more refugees, among your own humankind, than among the felines of America. If you want to adopt a living thing, why not a child? And if you have no room in your home, nor time on your schedule, for the homeless, then you must be a very busy person and presumably making lots of money. If you are a reader of this paper then your church operates a home for the homeless, or tries to find homes for them, and is doing this on funds never quite sufficient to do all that is needed. Why not pay that orphanage a visit? It is more important to keep a child out of the alley than to keep cats out of there; and your church offers you the opportunity to do just that.

AND IF YOU really can personally give a home to the homeless, there are Korean children and children in other tragic lands who desperately need you. To love a child is (as I have admitted) more demanding on heart and mind, and muscles too, than devotion to any cat that ever was. There is possibility of sorer heart-break, there is longer strain upon the goodwill, in adopting a child of your own human race than in caring for a pet.

But ask the families who have adopted orphans, from nearby or overseas. Would they exchange this human child for something cute from the pet shop? They would not; and they would think you rather soft in the head for asking.

Nichols Surprised at Vatican Council Attitudes

IOWA CITY, IOWA (RNS)—A Protestant delegate-observer to the Second Vatican Council said here that the observers had been taken into the deliberations of the Council to such an extent that they were "almost unofficial consultants."

James H. Nichols of Princeton (N.J.) Theological Seminary, a Presbyterian observer at the Council, made this statement during a discussion here with Roman Catholic Bishop Robert E. Tracy of Baton Rouge, La.

The two churchmen participated in "A Report and Dialogue on the Vatican Council" sponsored by the State University of Iowa's Committee on Lectures and Vespers.

Bishop Tracy said the Council Fathers "are a lot more willing to entertain change than people expected them to be."

As an example of this attitude, the bishop said the schema on the liturgy, which he called "a very liberal document," drew only 11 votes in opposition.

"My question is: Where are all the conservatives?" he asked.

Unsurpassed Courtesy

Dr. Nichols said the non-Catholic observers at the Council were "treated with courtesy that could not have been surpassed" and were informed about proposals that were to go before the Council and then asked to comment on them.

The most striking impression that Dr. Nichols gained at the Vatican was of "the maturity, depth, intellectual grasp and spiritual discipline" of the Catholic theologians assigned to brief the observers.

"I hadn't realized that anything like this existed," Dr. Nichols said. "I thought the Roman Catholic Church was a very closed, complacent and sectarian body that had nothing to learn from anybody else. I know now that this is no longer accurate, if it ever was."

Dr. Nichols added:

"In two months of speeches at the Council, there was not one single phrase calculated to affront or humiliate Protestant or Orthodox Christians. All the differences are still there. I don't think any major problem is in any sense solved. Nevertheless, the whole atmosphere is so different that as Cardinal Bea says, it is a 'real miracle.' One would never have believed that this could happen."

Bishop Tracy said that while the Council has actually voted on only one schema so far, many of its accomplishments have been in intangible areas, such as contacts with the Protestant and Orthodox churchmen, and the chance for the prelates themselves to get a "re-education" and to get to know each other better.

Going Back to School

Referring to the educational aspect of the Council—hearing speeches by "the Catholic Church's most brilliant minds" and reading countless documents—Bishop Tracy said "it's like going back to school."

He said the contact with prelates from throughout the world and with his fellow-American bishops "have given me my first good insight into what the Catholic Church is all about."

Bishop Tracy predicted that when the Council reconvenes again in September, the proceedings will go much faster and that it will be concluded by December as Pope John XXIII hopes.

Presbytery Requires Gift By Departing Churches

WASHINGTON, D.C. (RNS)—The Presbytery of Washington City has agreed to permit a once-prosperous mid-city Presbyterian congregation to move its house of worship to suburban Montgomery County, Md., but only after exacting a precedent-making condition—that the departing congregation make a gift of not less than $50,000 to the community it is leaving behind.

The presbytery, which consists of more than 50 churches affiliated with the United Presbyterian Church in Washington and its suburbs, told the congregation of Gunton-Temple Memorial Presbyterian Church that a relocating church must contribute to the community it leaves.

That donation will be used, said the presbytery, "to provide a responsible ministry to all persons regardless of race, nationality, culture, or geographical location."

Gunton-Temple, a congregation formed by a merger nearly 40 years ago, has arranged to sell its present church building on Sixteenth Street to the Canaan Baptist Church, a Negro congregation.

Although many residences and apartments on Sixteenth Street still house white tenants, the neighborhood nearby has become almost entirely Negro in the past decade.

The church has suffered a sharp membership decline and most of its present members come from a distance.

Originally, the resolution placed before the presbytery called for the payment of $90,000 by the departing congregation. This sum would have represented 25 per cent of the $360,000 which it expects to receive from sale of its present property.

The amount was scaled downward, however, when members of the congregation, after a two-hour meeting with presbytery leaders, said it would interfere with plans of the congregation—which has only 291 active members left—to relocate in the suburbs and develop a new church.

Christ Needs Workers

By ERNEST TRICE THOMPSON

Sunday School Lesson for February 10, 1963

Mark 6. Printed Lesson: Mark 6:7-13, 34-42

I.

Jesus was no longer content to depend on his own efforts to evangelize the villages of Gaililee. He called unto him the Twelve and began to send them forth by two and two. It may be that Jesus was moved to send them on this mission because of the pressing spiritual needs, which he alone could not satisfy, or because he wished to train them for the fuller work which would devolve upon them after his death. Very likely, however, it was due in large part to the growing opposition, which indicated that his ministry was now approaching its crisis. As Denny says (The Career and Significance of Jesus): "It was now a race against the enemy for the mastery of public opinion, and the apostles as well as Jesus seem to have felt the urgency of the situation." Branscomb says the significance of this mission must not be overlooked. "Jesus undertook to arouse the nation. To his own efforts he added those of such followers as he could trust."

The directions which Jesus gave to the evangelists on this occasion were not intended for all disciples, or even to be permanent for the Twelve. They were adapted to the haste and intensity demanded by this particular mission. They were to go forth two by two, that one might help and encourage the other, and that their testimony might be more telling. They were commissioned not only to preach, but also to work miracles of healing. Of the latter Mark specifies the one which to him was typical. He gave them authority over unclean spirits. As today, a ministry of healing would manifest the spirit of Christ, would open the way for his message, and confirm it in the minds of the people.

They were to take nothing for their journey save a staff only. That is, they were to be content with the simplest equipment. They were to go forth promptly, and as they were—traveling light that they might travel fast and give the impression of urgency of their message. Hence they were to take neither bread, nor bag (a small leather sack for carrying provisions), nor money, nor anything beyond the staff which every traveler carried. They were to go shod with sandals, the simplest covering for the feet, and typical of the traveler (shoes were also worn by Jews, furnished with upper leather and most costly). They were not to wear two coats.

"The dress of an ancient Oriental was quite simple, consisting, aside from sandals for the feet and a turban for the head, of a tunic (coat), a garment in form not unlike a long shirt, around which the girdle was bound, and a cloak which was of the simplest construction, scarcely more than a large square piece of cloth. To wear two tunics was a sign of comparative wealth (Luke 3:11) and it was this which Jesus forbade. He himself apparently wore but one (John 19:23)."

The purpose of all these injunctions was to secure simplicity and freedom from hindrance in their work. They were not to burden themselves either to get or to carry anything unnecessary. The customs of the land made it unnecessary to provide for traveling expenses, since they went afoot and could obtain free entertainment everywhere.

Furthermore, Jesus instructed them that they were to have but one stopping place in each village (not to waste time seeking for better quarters), and if a place would not receive them, they were to shake off the dust, as a sign of disapproval and protest against their conduct. Snowden remarks:

"Ministers and missionaries are to do all they can and go to the last limit of patience and sympathy and love in endeavoring to win the attention and confidence and conversion of unbelievers. But there may come a point of refusal and persecution when further efforts would be useless and harmful, and then the Christians may withdraw. We may do harm in pressing our Christian faith too persistently on others. Their sovereign right to decide their own faith and action must be respected. We may grieve over their unbelief, but we must leave them alone."

In accordance with Jesus' instructions, the disciples went out and preached and healed, anointing the sick whom they healed with oil. Oil was much used by the physicians of the day. It seems that in healing the sick, the disciples used, as Jesus did not, the regular remedies of the day. On their return they told Jesus all things that they had done, and what they had taught (vs. 30). Marcus Dods says that the words suggest that they had great things to tell. The teaching element would not have been extensive in the range of topics. Yet if it took the form of personal narrative concerning Jesus it might be copious enough, and really the principal feature of the mission.

Jesus relied on his disciples even during the days of his flesh. At the present time he depends upon us even more. As St. Teresa once said:

"Christ has no body on earth now but yours, no hands but yours, no feet but yours; yours are the eyes through which is to look out Christ's compassion to the world, yours are the feet with which he is to go about doing good, and yours are the hands with which he is to bless us now."

In the particular mission which we have just studied, there was need for haste. What need for haste is there now?

Is there any value for us in the instructions which Jesus gave to his disciples? Do his words, for example, indicate that his followers in general, or his ministers in particular, should live moderately, avoiding luxury, or were they merely directions for a specific emergency? Should we concern ourselves only with the souls of men, or also with their bodies? Does Jesus' mission require evangelists only, or lawyers, doctors, business men and artisans? What instructions do you think he would give these various groups now?

II.

The disciples, returning from their preaching mission, told Jesus what they had done and taught. Ever sensitive to the physical needs of those about him, Jesus suggested that they go with him to a quiet place where they might find rest. It was not to be found where they were. Streams of visitors, drawn by the fame of Jesus' works, kept them ever in movement and broke in even on their meals. According to the literal rendering of the Greek, they had no "opportunity or leisure for anything."

Jesus' plan to be alone with the Twelve was frustrated by the people who recognized his intentions. They went around the northern end of the lake by foot, and when Jesus and his disciples landed they found the usual throng of people awaiting them. But though Jesus' expectations of quiet were defeated he did not give way to a sense of disappointment. Instead his compassion was stirred by the spectacle of the eager interest of the crowd, whose needs had not been met by the recognized teachers of religion. As Mark puts it: "He had compassion on them, because they were like sheep without a shepherd." Crowds affect people in various ways. Some look upon them with amusement, some with cynicism, some with careful calculation of financial gain, some with scorn, or even with hatred, some with careless indifference. But Jesus looked upon them with compassion, stirred by a sense of their physical and spiritual needs (See Matthew 9:36). So, giving up the rest which he had sought for himself and his disciples, he began to teach them many things.

When the day was far spent the disciples came to him with a suggestion. It was time to think of food. The country was barren. It might be well for Jesus to dismiss the crowd, so that they could go into the country—that is, to the farms and villages round about—and buy themselves something to eat. But Jesus turned to them and said, "You give them something to eat."

The disciples were startled by such a suggestion. They said to him, "Shall we go and buy two hundred denarii worth of bread?" The word "penny" in the King James Version is misleading. A denarius was the day's wage of a laborer. Whether the disciples had this much is not clear. Probably not. They meant to say that Jesus was asking the impossible. But Jesus was insistent. He said, "How many loaves have you? Go and see." They came back and reported, "Five, and two fish." A loaf in Jesus' day was a thick scone, not enough for a full meal for one hungry man. The fishes would be of a dried sort, used as a relish for the bread.

In his American Translation of the New Testament Goodspeed graphically describes what followed:

"He directed them all to sit down in parties on the fresh grass [this would prevent a scramble for the food]. And they threw themselves down in groups, in hundreds and in fifties. Then he took the five loaves and the two fish and looked up to heaven and blessed the loaves and brake them in pieces and gave them to the disciples to pass to the people; and be divided the two fish among them all. And they all ate and had enough. And the pieces they gathered up filled twelve baskets, besides the pieces of the fish. There were five thousand men who ate the loaves."

Mark offers no explanation as to how the miracle was performed. He does not even hint. A popular commenator, Lenski, offers the traditional interpretation: "The miracle was not wrought by the words, but . . . by the will of Jesus . . . Always there were more pieces to break off; the bread grew in Jesus' hands."

J. Vernon Bartlett in the New Century Bible offers a more "rational" explanation:

"What Jesus actually aimed at and achieved was the turning of the mixed multitude, composed of innumerable personal and family units, each with their own self-regarding interests and impulses, then and there into a single brotherhood or union of social groups, for the purpose of sharing in common what was to begin with the property of a few. Thus those before strangers to most of their fellows, under the spell of Jesus' message of divine Fatherhood and human brotherhood, were one and all brought to feel of one soul, a single family of God."

This, according to Bartlett, was the real miracle. And under the influence of this new spirit, those who had provisions, led by the example of Jesus, divided with those who had none, so that all were satisfied.

This line of explanation does not satisfy. Most of us, with Theodore H. Robinson, prefer to take the Gospel stories as they stand, recognizing in Jesus a person so unique that he had powers beyond the reach of ordinary men and a control over the physical world which others have not possessed.

And now what is the meaning of this incident for us?

The Compassion of Jesus

The key that unlocks the passage is found in Mark 6:34: "He saw a great throng and had compassion on them."

Says W. J. Dawson:

"The general attitude towards the multitude in Christ's day was harsh and scornful. All the splendid intellectualism of Greece existed for the favored few; beneath that glittering edifice of art and letters lay the dungeons of the slave. It was the same with Rome—it was an empire of privilege, in which the multitude had not part. Jewish society was built after the same pattern, except that with the Pharisees the sense of religious superiority bred a kind of arrogance much more bitter than that which is the fruit of intellectual or social exclusiveness."

Jesus looked with compassion on the crowds. How do we look on people today —white people, yellow people, black people—in our own land, in other lands, including Russia and China? What is there about them to excite our compassion? Jesus had compassion for people—

1. Because they needed rest. "They had no leisure. . . . And he said to them, Come away by yourselves . . . and rest" (6:31). To live the fullest life we must balance work and play, toil and rest. Jesus knew that men needed relaxation. "God is not a hard task-master," Dwight L. Moody once said, "and in later years I have learned that to do your best work you cannot afford to neglect the common laws of health." Have we learned that lesson? Is Jesus concerned with those who have no leisure, with those who have not learned how to use their leisure? How about us? Are we concerned?

2. Because they needed bread. The disciples said, "Send them away, to go and buy themselves something to eat." But he answered, "You give them something to eat."

"A French queen said of the hungry in her realm who couldn't get bread, 'Then let them eat cake,' and outraged friends of the poor started the French Revolution. A foolish British king tried to tax the American colonies without allowing them a voice in the matter—and we had an American Revolution. Profit-mad industrialists in England worked little children to death for a pittance and sacrificed the lives of fathers and mothers on the altars of their greed—and soon there was an industrial revolution. . . . After long, fearful years of starvation, poverty and persecution, the Russian people revolted in 1917; they broke into the Church of the Kremlin, and found almost twenty million dollars worth of gold, silver and precious stones. The bells of the Kremlin had been melted down to help the Czar fight his war, but not one penny of the twenty-million-dollar treasure of the church had ever been used to help feed a nation of starving people, or to ease their poverty and suffering in any way whatsoever. The people of Russia almost destroyed that church." (Frank Mead in Tarbell's Teachers' Guide.)

John C. Bennett, writing in Theology Today (October, 1950), said:

"We must see the rise of an anti-religious Communist movement as a judgment upon the church, upon the comfortable middle class world to which we belong. It is one of the most tragic facts of modern history that in the 19th century the working classes especially in continental Europe 'came to believe that the churches were against them or indifferent to their plight'" (Report of the Third Section of the Amsterdam Assembly of the World Council of Churches).

He went on to quote Professor Jacques Maritain, famous Roman Catholic philosopher, then lecturing at Princeton University. After pointing out that the movements of social protest were led not by saints but by atheists, Maritain asked, "Why such a tragic defection? I consider it hard not to see in it a kind of punishment of the Christian world, which for a long period had more or less betrayed Christianity in its practical behavior, and despised the lessons of the saints, and forsaken the immense herd of the hopeless."

"We should never lose sight of the conviction that the only effective resistance to Communism is the effort to discover better solutions to the problems which give Communists their opportunity. . . . The power of Communism is not primarily military power. It is the power of an idea, the power of propaganda, the power of a program that is designed to overcome the poverty of nations. We might conceivably defeat Russia as a nation by military force but that would not mean the defeat of Communism. That defeat can only come by the presentation of another positive program backed by an idea and a faith that have more truth than the idea and the faith of communism."

The gospel, as Jesus proclaimed it by word and deed, possesses that idea and offers that faith. And this leads us to note that Jesus had compassion on the multitudes.

3. Because they need God. As Mark tells us: "He had compassion on them, because they were like sheep without a shepherd, and he began to teach them" 6:34. "Like sheep without a shepherd." Can this be said of masses of people today, in our land, in other lands? Some years back, before Communism had become the menace it now is, Pearl Buck wrote:

"The hunger in men everywhere now is the supreme tragedy of our times—the hungry who are not fed, the groping who look for goodness, the hopeless who look for cause to hope. But religion as it is organized today cannot feed them, nor lead them, nor save them. Its only valuable function, speaking in non-religious terms, seems to be to give refuge."

Is this true? What should we do about it? Should we be satisfied to offer the conventional religious services which so many do not attend? What other techniques could you suggest?

John C. Bennett predicts:

"Sooner or later there will be a new openness to Christian evangelism of the right sort, of the sort that deals rigorously with the problems of justice and that also meets the deeper needs of men for light, for divine grace and spiritual power. Many of the people who accept Communism have never heard Christ presented in a way that makes him relevant to their questions and their needs. The time of openness will come because the Achilles heel of Communism is that it has no understanding of the dimensions of evil in human life. . . . When this becomes more apparent than it is now, we may expect to see much of the human self-sufficiency of Communism overcome and CAROLINGIAN PORTRAITS: A Study in the Ninth Century. By Eleanor Shipley Duckett. The University of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor. 311 pp., $5.95.

One great advantage of a knowledge of history is that it provides perspective on our own time and problems. Thus a new book on ninth-century Europe, written by an eminent medieval historian, should be called to the attention of readers who enjoy the serious study of past ages, especially what were once called "the dark ages." Like us, Europeans of the ninth century felt that they lived in a time of unprecedented danger and distress, as Viking raiders savagely pillaged their society from without while civil war and dynastic ambition threatened it from within. Men, women, and children could with as good cause as now fear a violent and painful death, while slow and lingering misery was probably even more widespread. Much of the trouble arose from the attempts of Charlemagne's son and heir, Louis the Pious, to rule his empire by a policy of extreme mercy and forgiveness, as a result of which the order established by Charlemagne was replaced by what at times came close to anarchy and life was often reduced to the lowest levels of poverty and subsistence. Readers of this comprehensive history will be reminded of Luther's conviction that since Everyman is no Christian, the attempt to govern him by purely Christian ethics may yield surprisingly un-Christian results. They will be reminded, too, that fortitude was as necessary a virtue in the past as it is today, and that despair was as real a temptation.

In addition to the accounts of political, economic, social, and military affairs, detailed insight is provided into the affairs of the church, the development of theology, the interpretation of the mass, and the management of monasteries. Again, we are often reminded that the confusions and failures of our own age are neither new nor unique.

Miss Duckett has told her story through intimate portraits of eight leading figures of the time. She writes in a clear and readable style. Though her book will not have a wide audience, it will be enjoyed by those who are interested in the development of medieval Europe, whether they are amateurs or professionals.

Religion and Race

✦ ONE HUNDRED years after the Emancipation Proclamation the religious organizations in the United States finally came together in one body to discuss the moral problem of racial discrimination and segregation in specific and concrete terms. Six hundred fifty delegates from 70 religious groups met in the first National Conference on Religion and Race at the Edgewater Beach hotel, Chicago, January 14-17. This interreligious conference, the first of its kind in the nation's history, was convened by the department of racial and cultural relations of the National Council of Churches, the social action department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference and the social action commission of the Synagogue Council of America. The conference thus had the approval and support of the highest representative officers of the participating bodies. In addition to the delegates, several hundred observers and visitors attended the open sessions.

In the depth of the planning for the conference, the efficiency of its machinery, the comfort and conveniences of the housing provided for it, the mood of congeniality and cooperativeness which pervaded it, the earnestness of the delegates in grasping the problems which called them together, the auspices under which it met—in all of this the National Conference on Religion and Race was extraordinarily successful. But the tests of the true success of this gathering run deeper.

Whatever the values of the conference in the solution of the racial problem, it made a deep and far-reaching contribution to the solution of the interfaith problem. This was the most cosmopolitan gathering of religious leaders under religious auspices in American history. What Will D. Campbell said and William Stringfellow and others implied was in some measure accomplished: it is more realistic to seek a true inner life for church and synagogue through the race problem than to seek a solution to the race problem through the inner life of church and synagogue. The nation's number one domestic problem called together and introduced to each other people who on religious grounds have long been estranged. What else could have put in one room representatives of the American Ethical Union, the Christian life commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America, the Polish National Catholic Church, the Rabbinical Council of America, the Unitarian Universalist Association, the National Council of Catholic Men?

If a family so big is to gather in peace in one room, it has to be a room big enough to hold all its members. Particularities had to be submerged; generalities had to be avoided and the greatest common denominators sought. The harmony and the mutual dedications which were achieved were paid for in patience, restraint, understanding, courtesy, and a willingness not to say everything that could be said. It was an open conference, but the delegates operated on the healthful Pauline principle that though all things are lawful, not all are expedient. Brought together by a great cause, the delegates stayed together and arrived at mutual dedications despite the theological chasms dividing them.

But was it a successful conference on race? No, if it is supposed that such gatherings solve problems. Yes, if it is assumed that the meeting of minds and hearts on a vast and grave human problem is a beginning rather than an ending. Such conferences do not solve problems; they discover problems. They lift up the unresolved issues, identify the unused talent and resources, dramatize the unfinished business, renew the faltering commitments. In these respects the National Conference on Religion and Race was successful not only in the interfaith but also in the interracial quest. Two, three, five years from now will be soon enough to ask what good came of it.

From the brilliant, scholarly opening address by Rabbi Abraham J. Heschel to the moving plea of Martin Luther King, Jr., at the close the accent was on action. In the plenary addresses by Archbishop Cardinal Meyer, J. Irwin Miller, Rabbi Julius Mark, Franklin H. Littell, Robert Sargent Shriver, Jr., in the forums and work groups the accent was on action. Who, indeed, can say anything more than has been said? Who can resolve anything more than has been resolved? The conference declared explicitly and implicitly that what is lacking in human relations is not ideas, instructions, resolutions, but deeds—deeds such as picket lines, sit-ins, freedom rides; the less dramatic but equally creative deeds of love and justice in our homes, our neighborhoods, our churches and synagogues, our public and private facilities; the personal deeds of prayer, faithful obedience, courageous individual witness to the will of the God who set the solitary in families and made all men one.

Provision was made for a follow-up committee and, temporarily, for a continuing secretariat to put the resources of the conference at the disposal of local groups which want to transform words, ideas and plans into action. The life of the secretariat, without which the accumulated values and resources of the conference will be inadequately used, will depend on the availability of funds for its support. But this is not the action the delegates had in mind; it is merely a means to such action. Already ten follow-up local committees have been or are being formed—in Chicago, Atlanta, Detroit, New Orleans, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, San Antonio, San Francisco and Oakland.

What were the complaints about the conference? It was said, largely unjustly, that Negroes were not adequately represented on the program and in the number of delegates. There is a measure of truth in the first part of this criticism. President Benjamin E. Mays of Morehouse College, Atlanta, was chairman of the conference. With the exception of him and Martin Luther King, Jr., the talent and insight of the Negro were neglected. But it is incorrect to say that Negroes were not proportionately represented. All the religious groups in the Negro community were invited to send delegates. Although some of the groups did not accept the invitation, roughly one-fourth of the delegates were Negroes. Since delegates were selected on a religious rather than a racial basis, the Negro contingency was disproportionately large.

There were more serious omissions. A conference on religion and race should not—as this one did—ignore the Indian and other minority racial groupings. It would have been fitting to have paid some attention to the plight of Spanish Americans in the United States. Although most Spanish Americans are identified as Caucasians, their speech and physical traits subject them to the same kind of oppressions suffered by Negroes in American society. But even more serious was the failure to give recognition, credit and responsibility to women. With the exception of Mahalia Jackson, who sang, and the Rev. May Yoho Ward, who gave an invocation, no woman appeared anywhere on the program. Yet the fact, which some of the delegates and participating groups seemed not to realize, is that the women of the United States have been far in advance of men in the field of interracial activity. This was a regrettable oversight, but fortunately it will not halt the courageous, far-sighted services of women and women's organizations.

The conference, tied to the nationwide celebration of the centennial of the Emancipation Proclamation, was the brain child of a young Roman Catholic layman, Mathew Ahmann of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice, who deserves immense credit for the quiet, efficient work which brought this meeting to fruition. With the cooperation of Rabbi Marc H. Tanenbaum of the American Jewish Committee and J. Oscar Lee, executive director of the department of racial and cultural relations of the National Council of Churches, he initiated, planned and directed the development of this historic gathering. He placed himself—and often the religious group to which he belongs—in the background and brought off without bitterness, rancor or envy on the part of anyone an interreligious gathering which may prove to be epochal.

parents in the education of their children, a better understanding of the constitutional provisions which guarantee freedom of choice in education and equal protection under the law, and a better understanding of the role of the independent, nongovernmental schools in a pluralistic society." But C.E.F. seeks offices as well as understanding. It claims that six of the eight candidates it endorsed in New York state last year on the basis of their pledge "to work for federal aid to private school pupils" were elected. One candidate it helped re-elect was Representative James J. Delaney, Brooklyn Democrat who sponsored a bill in the House which would grant to parents, from federal funds, $20 for each child they have in school. In the nine states in which it has branches C.E.F. is now concentrating on promotion of legislation to provide for nonpublic schools bus transportation, textbook funds and other "auxiliary services." Its ultimate aim, according to the St. Louis Review, is to obtain for parents of children attending nonpublic schools federal funds in an amount equal to the $450 spent in the U.S. annually on each child in the public schools. If the C.E.F. achieves this aim it will be scrapping the freedom of the individual, undermining the public school system and enlisting the government as the chief supporter of the church. This is an organized effort that cannot be met by denunciations or individual forays. It takes organization to beat organization.

Which Way British Labor Party?

✦ UNDER THE LATE Hugh Gaitskell the British Labor party took an unexpected turn toward nationalism and was gaining a cheap and deceptive popularity as a consequence of its opposition to British entry into the Common Market. At the time of Gaitskell's death polltakers were predicting that Labor would win if a national election were held soon. Prime Minister Macmillan's determination to take Britain into Europe had run into President de Gaulle's veto, laid down in the interest of his fantastic dream of a Francocentric, Bonapartist Europe. On January 14 the French leader flatly opposed British entry, even though the Treaty of Rome on which the Common Market is based says that the community is open to "any European state." Previous to that development President Kennedy had administered an unnecessary humiliation to Mr. Macmillan at Nassau in abruptly withdrawing U.S. support from the Skybolt missile program on which the British air defense system had depended. The Labor party, aided by those sections of the British press with which it was once most in disfavor, was benefiting from the American rebuff as well as from French shortsightedness. Hugh Gaitskell's death creates a new situation the key to which is the Labor party's capacity to maintain its unity. Events may demonstrate that no other leader can hold the party together. Labor's left wing advocates nuclear disarmament so far as Britain is concerned, with a consequent loosening of the tie to the United States. Its leader is Harold Wilson, the party's foreign affairs spokesman. His chief rival for party leadership, George Brown, a conservative somewhat to the right of Gaitskell, is believed to oppose Common Market entry somewhat less strenuously than did the late leader. In the meantime, while Labor is settling the often disruptive question of succession, Mr. Macmillan continues to press for clear definition of the direction Europe is going to move. It is inconceivable that the other Common Market nations will at this late date settle for a Bonapartist Europe. The decision will probably come soon after resumption of talks in Brussels. If our hopes are fulfilled, the French attempt to isolate Britain will fail.

An Appeal to the Conscience of the American People

FROM THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON RELIGION AND RACE
JANUARY 17, 1963, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

✦ We have met as members of the great Jewish and Christian faiths held by the majority of the American people, to counsel together concerning the tragic fact of racial prejudice, discrimination and segregation in our society. Coming as we do out of various religious backgrounds, each of us has more to say than can be said here. But this statement is what we as religious people are moved to say together.

I

Racism is our most serious domestic evil. We must eradicate it with all diligence and speed. For this purpose we appeal to the consciences of the American people.

This evil has deep roots; it will not be easily eradicated. While the Declaration of Independence did declare "that all men are created equal" and "are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights," slavery was permitted for almost a century. Even after the Emancipation Proclamation, compulsory racial segregation and its degrading badge of racial inequality received judicial sanction until our own time.

We rejoice in such recent evidences of greater wisdom and courage in our national life as the Supreme Court decisions against segregation and the heroic, nonviolent protests of thousands of Americans. However, we mourn the fact that patterns of segregation remain entrenched everywhere—north and south, east and west. The spirit and the letter of our laws are mocked and violated.

Our primary concern is for the laws of God. We Americans of all religious faiths have been slow to recognize that racial discrimination and segregation are an insult to God, the giver of human dignity and human rights. Even worse, we all have participated in perpetuating racial discrimination and segregation in civil, political, industrial, social and private life. And worse still, in our houses of worship, our religious schools, hospitals, welfare institutions and fraternal organizations we have often failed our own religious commitments. With few exceptions we have evaded the mandates and rejected the promises of the faiths we represent.

We repent our failures and ask the forgiveness of God. We ask also the forgiveness of our brothers, whose rights we have ignored and whose dignity we have offended. We call for a renewed religious conscience on this basically moral evil.

II

Our appeal to the American people is this:

SEEK a reign of justice in which voting rights and equal protection of the law will everywhere be enjoyed; public facilities and private ones serving a public purpose will be accessible to all; equal education and cultural opportunities, hiring and promotion, medical and hospital care, open occupancy in housing will be available to all.

SEEK a reign of love in which the wounds of past injustices will not be used as excuses for new ones; racial barriers will be eliminated; the stranger will be sought and welcomed; any man will be received as brother—his rights, your rights; his pain, your pain; his prison, your prison.

SEEK a reign of courage in which the people of God will make their faith their binding commitment; in which men willingly suffer for justice and love; in which churches and synagogues lead, not follow.

SEEK a reign of prayer in which God is praised and worshiped as the Lord of the universe, before whom all racial idols fall, who makes us one family and to whom we are all responsible.

In making this appeal we affirm our common religious commitment to the essential dignity and equality of all men under God. We dedicate ourselves to work together to make this commitment a vital factor in our total life.

We call upon all the American people to work, to pray and to act courageously in the cause of human equality and dignity while there is still time, to eliminate racism permanently and decisively, to seize the historic opportunity the Lord has given us for healing an ancient rupture in the human family, to do this for the glory of God.

INAUGURAL DAY PRAYER BREAKFAST

Dr. Archie Ellis (left) greeting Lt. Gov. and Mrs. Robert McNair at the Prayer Breakfast. Nearly 250 other Christian laymen and ministers gathered at the Jefferson Hotel in Columbia on the morning of the Inauguration for prayer in behalf of the governor and other elected state officials.

A very meaningful series of prayers were led by Dr. Ellis, with the following participants: for the state, and out-going governor and lieutenant-governor — Rabbi David S. Gruber; for the citizens of South Carolina — The Rev. James Stirling; for the Constitutional officers, members of the General Assembly, and other elected officials of South Carolina — Monsignor Martin C. Murphy; for the Lieutenant Governor — Dr. Carl Honeycutt; for the Governor — Dr. R. Archie Ellis; for the Church — Dr. Francis Cunningham.

President Neil Truesdell of the Christian Action Council presided. "This was one of the most significant occasions ever sponsored by the Council," was a frequent comment.

(The prayers, at the request of many, have been mimeographed and are available on request.)

ALCOHOL EDUCATION WEEK

Bobby Richardson Says . . .

"My suggestion to young people is to seek out truths through study of available materials about alcoholic beverages — truths from scientists who have studied this subject carefully through experimentation and research and tell how alcohol affects the central control system of man, how it weakens self-control, causes people to say and do things which they would not do if they did not have alcohol in their blood.

As an athlete I'm here to say that alcoholic beverages are harmful to your body and to urge you to abstain from their use.

I say that, even though a friend and teammate owns and runs a liquor store in the off season. But he doesn't visit the alcoholic homes such as Peace Haven and Fairview here in South Carolina. Oh, he does have a sign in his store that says,

"If the kids need shoes,
Don't buy booze"

but the people buy it and the world suffers.

The story is told of two soldiers recently celebrating Christmas. It was Christmas Eve in Nashville, Tennessee — but it could have been Columbia or Sumter. There was no place to go, so they had just bought a bottle of whiskey. They passed in front of a store window to see the nativity scene there,

"The longer we looked, the more beautiful it became," one of them said. Without a word they walked to the nearest alley and smashed the bottle of whiskey.

Thus — when spiritual values are exalted in any person's life, liquor will be "busted." The best "intoxication" comes from dedication to Christian ideals. When people are led to Christ and into Christian service, there will be no place for alcoholic drinks".

Bobby Richardson, star 2nd baseman of the New York Yankees, provided this statement especially for the Christian Action Council to make available to the churches. To use this in the churches on Sunday, Feb. 10, would be a good emphasis at the conclusion of this special week in the public schools.

Christian Action Seminar

Camp Gravatt — the Episcopal campsite near Batesburg — is the place where the 10th CHRISTIAN ACTION SEMINAR will be held on February 22-24.

Dr. Everett Tilson, an outstanding Biblical scholar, and Lloyd Wright, Peace Corps information director and Baptist layman, will be the main speakers for this statewide intercollegiate conference.

Dr. Neely McCarter, professor of Christian Education at Columbia Theological Seminary (Decatur, Ga.), will lead the CAMPUS CHRISTIAN WORKERS SEMINAR at the same time and place. "The New Image of our Campus Ministry" will be the theme for this first Seminar for faculty, chaplains, and other adults interested in Christian higher education.

Legislative Committee Appointed

The appointment of a special "Legislative Committee" to guide the Christian Action Council's activities related to the General Assembly has been announced by Dr. R. Wright Spears, Citizenship Chairman.

Members include Porter Anderson, Jr., Henry Wingard, Tom McMahan and Neal Wyndham.

This committee will assist in planning the regular legislative reports in YOUR STATE HOUSE (sent free on request) and study measures before the state for action.

Social Welfare Forum

"The Mission of the Church, in cooperation with its allies, to Persons of Special Need" is to be the theme for the Church and Social Welfare Section of the state's Social Welfare Forum to be held in Columbia on March 13-14.

Executive Director Howard G. McClain of the Christian Action Council, chairman of the section, has said that special attention would be given to "The Family and the Unwed Mother" and "The Church and the Ex-prisoner."

Christian laymen, as well as ministers, have been especially invited to attend the Forum and participate in it.

DOCUMENTS OF CHRISTIAN CONCERN on Religion Desegregation

Editor's note: Monday, January 28, 1963, was a memorable day when South Carolina took "a step into the future" with the orderly, non-violent admission of a Negro student into Clemson College. Ministers, church groups, and many individual Christians aided in creating the climate of opinion which made this possible. Below are given excerpts from several representative expressions. The more complete text of these and other statements are available on request.

Dr. Neil Truesdell, president of Christian Action Council — Oct. 6, 1962:

"Great issues call for great principles. A strong principle of Judeo-Christianity is the obedience to the supreme power of government . . . Otherwise, there is always the danger of lawlessness, confusion and anarchy . . .

Under God, we are a state and nation of law. The Federal decrees are the ultimate governing and legal power. As citizens we have no choice but to obey . . . Once law is taken lightly the liberty and freedom of every citizen is threatened . . .

The Christian Action Council calls upon every Christian, every citizen within the State, to proclaim to the world that we are a State of law, that we are motivated by the highest of all laws — the royal law of love."

Columbia White Ministers (121 of 13 denominations) — Jan. 20, 1963:

". . . We affirm that the Christian view of man includes recognition of each person as a child of God having dignity and worth imparted to him by God himself . . . This belief demands that we aid our fellow-man especially whenever his God-given rights are limited or denied.

We confess that we ourselves stand under the judgment of God for our failure to apply more fully the Christian principle of brotherhood in our personal lives and in the churches we serve.

We declare our conviction that racial problems and their solutions are basically moral and spiritual. Christians of our beloved state are presently being confronted with opportunities to witness to their affirmation that all citizens be given equality of opportunity for full development of their capacities as children of God . . . for example . . . in education and in employment opportunities.

As Christians, we must be found in the ranks of those who lead our city and state in orderly obedience, in justice and brotherhood."

S. C. Baptist Convention's Christian Life and Public Affairs Committee, Jan. 21, 1963:

"We heartily commend the public officials of our state for their wise and consistent efforts to preserve order and to encourage respect for the law during the difficult period of racial re-adjustment . . .

We earnestly and respectfully urge that the public schools be kept open and that every effort be made to prevent the interruption of normal educational processes . . .

It is imperative that we face these differences in a spirit of mutual respect and positive good will; that we seek to find constructive means of resolving our differences in accord with the teachings and the Spirit of Christ. Whatever legal measures are taken in dealing with the problems . . . the burden of working out a . . . relationship of good will between the races . . . rests most heavily upon the churches . . ."

Ten executive and spiritual leaders of denominations, Jan. 22, 1963:

". . . It is our duty by this law of love of God and neighbor to avoid every form of violence and hatred in our relations among ourselves and to use peaceable means to reach conclusions founded on justice and order and the universal law of Christian love . . ."

Methodist Board of Christian Social Concerns (Section on Human Relations and Economic Affairs), Jan. 23, 1963:

". . . We strongly affirm that such adjustment to new conditions is consistent with our state's honorable traditions and illustrious past, her citizens' allegiance to the nation, and her peoples' faith in the providences of a just and holy God . . ."

Fountain Inn-Simpsonville Ministers' Fellowship statement on "A Christian Stand on Violence," Jan., 1963:

". . . A Christian citizen does not encourage, or approve of, or take part in, the use of violent action as a substitute for, or in defiance of established laws.

He will refrain from any action which violates the safety, dignity or property of another person . . . he will refrain from so-called 'non-violent' demonstrations which intrude upon the affairs of a community other than his own . . .

A Christian citizen makes use of every opportunity to pray that the justice and love of God will prevail over injustice and hatred . . ."

DOWN WITH ALBANY

by Charles W. Rawlings

Those of us who didn't go to jail in Albany last summer probably feel guilty about this since a number of other important persons did so deliver themselves. "Urban Church Highlights" and other church journals have carried numerous articles about the wonderful spiritual values and insights gained from this incarcerating experience. Surely it must have been a therapeutic experience since most of those involved were able to relieve their frustrations over northern urban problems by helping the South with its difficulties.

The intriguing thing about the "first hand" reports that have come in from the August gathering in Albany is their predictable stress on the charismatic aspects of the venture. To be sure, one writer sees a social revolution in it but he spent most of the time talking about the theological "feelings" and epochal thrill he derived from this vision of the revolution. The damnable thing for all of us in urban church work is that we enjoy emoting with this subject matter. We tend, it seems to me, to spend a good bit less time looking at the hard realities of the revolution and prefer preoccupation with the poetic heights that our sermonic style of writing can create. Specifically, I would raise the following objections to the exultation over the Albany movement.

First, in spite of the generic nature of the "Negro problem" the Albany situation is a limited and regional experience. I have not heard one layman in the city of Cleveland or anywhere else mumble one word about our brave clergy brethren who ventured to the South; and it strikes me that our two quite diverse Cleveland newspapers paid little attention to it. It may have done something for Albany but not one school or discriminatory practice in Cleveland has been improved by the noble witness, and I venture to say the same might be true of our other northern cities.

Second, the particular perspective of the "Negro problem" in the southern community is quite different from the northern urban setting. The Caucasian in the South struggles to retard history; we often speak of it as "the inevitable." However, in the North, the Caucasian is making a new reality and a new history. He is hardening his resistance to the movement for integration. He is beginning to speak in a carte blanche way about the undesirable characteristics of the aggressive Negro. In his suburban planning, in his political maneuvering within the metropolity, in his method of handling conflict, the northern, urban Caucasian is creating vast barriers against racial integration and social justice that make the riot on the Ole Miss campus look like a dance around the Maypole.

On the Cleveland scene this past year I saw a whole neighborhood of 500 middle class Caucasian fammlies leave almost "overnight" as it were. We saw the tax payer reject levy issues that would enable the society to enhance integration, education or governmental process. Moreover, in our little Presbyterian families it

POLITICS, PEOPLE, AND RENEWAL

THE POLITICS OF URBAN RENEWAL, by Peter H. Rossi, and Robert A. Dentler (The Free Press of Glencoe, Inc., 1961, $6.00; 308 pages.)

The central purpose of this study is to assess the contributions of citizen participation to urban renewal planning in the city. It reads like a suspense novel.

This is an excellent book, one that every pastor in an urban area should have on his active bookshelf. Pastors should read it and should see that the trustees and the session read it. It can serve as a primer on what to do and what not to do if they want to participate actively in the renewal of the city, or if they want to keep a given church building, manse, or home standing, in place of having it bulldozed for urban renewal.

This is a case study of the Hyde Park Kenwood Renewal program in Chicago, and it is mercilessly objective. It indicts equally the local community organization, Hyde Park Kenwood Conference, the University of Chicago, the cardinal's Archdiocesan Conservation Committee, minority groups, bureaucratic governmental structure and many others.

The authors recognize that certain conflicts are endemic to renewal activity; the need for increased housing in urban areas, and the need for reduced population density in deteriorating areas, the need for institutional expansion (defined as a public use) and the shifting definition of the "public good" with the attendant use of the right of eminent domain, the need for the individual citizen to have safety in making his major investment in life, the purchase of a home. One Negro block leader, a widow with four children, testified, "Must we always be on the move, must we always be afraid to invest in anything except expensive cars...?"

Hyde Park Kenwood is in the neighborhood of the University of Chicago, on Chicago's South Side. The author estimates the value of the University of Chicago physical plant at $200-million...the physical plant that the university has gone to great lengths to protect.

The university's interest was partly bound up in the fact that between 60% and 80% of the faculty members have always lived within a square mile radius of the campus (page 66), and they wanted to keep the resident character of their faculty. It is partly bound up in the $200 million investment in building and real estate of the University proper. The author states, page 68, "The University's assets lie behind much of what was accomplished in the process of renewal planning in Hyde Park and Kenwood. We know that other institutions and organizations played very important roles, but the university played the most important one."

The executive of the Southeast Chicago Commission which was effectively financed by the University of Chicago, Julian Levy, lobbied before the state legislature to change the Redevelopment Corporation Act to make it possible to acquire land more easily.

He (Levy) persuaded the state legislature to amend the Neighborhood Redevelopment Corporation Act. Originally the law permitted a redevelopment corporation to be organized only for the purpose of eliminating slums. Under the amendments that Levy personally represented before the Legislature in 1953, the public purpose for which redevelopment corporations might be used were broadened to include conservation of deteriorating housing in commercial sites. The original act held constitutional by the Illinois Supreme Court permitted any 3 residents and citizens to organize a private corporation with a capital of not less than $1,000 and then to carry out a redevelopment plan. The local corporation was authorized to make mortgages and prop-

HOUSING, PEOPLE, AND CITIES, by Meyerson, Terrett and Wheaton. McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1962, New York - $9.75, 386 pages.

For the parish in the city a great deal of interest and time must be put in the housing around it. Housing is the key to the whole community - schools, churches, public facilities, and to the less tangible but very real quantities in a community. Housing is one of the major factors determining whether or not your parishioners live within a half mile of the church, or six miles from it. We have passed forever the stage when the church could say "We have no interest in our physical environment; we are here only to preach the Gospel."

This book is written for the layman. It is a compilation of a five-year investigation of impediments to the improvement of housing, and the urban environment. This study was financed by the Ford Foundation, and was done by ACTION. The authors find that one of the major impediments to good housing for all in America is that the technology of housing industry in America is still primitive. It is a rare builder who innovates, simplifies, standardizes or improves technology at rates corresponding to that of other industries. The housing industry has been organized on too small a scale to secure the economies of purchasing, offsite assembly, mechanized site preparation, research and designing material, market analysis, and merchandizing that are available to other industries.

Expenditures on residential buildings account for half of all construction outlays in this country and a third of total new private investment in this country. Accumulated investment in housing constitutes a third of our national wealth. Family expenditure on housing is second in size only to that for food.

PUBLIC HOUSING - A FERTILE FIELD FOR PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES

by Robert Davidson

"He that has ears to hear, let him hear - what the spirit speaks to the Churches."

Because the patterns of life and the physical surroundings of public housing projects are not familiar to most traditional Presbyterians and other main-line denominations, we have accepted too many premature conclusions and stereotypes about the quality of life within public housing, and the ability of Presbyterians to serve in these areas. On the basis of seven years experience with one public housing project, I would like to suggest that there are more positive possibilities than we have usually been willing to accept.

Certainly there are many differences between and even within projects.

Various external regulations make a difference. For instance, the maximum income limits both for entry and continued occupancy make substantial difference, determining whether there is to be a relatively broad or narrow income sweep among the tenants. Federal regulations give local housing authorities considerable latitude in income standards and rental charges. (Perhaps there is a need for Presbytery and Church Councils to give attention to the narrowness with which some public housing authorities interpret the income requirements for occupancy.)

The attitude of the local project manager can make a significant difference. Does he administer for human beings or for "efficiency"? What efforts are made for tenant housekeeping education? What orientation does he give to the project police about the goals of their work? What is his attitude toward problem families? With one manager, upon my visiting him in behalf of families scheduled to be evicted, I was told "I must abide by the rules." Contrast this with the second manager who called me with this urgent plea, "Will you please call upon Mrs. X. She is in serious trouble and so are the children. Perhaps, as a minister, you could persuade her to go to X clinic for psychiatric counseling. If she is receiving counseling help, then I can use this in my report to justify maintaining the family in the project. She really needs help." The other administrative personnel, who take their cues from the manager, also contribute or detract from the quality of life.

While the opportunities for anonymity are great, there are also strong possibilities for many meaningful friendships. In "X" houses there were certain structures that contributed to a sense of community. There is the huge child population which breeds an inter-dependence among women as they share in playground watching, baby sitting, shopping and school escort pools (unlike the suburbanites usually on foot instead of by car). As in any community there were many sub-communities within this large project of 1250 families. Some buildings had a deeper common life, usually traceable to a gregarious family within it. It was in these buildings that the most significant house church meetings were held.

Jane Jacobs in her external observations in "Death and Life of Great American Cities" stated that there were no neighborhood gathering places within public housing projects. In our project for over a year, a strong primary group of unemployed and out of school teenagers were a part of the community. I could usually find them on any good day at a particular lamppost. In their "lost" state, they were a source of mutual strength. If all the world thought they were bums, at least they had a minimum status of belonging to a group of bums. (Out of this crowd, we recruited three released-time teachers for our weekly religious instruction program. Their need for something to do was wedded to our need for teachers.)

There are really very few barriers to the church which wants to be a part of a project community. Most doors would open at the announcement that Rev. "X" was knocking. Pastoral counseling was frequent though much more haphazard, less orderly, usually taking place within the apartments, or on a playground bench or on the sidewalk.

As experience grew, we came to know the natural leaders and the centers of communication within each building. (They were not always the same person.) Some buildings either did not have these important agents or else we did not ever come to know them. Announcements of activities or fishing expeditions for information concerning the latest rumor of a rumble could be carried out through these persons.

MEMBERSHIP RECRUITMENT

There were several important factors in membership recruitment.

1. Since most of the Protestants were Negroes, the identification as a "civil rights church" provided a framework for our acceptance. (This "image" was not projected by overt verbal testimony during visits, but by constant identification through N.A.A.C.P. and by acting on various civil rights issues.)
2. The House Church - irregularly, improperly and unsystematically operated - was still the most effective channel for reaching the unaffiliated. It was one of the few ways to reach the husbands (when there were functioning husbands). Neighbors, who would not have come to the church building, did come to meetings in the homes of friends. As in most other types of membership recruitment, the most effective forms are indirect.
3. Playground Evangelism - The project community center and the playground were good places for developing contact with unchurched youth. Our colleague, the late Rev. Edicer Rodriguez, was a specialist at this task. He carried lollipops or balloons in his

POLITICS OF URBAN RENEWAL

erty loans, propose street closings, propose new construction, call for demolition of old buildings. In brief, to undertake a great variety of redevelopment operations.

Incredible as it seems, under the law three people could incorporate and redevelop an area, using the power of eminent domain.

In the process of this renewal operation it became apparent that those who sought to have the area renewed introduced facts that actually were not facts.

The authors charge that "The plans for southwest Hyde Park however involved the removal of structures not clearly deteriorrated with university facilities replacing them."

Politics, this book says, are involved in urban renewal from top to bottom. Whether or not the final plan will be a plan that removes you from the community, and/or removes beauty from the community, worthwhile uses from the community, diversity from the community, is dependent upon citizen participation. This citizen participation cannot be Milquetoast. It must be active fighting participation. If eternal vigilance is the price of freedom, it is also in part the price of retention of, or creation of community. Since this case study, the Housing Act has been changed. One of the requirements now is citizen participation. Citizens would be well advised to know how to call the Urban Renewal commissioner about even the tiniest specific in urban renewal plan. Political process breaks down if you as a citizen do not operate responsibly. If you operate irresponsibly, or not at all, you may find yourself renewed out of the community.

If you read no more in this book, read chapters 5 and 6 which compare one community in which citizen participation was unsuccessful and another in which it was successful.

HOUSING, PEOPLE, AND CITIES

The authors list four major schools of thought about the housing market vis-a-vis Federal governmental action: One particularly popular in depressions and recessions is that housing should be employed essentially for purposes of offsetting swings in the business cycle; that is, that housing should be a countercyclical industry. Opponents of this position of course contend that continuous and wide swing in housing construction is the thing basically responsible for the inefficiency of the high cost, spasmodic, and inadequate progress in housing standards. Another widely held idea is that people should be encouraged to buy rather than rent houses. FHA of course has greatly favored the building of houses for sale, and many consumers who would prefer to rent are forced to buy because of the shortage or the low quality of rental accommodations. These social engineers believe that the transition of the United States to a country of home owners will be the most significant of the social revolutions that could take place. Still another idea is to eliminate risk for the produce of housing in much the same way as it has been eliminated for the commercial farmer, by government guaranteed profits, easy credit, a kind of "crop" insurance, and technical assistance in the form of publicly supported materials testing and market analysis.

And a fourth theory is that all governmental policies to date may have only subsidized marginal producers who might have gone out of business and thereby strengthened the stronger producers. What is needed, this reasoning goes, is a policy that helps the consumer more directly; for example, as the TVA helps electricity consumers wherever the private market does not provide standard housing for all.

This is a good book to have for reference.

LOUISVILLE CHURCH PLANS NEW CENTRAL CITY STRUCTURE

Central Presbyterian Church, Louisville, Arthur Hall, pastor, plans to move downtown into a structure incorporating the facilities of a church, a high-rise commercial building and an underground parking lot.

Central Church has signed an agreement with Leonard Styche & Associates of Milwaukee for development of a valuable downtown corner lot in Louisville. No final determination has been made as to whether the buildings, apart from the church structure, when completed will consist entirely of office space or apartments or a combination of both.

RELIGIOUS IDENTITY

There will be a visible religious identity: This may consist of a chapel or a free standing nave. Whatever its position the nave, when completed, will seat 500 to 600 people. There will be a public lounge, library or reading room with easy access to the street, a chapel open 24 hours a day, a great hall for dinners, exhibitions, public meetings and forums, and group meeting rooms for study groups, committees, and Sunday church use. This Church is planned to be a service to the downtown area.

Styche, the developer, won the 1962 Progressive Architecture Magazine Design Award for one of his other projects.

ENCLOSURES

should be secretly stated (and you must not quote me) that almost every Presbyterian congregation facing the arrival of the Negro in its parish area is either making plans for protection, the moving van, or holding an eternal "wake."

Thus, I say down with Albany lest it delude us into thinking that we (a) understand the problem, or (b) have done something about it, or (c) improved our perspective.

We should be more radical about perspective and action related to a problem. For example, how many urban projects of the churches are related in depth and with effect to the legislative process that defines the rules of the game. Or, in what mechanism of church or sectarian community have the in-groups and out-groups of our society been brought together for confrontation or dialogue. Where, for example, would one expect to see in Presbyterianism (our little esoteric experiments excepted) the industrial leaders who are the laity of our upper middle class churches engaged in creative dialogue with the union boys. Upper class churches support projects for this purpose to keep such interaction out of their churches. Where in the churches would one expect to find the Baptist Negro leaders telling our clergy and elders what is really on their minds. Or where, outside the women's association programs, does one find even the mild inclination among Caucasian groups to listen to the problem of minority peoples or economically deprived groups.

If the truth is to be honestly confessed, we would admit that the most dynamic posture Protestantism has found in the urban scene rests on printed pages written by professionally trained preachers and analysts. Most of this group are primarily skilled in histrionic writing. At the action level we are a highly organized institution dedicated to disguising the fact that the urban problem has truly and fundamentally overwhelmed us all.

The Albany movement represents this disguise in one of its purest forms. We justify it by describing it in terms of intangible matters of the heart. Here's one vote for some urban church movement that is not centered in the endless cliches of the "preaching segment of our communities or in those delightful efforts of the Church to do social work and solve all the problems because it is the Church doing the job. Let's face it, aside from the men who attended, the Albany movement does not seem to have impressed many people. Aside from those of us who do urban church public relations work, most of the ADC families seem to be just as hungry as ever.

LET'S TAKE THE PLEDGE

Why not try something related to the points in our society where values are formative and decisions are made? Here is how I want to take the pledge from the sins (including my own) described above:

A. Let's put some urban church mission money into broad community organization and dialogue. From their initial encounter with urban problems let Presbyteries organize and participate in the dialogues that are desperately needed between industrialists and central city politicians; between militant urban leaders and the quiet but murderous organization man who objects to minority aggression. Let action pour from this if it will.

B. Let's be in politics up to our necks. We need mission staff personnel at urban presbytery levels who specialize in city hall power struggle analysis and action. This social action that reaches Presbytery in resolution form is as impotent and meaningless as last year's Easter eggs.

C. We desperately need staff at the state capitals for purpose of liaison on legislative issues and for "politicking" where we have real convictions.

D. More of the same is needed in Washington. (So it's a wild dream requiring a large staff! What economy do we find in a Church that continually acts on and affirms what it doen not even vaguely understand?)

E. We need to stop employing clergymen to do every kind of church work in the urban scene. If secular professionals in various areas will not work under church aegis it suggests to me that we don't really want what they have to offer. If we don't believe anyone else can do the job, well....

F. Finally, let's recognize that our failure since World War II to develop the church in the city is a failure not to be mitigated by the solace of our new knowledge about class and cultural differences or the spiritual power of those few who have found relief in the Gospel for the poor. Perhaps the mission of the Church today is not a return to the city but a transforming influence upon the city. Let's make the Word live before we build a house for it.

MINISTERS IN INDUSTRY

The PIIR program has been cut back to one Chicago term this year April 15 to May, because of the press of duties as Moderator on the Dean of the Institute. The Ministers in Industry program is scheduled May 31 to August 11 and the laymen's seminar is scheduled October 19-26 in Chicago.

GOVERNMENT HOUSING ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

From the beginning of the urban renewal program it was recognized that a major problem in making better housing available was the difficulty of obtaining mortgage financing for new or rehabilitated housing in deteriorating or deteriorated areas. To meet this problem the FHA Section 220 program was initiated in 1954.

Another problem confronting communities contemplating urban renewal activities was the relocation of displaced families into decent, safe, and sanitary housing, as required by Federal law. As a means of providing such housing, or supplementing relocation housing resources in a community, FHA Section 221 was also enacted in 1954 to provide special mortgage insurance for families whose income permitted the payment of economic rent. For those families whose income was below the economic rent level, preference for occupancy of public housing units was granted.

Since 1954, Congress has amended, expanded, and liberalized the housing assistance programs, most importantly in 1961, when a number of major new provisions were added. Of these, Section 221 (d) (3) appears to hold out greater promise for making low and middle-income rental housing available than any earlier enactment.

FHA PROGRAMS

Section 220 provides special mortgage insurance assistance in urban renewal areas. It may be used to assist in financing the rehabilitation and conservation of existing housing through the refinancing of an existing mortgage plus the cost of home improvements. It may also be used to assist in financing new sales or rental housing, on single or multi-family structures, in certified areas.

Before redevelopment, a 26-acre neighborhood in Florence, Alabama, called Handy Heights contained 86 substandard dwellings. All the families were low income, with more than two thirds receiving public assistance. Many could not afford to pay even public housing rents, let alone rents for standard private housing. Only 2 houses had indoor plumbing; there were no streets, gutters, or paving. About half the owner-occupied properties were worth between $1,500 and $2,500. Some ranged from $800 to $1,500; a few were valued as high as $3,500. Those renting were paying about $15. per month.

The urban renewal plan for the area called for the retention of a church and 16 homes. After replatting and subdividing, installation of gutters and sewers, and widening and paving of streets, a number of these homes were moved to new lots. With the money received from the sale of their property, many residents were able to pay for moving their homes within the project area and upgrading them. The local public agency provided guidance in do-it-yourself improvement.

In addition, 78 new single-family houses have been built. Each has 3 bedrooms, living room, kitchen, bath, storage room, and carport. These houses were sold under the FHA Section 220 program at prices ranging from $9,700 to $10,700. Not only were the purchasers able to buy better housing than was ever before available to them, but they also can enjoy neighborhood amenities not formerly present - a modern, new school, a recreational area, garbage collection, fire protection, and a bus line. Water, electricity, sewer, and gas are in each house.

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENT DISPLACEMENTS

Section 221 authorizes FHA to insure mortgages on new or rehabilitated housing for sale or rent to families displaced from urban renewal areas or by other governmental action causing displacement, such as the construction of schools, highways, or other public improvements. Mortgage insurance is available for new homes, and for the purchase and repair of existing homes, containing from 1 to 4 units. Down payments are $200 per dwelling unit for displaced families, which may include legal fees and other items contained in closing costs. Section 221 also provides liberal terms for the purchase of houses and the repair of housing by any low or moderate income family.

Low Interest Rate Housing - The Housing Act of 1961 created FHA Section 221(d)(3), a below-market (low interest rate) rental housing program for displaced families and other low and moderate income families. The mortgage financing for a new or rehabilitated rental housing project can bear an interest rate below the market rate and FHA can insure the mortgage with reduced insurance premiums or no premiums. These mortgages are available in communities having a Workable Program for Community Improvement certified by the HHFA Administrator, and may be obtained by nonprofit corporations, or associations, limited dividend corporations, and cooperatives.

The most dramatic growth in the use of a new FHA program has been in 221(d)(3). Since its initiation in 1961, applications for over 10,000 units have been filed. The reason for the popularity of this program is quite obvious when the savings in rentals are analyzed. Through the lower interest rate (currently 3-1/8%) and no-premium financing it provides, a typical apartment rents for about 20% less than if regular market-rate financing were used. In the case of an apartment costing $10,000 to produce, the rental under 221(d)(3) is $84.74, in contrast to $103.79 under normal financing practices.

In Atlanta, the Wheat Street Baptist Church (a Negro Church) has formed a nonprofit corporation known as Church Homes, and construction in the Butler Street urban renewal area has begun on 65 structures, containing 8 units each, to rent for $65 to $70 monthly. The garden-type project will contain 2 swimming pools, stoves and refrigerators are furnished. This will provide the first moderate-rental apartments built in downtown Atlanta in many years.

NON-PROFIT HOUSING

In Greensboro, North Carolina, the first private corporation in the country to build low-cost, non-profit private housing received its charter from FHA. The corporation plans to build 182 units of

Woodlawn Report

In April of 1959 the first Presbyterian Church of Chicago began discussion of a proposal to join with other churches and groups in the Woodlawn area of Chicago in a community organization and development project. In January of 1961 the Session of the Church requested support from the Department of Urban Church of the Presbytery for their involvement in the Woodlawn community organization project begun under the direction of the Industrial Areas Foundation at the request of the Woodlawn Pastors' Alliance. A special committee of the Department of Urban Church studied the proposal; upon their recommentation, the department approved a three year project to begin in June of 1961 and to be supported by a special grant from the Board of National Missions, the Department of Urban Church of the Presbytery of Chicago, and the resources of First Presbyterian Church.

After its first year of operation, the project was reviewed and evaluated at a consultation called by the Department of Urban Church. Upon the recommendation of the consultation, the department has reaffirmed the following goals and objectives of the First Presbyterian Church in their participation in the Woodlawn Organization:

1. The Church must evangelize in this kind of community in a way which is consistent with the dynamics of this urban situation, not only in the traditional individualistic way;
2. The Church must take the initiative in the development of this area so that adequate standards and values for community life are established and maintained;
3. The Church must avail itself of the opportunity for Roman Catholic and Protestant cooperation for community renewal;
4. The Church must support citizen participation in the planned redevelopment of a "disorganized" community;
5. The Church must support the development of independent and responsible Negro leadership in this urban Negro community;
6. There must be Protestant identification with legitimate Negro interest rather than with the traditional identification with exploitive forces;
7. This organizational work must attempt to become part of a larger strategy for the break-down of segregated patterns in the total Chicago Metropolitan area;
8. The whole Church, clergy, local lay people, youth, etc., must be involved in the work of solving some of the crucial problems of community life;
9. There must develop a strong enough organization to be able to adequately counteract the power of those interests which seek to continue to exploit segregated Negro neighborhoods.
10. As the Church participates in community life it must acknowledge its own guilt for present practices and accept its particular responsibility to create in the emerging new set of relationships a delicate balance between love and justice;
11. We have a positive responsibility to interpret correctly the full implications of our work within this community organization in order that greater public understanding may emerge.

The consultation affirmed the need for the Church to be involved in experiments in direct participation in community life and issues. As the urban society continues to undergo change and restructuring, the Church must be related to the change and restructuring in such a way as to make possible adequate value structures and structures of justice. Many of the responses to the changing society will of course be tentative and many times improper. It is, however, only as there is direct action and involvement (with proper evaluation and review) that the Church can learn how to minister responsibly and effectively to the city. The discussion which has developed concerning the appropriate role of the Church has served to clarify and identify many issues of significance both within the Church and in the society.

pocket which he dispensed to the younger children. The children would see him coming and go to meet him. Thus, contacts were established with the parents. The "Rodriguez Case Work Referral Service" operated more consistently on the playground benches than in his church study. Mothers with welfare problems, troubled youth, men with need for voter registration information, etc., were directed toward various agencies during these playground visits. Often the way was cleared by a phone call to the agencies by Mr. Rodriguez.

4. Youth Outreach – Most obviously the best evangelists among the teenagers were the teenagers themselves. Frequent dances were a point of contact between youth and clergy and other adults. The pattern of Sunday Evening Program developed by one of our seminary students was especially helpful. He usually began the program at 6:30 P.M. with the first arrivals. Various singing groups – quartets, trios, quintets, mambo bands, etc. would gather to sing in various rooms and various corners of our one larger room. Others would listen to records – a very few would dance. During the first hour the seminary student would work over program details for the evening meeting with those entrusted with the evening presentation. At about 8:00 P.M. the formal discussion began running until about 9:00 P.M. with most of the group. Toward 9:00 P.M. some would drift loose while those more interested and concerned would continue on, possibly even until 10:00 P.M. Those who drifted off from the discussion circle returned to the activities which they called "recreation." Then at 10:00 P.M. or later, there would be a closing worship service. This kind of flexible program provided "a place" for youth who wanted to gather; a feeding of the souls of those who were ready and able to be involved in serious discussion; an experience of worship for all. Many young people were funnelled into the membership and worship of the church through this program.

Reapportionment and the Churches

by Dan Little

The recent Supreme Court decision on reapportionment of state legislatures (Baker vs. Carr) has led many of us to respond in some such way as this: "Now that is settled. Things will work out more fairly."

A crucial step was taken in the Supreme Court decision, but rather than settling anything it only opened up many possibilities. These possibilities will not always exist in quite the way they do now, because anti-reapportionment forces are moving to limit the influence of the Supreme Court decision by Federal amendment and and by an unfair reapportionment process.

Among the possibilities which lie before urban areas are these:

1. The possibility of a basic public debate of the principles of state government: What is the purpose of state government, which we now can reshape? Such a debate has not been undertaken since the states were established.

2. The possibility of a basic discussion in state government of metropolitan issues. There is no such discussion now, because legislators cannot do anything about problems which are metropolitan in scope. Since there is not the opportunity for an effective coalition between representatives from the metropolitan areas, discussions now concern local neighborhood issues. Attention to metropolitan concerns could bring far greater suburban concern for the city.

3. The possibility of greater sensitivity to urban problems at all levels of government, as effective action concerning them becomes more and more likely. If reapportionment is equitably effected, governors will no longer be able to advance mock urban bills, which are sure to be defeated in the rurally weighted legislature. State government will have to wrestle more and more with urban problems as mayors find they do not have to run to Washington every time they want a sympathetic ear. Local city governments can be more effective and responsible as state-imposed restrictions on cooperatives, financial structure, administrative staff, urban renewal, etc. are removed.

The important thing to note is that these and other opportunities inherent in the reapportionment decision are not actualities now, nor automatically in the future. Furthermore, there is not an unlimited amount of time for urbanites to use their opportunities; new patterns will be shaped to the continued disadvantage of urban areas if several things do not happen:

(a) Full scale public debate and information concerning the problems and implications of reapportionment.

(b) Active participation by citizens in the political action necessary to bring off equitable reapportionment. It is particularly important that urban representatives now in office know that they have active, militant support out in the district.

Why address these thoughts to churches? Because churches can take responsible part in both (a) and (b) above, and can perform an important ministry in relation to this issue. The opportunity is before us as churches: a real, live, urgent, approachable, important issue, the implications of which relate directly to the concerns we have in our Christian mission in urban areas.

Most churches, denominations and councils of churches, however, will miss the opportunity entirely, because the national church machinery cannot operate on the local level, and the local church machinery is not related to local issues such as this. Beyond machinery, the church is ill-prepared psychologically to think (much less do something about) issues which have to do with other than private-residential or individual-personal concerns.

A sense of "golden opportunity" has to grip church forces if they are to overcome these handicaps. But for those with this sense of urgency, the first step is to get with as many other church forces as feel, or can be made to feel, this urgency. The next step is to define the issues as clearly as possible in terms of the concerns of the Christian mission. Some study on local education may be necessary here. Then legislative representatives and government officials will have to be approached in specific terms, so that a coordinated strategy can be worked out. If local representatives are not aware of the implications of reapportionment, then the churches will have to help educate them. On this issue church involvement can and must pass the workshop stage and get into specific local issues, as understood and affected by specific local politicians and citizens. Local denominational executives and councils of churches staff can do much to alert their constituencies to the opportunity which lies before them. Such an issue might provide a much sounder basis for relations between urban and suburban churches than the usual attempt at good intentioned helpfulness that now exists. In reapportionment, for once, there is a real issue that affects both urban and suburban groups.

The point is to begin debating and investigating and influencing the governmental processes, in relation to reapportionment. It has more to do with the future shape and life of our metropolitan areas than almost anything else about which the church may concern itself in the near future.

garden-type apartments in the Cumberland Redevelopment Project.

While churches and labor unions have organized similar corporations, this is the first instance of a group of private citizens forming one. Two whites and three Negroes, serving without compensation, make up the corporation's board of directors. The financing of the apartments will be under the terms of FHA Section 221(d)(3), and these apartments will rent for $57.50 a month for the 1-bedroom units and up to $75 a month for 3 bedrooms.

THE VANGUARD

. . . THE CHURCH IN HUMAN RELATIONS

Volume 10, Number 1 January, 1963

That the Church May Lead

19 Million Negroes -- Free True or False?

January 1, 1863, was the day of the Emancipation Proclamation by President Abraham Lincoln. A century has passed since then. As we look back over these one hundred years and try to see where we are in Negro-white relations in January, 1963, can we say, "Our 19 million Negro citizens are free"? Is the statement true or false? Should we celebrate or commiserate? The truth evidently lies somewhere between these two poles.

As a nation we got off to a fairly good start, race-relations-wise. We said it: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness. That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed" (The Declaration of Independence). But that sometimes angelic and sometimes diabolical instrument called political compromise soon slowed us down. The Constitution did not specify the elimination of slavery — you know there were slaves in Northern as well as Southern states in 1776. And so we trudged along the greater part of the first century of our national freedom with the shackles of human bondage upon Negroes — and the rest of us as well. Wasn't it Lincoln himself who said something to the effect that a nation cannot remain half slave and half free?

But as people began to take sides, some for freedom and some for bondage, and as each side became more rigid in refusing to yield, war was inevitable.

Historians, economists, and others are still trying to find clear and true answers as to why the Civil War was fought. Perhaps at the time of the second centennial we may be sufficiently removed from the war itself to be able to evaluate it less emotionally, with the result that we shall have a more factual and objective answer. We know the result of the war, however — the end of legal chattel slavery in the United States.

The Proclamation was later undergirded by three post Civil War amendments to the Constitution, the first of which — the Thirteenth Amendment — declared: "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Our Negro citizens are now legally free. But are they free indeed or are there chains other than those of slavery that rob them of their freedom? What progress has been made during the century now past?

Many Negroes are living in better homes than those of their parents and grandparents. A visit to Detroit, St. Louis, Chicago, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, and many other cities, with a tour through the better residential areas occupied by them — some for two or three decades — will reveal beyond the shadow of a doubt that there has been much progress since 1863.

I can recall that during my boyhood days there was a Negro settlement not far from my home. Many of the dwellings were mere shacks put together by unskilled hands and made out of shipping-box lumber. Many of the children who lived there at that time are now living in well-constructed and well-kept brick houses in other parts of the city, while the old shanties in which they lived as children have been torn down and replaced by respectable residences worthy of any middle-class American.

Other standards of living, including income and education, have risen to amazing heights when compared with what they were in 1863.

Negroes are now dignified as members of our armed forces as they put on military uniforms, no longer to be shunted to segregated units used largely to perform the more menial tasks and insulted by exclusion from the ranks of those who in wartime do the actual fighting. Our military forces are integrated.

Negroes have advanced since 1863 to positions of high honor in the professions, in music, education, science, sports, and in politics.

All of this great progress must, in the final analysis, be ascribed to the blessing of God. But He works at least in many instances through the instrumentality of human beings.

Much of the progress enjoyed by our Negro citizens is a direct result of advances made throughout our nation and resulting from an industrialized society; there are more things; there is more food; there are more houses; and all these are more easily attainable now than they were in 1863.

During the darkest days after the Civil War and until now there has been a hard core of white people, both in the North and in the South, who have been concerned about the Negroes' plight and have worked long and hard to help them in their total human need.

The church in many places concerned itself with the spiritual needs of Negroes, bringing to them the Word and the Sacraments, sending to them dedicated, self-sacrificing teachers and missionaries. — Among the Lutheran church bodies of this country, The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, through the Evangelical Lutheran Synodical Conference of which it is the largest constituent member, has carried on the most extensive church work among Negroes. Beginning in 1877, this work, originating in Arkansas, was extended to Louisiana, North Carolina, Alabama, and other states. At times the mission churches thus established had Christian day schools with enrollment in some individual schools running into the two or three hundreds.

In the 1940's, church bodies in the United States began to address themselves to the total needs of our Negro citizens. Since that time all major denominational groups have issued pronouncements setting forth the needs and the rights of Negroes in the church as well as in society in general and pointing out the challenge and the opportunity of the church and its people to establish an inclusive fellowship in the church and a society in which the dignity of Negroes as well as others is recognized, respected, and honored, so that they may enjoy the privileges and responsibilities of first-class citizens.

The Supreme Court in recent decades, with much scientific knowledge at their disposal which their predecessors in office did not have, and with the urgency forced upon them by the social and political revolution which began after World War I, began to hand down decision after decision clarifying the status of Negroes as full citizens of the United States with all the privileges and responsibilities pertaining to such citizenship.

There is hardly any aspect of life where the rights of citizens come into play which has not been spelled out by recent decisions of the Court. In fact, the Court has stated repeatedly that legal segregation is contrary to the Constitution of the United States. — In an amicus curiae brief recently submitted to the United States District Court for the Middle District of Georgia, Albany Division, the office of the Attorney General said: "The Supreme Court and the lower federal courts have repeatedly held that racial segregation in facilities operated by or under the control of the state (or its officials) is illegal under the United States Constitution and under federal law."

Negroes themselves, however, have under the blessing of God done more for their own advancement than all our white citizenry combined. Among the Negro greats whose names should be worthy of the honor of all of us are: Frederick Douglass, Booker T. Washington (though some would question his right to such honor), W. E. B. DuBois, George Washington Carver, James Weldon Johnson, Charles S. Johnson, Walter White, Marian Anderson, Martin Luther King, and a host of others.

Among organizations, besides the Negro churches which gave their members hope and a place to meet and to work for their own betterment, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the National Urban League are worthy of the admiration and thanks of whites and Negroes for what they did for Negro progress and hence for all of us during the past century.

As a result of the self-sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of Negro parents, their sons and daughters are pouring out of high schools and colleges with heads erect and singing "We shall overcome." They are challenging local discrimination that has its roots in illegal segregation. In dignity and restraint they are entering public places and private establishments licensed to serve the public. They are doing so with the full knowledge of the risks involved — the danger of physical violence and illegal incarceration.

Paula Snelling herself a Southerner, writes in The Progressive (Dec., 1962): "It is well for all Southern whites to realize that no important, no deep-rooted change could have come to the region (the South) without the Negroes' own recent non-violent and immensely brave protests."

The trend toward improved social and economic progress is good, and the progress already made is considerable and obvious.

But, Are Negroes Free?

A St. Louis school teacher made a trip abroad. In her book, Black America Abroad, she told of an experience she had in Switzerland at the ticket window of the railroad that took tourists into the mountains. The woman at the window was an American who refused to sell the tourist a ticket because she was a Negro American!

That incident might well be used as a symbol of the status of our Negro citizens 100 years after Emancipation. For they are not free. Wherever they go, especially in the United States, they can anticipate the possibility of being rejected because they are Negroes. They do not have free access everywhere to housing, no matter what their economic and social standards may be. They are not employed everywhere purely upon the basis of ability to do the job well. And, because of their racial identity, they stand in constant danger of police brutality in the North, the South, the East, and the West. In the South generally the courts of justice are less than impartial when a Negro stands before the bar.

All of these difficulties with which our Negro citizens are confronted daily involve more than a mere denial of certain physical needs or conveniences. They are the evidence of their rejection as persons. The subtle or overt discriminations practiced against Negroes are a conscious, or sub-conscious, endeavor to place them on a sub-human level. Until that demonic aspect of our society is eradicted, our Negro citizens, the 19 million of them, will not be free.

Sometimes Bitterness

Among the great boons that have come to our Negro citizens are better education and better income. But by virtue of the two, Negroes are more conscious of and sensitive to the discriminations practiced against them. They understand more fully the serious rejection involved in discrimination. They know it was bad enough not to have money to buy things and to go places. But now that they have more money so that they can buy and go, the feeling of rejection has become more intense because they cannot buy on the open market as others can buy — houses for example — because they cannot go where money will take others. Where? You name the places.

Is it difficult to understand, then, that there are Negro newspapers that exist and thrive because their one theme is the damnable discrimination inherent in racial segregation? Is it difficult to understand why one Negro member of the Valparaiso University faculty, though a theological seminary graduate, received his Ph.D. in the field of sociology and is now teaching, not religion, but sociology? And two of the few great American sociologists were Negroes. — E. Franklin Frazier and Charles S. Johnson. — Dr. Frazier's book, The Negro Family in the United States, has been used as a text in some of our best universities.

Since human nature is what it is, it should not be surprising that the minds of some of the best Negro writers produce bitter attacks on our entire social system — and upon the organized church. Two such writers are Richard Wright, the author of Black Boy, Native Son, and White Man Listen, and James Baldwin. For an example of the hopeless despair often found in the writings of such men, read White Man Listen, and a 20-thousand word article entitled, "Letter from a Region in my Mind," written by James Baldwin, appearing in the November 17, 1962, issue of The New Yorker.

When speaking of bitterness, though, one cannot bypass mentioning the Black Muslims, a Negro cult flourishing at the beginning of the second century of Negro "freedom."

It is good, however, that the writers of bitterness have written; and one must assume that the existence of that most bitter group, the Black Muslims, is an instrument of God's correcting judgment upon us. For both the bitter writers and the bitter Muslims are saying much that is true — ugly truth in all its ugly nakedness. When reading, the honest, knowledgeable person cannot but say, "It's only too true."

Blessed is he who, when reading, turns to God in repentance and prays that, by the new life that God gives us in Christ, he will lay aside his own discriminations and prejudice so that he might become the instrument of the Spirit of God working relentlessly for the physical, social, and spiritual well-being of all and especially of those whose freedom was guaranteed by the Emancipation Proclamation but largely denied them, lo, these many years.

Silver Lining

There is ample evidence that there are many Johnny-come-lately people. Seeing the danger to the institution, whether it be their business, school, ward, city, party or their congregation or denomination — and, incidentally, danger to themselves also — they suddenly jump on the bandwagon and cry, "Me too." From the Christian perspective this represents no real progress, especially when the change-over from racial discrimination to non-discrimination has to do with the church, either on a congregational or denominational level. For when the principle of what is moral, right, and pleasing to God has been by-passed, and for the purpose of saving something that one wants to save it suddenly becomes expedient that discrimination is laid aside, that's no real progress. Even as it may be expedient today, for the institution's sake, to lay aside discrimination, it may be expedient tomorrow or the day after or next year or the year after next once again to discriminate. — And the last state of that man will be worse than the first.

Whatever the motive may be in the kingdom of the left hand (using Luther's terminology) that is, in secular society, one should welcome the elimination of discrimination; in a sense, that's progress. But real progress in the spiritual realm is possible only where there is true repentance followed by the determination to "go and sin no more," to conform to the word and the will of God. — And there is evidence within the church of such repentance and progress.

One example comes to mind at this writing. The church had grown and prospered. It was strong financially and numerically. A cathedral-like house of worship was constructed. After a time the community began to change; Negroes began moving in as whites moved out. For years the congregation and the pastor did nothing. Then, after many of the congregation had moved out of the community and the financial as well as the numerical strength of the congregation had been reduced to a dangerously low level, God gave to the pastor of the church an experience that opened his eyes. In sincere repentance toward God, and acknowledged before men, the pastor began to lead the flock that still remained under his pastoral care on the same road that he had been led by the Spirit. With two walls of prejudice to be battered down — the one in the minds of his members and the other in the minds of the newcomers to the community — the pastor began to work with unrelenting zeal to witness to the Lord Jesus Christ to the people of his community and to lead his congregation toward a colorblind future. Praise God for every example of that kind. That's real progress. To help implement that kind of progress is one of the goals of The VANGUARD.

This writer believes himself to be qualified, because of many years of experience, much travel that takes him to every section of our nation, and an endless stream of correspondence, to say that, under God, the greatest hope for progress in race relations in the church is to be found in the younger ministers. There is a very noticeable and articulate concern on the part of many of them. And their concern is theological, that is, the Word of God as it relates to race relations is their concern. They are becoming more and more impatient with saving the institution — with its emphasis on dollars and numbers strength only — for the institution's sake. They are more and more raising their eyebrows as they see the institution mushrooming in the racially-exclusive, sprawling suburbs to where it has fled in fear with its fearful people, abandoning the thousands upon thousands in the city who so desperately need the witness of Christian strength and acceptance.

These "angry" young ministers, both pastors and theologians, are found in many of the major denominations. The present writer has had ample opportunity to come into contact with and to understand this common concern for a faithful witness to Christ in the area of race relations cutting across all denominational lines and incidentally giving further hope to true Christian ecumenicity in the future.

It is possible that the following is an expression of bias recognized easily by non-Lutherans and just as easily participated in by Lutherans. It is offered to our readers for what it may be worth.

We have observed that many of the Protestant clergy, though they are committed to addressing themselves to the race issue with its many-faceted implications of the gospel, are often weak in defining the gospel itself, centered in the grace of God, forgiveness through the substitutionary atonement of Jesus Christ, and the new life that that we have in God through Him. These good men, who by virtue of their calling and deep personal commitment, find relevance between accepting people in their total selves and the church's profession of Christ, either take the gospel for granted or have such a vague understanding of what it is as to fail to speak it so that even the unlearned will know just what the gospel, grace, forgiveness, and the new life in Christ are. Lutheran ministers, with a clearly defined message of sin and grace, who are equally clear as to the implications of the gospel for all of life and are committed to a faithful witness to Christ in the area of race relations, have a unique opportunity and an urgent responsibility to help bring the church into the vanguard in human relations as we enter the second century after emancipation. We have no guarantee from God that the century now begun will be rounded out. Now is the time!

OTHER CENTENNIAL NOTES

I.

According to a United Press release, as the Emancipation Proclamation reached its 100th milestone, January 1, the President of the United States "called on all sections of the nation to hold special commemorative ceremonies."

II.

According to present plans, the fourteenth Annual Valparaiso University Institute on Human Relations, scheduled for July 5-7 of this centennial year, will highlight the Centennial. The program committee is at work trying to secure the best possible essayists and speakers. As soon as possible, VANGUARD readers will be given further information concerning this important institute program.

III.

As a significant observance of the Emancipation Proclamation Centennial, an important, perhaps historic, conference is to be held: The National Conference on Religion and Race, at the Edgewater Beach Hotel in Chicago, January 14-17. By the time this issue of The VANGUARD reaches our readers, the conference will no doubt have been concluded. The VANGUARD intends to report in detail on the conference in the February issue.

In the meantime, though, a few introductory words about the conference.

The convenors are the Department of Racial and Cultural Relations of the National Council of Churches; the Social Action Commission of the Synagogue Council of America; the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference.

All major religious bodies and religious organizations specifically concerned with race relations have been invited. The committee has been making preparations for at least a year. Some 800 invited delegates are expected to attend. The National Lutheran Council is sending about twenty delegates. The Lutheran Human Relations Association of America will have four delegates in attendance and will take advantage of the opportunity to display, distribute, or sell some of its literature.

There are certain basic moral and ethical principles involved in race relations which the several religious bodies in the United States hold in common. According to the understanding of this writer, the conference is an attempt to gain a greater degree of cooperation from among the various groups for the elimination of the evils of racial discrimination, a legitimate concern of all.

Another hoped-for result of the conference is to focus the attention of the entire nation on the urgency of a religious conviction to a commitment for the eradication of racism. It is also quite probable that the Federal Government in all three of its branches as well as many state and local governments will either give up an attitude of bypassing the issue, or take courage, if they are already working on the elimination of the evil, to work at it with greater vigor and determination, because of the moral support that the conference will give them.

For Lutherans to participate in such an undertaking means to live dangerously. One cannot be blind to the fact that there may be an effort or a tendency on the part of some to make the moral issue involved the all-inclusive purpose of religion and to reduce everything to the least common denominator as far as faith and confession are concerned. On the other hand, not to work together with those with whom we can work in the interest of justice for all would be bypassing both the opportunity afforded and the responsibility incumbent upon all Christian citizens to work together for the common good, especially for those who by an evil and heartless society "are appointed to destruction." The conference could indeed offer an opportunity in a big way to "plead the cause of the poor and needy" (Prov. 31:8-9).

IV.

One may anticipate the publication of much reading material dealing with the Centennial of the Emancipation Proclamation. There are at this time two such publications which we have read that may be of some interest to VANGUARD readers.

EPIPHANY VISITATION

As we came into the living room we were impressed with the over-all atmosphere of good taste and arrangement. It was not luxurious but it was better than average. It was well kept and it gave a sense of warmth and welcome. The people who met us at the door were intelligent, cultured, and gracious. The children in the home were well-mannered and obedient without giving the impression that they were so for the occasion. Had I been calling in any one of the parishes I have served in twenty-four years of pastoral ministry, this home with its outward appearance and appointments and occupants would have been among the best. This I say without qualification. However, the reason I was impressed, and my wife especially so, was because these people in the home were Negroes. The other two ladies along with us were likewise impressed with the home, the family, and the visit.

All of this was a part of a special visitation in Chicago sponsored by the Friendship House, Catholic lay organizations, United American Hebrew congregations, and the Chicago Church Federation. Our Lutheran churches were invited to take part as well in providing visitors and also Negro homes to visit. It just happened that the family we visited were Lutherans (LCA). Their congregation had about six Negro families that volunteered to open their homes for the visitation. Since this is being written on the Monday following the day of visitation, January 6, it is not possible at the moment to give the total number of Lutherans who took part. Over-all figures available show that approximately 500 Negro homes were open to 2,500 visitors.

In "A Guide for Visitors" it was stated that the need for such a special visitation is due to "the isolation of man because of race." Because of such isolation, this mass visitation was planned in order to set the stage "for open and frank discussion on racial issues." The setting for this discussion was the home of a Negro family. The visitors were "encouraged to bring up questions on your mind — or perhaps questions others have put to you." It was pointed out that although the Negro cannot possibly speak for all, he and his family can give "personal insights, feelings, and ideas, his own and others' experiences and offer his suggestions."

Mrs. Halvorson and I went to St. Thaddeus Catholic Mission at 2:00 p.m. on the afternoon of January 6. There were eight different meeting places throughout the city where people were assigned to the homes to be visited. We were pleasantly surprised to see so many people. "By actual count I estimate" about 240 visitors were there. We were sent out to various Negro homes in groups of four or five. Two ladies sitting next to us were sent along with us to the home assigned. It was but a short drive to the fine home I described at the beginning.

Mr. W., our host, is an official in the Social Security Administration offices here in Chicago. He and his wife and family moved here from Ohio about fifteen years ago. From the start they knew of the restrictions placed upon them in the field of housing. The area they now live in is primarily Negro — the Negro who can afford the better homes. He said that in their precinct with about 900 families there were only four now out of work. Mr. W. is a community leader — now a past president of one of the local congregations. He was one of several who took his children to white schools to protest segregation. He told of how this was the first time his children had been introduced to adult white prejudice against them. It all came as a real surprise to them and, to begin with, made for a disturbing disillusionment. But now he says they have come to understand the simple fact of prejudice and are learning to live with it.

In speaking of the church in relation to racial problems, Mr. W. lamented the fact that there is so much indifference and lack of concern. Where the Christians ought to be taking the lead in these matters, they rather turn out to be reluctant followers. His viewpoint is surely understandable and we realize that there is little that he and other Negroes can do about it. We who are "white" must be the ones within the church and community who are to be expected to take up the mantle of freedom. If we do not do so as Christian citizens, what can we expect of those who are not Christian in their attitudes to other people?

In looking back on this visit in a Negro home, I must say that it is so wrong of us to have our negative images of the Negro as such. They have different classes among them just as we do. The ones we saw do not like to be judged by the worst among them any more than we do. It is simply not fair for us as whites to persist in this negative image which we so unthinkingly attach to "Negroes." The "whites" are not nearly as good as we think nor the "Negroes" as bad. Many among them are as intelligent and as "good" as any to be found among the whites.

It would be an excellent project for the churches and synagogues of our city to sponsor such a visitation program as this. The total effort of all religious groups would, I believe, amount to more than the individual efforts of single church denominations. This is one place where we can cooperate with other religious groups in seeking to promote the understanding and good will which the Negroes have a right to expect of the truly American community. Christian citizens can do no less than seek every possible means of attaining such an objective.

Fisk University. It describes the ideologies of the great Negro leaders and how they helped to shape Negro thought and action in the interest of complete emancipation. Although less known personages are treated in the book, the main persons whose thought and life are detailed are Frederick Douglass, Booker T. Washington, and W. E. B. DuBois, for it was these three who were the greatest Negro spokesmen and whose theories were often in deadly conflict. The book is written in a popular vein and can help toward a better understanding of what went into the development of the body politic which resulted in the degree of progress gained by our Negro citizens since emancipation.

The book of 276 pages was published in 1962 by Dodd, Mead & Company. Price: $3.50.

The December issue of The PROGRESSIVE is devoted entirely to the centennial of the Emancipation Proclamation. This issue is a handy source of information on all phases of the historic development between 1863 and 1963. It furnishes authentic material on many phases of the whole question of Negro-white relationships at the present time. The magazine is to be congratulated on securing articles from interesting writers, leading authorities in the field of race relations. Among the contributors are Adlai Stevenson, Lillian Smith, James Baldwin, James McBride Dabbs, Martin Luther King, Jr., C. Vann Woodward, and C. Eric Lincoln. It will be well worth fifty cents for you to secure a copy of this important December issue of The PROGRESSIVE. The address is: Madison, Wisconsin.

As space permits, The VANGUARD will bring to the attention of its readers other worthwhile books or articles dealing with the Emancipation Centennial.

A LOOK AROUND

BY MARTIN H. SCHARLEMANN

1. A SEVENTEEN-FOOTER

T. V. Smith, once professor at the University of Chicago and later a Congressman from that area, used to say of Lincoln that he was a "starveling of fate who forgot himself into immortality." Lincoln was a man who did great things rather casually. He was big enough not to be concerned with the matter of getting proper credit.

A hundred years ago he prepared an emancipation proclamation — without benefit of a staff of professionals! He introduced it without fanfare to his cabinet, like a man who had long before thought through the moral issue of the War Between the States. At first it was a question of preserving the Union. This is what made secession a question to which he had to address himself under the Constitution. But long before that, in his debates with Douglas, for example, he had come to see the moral dimensions of the issue.

Some months after the Emancipation Proclamation had been signed, a reporter is said to have asked an Iowa farmer how Lincoln stood in his state. "He stands high," the farmer replied. "He stands seventeen feet higher than any other man in the United States." The century that has passed since the Proclamation was issued has in no way detracted from the stature of Lincoln. In fact, the size of his moral grandeur has increased just in these last few years, during which the Negro is beginning to enjoy some of the rights that no one ever had a right to deny him in the first place.

2. THE LOT OF SUFFERING

During the hundred years since the Proclamation of Emancipation was issued, Negroes have continued to suffer much. This is not the place to engage in criticism and recrimination. It may, in fact, be more constructive to reflect on suffering as part of a Christian's experience. Those individuals in our minority groups that had the benefit of a strong Christian faith did not forget that Christ once suffered not for the purpose of helping us to escape suffering but to show us how our suffering might be like his — redemptive, liberating! This did not dull their understanding of injustice; it sharpened their sensitivity by making them more fully aware of the fact that God did not create man to be the victim of another man's pride and greed. But their faith kept them from becoming bitter. In fact, they rejoiced at times to be counted worthy of suffering.

It is in this kind of context that we must understand and learn to appreciate the significance of the Incarnation. For in that event God Himself became part of the human situation, exposing Himself to the selfishness and callousness of men; and when these had done their worst, God raised Him from the dead. By emptying Himself, our Lord intended to create that kind of community where men, in imitation of their Lord, would be willing to put themselves at the mercy of men, offering their gifts and services without wanting to control or to take credit or to receive thanks. For that is the heart of redemptive suffering.

3. REVOLUTIONARY

During this anniversary year of the Proclamation, it may be well to remind ourselves of the revolutionary nature of the gospel. When, at Vespers, we sing the Magnificat, which reads in part: "He hath put down the mighty from their seats; He hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts," we are not just mouthing pious words. The Biblical record is full of the evidence that God works just in this way. It may be argued, therefore, that the early church should have been more vigorous in her criticism of the institution of slavery as it was practiced in the Roman Empire. She should have agitated for a revolt, on the order of Spartacus.

But we must recall that the church works with a long future, despite her awareness that the end is near. And so the revolution she accomplished in human relations during the first centuries of her history has had a lasting effect. She was determined to treat slaves as people and not as chattel. She invited slaves and masters to the Lord's Table on an equal footing. She reminded masters that they, too, had a Master — in heaven! And she opened all the offices of the church to slave and free alike.

All this helped to change the course of history in the Western world. It tempered cold justice not only with equity but with clarity; and in the West the individual began to be treated on the basis of the doctrine of creation and of redemption. Life has not been the same since. Lincoln's moral sensitivity was a secular echo to this Christion concern. Without the church and her history there would not have been an echo. Nothing really revolutionary would have occurred through the centuries; and the emancipation of slaves might not even have suggested itself.

Ambassador to Finland

While engaged in proof-reading this issue of The VANGUARD, we heard the news broadcast: Carl Rowan has been appointed Ambassador to Finland.

To the best of our knowledge, Mr. Rowan is the first Negro ever to be named Ambassador to a European country. This news should be doubly interesting to Lutherans, since Finland is more than ninety per cent Lutheran.

Mr. Rowan is a long-time, close friend of Mr. Richard K. Fox, Jr., a deputy in the Personnel Division of the Department of State and a member of the Board of Directors of the Lutheran Human Relations Association of America. Wouldn't it be an interesting development if the newly appointed Ambassador, in the interest of even closer friendly relations between the United States and Finland, would personally welcome those participating in the interracial Good Will Tour mentioned on page 4? The office of LHRAA will work on it.

Religion and Race Meeting

From the 650 persons, representing some 68 religious bodies, who took part January 14-17 in the epoch-making First National Conference on Religion and Race, held at the Edgewater Beach Hotel in Chicago, there was one general comment: We never before had anything like it in this country. Never before, on a national scale, have most of the major religious bodies of the United States—including the Greek Orthodox, in the gracious person of its Archbishop Germanos—united thus to perform a single task. This task was to implement the moral principles handed down to both Jews and Christians for the brotherhood of man, and thereby effectively combat the monstrous evil of racism. Incidentally, some twenty-five Catholic bishops attended the conference, and a large number of Catholic bishops sent personal representatives. I almost said, "never before in this country was there such a gathering of all outstanding religious bodies," but this would omit the impressive and unique World Congress of Religions which took place in 1893 at the Chicago World's Fair, and was honored by a special message from Pope Leo XIII and by the presence of many of our nation's most distinguished prelates.

The 1893 Conference, however, concentrated upon no single outstanding problem, as did this event 70 years later, and was unsuspecting of later tragic national developments.

First proposed in August, 1960, at a directors' meeting in Chicago of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice (an outgrowth of the series of Catholic Interracial Councils across the country first begun in New York City in 1934), the National Conference on Religion and Race was set up in view of the current centennial celebration of President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation of January 1, 1863. Though initiated without reference to the Second Vatican Council, the Conference's astonishingly open spirit reflected to a notable degree the Council's attitude.

Cardinal Meyer, Archbishop of Chicago, who took part in all the proceedings, called the race issue the "nation's unfinished business," and said that "our whole future as a nation and as a religious people may be determined by what we do about the race problem in the next few years."

Rabbi Julius Mark, president of the Synagogue Council of America, said the conference was an effort "to impress the entire American people with the urgent necessity of translating into daily practice the noble concepts of human equality" proclaimed by religion. And Dr. J. Irwin Miller, president of the National Council of Churches, asserted that "this nation cannot continue to preach to the whole world . . . the brotherhood of man and equal opportunity" while at the same time denying these things "whenever it is convenient and pleasing to the majority to do so." As pointed out by the Most Rev. Paul J. Hallinan, Archbishop of Atlanta, who took the chairmanship of an important meeting (as did Archbishop Cousins of Milwaukee and Archbishop Cody of New Orleans): "Freedom is a human right and a moral condition. When it is diminished in any place, it is reduced everywhere."

If any doubt lingered as to the urgency of the racial problem in our nation, it was certainly dissipated by the stirring words of speakers like Dr. Franklin H. Littell, professor of church history, Chicago Theological Seminary; or R. Sargent Shriver, director of the Peace Corps, who laid out a series of highly practical proposals; or the prophetic apostle of nonviolence, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. These and all other addresses will be issued this March in book form.

First and foremost, this national conference inspired its participants to a definite commitment of conscience, as expressed in its magnificent concluding declaration. Furthermore, it adopted plans for continuance, together with a concrete plan of action for specified regions and situations. Its aim above all was positive—to release the potential of millions of our fellow citizens for the defense, the welfare and the upbuilding of our nation. It is only sober truth to call it a turning point in our nation's history.

Time magazine (January 25) sneeringly quotes remarks of certain skeptical conference participants. But compromises shown by religious people, past and present, give no excuse to mock the efforts of those who today are determined to reverse the painful record.

The New Negro and the Church

Religion
Christian
Century 2/6/63

Negroes are tired of bruising their knuckles on doors which white America refuses to open.

GAYRAUD S. WILMORE, JR.

✦ THE SPIRITUAL unity of the church as the Body of Christ should not be permitted to obscure the sociological fact that in the United States there is a white church and a Negro church—with very little communication between them. There are some 12 million Negro Protestants and over 600,000 Negro Roman Catholics in the nation. Of the Protestants, 10 million hold membership in five denominations: the National Baptist Convention, U. S. A., Inc.; the National Baptist Convention of America; the African Methodist Episcopal Church; the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; and the Christian (formerly Colored) Methodist Episcopal Church. These, plus several smaller all-Negro denominations, pretty much constitute Negro Protestantism in the United States today. Less than 5 per cent of the nation's Negro Protestants are affiliated with predominantly white denominations.

Ghettoized Institutions

Despite their similarity to the typical American religious body and despite class differences within the Negro community, Negro churches are of a kind. That is, all of them are institutions of the Negro ghetto. Even the majority of the all-Negro congregations within white denominations have a style of Christian life that is freighted with memory of the religious traditions of a rural southern past. Regardless of the degree of his secularization and urbanization, the Negro has links with old homesteads and old friends, old hurts and old bitternesses which are continually being reforged by migrations from the south, the intermixing of family lines, and a common background and life-experience.

Much more so than the typical white urban church, the proud and substantial Negro churches have preserved the relatively unsophisticated American Protestantism of the 19th and early 20th century. I refer not to the biblicism and emotionalism of evangelical Protestantism—though both are present in many Negro congregations—but rather to the ethical revivalism of the latter part of the 19th century and the social gospel reformism which came later. The Negro churches have changed but little; what is different about them today is a new sense of power in the war against racial discrimination.

Gayraud S. Wilmore, Jr., is associate professor of social ethics at Pittsburgh Theological Seminary (Presbyterian).

No man is more responsible for the Negro church's new spirit of resistance than Martin Luther King, Jr.; nevertheless King is in reality a symbol of an ethos that has been coming to maturity in the Negro Christian community since New Deal days. The Albany Movement, the unseating of Detroit's mayor in 1961, the boycotts led by the Negro clergy of Philadelphia against the oil companies, the community organization movements spurred by Negro churches in Chicago and Los Angeles—all these are examples of what King has called the "new Negro" working for first class citizenship through the church. It is no accident that the new Negro has chosen the strongest and most familiar institution in his community to be the vanguard of this struggle. But it is also true that the Negro church has long been rich in the theological and ethical resources needed to undergird such a crusade.

Who is this new Negro and what does he want from the church? In Stride Toward Freedom King declares that the new Negro is a man who has acquired a sense of self-respect. "This growing self-respect," he writes, "has inspired the Negro with a new determination to struggle and sacrifice until first class citizenship becomes a reality . . . one can never understand the bus protest in Montgomery without understanding that there is a new Negro in the South, with a new sense of dignity and destiny."

Wanted: Prestige and Power

The new Negro is not always a churchman, in the usual sense of that term. He may be, but he may also be a college student in Greensboro, Nashville or Amherst who dislikes gospel songs and spirituals because they remind him of "jack-leg" preachers and the degradation of the Negro. He may be a member of the Congress of Racial Equality or the Fellowship of Reconciliation who long ago wrote off the church as a reactionary, war-mongering anachronism. He may be an attorney on the staff of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People who goes to church only because his pastor is an N.A.A.C.P. chapter president or because he needs names on a petition in a school desegregation case. He may be an agnostic writer living in New York city, or a Pittsburgh laborer who works too hard during the week or spends too many hours in bars on Saturday night to get up on Sunday morning. The church-led desegregation movement has many fellow travelers. But even the new Negro who is a loyal churchman may not always be convinced that nonviolent resistance is the only Christian response to injustice; very likely he smiles to himself when Martin Luther King endorses the view that the Bible verse " 'Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord' might well be the motto of the Montgomery Improvement Association."

The close association of the new, self-respecting Negro with the church in the struggle for first class citizenship does not mean that we are witnessing a wholesale reconversion to Christianity—at least, not to Christianity as the white man understands it. It does mean that we are witnessing the emergence of a Negro church which is seeking alliances with thousands of "new" Negroes who have long wanted something from the church they have not heretofore been able to get—leadership and, in the broadest sense, political power. Not that these new Negroes want a church without religion or a religion without the God of the Bible (although such a desire would make them no different from many white Americans). Rather, they want a church which has divested itself of moralistic complacency about the status quo and become a revolutionary force revealing the true religious significance of human life in a world where naked power is rampant.

Increasing Estrangement

The "new Negro" movement includes not only the great mass of underprivileged Negroes but also the growing Negro middle class and intelligentsia. It is the latter two groups which are most alienated from organized Christianity, in large part because of the unsavory image of a racially segregated Protestant church—an image especially offensive to younger Negroes. Negro congregations in the predominantly white denominations—Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopal, Disciples—have not been able to counteract the influence of that image by virtue of being a part of those denominations. According to a recent report, only 28 Negroes in the United Presbyterian Church—which has well over 55,000 Negro members—are currently preparing for the ministry. Of this number all but seven are enrolled at Johnson C. Smith, a Negro seminary in the south. Such is the situation in a presumably integrated denomination.

But for many Negro intellectuals an even more serious indictment of the church than segregation in pew and pulpit is what seems to them to be white Christians' timid acquiescence to, if not active participation in, discriminatory patterns of social and economic life in America and elsewhere. This is not only the primary reason for the black intellectual's growing tendency to reject Christianity; it is also the cause of the increasing estrangement of the whole Negro Christian community from the white Christian community. If the white Protestant church does not more speedily enter the struggle in which the Negro is engaged, the psychological and ideological distance between the two communities may become so great as to prevent authentic integration for years after the merely spatial distance has been closed.

This observation has no relation to the current fashion of holding the ax of black racism over the heads of white moderates and gradualists. It is unlikely that large numbers of what the late E. Franklin Frazier called "the black bourgeoisie" will rally to the cause of Malcolm X, Isaiah Poole and others calling for voluntary segregation on Negro terms. Nevertheless—and despite the denunciation of the Black Muslim movement by numbers of Negro clergymen—it is doubtful that middle class Negroes will expend much energy in opposing this antiassimilationist movement.

Though the new Negro may temper his frustration by joining a protest movement, the source of that frustration remains. The Negro's full integration into American society is still remote, and with every small advance in one area there seems to be a retreat in another—whether because of indifference in his own ranks, structural impediments, or his opponents' employment of new and more subtle forms of resistance.

In the nine years since the Supreme Court decision, desegregation—and only token desegregation at that—has been achieved in less than half of the south's school districts; the prediction of Guy B. Johnson of the University of North Carolina that it will take 25 years for the court's decision to be implemented may well prove correct. Crisis, the magazine of the N.A.A.C.P., reported last May that at least five Negroes have been killed in the south and a number of others "shot, beaten, jailed and humiliated" as a result of attempts to register and vote. Housing and education facilities for Negroes are still a scandal in the great cities of the north. Staughton Lynd, writing in the Nation for July 28, 1962, notes that the unemployment rate among Negroes is roughly two and a half times that among whites. He compares the American economy "to a train in which the Negro is the caboose"—with "the number of cars between the caboose and the engine . . . constantly [being] increased."

A Cynical Refrain

The fact is that the white community's continued rejection of the Negro makes the most spirited Negro crusader feel like a displaced person. He is no less frustrated than those among the Negro masses who give way to apathy and resignation. "New" Negroes may not overtly support the pseudo-Muslim and black racist groups, but many are ready to take what they can of the material fruits of desegregation while spurning cultural and religious integration. In Negro middle class circles one hears the cynical refrain: "The only thing we want from Mr. Charley is his money."

It is rapidly becoming a simple matter of self-respect for the Negro to refuse to bruise his knuckles perpetually on doors that white America refuses to open. This is an intolerable state of affairs for the Protestant churches, which for about a decade have been beating drums for a "nonsegregated church in a nonsegregated society." But it is nonetheless just such a state of affairs that the church faces in large sectors of the Negro community. In almost every major northern city some progress has been made toward a "nonsegregated church"—and stoical white congregations continue to be confronted with what amounts to "kneel-ins." Yet in terms of relevancy to the total problem, it is doubtful that congregational desegregation should have highest priority in the strategy of Protestant Christians.

The new Negro believes that desegregation of individual congregations will be of little consequence for the Negro and for the spiritual vitality of the society. To the extent that congregational life continues to revolve around platitudinous preaching, tired ritual and bland fellowship, racial integration in American Protestant churches will be irrelevant. Indeed, it might obscure the basic needs of both the Negro community as an alienated and exploited minority and the church as the agency through which God can address, judge and bless modern man in his life-situations.

Altering the Image

More important today than token desegregation of individual congregations is the kind of image that the Protestant church presents to the American Negro community and to the other colored peoples of the world. That image must of course communicate something about the openness, if not the de facto inclusiveness, of the church in regard to social integration and fellowship. But more than this, the church's image will have to challenge the new Negro's impression of the white Protestant as at best a condescending, paternalistic gradualist and at worst a vicious wielder of power who in the south opens White Citizens Council meetings with prayer and who in the north champions conservative Republicanism. In short, the image Protestantism must somehow convey to the new Negro is that of a revolutionary force committed to distinguishing and separating the Christian understanding of life from the idealizations and norms of middle class white society. This is what the new Negro wants from the church.

I do not wish to imply that the new Negro does not hanker after material blessings and social prestige. The Negro migrants to Atlanta, Washington, D.C., New York or Detroit, and even more certainly their children who will graduate from Morehouse, Howard, New York University and Wayne, are just as eager for a split-level suburban home and a foreign-made car as the next American. Indeed, many of them will have to experience the vacuity of suburbia and its prestige churches before being able to think of themselves as people who "have it made." But for many this is a social and personal, not a political and corporate, aspiration. To want Mr. Charley's money is to want his real estate and automobiles, but more than that it is to covet the power, dignity and self-determination which—or so our society has taught us—money buys.

These assets have largely been denied to Negroes, and there is no reason to assume that they will be bestowed upon them by white people. This sober realization, coupled with knowledge of what it means to be black in America and excitement over what is happening in Africa, has given to the Negro a sense of solidarity more potent than the drive for personal aggrandizement. And the potentiality of the Negro community is evidenced every day by expressions of penitence among relatively well situated Negroes who used to play golf while their slum-dwelling brothers demonstrated against rent-gouging and police brutality.

While the Negro's yearnings for material goods and the symbols of affluence will persist, they will not mitigate the growing sense of social and political solidarity with black people throughout the world. The real heroes of the American Negro in 1963 are not the Ralph Bunches and the Willie Mayses—though they are justly admired still—but the Martin Luther Kings, the Tom Mboyas and the Kwame Nkrumahs.

Whether the predominantly white Protestant churches can capture the imagination and loyalty of the new Negro may depend on whether a counterpart movement can arise within those churches—that is to say, whether that part of the white Protestant intelligentsia which has become disenchanted with middle class complacency and moralism can marshal sufficient resistance to the old ways to change the image of white Christianity. In the student Christian movement, in lay academies and renewal groups, among missionaries, staff members of inner city churches and some of the younger clergy, there are signs which suggest that a new kind of white Protestant is no more unthinkable than a new kind of Negro Protestant.

Building upon the Rubble

If a rapprochement develops between the revolutionary Negro laity and the white Protestant laity in the next few years, it will not be because the ranks have closed to protect America from communism, or because "creeping desegregation" has finally caught up with both white and Negro churches, or because through sharing white neighborhoods, schools and churches Negroes have become "acceptable" to whites. It will develop because Christian brotherhood in America has come to mean a relationship which seeks to build upon the rubble of an irrelevant spirituality a new barrier against the tragic disillusionments of a post-Christian age, and because white Protestants have finally realized the truth of Richard Wright's affirmation that "the ties that bind us are deeper than those that separate us." ("Look at us and know us and you will know yourselves, for we are you, looking back at you from the dark mirror of our lives.") Christian brotherhood will then mean something profoundly human and incisively political; it will mean standing with and for one another in the exasperating and bewildering realities of secular life. This is what the new Negro—and many "new" white Christians —want from the church.

MOBILIZING THE AMERICAN CONSCIENCE

Special report on the National Conference on Religion and Race.

BY DENNIS CLARK

MANY a good soul was rocked at the Edgewater Beach Hotel in Chicago on the days of January 14 to 17 as the first National Conference on Religion and Race brought together 800 people from all parts of the country. For some, the rocking of the soul amid the sonorous oratory was a swing of harmony and a rhythm of common effort. For others the rocking prompted a hard pitch and tumble that could bring some discomfort. The conference was convened by three religious groups: the National Catholic Welfare Conference, the National Council of Churches, and the Synagogue Council of America.

It was a driving attempt to match religious courage to religious conscience. It was an effort to pit theism against racism in the mind of the nation.

EVERYBODY from Bobby Kennedy to the brooding James Baldwin has slapped at religious leadership for its inability to shatter the voodoo of racial witchcraft in this country. As waves of enthusiasm moved the crowded conference sessions, souls were moved to a new struggle with this task. There was one breath-taking instant when a speaker shook the constructive cadence of things with a withering judgment that it was too late. The initiative has passed beyond the control of religious men, he said, and the remarks struck home, because they thrust forward a secret fear with which praying men have long lived. The conference delegates paused, and then moved on to a drama of moral affirmation that left any doubts stone dead.

As the delegates moved through the patiently developed sessions analyzing religious work for interracial justice, it became clear that for the first time in this country there is a religious consensus about race relations that is achieving broad practical gains. The stiffness is fading as the workers toil in the vineyard.

This is the first time this kind of consensus ever really moved in the land. In the early part of the last century there was a consensus among religions about race—a consensus of indifference. Then came the wracking spasms of racial heresy, biblical distortion, sectional estrangement and moody hypocrisy. Now, the religious men have come to know one another and to know themselves more truly. They are excited by the common tasks they share in promoting human unity.

My selection of high lights of the gathering will have to be subjective, for I was too busy tending to my little bits of conference responsibility to really stand off and survey the whole huge process. Here are some of the most appealing features of an intensive four days.

Interreligious Strength: Certainly, one of the most impressive facts of the meeting was the breadth of resources represented by the delegates. Twenty-four Roman Catholic Bishops and one Cardinal attended this meeting, perhaps the largest number to attend any gathering of interreligious import at any one time in memory. It was as if not only Bishops, but priests, nuns and lay people were cheerfully demonstrating gratitude to Pope John for his wonderful inspiration of the Church's ecumenical renewal.

The Protestant delegates, a free and hardy banding of clergy and lay people, brought a huge contribution of interracial history and experience to the sessions. Their scholarship was complemented by the creative programs in racial reconciliation that they described. Jewish leaders, remarkable in their gifts and organizational sensitivity, played a vigorous role. The moral and social strength represented at this conference could only be brought to bear in a country as big and diverse as ours. If all the constructive force represented at this meeting really rolls against racism, the old dragon will surely fall.

Competence: The workshops permitted over nine hours of discussion of problems ranging across the whole spiritual and social confrontation of religious groups with racial change in American life. The excellent first-hand knowledge of complex racial conditions revealed in these sessions would have chilled the hearts of the White Citizens' Councils. Government officials were not much in evidence. Volunteer leaders, church staff workers and representatives of special agencies predominated. A wide variety of case histories were prepared in advance for the conference, and they revealed a tremendous amount of dogged work for desegregation in the most tangled kinds of situations.

Eloquence and Insight: Rabbi Abraham Heschel, professor of Jewish mysticism at the Jewish Theological Seminary, gave an absolutely lyric address, brilliant with gem-cut phrases that shone from the meditative mind of a splendid scholar. "A prophet is a man who holds God and man in one thought. . . . the prophets' great contribution to humanity was the discovery of the evil of indifference," said Rabbi Heschel.

The paper delivered by Dr. Franklin Littell of Chicago Theological Seminary was an incisive look at American, and especially Protestant, religious history. His plea for discipline within the religious groups was echoed by at least one prominent rabbi. "We do not need any more general resolutions in the field of religion and race. What we need is disciplined witness backed by positions with binding quality," Dr. Littell stated. Pointing out several noted cases of public figures who were racists without fear of reproach from the religious groups to which they belonged, Dr. Littell said, "What would our situation be in America today, facing our most important internal crisis, if the Negro leadership were at the level of Ross Barnett, Orval Faubus, Jimmy Davis and Edwin Walker?"

The evening address by His Eminence Albert Cardinal Meyer linked with steel-bolt accuracy the moral and civic orders. The central practical issues of urban race relations, the Cardinal stated, are the expansion of employment training and opportunities for young people and the breaking of housing discrimination practices. "The problems that confront us in our great cities are too manifold and too deep-rooted in human passions and misunderstandings for any one of our great religious bodies to deal with alone," said His Eminence. This statement and a similar one by Archbishop William Cousins confirm the principle of interreligious action on major social issues in American life. Those portions of the Catholic community that are still content to go it alone must yield to such episcopal leadership.

Action Targets: Behind all the eloquence and the flashing spear points of the spirit, the workshops were lining up recommendations that would permit the churches and synagogues to back specific projects at the local level. The number of recommendations was like the bountiful harvest of Canaan. Here are some of the areas in which stepped-up religious action was called for:

- Total elimination of racial bars in church-related institutions and schools.
- Diligent work under religious auspices to help Negro families find houses in restricted white neighborhoods.

- Contract clauses in all religiously sponsored building projects that will demand nondiscrimination of contractors.
- More backing for minority voter registration.
- Interreligious task forces in the inner-city and suburban areas to work for housing improvement and freedom of residence.
- A service corps to aid in rural reconstruction.
- More religious representation with respect to urban planning decisions.
- Steady church and synagogue policy to fill the vacuum in civic life by developing community organizations where none exist now.
- Widespread home-visiting programs and other work to foster interracial association.

What must men like Father John LaFarge, S.J., and George Hunton, who had toiled for years on racial problems against stony indifference, have thought of this outpouring of examples of good work and good will? They could only be happily encouraged in the eminence of their years.

The Conference on Religion and Race, of course, did not just happen. It was originally the idea of Matt Ahmann, director of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice. Rev. Oscar Lee of the National Council of Churches, Rabbi Philip Hiat of the Synagogue Council of America, Father John Cronin of NCWC and Rabbi Marc Tanenbaum, director of the American Jewish Committee headed the program committee. They worked furiously over a period of months with the aid of a great variety of people.

The task of piecing together a representative mosaic of leadership, with concern and experience in race relations, from dozens of religious groups was a masterwork of diplomacy. The inhibitions of protocol, distance, church organization and timing made the process a bit like catching birds without ruffling any feathers. The conference planning included a scheme for follow-up, and interest has been expressed in a dozen major cities in reproducing the conference format locally. The excellent materials and recommendations of the Chicago meeting will be printed soon for wide distribution.

Only Rabbi Tanenbaum can know the mountain of work that went into making the meeting possible, and only Matt Ahmann can count the sacrifices involved.

This conference will need follow-up. There is too much at stake to rely upon enthusiasm alone. Our reconstruction of race relations is vastly complex. There are many problems involved in religious exertions on this issue. The current religious contribution to race relations is quite uneven, poorly financed and fitfully supported.

How can a stable interreligious co-operation be built upon such a base? There were some heavily Negro groups that apparently did not initially think the conference was going to be so successful. They rather belatedly discovered the importance of the gathering and asserted their desire for representation with some embarrassment and distress. The shaping of a Declaration of Conscience proved to be quite a literary wrestling, due to differences of interpretation of word and principle growing out of diverse backgrounds. Will such differences continue to cause difficulty?

By dipping deeply into our understanding of democracy we may be able to overcome these weaknesses of interreligious cohesion. But, the massive apathy of our congregations remains. Can we stir them with programs? The skills to promote racial change are hard to develop. Hence, only small action groups can be put into such work as suburban desegregation projects or the upgrading of slum family life. Can these small groups move things fast enough to satisfy the sense of urgency among our Negro citizens?

People with even a little experience in race relations realize the crazy crossfire of contradictions that such involvement entails. Even the man who is patently without guile is suspect. The fight to maintain clarity of goals and motive is constant. Religious people, working on the basis of generous principle, are not usually prepared for the tortured drives and confusion of racial wrangles.

One of the real shortcomings of the conference was the inability of the delegates to come to grips with the subject matter of one set of workshops dealing with the inner life of the church and synagogue. The intention of the organizers was to provide in this segment of the program an opportunity for evaluation of the specific spiritual exercises of the religious groups in relation to the moral problem of racism.

The formulas for personal prayer, sermons, moral instruction and guidance, religious textbooks and observances were all to be examined. But this did not produce any clear conclusion. Perhaps the disparity of religious representation prevented this. The tendency appeared to be to consider social interpretations of the problems, rather than to dissect the spiritual nerves of the matter. The delegates were stronger on sociology than on the root processes of character building and the formation of conscience in these sessions.

It is often said that American social-action efforts differ markedly from those of Europeans. The philosophically keen Europeans analyze and refine ideas till the environment wastes away. The Americans do some job of social reform somewhere, and then can't repeat it because they never really figured out how to do it in the first place. We do not know if this interreligious attack upon racial injustice will prevail, or how it will work, but we have to go ahead and do it. We'll sort out the niceties later. We must do this because it is dreadfully urgent that social change in America be animated by a religious spirit.

As J. Irwin Miller, president of the National Council of Churches, put it: "We can abolish every system and practice and custom and regulation which now offends, and if we do not at the same time work with equal vigor and determination to eliminate the spirit which embraces and supports all these, then we will find that little has been accomplished and that somehow all the new regulations and programs have become the servants of the old spirit."

I came away from Chicago certain that the country's 50 Catholic Interracial Councils will avidly pursue the results of this conference. The gathering was probably the greatest expression of religious initiative in U.S. society in decades. It is a happy circumstance that the first impulse for the move came from a Catholic quarter. The sight of a big, ruddy monsignor sitting next to a Southern Baptist who was sitting next to a Negro Methodist, while all three boomed a basso chorus of "We shall overcome" was quite a side attraction. The mercury hit 20 degrees below zero while the lively discussions went on, but I'd have walked from Chicago's Loop to the Edgewater Beach Hotel to get to this conference. ●

This Matter of Integration

by Roy Sano, minister First Methodist Church, Loomis, Calif.

Merger of 31 churches of the Pacific Japanese Provisional Conference with annual conferences of the Western Jurisdiction will take place in 1964. This will mark the end of "segregated" churches in the region.

The Japanese churches were organized with provisional conference status 23 years ago. This is the extension of a Japanese mission formed 63 years ago on the Pacific coast. This year all the churches of the PJPC are celebrating the 85th anniversary of Japanese Christian work in America which began in San Francisco. (For details on this origin, see Methodist Story.)

More than half of these churches, scattered in Arizona, California, Colorado, Oregon, and Washington, are now fully self supporting.

Membership in the Conference was 6,466 as of June, 1962.

Bishop Donald H. Tippett of the San Francisco Area says, "It is my considered opinion that our Japanese people are better prepared for integration than any of our other ethnic groups. . . . They do not want to be in any way second rate congregations or members."

During the heart-searching discussions at the last session of the last annual conference, a Japanese Methodist minister made an address on which this article is based, and which we believe has implications for any future desegregation in Methodism.—Ed.

At almost every major church gathering here on the West Coast, churchmen discuss the question of integration and make pronouncements. We are all for it. Lest our adoption of it be only a gullible acceptance, however, we ought to examine this goal with a combination of soft hearts and hard heads.

The Main Question

The main question for us to consider at the moment is not the advantage or disadvantage of integration, nor whether we are ready for it or not. The prior question for us to answer is whether the integration we propose is soundly conceived and will be responsibly implemented.

A responsible integration will bear in mind that we are basically disbanding a racial conference and merging the several churches into their respective geographic annual conferences.

When these churches separate themselves from their present association as a provisional conference, a disbanding of this conference ought not to mean an abandoning of specialized, but legitimate responsibilities, concerns, and aspirations.

A responsible integration will bear in mind that union of church bodies brings strength, but they must walk the tightrope by preserving adequate freedom for the specialist without jeopardizing the concrete, organic, and visible unity of the Church.

The Church must work within communities and to create a new community. One of the reasons we are hampered in our work with racial groups is that our work is not sufficiently within these communities. We are too eager to create new communities and do not want to appear segregated.

We are like a swimmer who complained that he could not swim well in the Dead Sea. His body was not sufficiently immersed in the water.

The Calling of God

There are two questions to answer if we are to work in and create a new community: What is the community to which we are called? And what is the calling of God we must proclaim to this community?

The community to which we are called as a provisional conference is the Japanese community, which is changing but still identifiable. The Japanese are among the most quickly assimilated or Americanized immigrants. They are rapidly losing their distinctive foreign traits. A large number, however, still ban themselves together for social, recreational, and religious purposes.

The best example is the Buddhist church. I do not mean to be facetious when I say that the Buddhist church in America is first Japanese, second American, and third Buddhist. She is not trying to be provincial or racially exclusive. She is only following a strong trend of the community to identify themselves racially by associating with their own kind.

A responsible integration will bear this trend in mind and work within this racial community. Through it they will proclaim the call of God to this community to become the people of God, a colony of heaven.

A Practical Strategy

What are the reasons for this strategy? For one thing, it is practical. This strategy is working in the case of the Buddhist church and among Japanese fundamentalistic groups who ignore the integration question.

Second, a church that would allow racial churches and perhaps even allow them to band together within and across annual conferences could be said to be in harmony with St. Paul's teaching of the body. The unity of the Church retains multiplicity and specialization, but it is the multiplicity that does not jeopardize the concrete unity of the Church.

Third (and this is still an unexplored reason) we would only be following Christ. St. Paul tells us that although Christ was endowed with regal authority, he laid it aside and assumed the form of the servant and lived within human flesh subject to death.

Americans all: from many racial and cultural backgrounds.

If we take this passage with radical seriousness, I would take it to mean that the work of the Church is to live within the existing racial communities even if these communities are subject to a short life.

Many of us argue that because culture and racial communities are a passing thing, therefore we are not going to get involved. But our Lord Jesus Christ argued quite the opposite. Because these things are subject to sin and its consequence symbolized in death, therefore He decided to live in the flesh.

Although Christ is not a sanctioner of the existing order of things, he is the sanctifier, or the transformer. And he did it by living within it—not trying to avoid it, or belittle it.

We look on people who do not feel free with the majority of caucasians and pronounce judgment upon them as "awkward" and "backward," because they impose segregation upon themselves. A responsible integration does not hamper the free choice of human associations nor belittle the many who will work within these communities and associations.

Many of us are afraid to work with a separate Japanese church even in major centers of Japanese population, because this would make us vulnerable to criticism of segregation. Many of us feel guilty about the existence of such churches. But if we take the Incarnation of God to heart, we may move forward toward a responsible integration.

Finally, the Incarnation tells us that our Lord lives in and above. He is fully human and fully divine. That would mean that the Church can exercise the courage to live within the boundaries of human communities, without making barriers to communication.

The church ought to have the audacity to live within the dangerous limitations of human communities, making the distinctions that set us off from one another without being discriminatory. We will be bold to say that we will organize ourselves separately at some points without segregating ourselves.

Isn't this what we mean when we speak of the church in the world, but not of the world?

Isn't this what Martin Luther meant in part when he said that "A Christian man is a perfectly free lord of all, subject to none. A Christian man is a perfectly dutiful servant of all, subject to all"?

Responsible Integration

And now, let us see how we may implement the responsible integration we have attempted to describe.

In evangelism, occasional specialized campaigns could be conducted co-operatively across ethnic lines within the conference and within ethnic groups across conference lines. But the campaigns could be sustained by an efficient and just distribution and adequate recruitment of specialized ministers in ethnic work. Notice, I did not say "ethnic ministers," but "specialized ministers in ethnic work."

Furthermore, the laymen will very likely want some mutual sharing in developing new leadership.

Stewardship is another topic in churches so easily prey to "give-me" psychology characteristic of some ethnic churches.

And then there are cultural concerns. We are yet to explore the height, breadth, and depth of God's call in the area of inter-cultural relations here on the West Coast, with its numerous major centers of Oriental, Latin, and Negro population.

In addition, there are the migrants of the 30's, 40's, and 50's. Surveys such as the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights of 1961 bear out the continued need for action on part of the Church in promoting fair housing, equal opportunity in employment and education, full participation on all levels of government, and justice before the courts.

Besides the obvious injustices in race relations, we face more subtle problems of prejudice. We need knowledge and respect of each other and ourselves as minorities. We need to know the hurts we harbor, the anxieties that drive us, and the aspirations that arouse us.

We need to feel our full humanity —not only our meanness or majesty alone, but both. Even the Commission on Worship could explore the inclusion of Negro spirituals and Japanese hymns in the new hymnal. But much of this concern will rest on the Board of Christian Social Concerns.

God has a new day to dawn upon us. He is giving us the opportunity for a creative and authentic integration, responsive to the existing situations and the ultimate claims of God.

"If all the girls in the world took hands,
beginning here with me,
It would make a line exceeding fine that would reach from sea to sea;
If all the boys in the world took hands,
stretching from shore to shore,
It would make a circle of friendliness where wars could be no more."

My family resides in a segregated society, where even to be a "moderate" is to be suspect, and where "One Worlders" are referred to with contempt. From such a situation many people, both white and colored, seek to escape by moving. Every section of our land is facing its greatest struggle, and its greatest opportunity, at the same time. I want to remain in my community to share the struggle and the opportunity.

... Wherever I am, I try to teach my children, by precept and example, to respect persons as persons, and as children of God.

... We have a globe in our home, and some large maps: one of the United States and one of the world. We have a picture of the flags of the United Nations. Three of our children can associate flags and nations.

... One daughter is a member of the World-Wide Doll Club and receives periodically a doll from some different country, along with an explanation of the customs of that country.

... Our family watches together some TV programs, one of which is the World Series in baseball. Sometimes it is amazing how many different nationalities and ethnic groups are represented by the players. Another program which we see together frequently is the World News Roundup. By this means we travel here, there, and yonder around the world. We become more aware of places and problems, though, than we do of conflicts among persons of other races and backgrounds.

... We sometimes count, and locate on the map, the date lines to the front page of the newpspaer. Our family uses various devotional guides. Occasionally THE UPPER ROOM has a"World Fellowship Number."

Human rights are more basic than states' rights. The state does not create rights; its task is to make fraternity and conditions which support equal rights secure for all its citizens. We can't legislate morality, but we can and should develop and support legislation which encourages and supports morality. There is a natural "consciousness of kind" but it need not be "unkind." Each person, as a child of God, has the right of equal opportunity for full self realization. Intelligence, mutual respect, and co-operation are musts for survival. They are necessary if we are to build a good society, and more necessary still if we are to take seriously the discipleship of our Lord who calls us to prepare the way for the gift of the Kingdom of God.

Lutherans and School Aid

New York city.

✦ AT ITS 45th annual meeting here February 5-7 the National Lutheran Council adopted as a study document, without approving the contents, a report from its committee on social trends supporting "limited and specified" use of public tax funds for nonpublic colleges and universities but opposing such aid to parochial schools. Declared the report: "Public tax support for church schools, even in limited and specified ways, would create great advantage for some religious groups over others at the elementary and secondary school levels, but would not necessarily have the same effect at the level of college education." Further, use of public funds to subsidize nonpublic schools and school systems below the college level "may lead to a proliferation of insitutionalized creedal and other rivalries within the formal educational process and serve to threaten the public school system." The committee held that nonpublic colleges and universities may be properly aided with tax funds "if safeguards are provided to keep [them] from becoming largely government financed institutions operated by church and other private groups."

Robert W. Long, executive secretary of the council's division of American missions, reported that a nationwide county-by-county study completed in 1962 reveals that in the 1950s Lutheran church membership increased almost 35 per cent while the population was increasing by 18.5 per cent. In metropolitan areas the rate of Lutheran growth was twice that of the general population; in town and country areas, four times as great. The report indicated that while more than 55 per cent of the nation's 8,600,000 baptized Lutherans live in cities, only 36 per cent of Lutheran congregations are located in urban areas.

Citing mobility as a force "impelling us toward conformity," Dr. Long pointed out that since formerly isolated racial and cultural groups are now a part of "the mainstream of American life," coordination of Protestant home missionary activities is mandatory if the church is "to bring the gospel to the homogenized American population" with its "marked tendency toward uniformity in the midst of general diversity."

The Lutheran Service Commission, a joint endeavor of the council and the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod, reported that from November 1961 through October 1962, 428,809 members of the armed forces and their dependents made use of the centers it operates throughout the world. Carl F. Yaeger, associate executive secretary of the commission, reported that combined efforts of the armed forces and Christian organizations have resulted in improvement of the environment of military personnel and their dependents. He pointed to "the most elaborate recreational facilities in military history," the success of military police in "cleaning up" communities and "clearing 'girls' off the streets," along with the efforts of Christian organizations to combat vice in areas surrounding military establishments. Religious ministries to service personnel must undergo quick and drastic revamping, Dr. Yeager said, as a result of the missile dispersal program.

The council voiced support of the United Nations in a resolution commending the international agency for its championship of religious liberty. Urging continued U. S. support of the U.N. by both citizens and government, the resolution termed the U.N. "a symbol of the God-given aspirations of man toward responsible international conduct and more brotherly relations among men," "an effective way of making a contribution toward the alleviation of human suffering" and "a major factor contributing to the development of more peaceful, just and orderly relationships among nations and people."

Lutheran World Action, the National Lutheran Council's annual financial appeal, reported 1962 receipts of $4,203,755—less than 2 per cent short of the goal for the year. Major share of the receipts were channeled through the Luther World Federation for its widespread program of interchurch aid, community development, self-help projects and missionary and theological activities. L.W.A. funds also go to support ministry to the armed forces, resettlement and assistance for refugees, a ministry to temporary communities in the U.S. and a variety of interdenominational activities. The L.W.A. goal for 1963 was set at $4,450,000.

Delegates voted support for bills pending in Congress which would revise immigration laws to allocate larger quotas to countries outside the western hemisphere, to facilitate reunion of separated families, to provide for regular admission of refugees, and to increase admission of persons with special skills. Lutheran Immigration Service reported that it is expanding its program of assistance to European refugees to care for Cubans and Chinese who need resettlement and relief aid.

Membership in the National Lutheran Council was reduced from six to two church bodies last year by the merger of the United, Augustana and American Evangelical Lutheran churches and the Suomi Synod into the new Lutheran Church in America, and by the entry of the Lutheran Free Church into the American Lutheran Church. The other large U.S. Lutheran body, the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod, is not affiliated with the council but has taken part in certain phases of its program and just now is engaged in a continuing study with N.L.C. representatives looking toward possible cooperation in other areas at some future date. The Church Suffers

by Frances Kay Dellinger

"ANY THOUGHT OF A WIDE GENERAL CONVERSION of Negroes to the Catholic Church is an illusion unless the attitude of American Catholics—clergy and laity—is completely purified of the segregation policy."

Such is the judgment of the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith on the state of the Church in this country.

Too often in America, and for too long, both the clergy and the laity of the Church founded by Jesus Christ have been indifferent to the problem of racial injustice in our land or have approached the problem of racial tensions from an emotional rather than a rational point of view.

Priests who have worked for years to convert Negroes to the Church are convinced that one of the major deterrents to potential converts is the anti-Negro attitude of many white Catholics. Only three per cent of the Negroes in America today are Catholics. When Catholics display prejudice, promote segregation, or practice discrimination, they commit sins not only against justice and charity, but of scandal. Non-Catholics, both white and Negro, study Catholics to see if their conduct is in accord with avowed principles. Catholics who do not live the principles of Christianity while giving them lip-service commit a sin which can be mortal, and their actions are injurious to the Church.

The American Negro, after a hundred years of citizenship, still has not won the free exercise of his God-given rights. Prejudice, discrimination, and segregation restrict and hamper his full development both as a person and as a member of society.

Discriminatory practices wound his spirit and rob him of his self-respect. Segregation places on him a social stigma and inevitably leads to unequal treatment. Frustration and even hopelessness can be the end result of an existence constantly hindered from pursuing "even moderate ambitions and fulfilling even modest duties."

Often such circumstances have prevented the Negro from obtaining adequate education. Therefore, he is relegated to jobs with low income. The inadequacy of his wages forces the mother of the family to seek additional income by working outside the home. The children are left without proper guidance and supervision.

The highest rent in many cities is collected in slums where apartment subdivision leaves entire families occupying single-room dwellings. Without adequate maintenance, privacy, or conveniences, and at a price equivalent to an

by Rev. Thomas F. O'Connor, S.S.J.

IT IS NATURAL, I suppose, for a sexagenarian to reminisce: to compare what is with what might have been. I was started on this track by rereading Edwin O'Connor's Edge of Sadness, to my mind the best novel about a priest since Canon Sheehan. As a matter of fact the start of my own vocation came with the reading of the story of another priest, a martyr of the Tudor era—Come Rack, Come Rope by Robert Hugh Benson.

Forty years ago, when I first read that book, I had absolutely no personal thoughts about the priesthood, except perchance the hope that a son of mine might grow up to be a bishop, mayhap an archbishop, even a cardinal! At the time I had a good clerical job at the Fulton Fish Market and I was attending night classes at the newly opened Fordham University School of Business in the Woolworth Building, then the tallest in New York. In my future I hoped there would be a pretty wife, a few well-behaved children, and solid financial security. Maybe even a Stutz Bearcat and a big house on Long Island.

In those days Al Smith was Governor of New York and, since he claimed "FFM" (Fulton Fish Market) as his alma mater, he was the hero of all the young men who worked there. Who knew to what heights we might rise?

However, after reading Come Rack, Come Rope I became overwhelmed with the realization of the gossamer quality of worldly success. It gave me a sort of hopeless feeling that I should have tried for the priesthood, but now it was too late!

In this state of mind I made a retreat at Mount Manresa on Staten Island. There the director, Father Herman Storch, S.J., God bless him, assured me it was not too late—that priests were everywhere in short supply. With his wise counsel, and after much earnest prayer, I finally decided God was calling me to the Negro Missions. I applied to the Josephite Fathers and was accepted. On October 22, 1925 I entered Epiphany Apostolic College in Newburgh, New York, as a candidate for the priesthood. I was ordained June 11, 1934 and I have never had a regret. Sometimes I harbor doubts about my effectiveness but, no matter what the future may hold, it has been a very happy and satisfying life. Much better than having a big house on Long Island, a Cadillac convertible—or even a bishop for a son.

HARMON DRAWING

from Segregation

Eastside penthouse, tenants are exposed to conditions which breed disease and crime. They are prevented from moving by segregation.

Many jobs are not open to Negroes. Often well-educated young men and women are forced to undertake menial positions because they are not permitted by discriminatory business practices to enter occupational fields for which they have been trained.

It is easy to see the cumulative effect of these injustices. Some Negroes withdraw from the struggle and simply give up. The denial in practice of their human dignity leads to a loss of self-respect, which leads to a loss of a sense of responsibility. Where, on the other hand, Negroes are given just opportunity, they educate themselves and become fine citizens.

God is color-blind. He is the Father of all men. This is the constant teaching of the Church. Yet it is difficult for the Negroes to accept the Church when they are turned away from parishes on the pretext that they are provided for elsewhere. Thus vast spiritual harm is done to the Negroes by impeding the conversion of non-Catholic Negroes and by alienating the Catholics.

How can they believe in the Catholic doctrine, "Love thy neighbor as thyself?" In church they must sit in "segregated" pews, a practice impious because it gives the lie to sacred principles.

They listen to sermons urging the congregation to send Catholic children to Catholic schools. Yet Negroes are told that there is no room for their children when they apply to these schools. Teen clubs and parish activities are organized for Catholic young people. Yet the teenagers too are segregated; they may not attend teen clubs with the white children; they must have their own "separate and equal" teen clubs.

If actions speak louder than words, what do these actions say? The Negro finds discrimination on all sides, but when it is in God's Church too, the injustice is unbearable.

"Today, in many areas of the South, the average Christian is even afraid to speak out in favor of what he knows is morally right," says Mr. Thurgood Marshall, prominent Negro leader. (Now a Federal judge.—Ed.) Too well known is the incident of the Negro priest who was sent to labor in a Catholic parish in the Archdiocese of New Orleans. When the congregation arrived for Sunday Mass and saw that they had a colored priest, they walked out.

One of the great tragedies is that the white people by these unjust segregation practices are making it impossible to come into contact with the Negro enough to know or understand him. The ghetto walls that shield the white man keep him from ever meeting a Negro as a person. He does not know the Negro as an individual, but as "one of them."

The white man suffers from this degradation or denial of human rights that must eventually place his own in jeopardy.

Prejudice is demoralizing for those who practice it. It places in the mind an entirely false idea of one's own superiority, while it harms the faculty of judgment itself. The white man becomes incased in a little shell of bigotry and prejudice.

Those who know and understand the Negro also are hurt by segregation. Because they are subjected to hostile pressures by other Whites, they often lose courage to love their Negro brother as they would.

Discrimination is unjust on all sides. To conquer the injustice will require much time and tremendous work. It will never be done, however, until as Father Robert F. Drinan, S. J., says, "those who are not injured feel as indignant as those who are."

OUR READERS WRITE . . .

I am a boy, ten years of age. I have just finished reading "A Stocking Full of Sorrow" in the Christmas issue and I feel very sorry for the children who have nothing for Christmas.

I am enclosing $3.25, my Christmas money, for you to give to some Negro children in Alabama. It is late for Christmas now, but better late than never. Also, would you please send the names and addresses of priests who have small schools in Alabama?

I will be able to celebrate Jesus' birthday better today.

New York

This and the letter following are but two of many prompted by "A Stocking Full of Sorrow." An equally stimulating article in our Christmas issue was "There is a Santa Claus!" We are deeply grateful to all who sent toys and other gifts for our needy children on the Southern Missions.—Ed.

The article, "A Stocking Full of Sorrow," touched me deeply. Sometimes I think things are rough and then something like this makes me thank God for all we do have!

I have sent you a box of toys—they aren't much, but almost every toy in this house that was in decent condition is in there. Joey (age 5) and Marianne (4) were quite willing to part with them for Baby Jesus' sake. Then, too, they know they will get some for Christmas. We wrapped each one separately so it doesn't seem like a box of junk.

When the box comes, will you please re-address it to one of those turpentine places or someplace where little ones need toys? As soon as I can, I promise to send a couple of dollars to cover any postage you may spend to forward it. We are saving up and if you'll let us know where the package goes we'll send a big box of candy to the children, too.

Pennsylvania

Thanks very much for your beautiful Christmas card and also for this month's edition of THE JOSEPHITE HARVEST. I can not tell you how much I have enjoyed reading it. Also, I want to take this opportunity to thank you for your beautiful calendar. Every good wish for a very bright and prosperous New Year.

Massachusetts

I think it is a wonderful and happy coincidence that, through the intercession of Saint Joseph, I have been granted a very special intention regarding my daughter, on the Feast of the Holy Family. Please find enclosed a little something for your missionary work.

Pennsylvania

This is in thanksgiving for a very great favor received from Saint Joseph. My husband was transferred to this city in July of last year. We put our house up for sale in June and had no prospects that were able to finance our house. Someone told me to pray to Saint Joseph. I started the Thirty Days Prayer. On the last day a lady called and said she had just noticed the sign on our house and asked if she could come to see it. We signed the final papers on the 15th of November, and I'm sure it was only through Saint Joseph that we were able to sell, because the real estate business is very slow in our small town.

New York

I am sorry I didn't get my Christmas offering to you sooner. The past few weeks have been pretty hectic for me. I am a mailman.

Maryland

Thank you for your beautiful Christmas card, and for the great privilege of helping your work in my small way. Yours is the finest gift one could receive.

This $10.00 is part payment of a debt I owe Saint Anthony. In a new city, incredibly, he found me a bit of work as an organist.

Have a wonderful 1963.

Please pray for peace and good will in our recently integrated neighborhood.

Open Doors at College Hill

By O. MERRILL BOGGS

THE transformation of College Hill Christian Church in Cincinnati, Ohio, began on Thursday before Race Relations Sunday in 1961. I was in my study that February morning preparing my sermon. It was not a message on race relations.

A lady, one of our members, came into my study and told me of a Negro boy in College Hill who had tried unsuccessfully for more than two months to get into one of the local Cub Scout packs. He was being kept out by the children's parents.

After this woman left my office I began to ask myself whether the church would have dealt any differently with this Negro lad. I recalled an address by Carlyle Marney at the Ministers Breakfast at the 1960 International Convention Assembly in Louisville. When it comes to vital social issues, Dr. Marney said, the church, instead of being out ahead of the slow-moving majorities, is too often trailing behind. The church, he said, is rarely out on the scrimmage line of life but waits for someone else to make the touchdown and then wants to rush in and make the extra point! As I sat there in my study I knew that in the area of race relations this is all too true.

Then God spoke to me and he said, "Let the church be the church! Challenge it to open its doors wide to all races, or else take the name Christian off its cornerstone. And do it now!"

Mr. Boggs is minister of the College Hill Christian Church in Cincinnati, Ohio.

For nearly three hours that morning I argued with my Lord. I knew full well that this was the gospel his Son had preached and lived.

"But Lord," I complained, "why does it have to be done now? This is not a good time. We have just built a new sanctuary, with a large mortgage on it, and our financial obligations are so large and our receipts so small that it would be foolish to risk losing any financial support right now."

And the reply came: "What does it profit a church—to gain the whole world, to build buildings, to raise budgets, to add members to its rolls—if in the process it forfeits its life and surrenders the mission for which it came into being?"

That morning I felt God's presence in a way I had never felt it before. I scrapped the sermon on which I had been working and prepared an entirely new one. I devoted this new sermon to a discussion of the nature and mission of the church, especially as it pertains to its role in the area of race relations. I acknowledged the contributions of our social scientists in this field of human relations but emphasized that our major concern must be what the church is doing or ought to do. Directing my people's attention to the Biblical teachings on race, I pointed out that the central message of the gospel is one of reconciliation and love and that today as at Pentecost the incoming of Christ's spirit wipes out the man-made barriers of race and nation.

That next Sunday I faced my congregation.

It is true, I told my people, that we don't explicitly bar Negroes from our church. Yet in nine years as pastor at College Hill I had never seen a Negro enter the sanctuary for worship. The reason for this, I suggested, is that Negroes felt they would not be welcome.

I then challenged my people to re-establish the church as Jesus had founded it—to open its doors wide to all races, and to go to the Negro people in our community and let them know that they are welcome in our church. I challenged them to "go into the world"—and the "world" certainly includes our own neighborhood—and "make disciples of all" who would confess Jesus as Lord. I called them to restore the church as Christ had founded it, a holy fellowship that is based not on kinship of race or class but on kinship in Christ.

Encouraged by the positive response of my congregation, I decided to mimeograph the sermon and mail it to all the members. Before mailing it, however, I asked the chairman of the board of elders if he thought the elders would like to send a letter with the sermon, encouraging our people to give it serious attention. He promptly called a special meeting of the elders to consider my request.

Our board of elders consists of six men. At that time the chairman was a Virginian. One was from Missouri, another from West Virginia, two from Ohio, and one from Indiana. Four of the men were college graduates, the fifth was a grocery chain executive, and the sixth was in the plumbing business. They ranged in age from 31 to 57 years. Good, sensible, Christian leaders—all of them. They were conservative but not fanatically so.

They quickly agreed on sending a letter of commendation with the sermon, but then went on to say that this was a pretty weak position for a board of

THE substance of a recent Air Force letter putting an end to the distribution of gift cigarettes among Air Force personnel raises a number of interesting ethical questions. The letter itself reads as follows:

17 September, 1962

Department of the Air Force
Headquarters, United States Air Force
Washington 25, D. C.
Reply to—Att'n of: AFCSG
Subject: Gift cigarettes
To: ADC, AFSC, AELC, AFSC, ATC, AV, CONAC, CAP-USAF, HQ COMD ASAF, MATS, SAC, TAC, AAC, PACAF, USAFE, CAIRC, USAFA.

1. The ever-increasing evidence linking cigarette smoking with lung cancer, pulmonary diseases, cardiovascular diseases, etc., can no longer be ignored. The Surgeon General U.S.A.F., has taken a firm stand on this issue and has informed the tobacco companies that gift cigarettes are no longer acceptable.

2. To allow the free distribution of cigarettes in our hospitals and in flight lunches suggests to our personnel that the Air Force Medical Service, in effect, condones cigarette smoking. To do so is to repudiate the overwhelming evidence of many medical research teams working independently on a world wide basis.

3. Henceforth, gift cigarettes will not be accepted for free distribution to patients in U.S.A.F. Hospitals, nor will they be placed in flight lunch boxes.

R. L. Bohannon, Major General, USAF, MC
For the Chief of Staff
Deputy Surgeon General USAF

AMONG the other ethical questions raised by the letter one may list the following:

(1) If there is as much real danger from cigarette smoking as is suggested by the Air Force Medical Service (and we agree that there is) should we not be raising the question of cigarette advertising through radio, TV, newspaper and magazine channels?

(2) Is it an unwarranted infringement of individual freedom and business privilege to curb the sale of cigarettes by shutting off advertising channels?

(3) Do businesses have a responsibility for anything beyond making a profit for their investors?

(4) Do individuals have a responsibility to themselves and to their friends and children to seriously consider the health implications of cigarette smoking?

(5) Should the church keep free of such issues as cigarette smoking, the use of alcoholic beverages, racial equality, atomic warfare, and medical care of the aging? Should the church leave these ethical matters to the armed forces, the political parties, the business and advertising agencies of our country, and our mass media of communication such as the movies, the radio, TV, the newspapers? Or does the church have a major responsibility in these and similar fields of ethical decision which it is not now accepting?

elders to take. On such an important issue, they felt that they ought to let the congregation know where they stood. I think they surprised themselves as much as me when they discovered that they unanimously supported my challenge to become a racially inclusive church. They composed a letter to the congregation which included this declaration:

"(1) That the church should take the lead regarding racial integration rather than stay idly in the background; (2) true harmony between the races will never exist until Christians of all races can worship together; and (3) the College Hill Christian Church should invite people of all races to worship with us, for all races are one in Christ."

The elders also agreed that we should immediately make personal contact with Negro families in College Hill, preferably people with Disciples background. We promptly called on a few of such families, and soon thereafter two or three Negro families began worshiping with us.

Not everyone in the church agreed with what the elders and I were doing. One deacon left and a few persons made sharp attacks on our program. But in June of 1961, we called a special congregational meeting and formally voted to support the elders and pastor in inviting all races to worship with us.

BY the end of July we had received our first Negro family into membership. Since then we have received five other Negro families, so that at present we have six Negro member families, with four or five other such families also attending worship.

Our Negro people came into membership one family at a time. It was a personal religious experience for all of them. They joined our church for the same basic reason that anyone does, because in one way or another it meets their personal spiritual needs.

There was no mass movement on the part of Negroes to get into our church. We discovered what thousands of churches across the land have learned. Negroes do not overwhelm formerly all-white congregations once these churches open their doors to all races. Negroes must be evangelized just like other persons.

Indeed, because of Negroes' long-standing fear and mistrust of white people, it is even more difficult to bring them into a formerly all-white congregation than it is to evangelize white persons.

In an all-colored church the Negro has a sense of personal security. Here the color line does not exist and he is accepted on the basis of his personal merits. To leave this relatively secure emotional situation and come into a preponderantly white congregation requires real courage and faith on the part of the Negro. In taking this step he runs the risk that white members may not fully accept him on his own merits. He also faces the possibility that members of his own race will criticize him because they themselves are too weak and insecure to take a similar step or because they do not understand his motives.

WE lost only four active families as a result of integrating our church. Several other families were not happy about this move but did not feel they should leave the church over it. Many of these members have since changed their minds and now support this important development in the life of our church. It is important to note that during that same year that we lost four families over the decision to integrate, we received thirty-seven new members of whom twenty-eight were white. This is a record number of additions for the past three years at College Hill and the second highest number of additions during the previous ten years. We are now a congregation of 215 resident members.

Our Negro members have been thoroughly accepted into all phases of church life. They take part actively not only in public worship but also in the CWF, CMF, youth groups, and church school. Two of them are church school teachers and one sings in the adult choir. A number of them now serve on several functional committees of the church and one Negro, Mrs. Joseph Young, is secretary of the general board of officers.

Now, how did this all happen? How within a year and a half were we transformed into a racially integrated congregation? Certainly it was not because of any social pressure; our neighborhood is not changing from white to Negro. The percentage of Negroes in College Hill—three per cent—remains the same today as it was in 1950.

Nor did we become racially integrated because the congregation were all "northerners." At least twenty-five per cent of our members were southern born and reared.

Nor could the sermon I gave on Race Relations Sunday in 1961 be credited as the sole reason for this important change in the life of our church. Most of the ideas and insights it contained had been shared with the people before.

SOMEHOW, most of us at College Hill Christian Church found ourselves gripped by the Holy Spirit to a degree that we had never known before. We suddenly found ourselves empowered by his love to tear down the man-made barriers of racial pride and prejudice which had so long surrounded the church. We stopped talking about what the church-in-general ought to do about race and began asking ourselves what the church-in-College-Hill ought to do about it.

We have succeeded in wiping out the barriers of race and color at College Hill Christian Church because we have dared to act on our faith in God.

Many a person said to me during the first six months of our struggle: "To welcome, to invite people of all races to join our congregation upsets me emotionally. It goes against all that I have been taught. It is contrary to the social patterns in which I have been brought up. But I know that it is right. It is Christian. And I must do it!"

This is an act of faith. And when we so act, when we really put our trust in God—even when he commands us to do something difficult for us to understand or accept—it is then that his Spirit is able to enter our lives, cleanse us of impure thoughts and low motives, and empower us to love one another even as Christ loved us.

The first step toward the realization of a society in which all men mutually respect and help one another is neither violent revolution nor even reform. It is spiritual regeneration. This is what our church has experienced. And others can find it, too.

Catholics and Racism in the North

Matthew Ahmann

Reprinted from THE CATHOLIC WORLD by permission.

Catholics and Racism in the North

On June 10, Archbishop Paul J. Hallinan ordered the integration of Catholic schools in the diocese of Atlanta, the order to take effect in September. The secular as well as the religious press hailed this decision as a courageous move that swept aside long years of tradition. While the Catholic Church is active in eliminating segregation in the South, little is being said about its role in racial justice in the North. The great bulk of Catholic power and population is in the big cities of the North. What are Catholics doing to dissolve the massive black ghettos in these cities? What are they doing—and what should they do—about discrimination in housing? Employment opportunities? Is the Northern Catholic practicing the injustice he affects to despise in certain Southern cities?

Matthew Ahmann, executive director of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice, sees the response of Northern Catholics as too little and too slow. He presents some practical programs for organized Catholic effort in the North. Mr. Ahmann is editor of The New Negro (Chicago: Fides, 1961), and a member of the Steering Committee of the newly established National Conference on Religion and Race.

DESPITE the wise, necessary and socially significant action of the Archbishop of New Orleans in declaring each grade of all Catholic schools open to all Catholic children, the larger job for the Catholic community coming to grips with racial segregation is in the Northern city. In establishing a diocesan policy on schools, the Archbishop took a giant step ahead of many Northern Catholic communities which are still searching for the things they must do to resolve a virulent Northern racism and deal with the great human deprivation and misery found in massive Negro ghettos.

Northern racial segregation and its concomitant human problems are more insidious, hypocritical and dangerous than Southern segregation has ever been. In the seven years since the Supreme Court decision, which declared segregation in public education unconstitutional, racial misery and racial ghettos in Northern cities have expanded. It is far easier to overcome segregation by law and create a climate of growing freedom in the South than it is to dissolve the massive intrenched black ghettos of the North.

During much of the decade of the '50's, fifty to sixty city blocks a year changed from all white to all Negro occupancy in Chicago. Some realtors and mortgage men have bled Negro and white families and have set the key conditions for the growth of slums. Segregation in Northern parochial and public schools has increased. And white people have fled to suburban areas with torn and bleeding consciences and intensified bitterness toward Negroes.

This process has been developing in many large Northern cities—Detroit, Los Angeles, Cleveland, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, New York, Boston, San Francisco. Such cities as St. Louis, Baltimore and Washington have become more Northern in their characteristics than border South. Even smaller Northern cities and towns have increasingly felt the tensions produced by strains in an unjust and segregated social order, as Negro communities continue to grow in size. More than one fair-sized city with no Negro population, which maintained it had no interracial problem, discovered a bitterness toward those of another race on the arrival of its first Negro family.

HIGHWAY PROGRAMS and urban renewal in their early years dealt harshly with impoverished Negroes and those most often found in neighborhoods subject to these programs. Forcible relocation, without attention to problems of racial segregation, has only pushed the ghetto boundaries over into new neighborhoods and created new slums elsewhere. The lack of provision for low and middle-income housing even now means that the burdens of badly needed urban programs are all placed on the poor while a handful of developers have grown rich.

When Negroes have made attempts to move into unsegregated neighborhoods — away from the slum and the ghetto, perhaps to a suburb—they have been faced with massive and nauseating reactions from supposedly educated and sophisticated white people, and not infrequently with the arson and bombings that symbolize for Northerners the racial climate of Birmingham, Alabama or Shreveport, Louisiana. It is the hypocrisy of the North that it has gleefully criticized and pressured the South while trying desperately to bury its own grave sins under the carpetbag.

The still-growing Negro ghettos and the expanding slums, the segregation on beaches, in public accommodations, schools, hospitals and employment in the North are developing a generation of millions of people without hope and little human motivation. In the large urban slum in the North there is misery comparable to that of the Negro in the sugar cane country in southern Louisiana.

These are facts. It is also a fact that the major task of the Catholic community in race relations and in dealing with the human problems of the city, is in the North. Catholics are an urban people, by and large, and most Catholics live in the North. The wealth of the Catholic community and the wealthy dioceses are in the North (and East and West). The large Catholic associations and organizations have their strength in the Northern city. Without the active participation and commitment of the Catholic community in improving the city and in fighting its devastating racially segregated patterns, the Northern city cannot become a home for free and dignified men. There are signs of hope, but the Church must respond more rapidly and with a still larger heart.

AMONG THE HOPEFUL signs is a growing restiveness and political sophistication in the Negro community. Old Negro leaders are increasingly being threatened with loss of power. On the plus side, whites and the dominant power groups setting city policy are faced with growing pressure from an increasingly organized Negro community. On the negative side, we can observe a growing, though perhaps necessary, confusion of issues —in urban renewal, for example, and even in battles over de facto segregated schools—and the steady growth and influence of movements like the black "Muslims." The recent riot involving "Muslims" and the police in Los Angeles is a case in point.

Slowly, but surely, the Catholic Church is beginning to respond, too. You can see this in the expanding horizons of the Catholic Interracial Councils and in the increasing concreteness of their work. Eight years ago many CICs lacked effective contact with institutions in their dioceses and only conducted youth education programs, ran speakers bureaus and the like. Today, these programs are becoming more effective and the Councils are discovering the techniques of getting at problems of urban renewal, all white suburbs, the lack of freedom in housing, the misery and loneliness of the slum. CICs are also rooting themselves more deeply in the Catholic organizational networks of their dioceses so as to have growing and steady contact with the larger Catholic public. Increasingly they seem to be called upon as experts and people with sophistication and skills, as they should be, regarding some of the many problems of race, housing and connected ills. In some cities the Councils are organizing networks of people throughout the metropolitan area so as to be able to carry on their work more effectively.

You can see the gradual response, too, in the growing number of Catholics who are communicating with each other informally across diocesan lines on problems of urbanism, race, planning and community change. In Cardinal Spellman's Urban Renewal Committee, Cardinal Meyer's Archdiocesan Conservation Council, the Archbishop's Committee on Human Relations in Detroit, Bishop Wright's service on the board of Pittsburgh's Action Housing, you can see the deliberate plan of bishops to give all their priests experience in heavily Negro and inner city parishes.

But the response is yet too little and must come more rapidly. There seems to be a reluctance on the part of Church authorities to develop definite diocesan policy and experiment with what must be done. There is still a reluctance to commit the Church to a genuine effort to teach concretely about interracial justice and the many other areas of concern for the Christian in the city. There is no organized national Catholic interest, outside of the Catholic Interracial Council network, no one connected with NCWC who has the time to specialize on problems of urbanization.

There is, moreover, too little realization of what the shifting, changing city means for the Church: the opportunities to give witness, to provide religious inspiration, to serve the people God created, to fight blatant injustice and the unscrupulous use of power.

Broadly the approaches to solution, the programs, can be grouped under five headings: education, employment, center city slum, housing and the ministry of the Gospel. The large Catholic resources of our dioceses on the East Coast, in the Middle West, on the West Coast and in the formerly border South must be mobilized to carry on and support a unique witness in each of these areas. In most of them the new ecumenical spirit should prove an asset, for the churches and synagogues together must hammer out in public the agreed-upon values which will underlie the more practical programs necessary to make the city a servant of all men, and undergird, for example, the coming federal Department on Urban Affairs.

EDUCATION. There is hardly a city where some Catholic parochial or high schools do not try to dodge accepting Negro pupils. They resort to almost all of the ruses used in the South. Some schools refuse them flatly; some have racial quotas; some parishes informally revise their boundaries by agreement with a bordering school. Obviously, an effective, enforced policy has to be devised to bring practice in line with Catholic belief.

In some areas where neighborhoods have become heavily Negro, Catholic schools are under-utilized or closed because of a lack of Negro Catholics to fill them. Often this action is taken in situations where public schools are bulging with overcrowded classrooms and second shifts. Here the Catholic educational system can be of real social service to our cities and to the Negro parents who often appreciate a Catholic education for their children. Those places that have a policy of maintaining open schools have found they can easily fill their school — charging sufficient tuition to maintain the plant and teaching staff.

Such utilization of Catholic schools is most urgent in the inner-city slum neighborhood. Here special teaching programs designed to help pupils with special educational, cultural and social disabilities can be devised. This can be done more easily and in a better fashion than in the cumbersome structure of a large public school system. Many of the children of these neighborhoods come from unstable and very poor families. They have little motivation to learn, or even to stay in school. Their home environment is not conducive to school work. They are exposed to a multitude of bad influences. Their parents do not encourage them to learn. Because they know of employment discrimination through seeing many unemployed Negro men about, they realize they will grow up without a job. And they will, unless—unless special programs are gotten underway. Efforts can be made in these programs to involve parents more closely in the educational process, as is done in the Banneker school group in St. Louis. This will help the children, and can also have a beneficial influence on the stability of family life itself.

The school plants can be used also for special adult educational programs, to help increase the employability of those living in underprivileged neighborhoods and for special summer programs for the children.

EMPLOYMENT. Many employers say they will hire Negroes when they possess the requisite skills. And happily, under governmental pressure this promise is being fulfilled in many cases. But a study, a few years ago, of white collar jobs offered by the employers in a large Northern city indicated 98% of the employers specifically refused to consider nonwhites of any kind. A 1960 research report on apprenticeship programs by the labor department of the NAACP indicated that at the then existing rates of progress it would take Negroes 138 years or until 2094 A.D. to secure "equal participation in skilled-craft training and employment." A recent U. S. Labor Department report rejoiced that Negro wages had reached 58% of those of whites by 1958. Slight cause for rejoicing in the Negro community! Discrimination in employment is still rampant; few employers, apparently, feel the slightest pang of conscience, and few employers will go any further toward justice than the point to which they are forced by massive public and governmental pressure.

What are the programs? First of all, as Catholics, what are the employment policies of our Catholic organizations and institutions? Justice does not happen in this area of concern unless there is a policy and someone to see to it that it is followed. We still do have organizations and institutions, hospitals and others, where there are patterns of discrimination in employment. We also, sad to say, have rectories where no Negro housekeeper is welcome. Catholics, obviously, have to abandon these practices.

Catholic employers have to be reached from the pulpit and by other means; they need help in their attempts to live up to the social doctrine of the Church. Sermons on interracial justice that leave the conscience of an employer undisturbed are really meaningless, if intended to help the Catholic be a better Christian.

As an organized Church we can use the economic power that is ours to help shape fair employment practices in civic society. Our investments, our real estate, our purchasing power, our building contracts are either perpetuating discriminatory patterns, or working to break them down. They do not act in a neutral way. Surely we have a grave duty to use these resources with responsibility and prudence.

The idea for this latter program was originally presented at the 1961 Convention of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice by Father John Cronin of the Social Action Department of the NCWC. Soon we hope to see some breakthroughs in announcements of new policy in this area.

CENTER CITY SLUM. I have already referred to some of the ways our schools can be used in slum areas to give help and hope to people. We must build into programs for Negro youth and parents a drive for education which will help them go far enough in school to pick up the training and skills that will make them employable in the more skilled labor market of the future. Already in some areas of employment there are jobs available for Negroes, but not enough applicants to fill them.

The Catholic community has a large organized program of social service, administered through various Catholic Charities departments. We should give more serious thought to how these programs can be used on a local neighborhood basis to meet the needs of an underskilled, problem-filled neighborhood. People here are not oriented toward downtown agencies; we should bring the programs to our parish centers, and open them to the total community there. One such program, on an informal basis, is operating in the well-known "Corktown" parish of Pastor Clement Kern in Detroit. Another operates out of Philadelphia's Gesu Parish, and there are several existing experiments run by Protestant churches. It seems obvious that social services in the parish also can increase the vitality of parish life as well as its witness in the local community.

Our parishes should join with other churches in working to strengthen such organization in the Negro community as will enable people to participate in civic life more fully, speak up for their own needs and interests, and end the control by distant downtown groups.

HOUSING. There are at least four important aspects of the housing problem in which we all bear responsibility for action. We know the conditions of slum neighborhoods, and I have itemized some of the work we must do there. But we must also help work out ways to rehabilitate undermaintained housing, reduce artificially high rents, improve building code enforcement and reduce the density in the overcrowded tenements. We must strive to reduce the blight-inducing concentrations of massive public housing projects which, in many cities, are built almost exclusively in the Negro ghetto. Smaller public housing projects — row houses, for example, or reconditioned houses and apartments—can be made available for purchase by families whose incomes rise, thus introducing some stability into these areas.

We must also have programs which get at the jobs of organization and education necessary to meet the problems of racially changing neighborhoods in order to stabilize them, maintain the housing quality, and still allow for interested Negro families to move in without extending the boundaries of the racial ghetto.

It is in the changing neighborhood that white people grow most bitter toward Negroes. Yet, since 1950, a variety of experiments in many cities taught us what must be done in these communities. There are so many Catholics in our cities that the endless process of harmful change will not end without deliberate support and action by the Church and the Catholic community. Sometimes, I have discovered, this will mean dealing with Catholic groups who operate on the self-defeating as well as morally unsound policy of keeping Negroes out.

We must do what we can toward making it possible for Negro families to move far out of the ghetto if they choose — even to the all-white suburb. Negro families are beginning to look around for decent housing out in the reaches. They have the same desires as the ordinary white family—and the same rights—but too often they are denied their rights. Put it this way: a fine upstanding white Catholic family can move into any suburb where it can afford housing. A fine upstanding Negro family cannot. Why not? What is wrong? What must we do about it?

FIRST OF ALL, the Catholic community should support fair housing legislation. It is needed to eliminate the factor of race from the judgment a realtor or family makes in deciding to sell a house. Secondly, we should give the support of our suburban parishes to the rights of these families. This means preparing our communities so that the climate is favorable for a family looking for housing. It means supporting that family if they should be threatened, upon moving in. In the past several years, the Catholic Interracial Council of Chicago has done some magnificent work in helping parishes live up to their Christian obligations in this regard. It can be done. And surprisingly enough to many, property values do not drop when a Negro family arrives.

Finally, there are special governmental programs such as public housing and urban renewal which should concern us. The relocation and other provisions of urban renewal can be a great aid in reducing the amount of racial segregation in our cities, if citizen watchdog committees keep their eyes open. But any city needs a conscious policy to encourage racial integration before these tools will be of any use. As a religious people, committed to racial integration, we have responsibility to work with members of other groups to see that necessary city policy is developed.

MINISTRY OF THE GOSPEL. What is gained, despite all these practical programs, if people do not understand why they carry them out? What is gained if people do not know why they should support racial integration? One of the key elements in any Church approach to the problems of racism and racial segregation in the North is to preach the Gospel. From observation and many interviews, I would say that most Catholics have a vague knowledge that the principles of Christianity argue against discrimination toward other people because of their race. The work of well-known churchmen in the public eye and to some extent, the Catholic press, have taught them that. The dramatic work done by the Archdiocese of New Orleans has also spread the message.

But few Catholics ever hear a sermon on interracial justice. This year several dioceses do have sermon plans which make a deliberate point of preaching on race. Many of the sermons given are timid, however, and insufficiently concrete to trouble the placid, but prejudiced, conscience.

Practice, or support, of racial segregation denies some of the key doctrines of Christianity: men are one, created by a common Father; one in the redemption by Christ; essentially equal in their human nature. The Mystical Body binds men despite their race, culture or education in a unique community of love. Christ told us that it was by our love that all men are to know we are the Christian community. Racism is a heresy in its denial of these basic truths of our Faith.

If it is urgent, as the 1958 Bishops' statement on "Discrimination and the Christian Conscience" said, that men of good will take the lead from the racist before it is too late, how much more urgent is it that our teaching and preaching be done with sophistication and a spirit of courage, in an attempt to be concrete enough to awaken the conscience of the Catholic to all of his responsibilities. The Church's doctrine is not vague. It has specific meaning. Let's get on with the job of communicating that meaning.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS AND THE ISSUE OF PUBLIC FUNDS

FOR THE CHURCH SCHOOL

Introduction:

The National Conference of Christians and Jews has inaugurated a new program entitled, Religious Freedom and Public Affairs. This project will bring together on a national and regional level, priests, ministers and rabbis across the country for the purpose of discussing those issues in the public order about which religious groups differ. Complex and knotty questions such as public funds for the church school, religious practices in the public school, the distribution of birth control devices and Sunday closing laws are on the agenda.

Recently the project, Religious Freedom and Public Affairs, called together thirty five editors of Catholic, Jewish and Protestant publications. For the first time these editors of church and synagogue magazines and newspapers confronted each other in frank and honest discussion. Participating in this symposium held during the Editors' Institute are: Rev. Albert P. Stauderman, Associate Editor of the Lutheran Magazine, Father John Reedy, Editor and Publisher of Ave Maria, and Wayne Cowan, Managing Editor of Christianity and Crisis. The topic for discussion: "The Religious Press and the Issue of Public Funds for the Church School

Rabbi Gilbert: What in your judgment, Rev. Stauderman, is the responsibility of our church press?

Rev. Stauderman: The church press has a responsibility to provide information. It should certainly tell its constituency why other people act the way they do. If it serves its purpose as fully as it should, then it will not simply propagandize, although of course, there are irresponsible elements in the church press which try to conceal every viewpoint but their own.

Father Reedy: I would like to make an additional point. Within each of the religious groups there is probably a wide diversity of opinion. The most obvious example today would concern the question of public aid to private schools. To the general public, the Catholic position seems to be a solid one. There is prevalent also the idea that Catholics hold a position, generally stated: "No Federal Aid to education without some form of aid to parochial schools." This is a great over-simplification. Within the Catholic Community there is a wide range of opinion: First on the whole issue of whether Federal Aid to education is needed. Then there is disagreement on whether Federal Aid if given, and if including aid to Parochial Schools, should be direct aid to a religious institution or whether it should be limited to aid to parents.

Rabbi Gilbert: Such a situation of divergent viewpoints prevails also in the Jewish Community. Although it would appear that most of the Jewish Community is opposed to the use of public funds for the Church School, the truth is that there are independent voices in the Jewish Press that have indicated their support of the use of public funds for the Church School. The press does not fulfill its function certainly if it does not give all these points of view adequate expression within their pages.

Mr. Cowan, how would you characterize the responsibility of the Protestant Press in this country in reporting and editorializing on this issue of public funds for the Church School?

Wayne Cowan: Except for a few almost remote denominations within Protestantism which have their own parochial schools, the Protestant Press had been quite solid in insisting that it would be unconstitutional for public aid to be given to the church-related school system. There has been, a virtual monolithic position within Protestantism on this question and there has been very little room for difference of opinion. The idea of a wall of separation has been the dominant view within Protestantism.

Rabbi Gilbert: Now, while the Protestant Community would appear almost overwhelmingly to be against the use of public funds for the church school, I get the impression from what Father Reedy says that there is some division within the Catholic Community on this issue. Would you clarify that a little more for us? How extensive is it really?

Father Reedy: There is not one firm position on the part of either the Protestant Community or the Catholic Community. I believe that the Catholic parent, who is very seriously concerned about this matter of the financing of private schools, will nevertheless fulfill his obligation as a citizen. As a citizen who pays taxes, and who also is involved in supporting a private school system, he will be concerned for the quality of education for all school children. In this he will fulfill his duties as a citizen, not simply as a Catholic. He knows that he has an obligation to the community at large. In other words, I think that it is possible for a Catholic - even for the parent of a child in a private school who feels that he has a right to some sort of consideration, based on the fact that he is supporting two school systems - I think it possible for this Catholic to recognize his obligation to the community at large. If in his pushing for his right he does serious damage to the community, then that is something he must take into serious consideration! There are some things that a citizen should not do in the interest of his sectarian purposes if those actions will harm the public good. I think that he has to conduct his discussion in a way that serves the community at large. He must use the legal means available to him and must conduct himself with dignity and with a sense of an obligation to the commonweal.

Rabbi Gilbert: Are you not suggesting, Father Reedy, that if there will be a clear consensus that there must be some form of public assistance for education in general and that no funds be legislated for church-related education, the Catholic will then be confronted with a choice between what he feels is his obligation as a Catholic parent as against his overriding duty as a citizen: i.e., to see to it that these public funds are made available for public education whether or not money is appropriated for church-related education?

Father Reedy: This is already the position held by many Catholic parents who have discussed the matter with me. I have talked to parents of large families of young children who maintain very clearly - regardless of what has appeared in the religious press and regardless of public statement by members of the Church - that they are going to support Federal Aid to education whether this aid comes to the Catholic schools or not. This I know is a position held by many responsible parents.

Rabbi Gilbert: Father Reedy has indicated that there are a variety of positions within the Catholic Community and some division as to what Catholic public policy ought be when the chips are down.

Rev. Stauderman: I am sure that is true. From within the Protestant Community we are aware of certain differences of opinion among Catholics. There's a rather prominent Catholic whose address is the White House, Washington, D.C. who has expressed his opinion that the granting of public funds for church-related schools is unconstitutional. There are differences of opinion among Protestants too. When we speak of "public funds for the church school" we must be aware that there are a variety of proposals that confront the American people. Proposals for textbooks for parochial school children or bus transportation for parochial school children may be seen as part of "child welfare benefits." These have been supported by some Protestants as within their understanding of the First Amendment and the separation of church and state.

Wayne Cowan: These "auxiliary services" are still a source of great conflict and as often as not are strongly opposed by Protestant groups in most parts of the country. It is fair to say that there is a group of Protestants who recognize that these are services to children, that they are not services essentially to the Catholic Church. Although the church does in an indirect way benefit from this the basic gain there is a gain for the child - just in the same way that you provide police protection at a street crossing for the child whether the child is going to a public school or a parochial school.

In response to Father Reedy's statement I would like to add that he is expressing a point of view that he may himself represent or one that he hears, and it is an extremely moderate one and a very prudent one. But I do not believe that this moderate view is very sympathetically supported from within the policy making structure of the Catholic Church.

Conclusion:

This exchange points up the important function of the church press to inform its constituents concerning religious principles as they apply to social problems. While the religious press has a right and a duty to editorialize and make comment on important problems in the social order, it has a responsibility also to provide this information as fairly and as objectively as possible, and to help its constituency understand the motivation and the viewpoints of those with whom they differ.

The Project Religious Freedom and Public Affairs hopes through continuing dialogue and confrontation in the spirit of this presentation, to lift the level of public debate in this country aiding the cause of religion and the public good.

PRESIDING BISHOP

Message of Importance

Presiding Bishop Lichtenberger has canceled all the next few months' speaking engagements and is assigning consecrations to other bishops, according to a letter sent recently to the bishops of the Church and to others.

In the letter, he said that he suffers a disability which makes speaking in public difficult, but that he has no immediate plans for resigning his office before the next General Convention.

In a later communication, he revealed that his disability has been diagnosed as Parkinson's syndrome.

Bishop Lichtenberger told the bishops:

"It has been brought to my attention recently that a number of people are concerned about my health. I do have a disability which I had hoped might be corrected by surgery before it became very noticeable. With this in mind, I told the Council of Advice, the presidents of the provinces, about my situation at the last meeting of the House of Bishops in Columbia, S. C. However, it seems clear to me that I should be quite frank and open about this now. . . .

"The first symptoms appeared in a very mild form in 1960. These have increased gradually, but not sufficiently to warrant surgery now. The prognosis is quite uncertain.

"There is no way of predicting how rapidly the disability will increase, or whether it will remain as it is at present. Most affected is my speech — I have a compulsion to rush headlong and to slur my words. It is quite difficult, therefore, for me to read the service, or to speak in public. I am hoping to find a way around or through this, but very reluctantly I must, for the next few months at any rate, assign the consecrations to other bishops, and cancel all speaking engagements.

"I regret this exceedingly, and I have hesitated to do this until it became quite evident that it was necessary and wise.

"Should I, under these circumstances, resign my office? I have given this much thought, and I have prayed about it. I hope I have come to a right decision. If a Presiding Bishop is elected between sessions of General Convention, he shall, according to the provisions of Article I, section III, of the Constitution, 'serve until the next General Convention.' While it is likely that a man so elected by the House of Bishops would be elected again at General Convention, and his election be confirmed by the House of Deputies, he would, until Convention, continue in his diocese and thus work under great difficulties.

"I believe, therefore, that I should carry on until the General Convention of 1964, when a successor could be elected in the usual way. I can continue my pastoral responsibilities; I can do my work as president of the National Council; I can preside at meetings of the House of Bishops. I plan to attend the sessions of the Anglican Congress next summer. It may be that this disability will reach a plateau, and when I have learned to live with it that I shall be under no handicap, and could continue until 1967. But I am not concerned with that possibility now. I do think, as I have said, that I can go on until 1964. If, at any time, I find that I cannot, I shall of course resign.

Fabian Bachrach

Bishop Lichtenberger: No plans for resigning.

"Let me assure you that I am not a sick man. This is not due to the pressure of work. This could not have been foreseen in 1958. It may have had its origin, as with many who have this difficulty now, in a case of 'flu during World War I, but the onset of the trouble was quite unpredictable and unexpected.

"I regret very much that I cannot, for the time being, do all that I should be doing as Presiding Bishop, but I rejoice that I am still able to be of service to our Lord in His Church.

"I know you will pray that God will give me patience and a right judgment in the days to come."

NORTHERN INDIANA

Dean Klein Elected

On the third ballot of a special convention of the diocese of Northern Indiana, the Very Rev. Walter C. Klein, dean of Nashotah House Theological Seminary, was elected Bishop Coadjutor of the diocese. The convention was held in St. James' Cathedral, South Bend, Ind., on March 13th.

Dean Klein's was one of ten names receiving votes on the first ballot, but the only other name to receive a substantial number of votes was that of the Very Rev. Robert F. Royster, dean of the South Bend cathedral. Dean Royster was given 10 clerical and 34 lay votes on the first ballot, while Dean Klein received 12 clerical and 25 lay votes. On that ballot, 16 clerical and 39 lay votes were necessary for election. On the second ballot, Dean Klein received 17 clerical and 36 lay votes (16 and 40, respectively, being necessary to elect), and Dean Royster was given 11 clerical and 35 lay votes. Dean Klein received 20 clerical and 42 lay votes on the third and deciding ballot, while Dean Royster received 11 and 35.

Others receiving votes on the first ballot were the Rev. Messrs. J. Ralph Deppen, Charles Gaskell, Edward Jacobs, Osborne Littleford, Leslie Olsen, Wallace Wells (who withdrew after the first ballot), George B. Wood, and Samuel Wylie.

RACE RELATIONS

Church School Turns Down Negro Child

Martin Luther King III, five-year-old son of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., a Baptist minister who has been active in seeking equal rights for Negroes, has been turned down on a bid for admission to the Lovett School, an Episcopal school in Atlanta, Ga.

Mrs. King, the boy's mother, told THE LIVING CHURCH that she and her husband had applied to enter the boy in the school's first grade next fall, subject to the usual pre-enrollment tests, but that the application had been denied. A letter from the school's headmaster, the Rev. James R. McDowell, dated February 23d, put it this way:

"Since the application of your son, Martin

Luther King III, was the first formal Negro application in the history of Lovett School, it was necessary for me to consult the admissions committee of the board of trustees. The bylaws of the institution are quite explicit in stating that admissions policies are set by the board. Due consideration was given this matter, including a full meeting of the board of trustees. It was decided at that meeting that, under present circumstances, it is not advisable to accept this application for testing.

"I am returning your check, therefore, in compliance with the board's directive. I apologize for any inconvenience you may have experienced pending the decision of the board of trustees."

The letter was signed by the Rev. James R. McDowell, headmaster of the school.

The school is listed in the Episcopal Church Annual for 1963 as the "Lovett Episcopal Day School," although it carries only the words, "Lovett School" on its letterhead. Its board of trustees is composed of 21 people, of whom seven must be members of St. Philip's Cathedral, Atlanta, and approved by the cathedral chapter; and at least seven of the remaining 14 must be Episcopalians. Part of the school's purpose, as defined in its charter (amended in 1959), is ". . . to further the cause of education and religion with reference to the teaching of the Episcopal faith as contained in the Book of Common Prayer."

An attempt was made in the meetings of the council of the diocese of Atlanta, held earlier this year [L.C., February 10th], to have the council adopt a non-segregation statement of policy. The attempt was ruled out of order, however, by Bishop Claiborne of Atlanta. The resolution, which had been approved by the committee on Christian social relations of the diocese, would have required:

Martin: First to apply, first to be denied.

". . . That all diocesan institutions and all present and future institutions maintaining an affiliation with the Episcopal Church by means of charter, boards of trustees, or by use of the name of the Church in official or unofficial title, advertisements, etc., in the diocese of Atlanta, make clear by statement and act that such institutions do not use race as a basis for their admission of persons and do welcome all applications meeting the requirements for admission, which applications will be processed equally regardless of race or color, in accordance with the oft-stated position of this Church."

At that time, Bishop Claiborne said in a press interview:

"In the diocese of Atlanta there are no institutions that are segregated, as far as I know. Surely none is officially segregated. . . . Segregation is a blight on our nation that must be removed. I am against it. . . . The council . . . has passed resolutions on this subject over and over and over. . . . Any demand for new resolutions on this subject seems to me to encourage doubt as to our sincerity in both principle and practice, which have been clearly demonstrated. . . . Every institution has been informed by the bishop that the name 'Episcopal' cannot be used if a policy of segregation is pursued. . . ."

Concerning the Lovett School situation, Bishop Claiborne told THE LIVING CHURCH:

"The diocese of Atlanta has no official connection with Lovett School. I have no official connection with Lovett School. I am sure the racial policy at Lovett School must be satisfactory, since the children of the Rev. John Morris [executive director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity] have been enrolled there for some time.

"If the family of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., do not find the admissions policy of Lovett School acceptable, and if they want their children to have an Episcopal educational background, they should apply to one of our parochial schools, where the Church is responsible — such as Holy Innocents' parish in Atlanta, where the Rev. John Morris and his family are affiliated."

LOUISIANA

Fire Burns Home, Two Die

A prominent Louisiana Churchman suffered a fatal heart attack and his wife died of asphyxiation during a fire that destroyed their home on March 11th.

The dead were Joseph Merrick Jones, 59, of Metairie, La., an attorney, president of the Tulane University board of administrators, and a grandson of Leonidas Polk (Episcopal bishop and Confederate general); and his wife, the former Eugenia Elizabeth Penick. Mrs. Jones was asphyxiated during the fire, and Mr. Jones died in a hospital a few hours later. The couple are survived by a son, Joseph Jones, Jr.; two daughters, Mrs. Killian Huger and Mrs. Harry Lane; and by Mr. Jones' mother, Mrs. Hamilton Polk Jones.

A passing motorist saw flames shooting from the roof of the two story house at 1:30 a.m., and shouted to attract the attention of neighbors, who called the fire department. Cause of the fire had not been learned at press time.

Mr. Jones, who was a member of the board of trustees of the diocese of Louisiana, was a contributor of generous sums of money to the University of the South. As co-chairman of the stewardship committee of Trinity Church, New Orleans, where he was a parishioner, he was active in planning and bringing to fruition a plan of remodelling and expanding the physical plant of the parish. In 1958, he was chosen as Rex (King of Carnival for the New Orleans Mardi Gras — prominent citizens are selected for this annual role).

He was, according to the New Orleans Times-Picayune, president of Canal Barge Company, Inc., president of the National Waterways Conference, past president of the Bureau of Governmental Research and of the New Orleans Bar Association; director and member of the executive committee of Penick and Ford, chairman of the executive committee of Southdown Sugars, chairman of Petroleum Reserves, a member of the board of directors of Coastal Marine Drilling and Construction Corporation and of the Louisiana-Delta Drilling Corporation, and a director of the Council for a Better Louisiana. In addition, he was a director of Acme Life Insurance Company; Baulerlein, Inc.; Dr. G. H. Tichenor Antiseptic Company; Cultural Attractions Fund; Tulane Educational Fund; Central Gulf Steamship Company; and the Urban Maes Research Foundation. He was also a trustee of the Isaac Delgado Museum of Arts.

The day after Mr. Jones' death, Tulane University was closed in mourning. At the University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn., Arthur Ben Chitty, historiographer, said faculty members were "shocked beyond measure" to learn of Mr. Jones' death. "He was a major benefactor of the University of the South, founded by his grandfather, Bishop Leonidas Polk of Louisiana. He also . . . held national stature among lay philosophers devoting themselves to its service. His kind is irreplaceable," said Mr. Chitty.

GENERAL CONVENTION

The Seal and the Fish

The official seal for the 1964 General Convention has been chosen. Documents of the Convention, as well as stationery and programs, will bear this insigne, which combines the Episcopal Church shield and the seal of the diocese of Missouri. The Convention is to be held in St. Louis, October 11 - 23, 1964.

The insigne is shaped as an equiangular diamond, divided vertically into two portions. The Church's shield is on the right half of the diamond, showing the nine crosslets (representing the Church's nine original dioceses) arranged as a St. Andrew's Cross (showing the ties of the

BISHOP CALLS RACIAL INJUSTICE A MATTER FOR CONFESSION

HERSHEY, Pa., March 28 (NC) - The Bishop of Wheeling, W. Va., said here that unjust treatment of Negroes by Catholics is a matter for confession.

Bishop Joseph H. Hodges, speaking to a leadership institute of the National Council of Catholic Women, said that racial discrimination deprives the Negro of honor due him as a human being.

"Unless we are just in our dealings with our neighbor, we can make no claim to love of God and love of neighbor," he said.

"In the Old Testament we read: 'Thou has loved justice and hated iniquity; therefore thy God hath annointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy neighbors.'

"God made Negroes human beings. In all justice, treat them as God does. Discrimination is a matter for confession."

The prelate defined racial discrimination as "the total restriction or rejection of a racial group without consideration of the capacity or merit or concrete behavior of the individuals in that group."

He said "segregation is a sub-division of discrimination where there is physical separation or specific boundaries set up."

Bishop Hodges discussed four basic rights due the Negro; the right of free association, the right to a decent living, the right to a full education according to his capacity and the right to freedom of worship.

Urging the women to study and [illegible] on the problem of racial discrimination, he said.

"Catholic [illegible] the field [illegible] relations has been too feeble in intensity [illegible] extensity. [illegible] Church has done much but not in proportion to [illegible]"

Truesdell Receives First "Christian Action Award"

Rev. Bryan Crenshaw (right) is shown here giving this first "Award" to Dr. Truesdell (center), with Dr. Truesdell's mother looking on. It states: "This first official recognition for Constructive Responsibility in Public Affairs and Christian Citizenship to a South Carolina Churchman is hereby awarded to The Rev. Dr. Neil E. Truesdell by the Christian Action Council."

The first official recognition of Christian leadership in public affairs by a church group in South Carolina was one of the highlights of the recent Annual Meeting of the Christian Action Council.

The resolution, presented by the Rev. Bryan Crenshaw (Methodist minister of Gaffney and vice-president of the Council) was as follows:

"WHEREAS our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ, taught us that we are to love one another, and seek the well-being of others . . . and

WHEREAS, you, Neil Truesdell, have exemplified these qualities in your personal life, showing concern for all men, especially the needy and distressed, and have sought to preach the gospel to the poor, heal the broken hearted, preach deliverance to the captives, and set at liberty those who are bruised, and

WHEREAS, you have demonstrated these qualities not only in your personal life but in leadership in CHRISTIAN SOCIAL CONCERN AND ACTION, as exemplified in your

STATE LEADERSHIP, as Chairman of the Board of Trustees of Fairview Alcoholic Rehabilitation Center; as Chairman of the Governor's Council on Alcoholism; as District Governor of Rotary International, and as President of the Christian Action Council; and in your

DENOMINATIONAL LEADERSHIP, as Chairman of the Special Synod Committee to study and recommend program for "Christian Action" to the S. C. Synod; as Chairman of the Special Synod Committee on Sunday Observance; and your leadership has been recognized in your church by the honorary Doctor of Divinity, conferred by Presbyterian College; and in your COMMUNITY LEADERSHIP, as "Pastor to the Community," your work with A.A., your continuing ministry to alcoholics; your work with Allied Youth, your service as chaplain to the Newberry Fire Department, your ministry to the needy, and your wide service in community, health, and welfare groups; and in your

STATEMENT OF OCTOBER 6, 1962, regarding the approach of South Carolina to desegregation, which was the first public statement by a South Carolina leader (church, political, or economic) that our state follow a pattern of behavior different from that of Mississippi.

BE IT THEREFORE RESOLVED, on this 26th day of March, 1963, that the CHRISTIAN ACTION COUNCIL, assembled in Columbia, S. C., in its Annual Meeting, express on behalf of itself and its members its affection and appreciation for your tireless, courageous, unselfish, and Christ-motivated endeavors, and award to you our initial presentation of the CHRISTIAN ACTION AWARD."

Granting the special award to Dr. Truesdell and hearing three of the state's denominational leaders discuss "social needs in South Carolina that call for Christian Action" were memorable events at the Council's recent Annual Meeting.

Members of 11 denominations heard Dr. Horace Hammett (General Secretary of Baptist State Convention), Bishop Carey Gibbs, (African Methodist Episcopal), and Arthur M. Martin, (Executive Secretary, Presbyterian Synod) discuss some of the common concerns of all Christians in the Palmetto state.

Hammett Commends

"The Christian Action Council is now coming into its greatest day and place of service," Dr. Hammett emphasized. "I hope the Council will be alert as never before . . . as concerted Christian Action is so important," he added, stating further that "the Council may be deliberate but it is steady and sure."

Officers Elected

Leaders of four denominations were elected as officers: President — Dr. Neil Truesdell (Presbyterian); Vice-Presidents, Mrs. D. C. Bomar (Baptist) and Rev. Bryan Crenshaw (Methodist), and Secretary — Rev. Neal Wyndham (Christian).

Also elected as directors were Dr. R. Wright Spears (citizenship), Rev. Arthur Martin (Community Service), A. M. Taylor (Education), Dr. R. Archie Ellis (Finance), and Dr. Wallace Fridy (Public Relations.) Two new members named to the Executive Committee were Rev. Harold Cole (Baptist) and Rev. Frederick James (A.M.E.)

Annual Report

"To build a civilization which will be a fit habitat for the human spirit is our purpose."

After enumerating and discussing all the evidence of economic and social progress in his country, Gov. Luis Munoz-Marin of Puerto Rico recently went on to state that all such change was only the means to the greater objective of cultural growth. His statement, in essence quoted above, is an excellent formulation of the social purpose for which Christians should strive in their endeavors to give expression and real meaning to the Lord's Prayer: "Thy will be done, thy kingdom come — on earth as in heaven."

The Church, as Church in public affairs, always places "A child in their midst" — always evaluates the social and physical environment, the climate of community opinion — in terms of human values, especially as social influences affect the potential growth and fulfillment of every single individual.

In such understanding we can find the ways in which the Christian Action Council can be used by God and His churches here in South Carolina. While being a witness to the proclamation of God's care for each person — that He would redeem all who come to Him in faithful obedience, the Council also should be an evidence of, and influence for, God's concern that the civilization of our state provide a fit social and spiritual habitat for the redeemed human spirit.

Functions of Council

To carry out such a purpose with and for the Protestant churches of South Carolina, the Council has come to interpret its work in five specific functions:

first, to provide a reliable, responsible source of information about citizenship and public affairs;

second, to make available films and materials for "Christian Action" education to individuals, churches, and groups, third, to assist denominations and their agencies in strengthening and implementing their programs of Christian Action, fourth, to make possible continued interchurch study and discussion on matters of common social and moral concern, and fifth, to be the agency of cooperative action by denominations and churchmen on matters of consensus which require corporate action.

A Changing Mood

The past year has witnessed a very significant "change of mood" in the "cultural climate" of our state (which provides the context in which we must work.) This is most evident in racial relationships, although it is by no means limited to this particular area of our society. It should be noted:

(1) racism as a political issue "died" (though perhaps it is not yet buried) in the 1962 elections;

(2) the quiet, determined, peaceful desegregation of lunch counters in Columbia in August, 1963;

(3) the impact of the "vicarious suffering" of Mississippi (in the Ole Miss desegregation tragedy) resulted in the growing opinion that "it must not happen here!"; and

(4) the "desegregation with dignity" at Clemson College — preceded by unified and determined efforts of many political and economic leaders — included also the "preparation of the soil of opinion" in which many churches and Christians — lay and clergy — in the state had a part.

There are indications that there will be greater freedom, in the future, to meet and discuss our problems together as Christian brethren. White Christians need to be aware that "no man's origin should be held against him," and work to eliminate the ways in which opportunity for that reason is denied to Negroes in our midst. We will, however, need to develop greater freedom with each other across racial lines — to enable us to think and work together to strengthen churches and the Christian witness where it is weak, to discuss the human problems that are deeper than our racial differences, to work together on social issues for which we have a common concern as Christian citizens.

Projects, 1963-64

One very important undertaking for the next year will be planning for a strengthened organization through which more effective "Christian Action" can be implemented in the future. This planning should enable us to have some important "interchurch confrontation" — to help us understand each other better and develop the basis on which we can work joyfully with each other.

Three really "big" programs should be studied and begun in the next year:

One, a study and action program (perhaps projected for 3-4 years) to aid in strengthening the total correctional system,

Two, develop an In-Service Training Program for young ministers (oriented to interdenominational understanding, community service, and Christian social action), and Three, Citizenship education program through the churches.

"These Things Are Needed!"

The executive director has the responsibility both to carry out the decisions made by the Council and also to indicate those things needed to achieve those objectives to which it is commissioned.

These include the following:

organizational — a larger and more representative membership from each "cooperating denomination" which would be the official liaison between the two, as well as the recognition of the Council by the denominations as "the recognized and supported agency of the cooperating denominations for study and action on social and moral issues;"

staff — at least an additional part-time staff person, with corresponding secretarial increase, to work especially for "Education and Youth;"

finances — by 1964-65 to increase our annual income (from $20,282.25 in 1962) to $26,650 and by 1967-68 to $35,000 — based on a minimum support of 5¢ per member per year from the cooperating denominations and a greatly increased number of individual contributions; denominational — both recognition of the essential witness of the Church through Christian Action and stronger support for their own Christian Action agency and development of local church committees to study and work on social and moral issues.

In Summary

The past year has been one of satisfactory growth in the program, services, and recognition of the Christian Action Council.

My continuing prayer is that God will be glorified through our work together and that the Lordship of Jesus Christ will be increasingly recognized in South Carolina through the distinctive ministry of the Christian Action Council.

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

February 26, 1963

Lutheran Human Relations
Association of America
Valparaiso University
Valparaiso, Indiana

Greetings!

The Lutheran Human Relations Association of America has worked for ten years in the area of seeking recognition and help for minority groups in our beloved nation. This country, under God, from its beginnings has stood out in the world promising a haven of refuge and a land of opportunity.

This promise has not always developed all the fruit hoped for. The Lutheran Human Relations Association, however, has sought to remedy inequities though it has been difficult at times to do so. Indeed some have said that the organization "goes too far"; others have said that it "does too little."

Be assured that my office, in recognition of the sincere and conscientious concerns for good by a voluntary organization of fellow Christians and fellow members of The Lutheran Church - Missouri Synod, wishes you well on your Tenth Anniversary.

It is my personal prayer that my gracious Savior, without whom none of us is worth anything at all, would give you wisdom and understanding, wise counsel and patience and continued great care for holy Scripture.

May God in his bountiful kindness reward you for your service.

In Jesus' name

LHRAA and The Lutheran Church - Missouri Synod

This issue of The VANGUARD is bringing to the attention of our readers a letter that was received by the Lutheran Human Relations Association of America from the President of The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, Dr. Oliver R. Harms. The letter is evidence of a growing understanding and acceptance of what LHRAA has been trying to do for the church and the nation.

LHRAA had its origin on the campus of Valparaiso University at the occasion of the Institute on Human Relations in 1953. From the beginning the University identified itself, primarily through its President, Dr. O. P. Kretzmann, with LHRAA, its aims and objectives. Other organizations, like the University, which function as independent institutions within The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, have cooperated with LHRAA from the time of its inception. Among them are the Walther League, the American Lutheran Publicity Bureau, the Lutheran Laymen's League, and Associated Lutheran Charities.

From the beginning of its history and until now, LHRAA has enjoyed the understanding concern and cooperation of official boards and commissions of The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod. Outstanding among them are the Board for North American Missions, the Board for Parish Education, and, since its inception, the Board of Social Welfare.

But LHRAA deems it most significant that, only a few months after he took over the office of President of The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, Dr. Harms addressed to the Association the letter of commendation found on the cover page of this issue.

LHRAA is deeply grateful to Dr. Harms for this expression of confidence. It is our hope and prayer that we shall remain true to the trust which such confidence implies. On the other hand, we hope that throughout the church there will be found a growing acceptance of what LHRAA is trying to do for the church; that, in keeping with the great need in our time for the kind of service the Association is committed to give to the church, there will be a growing spirit of cooperation on the grass roots level and an ever greater acceptance of the service we desire and are prepared to render on all levels of church organization.

LHRAA, functioning as a private and independent agency within the church, is on no synodical or district budget. It is dependent for its finances upon the contributions of its 1,034 members, some congregational auxiliaries, and such congregations as have recognized the importance of the Association's work and now make contributions toward its financial needs.

This Issue

The VANGUARD is ordinarily mailed to its subscribers. This issue, however, is being sent to all pastors and Christian day school teachers of The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod. Those who are not as yet members of LHRAA, but find themselves in sympathy with the principles and functions of the Association, are invited to become members by making a membership contribution. Every LHRAA member receives The VANGUARD free. Those who are not as yet ready to become members are invited, if they have not done so already, to subscribe for The VANGUARD. (Membership and subscription blank on Page 7.)

Further information about the purposes and services of LHRAA will be sent free upon request.

A LOOK AROUND

Martin H. Scharlemann

1. ROMANS NINE THROUGH ELEVEN

Few privileges could be greater than that of studying Paul's great epistle to the Romans with a class of Seminary students. We have this happy task almost each quarter. By the time we finish chapters nine through eleven, every member in the group begins to understand why this Pauline letter is often called the greatest theological treatise that has ever been written. There would be a great void in the life and thought of the Church, if we did not have this letter. Would there have been a Martin Luther? Very likely not.

At the moment our chief interest lies in pointing out that the three chapters referred to deal with the question of Judaism as it relates to the Church. The basic issue to which the apostle addresses himself is the question, "How does the existence of the Jewish race and religion relate to the concept of righteousness by faith?" His conclusion: God has from the beginning dealt with His people in terms of promise rather than demand. Israel rejected the Messiah, born in its very midst, because He came in fulfilment of God's promises. The only response to such a gift can be either glad acceptance or outright rejection; and a people determined to serve God on the basis of its own achievement can only refuse to accept a gift, since God's giving involves the total negation of the principle of accomplishment.

Here is the difference between religion and revelation. Judaism is a religion; but the Church proclaims a righteousness entirely apart from any system of religion. Religion is evil when it is man-centered. Judaism failed (and still fails) to recognize Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah because it is too much absorbed in its own activity. Like Paul, therefore, a number of Jews have, through the centuries, felt the inadequacy of their religious heritage and came to see that true "Jewishness" was to be found in the Church's understanding of the Old Testament as being a covenant of promise primarily, and not a covenant of Law.

Judaism is very much on the hearts and consciences of Christians today. This is partly the result of and in part the consequence of contemporary studies of the relationship between Jew and Christian. A general consensus has developed within recent years that the Jew is still a member of a race that lives with the promises of God. In his background are the patriarchs, the giving of the Law, and the coming of the Messiah in a way that will never apply to the Gentile-Christian. The Jew, therefore, should be treated by Christians as the member of a privileged race, to which promises were given that find their real fulfillment in the Church. The "whole of Israel" in Romans 11:26 consists of two parts: Gentiles and Jews that have accepted Jesus as the Messiah.

2. AND SO . . .

And so it needs to be said that for some years the Lutheran Human Relations Association of America has

That the Church May Lead

National Conference on Religion and Race

In an early morning TV interview, Secretary of State Dean Rusk recently said that the most serious problem confronting our nation today is the race problem. And when responsible churchmen of our country speak out on the subject, they make similar statements concerning race and the church. It is true that man's alienation from God and his stubborn refusal to accept the reconciliation effected through Jesus Christ is the basic problem confronting both the nation and the church. There nevertheless can be little doubt in the minds of knowledgeable people that one of the most serious problems confronting the church is that symptom of the basic sin of man expressed in man's rejection of man which in our country takes on the form of vicious, or subtle, racism.

Kyle Haselden, in his excellent book, The Racial Problem in Christian Perspective (Harper & Row, Publishers), speaks of racism in the U.S. as "without a doubt the major and most serious problem of human relationships in our time." "The church," he says, "either in timidity or in indifference has defaulted in almost total silence. . . . Such progress as has been made toward the solving of those disorders is the merit, not of the church, but of the secular institutions in our culture. We must not, of course, as the late Dr. Charles S. Johnson warned, indict the Christian faith because of the church's failure, nor must we forget the permeating influence of that faith upon the social sciences and the secular institutions. Nevertheless, even a casual survey of the voluminous literature, which runs into thousands of volumes on the subject of race and race prejudice, and a hasty classification of the areas and agencies of progress and solution leave the church condemned and the social sciences and secular institutions highly accredited" (pp. 68-69).

In the context in which the quotation from Mr. Haselden's book is found, he is speaking directly of the dearth of theologically-oriented books. But the paucity of reading material of this description, as he amply shows, is evidence of the backwardness of the "white" churches in the U.S. in coming to grips with the problem itself.

Since the Oxford Conference of 1939, and with an ever-increasing display of interest, the major church bodies have made pronouncements condemning racism as contrary to Christian ethics and a true witness to Christ. And, recognizing the necessity of translating words into deeds, many within these church bodies have been trying to fit the action to the word, often at a great personal sacrifice. But in spite of good pronouncements and, in many places, noteworthy attempts to help change for the better the status quo in race relations, the moral forces of the churches of the U.S. have not been in evidence as one might anticipate: Churches largely remain segregated, and racial discrimination is still running rampant in communities where the churches are or from where they have removed themselves.

AND NOW — ANOTHER CONFERENCE

Something startlingly new has developed. From January 14th to 17th some seven hundred official delegates and about five hundred invited observers attended the first National Conference on Religion and Race. The Conference was held at the Edgewater Beach Hotel in Chicago. About a year and a half before the Conference was convened, committees had begun making preparations for the Conference which in more than one respect was unique. The Conference, we are told, was the brainchild of Mr. Mathew Ahmann, the young dynamic Executive Director of the National Catholic Council for Interracial Justice.

The conveners of the Conference were the Department of Racial and Cultural Relations of the National Council of Churches, the Social Action Commission of the Synagogue Council of America, and the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference.

Along with other organizations, the National Lutheran Council and the Lutheran Human Relations Association of America were at the outset invited to participate in the structuring of the Conference.

PROGRAM

With the financial support of many religious organizations and sizeable grants from charitable foundations, the conveners were enabled to secure essayists and speakers who in their judgment were the best talent available.

The altogether legitimate and laudatory purpose of the Conference was to unite the moral forces of our religious bodies, with their several theologically motivated approaches, in a direct attack upon racism which is gnawing at the vitals of our nation and threatening the destruction of church and nation.

In addition to attending the plenary sessions which were addressed by religious and religiously motivated leaders, the delegates to the Conference participated in what was perhaps the most effective part of the program, the workgroups. There were more than thirty of them. These workgroups explored every possible aspect of the race problem as well as ways of combating it. — It was the reports of the workgroups which furnished the plans for future united action.

OUTCOME

The Conference voted that the Conference secretariat be continued for at least four months. A budget of $8,000 was allowed. At this writing more than three times that amount has already been promised by responsible persons or organizations.

A book is being published which contains all Conference essays and addresses, as well as the findings and recommendations of the Conference workgroups and of the Conference itself. All other pertinent available information about the Conference, its origin, planning, convening, and definite plans for continued activity will be made accessible to interested persons in this book, entitled Race: Challenge to Religion. It is being published in a hard-back edition at $5.00 per copy, and in paperback at $1.65. The book will no doubt be an important adjunct to the library of interested persons — pastors and laymen. But it is intended for much wider use by con-

A Committee on Follow-up was appointed with the responsibility for "the local community action which might grow out of the Conference." The chairman of this committee, the Rev. Arthur E. Walmsley, wrote as of February 13: "By and large, the religious institutions of America have had little initiative in racial change. In the main it comes from government, from national and community voluntary organizations, through the direct action movements, and by political, legal, and economic pressures. Whether the weight of united action by religious leadership will make much difference is a question which can only be answered in action terms. Certainly the potential of corporate action, backed up by our understanding of human dignity and unity, is an alternative to the fear-ridden excuse for living which is a mark of our contemporary cities. The Conference has already been written off by some as a well-meaning gesture, one more token effort to disguise the anxiety and guilt which characterizes human relations in America today."

"Chicago was a milestone in inter-religious cooperation. . . . If that spirit will now forthrightly and unitedly confront the social and moral chaos of the churches and the nation, Time (which spoke in somewhat uncomplimentary terms about the Conference) will be provided with an answer."

But two more specifics relative to the Conference plans for implementing its purpose:

(a) A concerted effort will be made to develop regional inter-religious conferences where grass-roots development of action programs can be planned and executed.

(b) Ten cities have been selected where pilot projects will be conducted: Chicago, Detroit, San Francisco, Oakland, San Antonio, New Orleans, Seattle, Pittsburgh, Atlanta, and St. Louis.

THEOLOGY INVOLVED

Let it be said at the outset that this writer as well as those to whom he is directly responsible — the Board of Directors of LHRAA — are convinced that it is not only theologically sound but also mandatory that those who profess the name of the Lord Jesus Christ take seriously the words of the prophet Micah, "He has showed you, O man, what is good; and what does the Lord require of you but to do justice, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with your God?" We are to seek "the peace of the city." We can and must work with our serious-minded Jewish friends as well as with others to combat a common evil in the interest of the common good.

On a much lower plane of ethical responsibility, Christian men and women cooperate with our Jewish neighbors. We do it in business. We do it in politics and in government. If The VANGUARD hasn't said so before, we hope it isn't too late to say it now: Our Jewish friends have given moral and financial support toward the eradication of racism in our land far out of proportion to their numerical strength.

When Christians and Jews come together to cooperate in a program such as the National Conference on Religion and Race, one must assume that, though they have a common concern, they do not have the same theological motivation. The Jews, if they are faithful to their heritage of the past two thousand years, draw their theology from what Christians call the Old Testament, and at the same time they, the Jews, do not recognize what Christians call the New Testament. And without that recognition they do not accept Jesus Christ as the consummation of God's promises given to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and all of God's people before Christ.

According to traditional Christianity, the whole of the Old Testament teaching is subverted or negated if Jesus Christ is not recognized and accepted as God incarnate. Jesus Christ is to the Christian the Beginning and the Ending, the Alpha and the Omega; He is the Way, the Truth, and the Life; and no man can come to the Father but by Him. If this is true, and if Christians and Christian churches are to cooperate with Jewish people and with Jewish synagogues — and they should in areas of mutual moral and ethical concern — these basic theological differences cannot be ignored nor by-passed; and whatever is said or done dare not imply that the 2000-year theological separation has been resolved nor even that it is a matter of indifference. In any joint endeavor, the consciences of none dare be violated.

An Appeal to Conscience

A veritable Who's Who of theological talent was chosen by the organizing committee of the National Conference on Religion and Race to constitute the Drafting Committee whose responsibility it was to draft and to present to the Conference "A Statement of Conscience." Over a period of six months a number of meetings of the committee was held; other theologians, we understand, were consulted as the work of the committee developed.

A few days before the Conference convened, the office of LHRAA received a copy of "A Statement of Conscience" which the committee planned to present to the Conference for adoption.

Though committed to the necessity of cooperating with all religious organizations to be represented in the National Conference on Religion and Race, and recognizing a common moral concern, this writer, when receiving the Statement of Conscience to be submitted to the Conference, was less than pleased with it. It was for all practical purposes a theological statement. It included such terms as "God's love," "our concern is for the laws of God," "belief in God, Who is the giver of human dignity and human rights," "we confess and repent our own failures," "we seek forgiveness of God our Father Whose supreme law of love we have broken," "we desire the renewal of a religious conscience," "we seek a reign of love," "we seek a reign of courage so that the people of God will make their faith in God their most binding commitment," "in the strength of God, our Father," "we seek a reign of prayer, so that our God is praised as the Lord Whom we all worship," "do this for the glory of our Father's name," "proceed with the zeal and freedom of the children of God, to make all things ready for the Day of the Lord."

Our disagreement is not necessarily with these terms themselves; it is rather to be found in the fact that these terms were used in a theological statement prepared in an environment which could permit but one thing — the elimination of any witness to Jesus Christ. If the National Conference on Religion and Race was to be a joint effort of Christians and Christian churches united in a common moral concern, the theological terms employed by the drafters of the Statement of Conscience, in the opinion of this writer, might well have been employed without the denial of Christ, the Son of God and Head of the Church. But the Statement was not intended to be a Christian statement of conscience; our Jewish friends were to be an integral part of the Conference, and the statement was intended to be a statement of conscience for Jewish people as well. Bearing this in mind one can understand why no specific reference to Jesus Christ was made in the statement. But by eliminating all reference to Jesus Christ, the Drafting Committee prepared a statement of Jewish theological content, intended for both Christians and Jews.

A parallel. In one of the Conference workgroups, a priest of the Episcopal Church suggested that, in the preparation of educational materials to be used by congregations, the Lord's Prayer be used as the text. A Jewish rabbi, who was acting as the workgroup discussion leader, said material based on the Lord's Prayer could not be used. The response of the priest was something to this effect: Our Jewish friends believe in God as "our Father"; they believe His name should be hallowed, His kingdom should come, His will be done, etc. Then why could they not use educational materials based on the Lord's Prayer? The response of the rabbi was an

FREEDOM OF RESIDENCE

"Segregated housing is unchristian, unfair, undemocratic and un-American." Statements like this were "a dime a dozen" at a Freedom of Residence Conference at Springfield, Illinois, on February 15-16. The conference membership covered a five-state area: Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Iowa and Missouri. All who attended were citizens from all walks of life who were interested in promoting legislation forbidding discrimination in housing, both public and private. It was my privilege to attend and have a part on the program and serve as a discussion leader. I would like to share some of the facts and insights of this conference.

Of the five states involved in this conference, Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri have no housing legislation. Indiana has statutes covering public housing. Wisconsin has statutes covering both public housing and publicly assisted housing and urban renewal. None of these five states has any law that prohibits discrimination in either public or private housing. That there is such discrimination in housing is common knowledge. But there is increasing concern that such discrimination be eliminated. Legislation is regarded as a most effective means of bringing this about. However, it was plain from all the discussion that legislation can only make for outward compliance. As in the problem of desegregation, as a whole, there is an area of good will and friendliness into which men must enter if they are to live together in peace and harmony.

It was to be expected that such a conference would emphasize the un-American aspect of segregated housing. On the one-hundredth anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation it is only natural that freedom of residence be recognized as a part of the whole problem of discrimination. The spirit that called for the emancipation of slaves one hundred years ago must now be called forth anew to bring our recognized freedoms to pass.

It was encouraging to hear several men on the conference program refer specifically to what the Christian faith has to say regarding segregated housing. It was called "unchristian." Racism was branded as "an insult to God" and a "dishonor to our fellowmen." This is the religious and specifically the Christian challenge of "Freedom of Residence." Our duty to God is discharged when we recognize and practice our duty to our fellowmen. The church must understand its responsibility to expose the true character of racism for what it is. The church must then positively seek for those things that will give to all men the civil rights that she claims for herself. Equal right, both civil and religious, are not some prize to be given as a reward to any one group for work well done. Equal rights are for all as guaranteed by the Constitution, but especially as a free gift of God. "God is no respecter of persons" for His powers of creation were used for the good of all. Lent should now remind us that His mercy, as offered in Christ, is for all men. This glorious fact the church must proclaim and practice.

"Freedom of Residence" therefore is something we must promote as Christian citizens. The facts show that much has been done but that much still remains. Here are a few of these facts.

Only ten states have statutes prohibiting discrimination in public housing, publicly assisted housing, publicly assisted urban renewal or private housing accommodations. These states are New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Colorado and Oregon. Four states have laws covering public housing, namely, Washington, Idaho, Indiana and Michigan. Montana has laws covering publicly assisted housing or urban renewal. Wisconsin and California have laws covering both public housing and publicly assisted housing and urban renewal. Three cities, New York, Pittsburgh and Toledo, have local ordinances prohibiting discrimination in private housing. All other states and cities have no legislation that deals with the problem of housing.

It is evident from a conference like this that simple patriotism should lead citizens to seek an honest answer to the problem. However, from the variety of topics that were discussed in small groups, it is also evident that there are many aspects that need to be considered. There are the questions of how to win the cooperation of realtors and bankers; how to explode myths about the differences between whites and Negroes; what must be the strategy of those who do move into the white community; how to show the values of integrated neighborhoods and how much it costs to have those that are segregated.

The discussion group I was asked to lead had to do with "the important goal of freedom and unity of all mankind." This raised the question of how to persuade white people really to accept Negroes as fellow human beings entitled to equal respect. Most of the members of our groups professed the Christian faith and all were agreed that what we believe should

On Valparaiso Campus

The Executive Chairman of the Chicago Host Committee of the National Conference on Religion and Race was the Hon. James B. Parsons, Federal Judge of the U.S. District Court of Northern Illinois. In 1960 Judge Parsons was elected judge of the Superior Court of Cook County, and in 1961 he was appointed by the President of the United States to the judicial bench he now occupies.

Judge Parsons thrilled both the faculty and the student body when he was the convocation speaker on the Valparaiso campus. The date was February 12, the birthday of Abraham Lincoln. Fittingly, and with the objectivity of one who in personality and decorum does credit to the high office to which he has been appointed, the judge spoke on the centennial of the Emancipation Proclamation.

Following the convocation, at a luncheon in the Judge's honor, a number of things came out in the "table talk" that may be of interest to our readers. The Judge, as an attorney, argued many cases in Springfield, Illinois, in the Sangamon County Courthouse and in the same courtroom where Abraham Lincoln often made his appearance. Judge Parsons, in order to fulfill his convocation responsibility, declined a personal invitation for the same day extended him by the President and Mrs. Kennedy to be their guest at the White House. Although he is not a Lutheran himself, his son is. Judge Parsons knows a good bit about Lutherans, and about The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod in particular.

Chicago's American reports that Malcolm X, second-ranking leader of the Black Muslims, called Judge Parsons a "handkerchief-head Negro," and an "Uncle Tom," "a puppet of the white slavemaster." These names were given to the Judge at the convention of the Black Muslims held in Chicago the last week in February. We shall be compelled to make a choice: either we listen to and cooperate with such great American leaders among our Negro citizens as typified in Judge Parsons, or succumb to the cat-calls and subversive activities of these black supremacists whose numbers are increasing and whose threats to church and nation are considerable and dangerous.

honest one that should have been anticipated: "But the Lord's Prayer was spoken by Jesus." In other words, the terminology employed in the Lord's Prayer is innocent and perhaps could be accepted by those who are Jewish, but when they appear in a Christian social setting — Jesus Christ speaking the words — they become Christian. By the same token, theological terminology, otherwise used by Christians, when used to avoid the mention of Christ in order to satisfy a Jewish conscience becomes a Jewish statement and in that sense a denial of the person and work of Jesus Christ, both of which are categorically denied by Judaism.

A CONCLUSION

In view of all that has been said thus far about the Statement of Conscience that was to be presented to the Conference by the Drafting Committee, this writer took upon himself the responsibility of responding to the Statement of Conscience in the hope that the mistakes referred to might in some way be eliminated by the Drafting Committee before making their final recommendations to the Conference. The following statement was drawn up by this writer and presented first to the chairman of the Drafting Committee and then to the Committee itself:

"In a religiously pluralistic society and under a democratic form of government such as ours, there is opportunity and a responsibility for the several religious professions to articulate their moral and ethical concerns and to work together for the eradication of an evil that all religious groups deplore and to which all of them have contributed — the evil of racism. This conference has been planned and is now convened for that purpose.

"Such united action can and must become a reality, although the theological differences that ante-date the racism of the 20th century, by many centuries, still exist in boldness and in strength. The exigencies of the social, political, and economic revolution that is currently sweeping across our world call for humility on the part of all, and have humbled some. They have made them ready to communicate in honesty with each other toward a better understanding and a possible mending of the rift that has divided them for hundreds of years. Such conversation must go on and must be intensified.

"This conference, however, has not been called for the purpose of such communication that has as its goal the removal of theological differences. By the same token, any statement drawn up and accepted by this conference must not directly or by implication suggest that the theological differences are either overcome or considered unimportant. If that were the outcome of our convening, no real progress will have been made in the area of the specific concern that has brought us together.

"Traditional Christian theology is centered in the person of Jesus Christ, Who, according to that theology, is God incarnate; forgiveness is through Him; prayer is accepted when offered in His Name; Christian love is not merely obedience to a moral code to which also non-Christians can subscribe, but is rather a new life given to man through Jesus Christ.

"It follows then that a statement of conscience which meticulously avoids even the mention of the name of Jesus Christ, but nevertheless employs such terminology which in Christian theology is always identified with the Christian believer's relationship to Jesus Christ, is to the Christian a denial of Jesus Christ.

"The statement of conscience, however, to be accepted by this conference need not be a Christian statement. It should not be, because this is not a Christian conference.

"The terminology cannot be Jewish either. But if proper reference to Christ is omitted in an obviously theological statement to which our Jewish conferees can subscribe, the statement from the Christian viewpoint has been reduced to the least common denominator and has thus become not a joint statement of all of us, but a statement of those representing a very small segment of our society, and perhaps less than one-tenth of those who are here as representatives of religious bodies.

"A theological statement that is neither Christian nor Jewish but rather an attempted synthesis of the two is at this juncture in history neither honest nor of any real practical value and is a violation of the consciences of both Jews and Christians.

"If a statement is advisable and necessary, it should be confined to an expression of our mutual awareness of the problem of racism, of our moral and ethical concern, of our determination to work together as representatives of different religious bodies on the level of citizens of the United States toward our mutually expressed common goal — liberty and justice for all our citizens. Such a statement can become an instrument to be used individually by each religious group represented to reexamine its religious motives and to implement the expression of them for the common good."

FRIENDLY RECEPTION

For several reasons we have gone into some detail in trying to give a fairly comprehensive word picture of the National Conference on Religion and Race. The Conference, or something like it, has become a necessity rather than a luxury. We of LHRAA are committed to cooperating on certain levels — as in the case of the Conference — with all persons and agencies of good will whose purpose it is to help eradicate racism from our land. We believe that in doing so there should be no denial of our Christian witness merely to get the job done.

A final reason for elaborating on the Conference on the pages of The VANGUARD is that we are aware of a deep concern on the part of Christians of other communions that Christ be not denied when working with those who do not share our Christian commitment. This concern was in evidence when the chairman of the Drafting

NEW BOOK RELEASED

When OUR IMAGE ABROAD came off the press a few days ago and LHRAA's Executive Secretary Andrew Schulze presented the first copy of the book to Valparaiso University President, Dr. O. P. Kretzmann, two students from Tanganyika, Nicholas Maro and Mika Urio, were on hand to observe. The new book contains presentations made at the 1962 Valparaiso University Institute on Human Relations held on the university's campus last July. The Institute had devoted its time and attention to determining what the image of America and the church in America is in the eyes of other nations. Among the speakers were personnel attached to the Washington embassies of Nigeria and India, an observer of world affairs, and two well-traveled and deeply concerned churchmen. One of these is Dr. Kretzmann.

Valparaiso University itself has been concerned about this very subject in even greater depth and the presence of Mika Urio and Nicholas Maro on the campus gives expression of such concern.

TEN YEARS OLD

How does one celebrate a birthday? The Lutheran Human Relations Association of America is ten years old as of this year. The Reverend Walter F. Wolbrecht, Executive Director of The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, made a suggestion a few weeks ago and LHRAA's Board of Directors liked the idea so well that the machinery is now moving to execute plans.

Dr. Wolbrecht pointed out that the observance ought to be one in which Lutherans everywhere are given opportunity to participate. This calls for a sort of "coast-to-coast birthday party."

Beginning in September, and continuing for several weeks, anniversary dinners will be held at least in cities where there are LHRAA chapters, possibly others. The first of these will be held in St. Louis, and Dr. Wolbrecht offered his help in arranging this.

Wherever possible it is hoped that Synodical officials or other church leaders will also be present to speak. Local chapters will be responsible for the host role in most instances.

More than merely "celebrate," LHRAA is eager to interpret its work in the church, a work that to many has remained unknown or obscure. More than this. In the recounting of its role and performance, the Association wishes to acknowledge with gratitude the blessing of the Lord of the Church on its work and to invite others to join in such expression of thanksgiving. And LHRAA hopes to enlist the concern and commitment of many more as it embarks on a second decade of service to the Lord in the world.

In a forthcoming issue of The VANGUARD a complete list of anniversary observances, with place and date, will be printed.

made available special materials which deal with our responsibilities toward Jews. These items have been designed to help our pastors and congregations in this area.

We are not here arguing pro domo. On the contrary, the relationship is quite the reverse. The chief reason we are personally in the Association and regularly contribute such a column as this is found in the conviction that this organization came into existence to face some very acute problems in a very realistic and God-pleasing way, without any "Yes-buts." Nor has it ever contented itself with talking in the abstract. Its studies, its pamphlets, its programs have always been motivated by the question, "How can we help the Church be the Church on these issues?" In this way it has served in much the same way that other agencies have.

Again and again, it has been individuals and groups within our Church that have sensed certain problems and devoted their energies to possible solutions. Lutheran hospitals, orphanages, Altenheime came into being that way. Today we have a university (Valparaiso), not because Synod as such saw an opportunity to move into this void in our total church life, but because a dedicated handful of laymen and clergy felt the time had come to act in this matter. The LHRAA has done much the same: alerting the Church to the nature of the problems inherent in the racial and religious pluralism of our country, with particular emphasis on those aspects of the situation which offered Christians an opportunity to "empty themselves" as did their Lord in obedience to the Father's will.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE

Committee invited this writer to meet with him while the Conference was in session and before the Statement was to be presented. In this private meeting, which lasted an hour, the chairman of the Committee made repeated expressions of concern similar to those expressed by us; with him it seemed to be not merely a matter of diplomatically silencing a dissenter but of one Christian conscience addressing itself to another Christian conscience. Something of the same spirit seemed to be evident among other members of the Committee when, upon invitation, this writer met with the entire Committee the morning after he had met with the chairman.

A theological statement which, understood in its context of development is less than Christian, was nevertheless finally presented and adopted. Although the basic objection to the statement remains, several good changes in its wording had been incorporated. The Statement as presented and adopted had its title changed from "A Statement of Conscience" to "An Appeal to Conscience." Among the other changes made is the addition of this significant statement: "Coming as we do out of various religious backgrounds, each of us has more to say than can be said here. But this Statement is what we as religious people are moved to say together."

As a Christian tries to live his life in total commitment to God through Christ, he walks dangerously all the way.

and does influence our attitude to others. The basic questions of respect for others and, of course, for their rights and privileges are really moral issues. No Christian can be indifferent to such problems as unfair housing practices and at the same time profess his loyalty to a Savior who said: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

RACE, RELIGION AND REPENTANCE

By Austin Pardue
The Bishop of Pittsburgh

A PASTORAL READ IN ALL CHURCHES OF THE DIOCESE OF PITTSBURGH CALLING UPON PEOPLE TO EXAMINE THEIR THOUGHTS AND ACTIONS

THIS IS the season of Lent. We are called to forty days of concentration upon the meaning of the crucifixion. A cross stands on or over every altar.

The Lenten seasonal color is purple. It symbolizes the theme: namely, repentance. This comes from the Greek word metanoia. It literally means to seek a change of mind; a new outlook from selfishness to unselfishness and from intolerance to understanding.

In this, the twentieth year of my consecration as your bishop, I call upon us all to repent for our sins of prejudice, intolerance, and discrimination against any race or religion. I am not speaking in anger or impatience, but in love and charity. If we harbor these sins of discrimination against race and religion, we will destroy our own souls, threaten our own bodies and contaminate our own children. If these sins are not corrected, they may well bring destruction upon our own nation.

Scholars, the world over, tell us that the next world war will probably be a racial conflict. I have recently been on a preaching mission to South Africa and I can readily see and believe what they say as prophets of the future. We, as Christians, cannot stand by and cling to our past prejudices. As our Lord cried from his cross two thousand years ago, "Father, forgive them for they know not what they do," so now he repeats the cry as we continue in our blindness. Therefore, I ask you to make individual examinations during this season of Lent; to seek God's forgiveness for past mistakes, so that our Easter communions may be a joy to the resurrected Christ.

Will you as an individual, ask yourself the following questions?

- Am I aware that our Lord lives in the heart of every human being on earth; that to discriminate against race or religion is hurtful to him; that wherever a human being is suffering, there is Christ likewise suffering?

- Am I antagonistic when a person of another color joins my parish, sits in my pew, attends my church society or kneels next to me at the altar rail? According to his or her reliability and devotion, am I glad to have a person of a different race on my vestry or hold a parish office?

● In my daily work, am I willing to labor side by side in union jobs, in office posts in any kind of honest employment with decent people regardless of race or religion? Am I willing to be helpful to such persons, cooperative and understanding and to conduct myself in the spirit of Christ and the constitution of the United States? If I am an employer, am I willing to hire those of different races when they are qualified for positions and are willing to give of their best abilities? Am I doing my best to end economic discrimination so that our free enterprise system will remain free for every willing worker? Do I want full employment for "all sorts and conditions of men" as long as they are honest, reliable and industrious?

● Am I too hard of heart to have a sense of shame when I drive through blighted areas, overcrowded slums, filthy and deteriorated living quarters? Does my heart go out to the needs of the children and the delinquency that follows from such living conditions? Am I moved to help improve these conditions or do I simply "pass by on the other side" without care or action?

● When people of other races move into my neighborhood, am I courteous to them or do I seek ways of preventing their presence?

● Do I seek special privilege, regardless of my race or religion, when I lack dependability, courteous manners and sincere willingness to work and search for truth and sound learning?

● Am I provincial, unwilling to study the world conflicts now being fought along lines of racial and religious hatred? Have I tried to understand the consequences of spiritual blindness in racial antagonisms?

My friends, few of us will find ourselves without guilt on one or many of these questions. May we approach them with calm understanding, spiritual insight, persistent prayer, and openness of mind. May those of us who feel strongly on one side or the other of these questions, ask God to rid us of the self-righteousness that breeds a haughty air of intolerance. May we approach this issue of the hour with intellectual integrity, emotional discipline, Christlike humility and patriotic devotion.

May we not judge some other part of the world or nation without first examining our own consciences in the community in which we now live.

Text of Pope John's Encyclical 'Pacem in Terris,' Calling for a World Community

Special to The New York Times

ROME, April 10—Following, in translation supplied by the Vatican Press Office, is the text of the encyclical "Pacem in Terris" ("Peace on Earth"), issued today by Pope John XXIII:

Encyclical letter of His Holiness John XXIII, by Divine Providence Pope, to the venerable brothers the patriarchs, primates, archbishops and other local ordinaries in peace and communion with the Apostolic See, to the clergy and faithful of the whole world, and to all men of good-will, on establishing universal peace in truth, justice charity and liberty.

To our venerable brothers the patriarchs, primates, archbishops, bishops and other local ordinaries in peace and communion with the Apostolic See, to the clergy and faithful of the whole world and to all men of goodwill: Pope John XXIII; venerable brothers and beloved children, health and apostolic benediction.

Introduction

ORDER IN THE UNIVERSE

Peace on earth, which men of every era have most eagerly yearned for, can be firmly established only if the order laid down by God be dutifully observed. The progress of learning and the inventions of technology clearly show that, both in living things and in the forces of nature, an astonishing order reigns, and they also bear witness to the greatness of man, who can understand that order and create suitable instruments to harness those forces of nature and use them to his benefit.

But the progress of science and the inventions of technology show above all the infinite greatness of God, who created the universe and man himself. He created all things out of nothing, pouring into them the abundance of His wisdom and goodness, so that the holy psalmist praises God in these words: "O Lord our master! The majesty of Thy name fills all the earth." (1) Elsewhere he says: "What diversity, Lord, in they creatures! What wisdom has designed them all!" (2) God also created man in his own image and likeness, (3) endowed him with intelligence and freedom, and made him lord of creation, as the same psalmist declares in the words: "Thou hast placed him only a little below the angels, crowning him with glory and honor and bidding him rule over the works of thy hands. Thou hast put all under his dominion." (4)

ORDER IN HUMAN BEINGS

How strongly does the turmoil of individual men and peoples contrast with the perfect order of the universe! It is as if the relationships which bind them together could be controlled only by force. But the creator of the world has imprinted in man's heart an order which his conscience reveals to him and enjoins him to obey: This shows that the obligations of the law are written in their hearts, their conscience utters its own testimony. (5) And how could it be otherwise? For whatever God has made shows forth His infinite wisdom, and it is manifested more clearly in the things which have greater perfection. (6)

But fickleness of opinion often produces this error, that many think that the relationships between men and states can be governed by the same laws as the forces and irrational elements of the universe, whereas the laws governing them are of quite a different kind and are to be sought elsewhere, namely, where the Father of all things wrote them, that is, in the nature of man. By these laws men are most admirably taught, first of all how they should conduct their mutual dealings among themselves, then how the relationships between the citizens and the public authorities of each state should be regulated, then how states should deal with one another, and finally how, on the one hand, individual men and states, and on the other hand, the community of all peoples, should act towards each other, the establishment of such a world community of peoples being urgently demanded today by the requirements of universal common good.

Part I

United Press International

A SPIRIT OF UNDERSTANDING: A view of nave of St. Peter's Basilica last October, when Vatican Council II was convened. The Pope, in his encyclical, suggested that a meeting of Roman Catholics and other Christians, now or in the future, might be useful.

conscience, and therefore the right to worship God privately and publicly. For, as Lactantius so clearly taught: We were created for the purpose of showing to the God who bore us the submission we owe Him, or recognizing Him alone, and of serving Him. We are obliged and bound by this duty to God. From this religion itself receives its name. 10 And on this point our predecessor of immortal memory, Leo XIII, declared: "This genuine, this honorable freedom of the sons of God, which most nobly protects the dignity of the human person, is greater than any violence or injustice foundly is the empire of nature ordained for the preservation of man." (17)

The right to private property, even of productive goods, also derives from the nature of man. This right, as we have elsewhere declared, is a suitable means for safeguarding the dignity of the human person and for the exercise of responsibility in all fields; it strengthens and gives serenity to family life, thereby increasing the peace and prosperity of the state. (18)

However, it is opportune to point out that there is a social duty essentially inherent in the draws its indestructible moral force from the natural law, which, in granting it, imposes a corresponding obligation. Those, therefore, who claim their own rights, yet altogether forget or neglect to carry out their respective duties, are people who build with one hand and destroy with the other.

Mutual Collaboration

Since men are social by nature they are meant to live with others and to work for one another's welfare. A well-ordered society requires that fulfill his obligation; and, in the countless forms of collaboration with others, act chiefly on his own respnsibility and initiative. This is to be done in such a way that each one acts on his own decision, of set purpose and from a conciousness of his obligation, without being moved by force or pressure brought to bear on him externally. For any human society that is established on relations of force must be regarded as inhuman, inasmuch as the personality of its members is repressed or restricted, when in fact they should be provided with appropriate incentives and means for developing and perfecting themselves.

Social Life in Truth, Justice, Charity and Freedom

A political society is to be considered well-ordered, beneficial and in keeping with human dignity if it is grounded on truth. As the Apostle Paul exhorts us: "Away with falsehood then; let everyone speak out the truth to his neighbor; membership of the body binds us to one another." (25) This demands that reciprocal rights and duties be sincerely recognized. Furthermore, human society will be such as we have just described it, if the citizens, guided by justice, apply themselves seriously to respecting the rights of others and discharging their own duties; if they are moved by such fervor of charity as to make their own the needs of others and share with others their own goods: If, finally, they work for a progressively closer fellowship in the world of spiritual values. Human society is realized in freedom, that is to say, in ways and means in keeping with the dignity of its citizens, who accept the responsibility of their actions, precisely because they are by nature rational beings.

Human society, venerable brothers and beloved children, ought to be regarded above all as a spiritual reality: in which men communicate knowledge to each other in the light of truth; in which they can enjoy their rights and fulfil their duties, and are inspired to strive for moral good. Society should enable men to share in and enjoy every legitimate expression of beauty, and encourage them constantly to pass on to others all that is best in themselves, while they strive to make their own the spiritual achievements of others. These are the spiritual values which continually give life and basic orientation to cultural expressions, economic and social institutions, political movements and forms, laws, and all other structures by which society is outwardly established and constantly developed.

God and the Moral Order

more on the eternal law than on human reason." (27)

Characteristics of the Present

Our age has three distinctive characteristics. First of all, the working classes have gradually gained ground in economic and public affairs. They began by claiming their rights in the socio-economic sphere; they extended their action then to claims on the political level; and finally applied themselves to the acquisition of the benefits of a more refined culture. Today, therefore, workers all over the world refuse to be treated as if they were irrational objects without freedom, to be used at the arbitrary disposition of others. They insist that they be always regarded as men with a share in every sector of human society: in the social and economic sphere, in the fields of learning and culture, and in public life.

Secondly, it is obvious to everyone that women are now taking a part in public life. This is happening more rapidly, perhaps, in nations of Christian civilization, and, more slowly but broadly, among peoples who have inherited other traditions or cultures. Since women are becoming ever more conscious of their human dignity, they will not tolerate being treated as mere material instruments, but demand rights befitting a human person both in domestic and in public life.

Finally, the modern world, as compared with the recent past, has taken on an entirely new appearance in the field of social and political life. For since all nations have either achieved or are on the way to achieving independence, there will soon no longer exist a world divided into nations that rule others and nations that are subject to others.

Men all over the world have today—or will soon have—the rank of citizens in independent nations. No one wants to feel subject to political powers located outside his own country or ethnic group. Thus in very many human beings the inferiority complex which endured for hundreds and thousands of years is disappearing, while in others there is an attenuation and gradual fading of the corresponding superiority complex which had its roots in social-economic privileges, sex or political standing.

On the contrary, the conviction that all men are equal by reason of their natural dignity has been generally accepted. Hence racial discrimination can no longer be justified, at least doctrinally or in theory. And this is of fundamental importance and significance for the formation of human society according to those principles which we have outlined above. For, if a man becomes conscious of his rights, he must become equally aware of his duties. Thus he who possesses certain rights has likewise the duty to claim those rights as marks of his dignity, while all others have the obligation to acknowledge those rights and respect them.

When the relations of human society are expressed in terms of rights and duties, men become conscious of spiritual values, understand the meaning and significance of truth, justice, charity and freedom, and become deeply aware that they belong to this world of values. Moreover, when moved by such concerns, they are brought to a better knowledge of the true God who is personal and transcendent, and thus they make the ties that bind them to God the solid foundations and supreme criterion of their lives, both of that life which they live interiorly in the depths of their own souls and of that in which they are united to other men in society.

Part II

RELATIONS BETWEEN INDIVIDUALS AND THE PUBLIC AUTHORITIES

Necessity and Divine Origin of Authority

Human society can be neither well-ordered nor prosperous unless it has some people invested with legitimate authority to preseve its institutions and to devote themselves as far as is necessary to work and care for the good of all. These, however, derive their authority from God, as St. Paul teaches in the words, "Authority comes from God alone." (28) These words of St. Paul are explained thus by St. John Chrysostom: What are you saying? Is every ruler appointed by God? I do not say that, he replies, for I am not dealing now with individual rulers, but with authority itself. What I say is, that it is the divine wisdom and not mere chance dignity as men, endowed with reason and free will. As authority is chiefly concerned with moral force, it follows that civil authority must appeal primarily to the conscience of individual citizens, that is, to each one's duty to collaborate readily for the common good of all. Since by nature all men are equal in human dignity, it follows that no one may be coerced to perform interior acts. That is in the power of God alone, who sees and judges the hidden designs of men's hearts. Those therefore who have authority in the state may oblige men in conscience only if their authority is intrinsically related with the authority of God and shares in it. (32) creator of the world has imprinted in man's heart an order which his conscience reveals to him and enjoins him to obey: This shows that the obligations of the law are written in their hearts, their conscience utters its own testimony. (5) And how could it be otherwise? For whatever God has made shows forth His infinite wisdom, and it is manifested more clearly in the things which have greater perfection. (6)

But fickleness of opinion often produces this error, that many think that the relationships between men and states can be governed by the same

them, that is, in the nature of man. By these laws men are most admirably taught, first of all how they should conduct their mutual dealings among themselves, then how the relationships between the citizens and the public authorities of each state should be regulated, then how states should deal with one another, and finally how, on the one hand, individual men and states, and on the other hand, the community of all peoples, should act towards each other, the establishment of such a world community of peoples being urgently demanded today by the requirements of universal common good.

Part I

ORDER BETWEEN MEN

Every Man Is a Person With Rights and Duties

First of all, it is necessary to speak of the order which should exist between men. Any human society, if it is to be well-ordered and productive, must lay down as a foundation this principle, namely, that every human being is a person, that is, his nature is endowed with intelligence and free will. By virtue of this, he has rights and duties of his own, flowing directly and simultaneously from his very nature, which are therefore universal, inviolable and inalienable. 7

If we look upon the dignity of the human person in the light of divinely revealed truth, we cannot help but esteem it far more highly. For men are redeemed by the blood of Jesus Christ, they are by grace the children and friends of God and heirs of eternal glory.

Rights

The Right to Life and a Worthy Standard of Living

Beginning our discussion of the rights of man, we see that every man has the right to life, to bodily integrity and to the means which are necessary and suitable for the proper development of life. These are primarily food, clothing, shelter, rest, medical care and, finally, the necessary social services. Therefore, a human being also has the right to security in cases of sickness, inability to work, widowhood, old age, unemployment, or in any other case in which he is deprived of the means of subsistence through no fault of his own. 8

Right Pertaining to Moral and Cultural Values

By the natural law every human being has the right to respect for his person, to his good reputation, the right to freedom in searching for truth and in expressing and communicating this opinions, and in pursuit of art, within the limits laid down by the moral order and the common good. And he has the right to be informed truthfully about public events.

The natural law also gives man the right to share in the benefits of culture, and therefore the right to a basic education and to technical and professional training in keeping with the stage of educational development in the country to which he belongs. Every effort should be made to insure that persons be enabled, on the basis of merit, to go on to higher studies, so that, as far as possible, they may occupy posts and take on responsibilities in human society in accordance with their natural gifts and the skills they have acquired. 9

The Right to Worship God According to One's Conscience

Every human being has the right to honor God according to the dictates of an upright meeting of Roman Catholics and other Christians, now or in the future, might be useful.

conscience, and therefore the right to worship God privately and publicly. For, as Lactantius so clearly taught: We were created for the purpose of showing to the God who bore us the submission we owe Him, or recognizing Him alone, and of serving Him. We are obliged and bound by this duty to God. From this religion itself receives its name. 10 And on this point our predecessor of immortal memory, Leo XIII, declared: "This genuine, this honorable freedom of the sons of God, which most nobly protects the dignity of the human person, is greater than any violence or injustice. It has always been sought by the church, and always most dear to her. This was the freedom which the apologists claimed with intrepid constantcy, which the apologists defended with their writings, and which the martyrs in such numbers consecrated with their blood." 11

The Right to Choose Freely One's State of Life

Human beings have the right to choose freely the state of life which they prefer, and therefore the right to set up a family, with equal rights and duties for man and woman, and also the right to follow a vocation to the priesthood or the religious life. 12

The family, grounded on marriage freely contracted, monogamous and indissoluble, is and must be considered the first and essential cell of human society. To it must be given every consideration of an economic, social, cultural and moral nature which will strengthen its stability and facilitate the fulfilment of its specific mission.

Parents, however, have a prior right in the support and education of their children. 13

Economic Rights

Human beings have the natural right to free initiative in the economic field, and the right to work. (14)

Indissolubly linked with those rights is the right to working conditions in which physical health is not endangered, morals are safeguarded and young people's normal development is not impaired. Women have the right to working conditions in accordance with their requirements and their duties as wives and mothers. (15)

From the dignity of the human person, there also arises the right to carry on economic activities according to the degree of responsibility of which one is capable. 16 Furthermore—and this must be specially emphasized—there is the right to a working wage, determined according to criterions of justice and sufficient, therefore, in proportion to the available resources, to give the worker and his family a standard of living in keeping with the dignity of the human person. In this regard, our predecessor Pius XII said: "To the personal duty to work imposed by nature, there corresponds and follows the natural right of each individual to make of his work the means to provide for his own life and the lives of his children. So profoundly is the empire of nature ordained for the preservation of man." (17)

The right to private property, even of productive goods, also derives from the nature of man. This right, as we have elsewhere declared, is a suitable means for safeguarding the dignity of the human person and for the exercise of responsibility in all fields; it strengthens and gives serenity to family life, thereby increasing the peace and prosperity of the state. (18)

However, it is opportune to point out that there is a social duty essentially inherent in the right of private property. (19)

The Right of Meeting and Association

From the fact that human beings are by nature social, there arises the right of assembly and association. They have also the right to give the societies of which they are members the form they consider most suitable for the aim they have in view, and to act within such societies on their own initiative and on their own responsibility in order to achieve their desired objectives. (20)

We ourselves stated in the encyclical "Mater et Magistra" that, for the achievement of ends which individual human beings cannot attain except by association, it is necessary and indispensable to set up a great variety of such intermediate groups and societies in order to guarantee for the human person a sufficient sphere of freedom and responsibility. (21)

The Right to Emigrate and Immigrate

Every human being has the right to freedom of movement and of residence within the confines of his own country; and, when there are just reasons for it, the right to emigrate to other countries and take up residence there. (22) The fact that one is a citizen of a particular state does not detract in any way from his membership of the human family as a whole, nor from his citizenship of the world community.

Political Rights

The dignity of the human person involves the right to take an active part in public affairs and to contribute one's part to the common good of the citizenry. For, as our predecessor of happy memory, Pius XII, pointed out: The human individual, far from being an object and, as it were, a merely passive element in the social order, is in fact, must be and must continue to be, its subject, its foundation and its end. (23)

The human person is also entitled to a juridical protection of his rights, a protection that should be efficacious, impartial and inspired by the true norms of justice.

As our predecessor Pius XII teaches: That perpetual privilege proper to man, by which every individual has a claim to the protection of his rights, and by which there is assigned to each a definite and particular sphere of rights, immune from all arbitrary attacks, is the logical consequence of the order of justice willed by God. (24)

Duties

Rights and Duties Necessarily Linked in the One Person

The natural rights with which we have been dealing are, however, inseparably connected, in the very person who is their subject, with just as many respective duties; and rights as well as duties find their source, their sustenance and their inviolability in the natural law which grants or enjoins them.

For example, the right of every man to life is correlative with the duty to preserve it; his right to a decent standard of living with the duty of living it becomingly; and his right to investigate the truth freely, with the duty of seeking it and of possessing it ever more completely and profoundly.

Reciprocity of Rights and Duties Between Persons

Once this is admitted, it is also clear that in human society to one man's right there corresponds a duty in all other persons: the duty, namely, of acknowledging and respecting the right in question. For every fundamental human right draws its indestructible moral force from the natural law, which, in granting it, imposes a corresponding obligation. Those, therefore, who claim their own rights, yet altogether forget or neglect to carry out their respective duties, are people who build with one hand and destroy with the other.

Mutual Collaboration

Since men are social by nature they are meant to live with others and to work for one another's welfare. A well-ordered human society requires that men recognize and observe their mutual rights and duties. It also demands that each contribute generously to the establishment of a civic order in which rights and duties are progressively more sincerely and effectively acknowledged and fulfilled.

It is not enough, for example, to acknowledge and respect every man's right to the means of subsistence: One must also strive to obtain that he actually has enough in the way of food and nourishment.

The society of men must not only be organized but must also provide them with abundant resources. This certainly requires that they observe and recognize their mutual rights and duties: It also requires that they collaborate together in the many enterprises that modern civilization either allows or encourages or even demands.

The dignity of the human person also requires that every man enjoy the right to act freely and responsibly. For this reason, therefore, in social relations man should exercise his rights, each other in the light of truth in which they can enjoy their rights and fulfil their duties, and are inspired to strive for moral good. Society should enable men to share in and enjoy every legitimate expression of beauty, and encourage them constantly to pass on to others all that is best in themselves, while they strive to make their own the spiritual achievements of others. These are the spiritual values which continually give life and basic orientation to cultural expressions, economic and social institutions, political movements and forms, laws, and all other structures by which society is outwardly established and constantly developed.

God and the Moral Order

The order which prevails in society is by nature moral. Grounded as it is in truth, it must function according to the norms of justice, it should be inspired and perfected by mutual love, and finally it should be brought to an ever more refined and human balance in freedom.

Now an order of this kind, whose principles are universal, absolute and unchangeable, has its ultimate source in the one true God, who is personal and transcends human nature. Inasmuch as God is the first truth and the highest good, He alone is that deepest source from which human society can draw its vitality, if that society is to be well-ordered, beneficial, and in keeping with human dignity. (26) As St. Thomas Aquinas says: "Human reason is the norm of the human will, according to which is goodness is measured, because reason derives from the eternal law which is the divine reason itself. It is evident then that the goodness of the human will depends much

Human society can be neither well-ordered nor prosperous unless it has some people invested with legitimate authority to preseve its institutions and to devote themselves as far as is necessary to work and care for the good of all. These, however, derive their authority from God, as St. Paul teaches in the words, "Authority comes from God alone." (28) These words of St. Paul are explained thus by St. John Chrysostom: What are you saying? Is every ruler appointed by God? I do not say that, he replies, for I am not dealing now with individual rulers, but with authority itself. What I say is, that it is the divine widsom and not mere chance that has ordained that there should be government, that some should command and others obey. (29) Moreover, since God made men social by nature, and since no society can hold together unless some one be over all, directing all to strive earnestly for the common good, every civilized community must have a ruling authority, and this authority, no less than society itself, has its source in nature, and has, consequently, God for its auself. (31)

But authority is not to be thought of as a force lacking all control. Indeed, since it is the power to command according to right reason, authority must derive its obligatory force from the moral order, which in turn has God for its first source and final end. Wherefore our predecessor of nappy memory, Pius XII, said: "That same absolute order of beings and their ends which presents man as an autonomous person, that is, as the subject of inviolable duties and rights, and as at once the basis of society and the purpose for which it exists, also includes the state as necessary society invested with the authority without which it could not come into being or live. . . . And since this absolute order, as we learn from sound reason, especially from the Christian faith, can have no origin save in a personal God who is our Creator, it follows that the dignity of the state's authority is due to its sharing to some extent in the authority of God himself. 31

Where the civil authority uses as its only or its chief means either threats and fear of punishment or promises of rewards, it cannot effectively move men to promote the common good of all. Even if it did so move them, this would be altogether opposed to their dignity as men, endowed with reason and free will. As authority is chiefly concerned with moral force, it follows that civil authority must appeal primarily to the conscience of individual citizens, that is, to each one's duty to collaborate readily for the common good of all. Since by nature all men are equal in human dignity, it follows that no one may be coerced to perform interior acts. That is in the power of God alone, who sees and judges the hidden designs of men's hearts. Those therefore who have authority in the state may oblige men in conscience only if their authority is intrinsically related with the authority of God and shares in it. (32)

By this principle the dignity of the citizens is protected. When, in fact, men obey their rulers, it is not all as men that they obey them, but through their obedience it is God, the provident Creator of all things, whom they reverence, since he has decreed that men's dealings with one another should be regulated by an order which he himself has established. Moreover, in showing this due reverence to God, men not only do not debase themselves but rather perfect and ennoble themselves. For to serve God is to rule. (33)

Since the right to command is required by the moral order and has its source in God, it follows that, if civil authorities legislate for or allow anything that is contrary to that order and therefore contrary to the will of God, neither the laws made nor the authorizations granted can be binding on the consciences of the citizens, since God has more right to be obeyed than men. (34) Otherwise, authority breaks down completely and results in shameful abuse. As St. Thomas Aquinas teaches: Human law has the true nature of law only in so far as it corresponds to In so far as it falls short of right right reason, and therefore is derived from the eternal law. Insofar as it falls short of right reason, a law is said to be a wicked law. And so, lacking the true nature of law, it is rather a kind of violence. (35)

It must not be concluded, however, because authority comes from God, that therefore men have no right to choose those who are to rule the state, to decide the form of government and to determine both the way in which authority is to be exercised and its limits. It is thus clear that the doctrine which we have set forth is fully consonant with any truly democratic regime. (36)

Attainment of the Common Good

Purposes of the Public Authority

Individual citizens and intermediate groups are obliged to make their specific contributions to the common welfare. One of the chief consequences of this is that they must bring their own interests into harmony with the needs of the community, and must dispose of their goods and their services as civil authorities have prescribed, in accord with the norms of justice, in due form and within the limits of their competence. This they must do by means of formally perfect actions, the content of which must be morally good, or at least capable of being directed towards good.

Indeed, since the whole reason for the existence of civil authorities is the realization of the common good, it is clearly necessary that, in pursuing this objective, they should respect its essential elements, and at the same time conform their laws to the needs of a given historical situation. (37)

Assuredly, the ethnic characteristics of the various human groups are to be respected as constituent elements of the common good, (38) but these values and characteristics by no means exhaust the content of the common good. For the common good is intimately bound up with human nature. It can never exist fully and completely unless, its intimate nature and realization being what they are, the human person is taken into account. (39)

In the second place, the very nature of the common good requires that all members of the political community be entitled to share in it, although in different ways according to each one's tasks, merits and circumstances. For this reason, every civil authority must take pains to promote the common good of all, without preference for any single citizen or civil group. As our predecessor of immortal memory, Leo XIII, has said: The civil power must not serve the advantage of any one individual or of some few persons, inasmuch as it was established for the common good of all. 40 Considerations of justice and equity, however, can at times demand that those involved in civil government give more attention to the less fortunate members of the community, since they are less able to defend their rights and to assert their legitimate claims. (41)

In this context, we judge that attention should be called to the fact that the common good

ROME, April 10—Following is the Latin version of the opening paragraphs of the encyclical made public today by Pope John XXIII:

Sanctissimi domini nostri Ioannis Divina Providentia Papae XXIII litterae encyclicae ad venerabiles fratres, patriarchas, primates, archiepiscopos, episcopos aliosque locorum ordinarios pacem et communionem cum Apostolica Sede habentes ad clerum et Christifideles totius orbis itemque ad universos bonae voluntatis homines de pace omnium gentium in veritate, iustitia, caritate, libertate constituenda.

Venerabilibus fratribus, patriarchis, primatibus, archiepiscopis, episcopis, aliisque locorum ordinariis pacem et communionem cum Apostolica Sede habentibus clero et Christifidelibus totius orbis itemque universis bonae voluntatis hominibus; Ioannes P. XXIII: Venerabiles fratres et dilecti filii salutem et apostolicam benedictionem.

Pacem in terris, quam homines universi cupidissime quovis tempore appetiverunt, condi confirmarique non posse constat, nisi ordine, quem Deus constituit, sancte servato.

Nam ex doctrinarum processibus ac technicorum inventis plane discimus, simul in animantibus et in naturae viribus dominari ordinem mirificum, simul in homine eiusmodi inesse dignitatem, qua possit sive ordinem ipsum deprehendere sive instrumenta apta sibi parare, ad easdem occupandas vires et ad sua commoda transferendas.

Sed scientiarum progressiones ac technicorum inventa primum omnium infinitam Dei magnitudinem ostendunt, qui et rerum universitatem et hominem ipsum creavit. Rerum, dicimus, universitatem de nihilo fecit, in eamque sapientiae et bonitatis suae copiam profudit: qua de re alicubi sacer psaltes hisce verbis deum laudat: "Domine, Domine, quam admirabile est nomen Tuum in universa terra," hisce alicubi vocibus: "quam multa sunt opera tua, Domine! omnia cum sapientia fecisti." Hominem item deus ad imaginem et similitudinem suam creavit, intellegentia et libertate praeditum, dominumque constituit rerum universarium, uti psaltes idem hac sententia profitetur: et fecisti eum paulo minorem angelis, gloria et honore coronasti eum, dedisti ei potestatem super opera manuum Tuarum, omnia subiecisti pedibus eius.

Public Officials Enjoined to Advance Common Good While Guarding Civil Rights

touches the whole man, the needs both of his body and of his soul. Hence it follows that the civil authorities must undertake to effect the common good by ways and means that are proper to them. That is, while respecting the hierarchy of values, they should promote simultaneously both the material and the spiritual welfare of the citizens. (42)

These principles are clearly contained in the doctrine stated in our encyclical, "mater et Magistra," where we emphasized that the common good of all embraces the sum total of those conditions of social living whereby men are enabled to achieve their own integral perfection more fully and more easily. (43)

Men, however, composed as they are of bodies and immortal souls, can never in this mortal life succeed in satisfying all their needs or in attaining perfect happiness. Therefore, all efforts made to promote the common good, far from endangering the eternal salvation of men, ought rather to serve to promote it. (44)

Responsibilities of the Public Authority, and Rights and Duties of Individuals

It is agreed that in our time the common good is chiefly guaranteed when personal right and duties are maintained. The chief concern of civil authorities must therefore be to insure that these rights are acknowledged, respected, coordinated with other rights, defended and promoted, so that in this way each one may more easily carry out his duties. For to safeguard the inviolable rights of the human person, and to facilitate the fulfilment of its duties, should be the essential office of every public authority. (46)

This means that, if any government does not acknowledge the rights of man or violates them, it not only fails its duty, but its orders completely lack juridical force. (46)

Reconciliation and Protection of Rights and Duties of Individuals

One of the fundamental duties of civil authorities, therefore, is to coordinate social relations in such fashion that the exercise of one man's rights does not threaten others in the exercise of their own rights nor hinder them in the fulfilment of their duties. Finally, the rights of all should be effectively safeguarded and, if they have been violated, completely restored. (47)

Duty of Promoting the Rights of Individuals

It is also demanded by the common good that civil authorit-

Structure and Operation of Public Authority

It is impossible to determine, once and for all, what is the most suitable form of government, or how civil authorities can most effectively fulfull their respective functions, i.e., the legislative, judicial and executive functions of the state. In determining the structure and operation of government which a state is to have, great weight has to be given to the historical background and circumstances of given political communities, circumstances which will vary at different times and in different places. We consider, however, that it is in keeping with the innate demands of human nature that the state should take a form which embodies the three-fold division of powers corresponding to the three principle functions of public authority. In that type of state, not only the official functions of government but also the mutual relations between citizens and public officials are set down according to law, which in itself affords protection to the citizens both in the enjoyment of their rights and in the fulfillment of their duties.

If, however, this political and juridicial structure is to produce the advantages which may be expected of it, public officials must strive to meet the problems which arise in a way that conforms both to the complexities of the situation and the proper exercise of their function. This requires that, in constantly changing conditions, legislators never forget the norms of morality, or constitutional provisions, or the objective requirements of the common good. Moreover, executive authorities must coordinate the activities of society with discretion, with a full knowledge of the law and after a careful consideration of circumstances, and the courts must administer justice impartially and without being influenced by favoritism or pressure. The good order of society also demands that individual citizens and intermediate organizations should be effectively protected by law whenever they have rights to be exercised or obligations to be fulfilled. This protection should be granted to citizens both in their dealings with each other and in their relations with government agencies. (49)

Law and Conscience

It is unquestionable that a legal structure in conformity with the moral order and corresponding to the level of development of the political community is of great advantage to achievement of the common good.

And yet, social life in the modern world is so varied, complex and dynamic that even a juridical structure which has been prudently and thoug-and at the same time meet the exigencies of social life, adapting their legislation to the changing social scene and solving new problems. They must be men of great equilibrium and integrity, competent and courageous enough to see at once what the situation requires and to take necessary action quickly and effectively. (50)

Citizens' Participation in Public Life

It is in keeping with their dignity as persons that human beings should take an active part in government, although the manner in which they share in it will depend on the level of development of the political community to which they belong.

Men will find new and extensive advantages in the fact that they are allowed to participate in government. In this situation, those who administer the government come into frequent contact with the citizens, and it is thus easier for them to learn what is really needed for the common good. The fact, too, that ministers of government hold office only for a limited time keeps them from growing stale and allows for their replacement in accordance with the demands of social progress. 51

Characteristics of the Present Day

In modern times, where there is question of organizing political communities juridically, there is observable first of all the tendency to write in concise and limpid phraseology a charter of fundamental human rights, which is, as often as not, inserted in the state constitutions, or is an integral part of them.

Secondly, there is also in inclination to determine, by the compilation of a document called the constitution, the procedures through which the governing powers are to be created, along with their mutual relations, the spheres of their competence, the forms and systems they are obliged to follow in the performance of their office.

The relations between the government and the governed are then set forth in terms of rights and duties, and it is clearly laid down that the paramount task assigned to government officials is that of recognizing, respecting, reconciling, protecting and promoting the rights and duties of citizens.

It is of course impossible to accept the theory which professes to find the original and single source of civic rights and duties, of the binding force of the constitution, and of a gov-stitutes the reason for its existence.

But a fundamental factor of the common good is acknowledgement of the moral order and respect for its prescriptions. Order between the political communities must be built upon the unshakable and unchangeable rock of the moral law, made manifest in the order of nature by the Creator himself and by Him engraved on the hearts of men with letters that may never be effaced. Like the rays of a gleaming beacon, its principles must guide the plans and policies of men and nations. These are the signals—of warning, safety and smooth sailing—they will have to heed if they would not see all their laborious efforts to establish a new order condemned to tempest and shipwreck. (54)

In Truth

First among the rules governing the relations between states is that of truth. This calls, above all, for the elimination of every trace of racism, and the consequent recognition of the principle that all states emphasis on the positive aspects of their way of life. But methods of information which fall short of the truth, and by the same token impair the reputation of this people or that, must be discarded. (55)

In Justice

Relations between political communities are to be further regulated by justice. This implies, over and above recognition of their mutual rights, the fulfillment of their respective duties.

Political communities have the right to existence, to self-development and to the means necessary for this. They have the right to play the leading part in the process of their own development and the right to their good name and due honors. From which it follows as a simultaneous consequence that they have also the corresponding duty of respecting these rights in others and of avoiding

The Treatment of Minorities

From the 19th century there has been a rather widespread tendency in historical evolution that political communities equate themselves to national communities. However, for var-any act of violation. Just as an individual man may not pursue his own interests to the detriment of other men, so, on the international level, one state may not develop itself by restricting or oppressing other states. St. Augustine rightly says, "What are kingdoms without justice but bands of robbers?" (56)

Not only can it happen, but it actually does happen that the advantages and conveniences which nations strive to acquire for themselves become objects of contention. Nevertheless, the resulting disagreements must be settled, not by force, nor by deceit or trickery, but rather in the only manner which is worthy of the dignity of man, i.e., by a mutual assessment of the reasons on both sides of the dispute, by a mature and objective investigation of the situation, and by an equitable reconciliation of differences of opinion.

The Problem of Political Refugees

The sentiment of universal fatherhood which the Lord has placed in our heart makes us feel profound sadness in considering the phenomenon of political refugees: a phenomenon which has assumed large proportions and which always hides numberless and acute sufferings.

Such expatriations show that there are some political regimes which do not guarantee for individual citizens a sufficient sphere of freedom within which their souls are allowed to breathe humanly. In fact, under those regimes even the lawful existence of such a sphere of freedom is either called into question or denied. This undoubtedly is a radical inversion of the order of human society, because the reason for the existence of public authority is to promote the common good, a fundamental element of which is the recognition of that sphere of freedom and the safeguarding of it.

At this point it will not be superfluous to recall that such exiles are persons, and that all their rights as persons must be recognized, since they do not lose those rights on losing the citizenship of lands of which they are former members.

Now among the rights of a human person there must be included that by which a man may enter a political community where he hopes he can more fittingly provide a future for himself and his dependents. Wherefore, as far as the common good rightly understood permits, it is the duty of that state to accept such immigrants and to help to integrate them into itself as new members.

Wherefore, on this occasion, we publicly approve and commend every undertaking, founded on the principles of human solidarity and Christian charity, which aims at making migration of persons from one country to another less painful.

And we will be permitted to signal for the attention and gratitude of all right-minded persons the manifold word which specialized international agencies are carrying out in this very delicate field.

Disarmament

On the other hand, it is with deep sorrow that we note the enormous stocks of armaments that have been and still are being made in more economically developed countries, with a vast outlay of intellectual and economic resources. And so it happens that, while the people of these countries are loaded with heavy burdens, other countries as a result are deprived of the collaboration they need in order to make economic and social progress.

The production of arms is allegedly justified on the grounds that in present-day conditions peace cannot be preserved without an equal balance of armaments. And so, if one country increases its armaments, others feel the need to do the same; and if one country is equipped with nuclear weapons, other countries must produce their own, equally destructive.

Consequently, people live in constant fear lest the storm that every moment threatens should break upon them with dreadful violence. And with good reason, for the arms of war are ready at hand. Even though it is difficult to believe that anyone would deliberately take the responsibility for the appalling destruction and sorrow that war would bring in its train, it cannot be denied that the conflagration may be set off by some uncontrollable and unexpected chance. And one must bear in mind that, even though the monstrous power of modern weapons acts as a deterrent, it is to be feared that the mere

Let them study the problem until they find that point of agreement from which it will be possible to commence to go forward towards accords that will be sincere, lasting and fruitful.

We, for our part, will not cease to pray God to bless these labors so that they may lead to fruitful results.

In Liberty

It has also to be borne in mind that relations between states should be based on freedom, that is to say, that no country may unjustly oppress others or unduly meddle in their affairs. On the contrary, all should help to develop in others a sense of responsibility, a spirit of enterprise and an earnest desire to be the first to promote their own advancement in every field.

The Evolution of Economically Underdeveloped Countries

Because all men are joined together by reason of their common origin, their redemption by Christ and their supernatural destiny, and are called to form one single family, we appealed in the encyclical "Mater et Magistra" to economically developed nations to come to the aid of those which were in the process of development. (61)

We are greatly consoled to see how widely that appeal has

Reconciliation and Protection of Rights and Duties of Individuals

One of the fundamental duties of civil authorities, therefore, is to coordinate social relations in such fashion that the exercise of one man's rights does not threaten others in the exercise of their own rights nor hinder them in the fulfilment of their duties. Finally, the rights of all should be effectively safeguarded and, if they have been violated, completely restored. (47)

Duty of Promoting the Rights of Individuals

It is also demanded by the common good that civil authorities should make earnest efforts to bring about a situation in which individual citizens can easily exercise their rights and fulfil their duties as well. For experience has taught us that, unless these authorities take suitable action with regard to economic, political and cultural matters, inequalities between the citizens tend to become more and more widespread, especially in the modern world, and as a result human rights are rendered totally ineffective, and the fulfilment of duties is compromised.

It is therefore necessary that the Administration give wholehearted and careful attention to the social as well as to the economic progress of the citizens, and to the development, in keeping with the development of the productive system, of such essential services as the building of roads, transportation, communications, water supply, housing, public health, education, facilitation of the practice of religion and recreational facilities. It is necessary also that governments make efforts to see that insurance systems are made available to the citizens, so that, in case of misfortune or increased family responsibilities, no person will be without the necessary means to maintain a decent standard of living. The government should make similarly effective efforts to see that those who are able to work can find employment in keeping with their aptitudes, and that each worker receives a wage in keeping with the laws of justice and equity. It should be equally the concern of civil authorities to insure that workers be allowed their proper responsibility in the work undertaken in industrial organization, and to facilitate the establishment of intermediate groups which will make social life richer and more effective. Finally, it should be possible for all the citizens to share as far as they are able in their country's cultural advantages.

Harmonious Relation Between Public Authority's Two Forms of Intervention

The common good requires that civil authorities maintain a careful balance between coordinating and protecting the rights of the citizens, on the one hand, and promoting them, on the other. It should not happen that certain individuuals or social groups derive special advantage from the fact that their rights have received preferential protection. Nor should it happen that governments, in seeking to protect these rights, become obstacles to their full expression and free use. For this principle must always be retained: that state activity in the economic field, no matter what its breadth or depth may be, ought not to be exercised in such a way as to curtail an individual's freedom of personal initiative. Rather it should work to expand that freedom as much as possible by the effective protection of the essential personal rights of each and every individual. (48)

The same principle should inspire the various steps which governments take in order to make it possible for the citizens more easily to exercise their rights and fulfill their duties in every sector of social life.

rights to be exercised or obligations to be fulfilled. This protection should be granted to citizens both in their dealings with each other and in their relations with government agencies. (49)

Law and Conscience

It is unquestionable that a legal structure in conformity with the moral order and corresponding to the level of development of the political community is of great advantage to achievement of the common good.

And yet, social life in the modern world is so varied, complex and dynamic that even a juridical structure which has been prudently and thoughtfully established is always inadequate for the needs of society.

It is also true that the relations of the citizens with each other, of citizens and intermediate groups with public authorities, and finally of the public authorities with one another are often so complex and so sensitive that they cannot be regulated by inflexible legal provisions. Such a situation therefore demands that the civil authorities have clear ideas about the nature and extent of their official duties if they wish to maintain the existing juridical structure in its basic elements and principles, competence, the forms and systems they are obliged to follow in the performance of their office.

The relations between the government and the governed are then set forth in terms of rights and duties, and it is clearly laid down that the paramount task assigned to government officials is that of recognizing, respecting, reconciling, protecting and promoting the rights and duties of citizens.

It is of course impossible to accept the theory which professes to find the original and single source of civic rights and duties, of the binding force of the constitution, and of a governments right to command in the mere will of human beings, individually or collectively. (52)

The tendencies to which we have referred, however, do clearly show that the men of our time have become increasingly conscious of their dignity as human persons. This awareness prompts them to claim a share in the public administration of their country, while it also accounts for the demand that their own inalienable and inviolable rights be protected by law. It also requires that government officials be chosen in conformity with constitutional procedures, and perform their specific functions within the limits of law.

Part III

RELATIONS BETWEEN STATES

Subjects of Rights and Duties

Our predecessors have constantly maintained, and we join them in reasserting, that political communities are reciprocally subjects of rights and duties. This means that their relationships also must be harmonized in truth, in justice, in a working solidarity, in liberty. The same moral law which governs relations between individual human beings serves also to regulate the relations of political communities with one another. This will be readily understood when one reflects that the individual representatives of political communities cannot put aside their personal dignity while they are acting in the name and interest of their countries. And that they cannot therefore violate the very law of their being, which is the moral law.

It would be absurd, moreover, even to imagine that men could surrender their own human attributes, or be compelled to do so, by the very fact of their appointment to public office, whereas they have been given that noble assignment precisely because the wealth of their human endowments has earned them their reputation as outstanding members of the body politic. Furthermore, authority is a necessary requirement of the moral order in human society. It may not therefore be used against that order. And the very instant such an attempt were made, it would cease to be authority, as the Lord has warned us:

"A word, then, for the kings' ears to hear, kings' hearts to heed: A message for you, rulers, wherever you be! Listen well, all you that have multitudes at your command, foreign hordes to do your bidding. Power is none but comes to you from the Lord, nor any royalty but from one who is above all. He it is that will call you to account for your doings with a scrutiny that reads your inmost thoughts." (53)

Lastly, it is to be borne in mind that also in the regulating of relations between political communities, authority is to be exercised for the achievement of the common good, which con-rays of a gleaming beacon, its principles must guide the plans and policies of men and nations. These are the signals—of warning, safety and smooth sailing—they will have to heed if they would not see all their laborious efforts to establish a new order condemned to tempest and shipwreck. (54)

In Truth

First among the rules governing the relations between states is that of truth. This calls, above all, for the elimination of every trace of racism, and the consequent recognition of the principle that all states are by nature equal in dignity. Each of them, accordingly, is vested with the right to existence, to self-development, to the means fitting to its attainment and to be the one primarily responsible for this self-development. Add to that the right of each to its good name, and to the respect which is its due. Very often, experience has taught us, individuals will be found to differ considerably, in knowledge, virtue, talent and wealth. Yet these inequalities must never be held to excuse any man's attempt to lord it over his neighbors unjustly. They constitute rather a source of greater responsibility in the contribution which each and everyone must make towards mutual improvement.

Similarly, political communities may have reached different levels of culture, civilization or economic development. Neither is that a sufficient reason for some to take unjust advantage of their superiority over others. Rather should they see in it an added motive for more serious commitment to the common cause of social progress.

It is not true that some human beings are by nature superior and others inferior. All men are equal in their natural dignity. Consequently, there are no political communities which are superior by nature and none which are inferior by nature. All political communities are of equal natural dignity, since they are bodies whose membership is made up of these same human beings. Nor must it be forgotten, in this connection, that peoples can be highly sensitive, and with good reason, in matters touching their dignity and honor.

Truth further demands that the various media of social communications made available by modern progress, which enable the nations to know each other better, be used with serene objectivity. That need not, of course, rule out any legitimate development and to the means necessary for this. They have the right to play the leading part in the process of their own development and the right to their good name and due honors. From which it follows as a simultaneous consequence that they have also the corresponding duty of respecting these rights in others and of avoiding

From the 19th century there has been a rather widespread tendency in historical evolution that political communities equate themselves to national communities. However, for various reasons, it has not always been possible to make geographical boundaries coincide with ethnic ones. This gives rise to the phenomenon of minorities and to the relative complex problems.

In the first place, it must be made clear that justice is seriously violated by whatever is done to limit the strength and numerical increase of these lesser peoples. The injustice is even more serious if such sinful projects are aimed at the very extinction of these groups.

On the other hand, the demands of justice are admirably observed by those civil authorities who promote the natural betterment of those citizens belonging to a smaller ethnic group, particularly when that betterment concerns their language, the development of their natural gifts, their ancestral customs, and their accomplishments and endeavors in the economic order. (57)

It should be noted, however, that these minority groups, either because of a reaction to their present situation or because of their historical difficulties are often inclined to exalt beyond due measure anything proper to their own people, so as to place them even above human values, as if that which is proper to humanity were to be at the service of that which is proper to the nation. Reason rather demands that these very people recognize also the advantages that accrue to them from their peculiar circumstances. For instance, no small contribution is made towards the development of their particular talents and spirit by their daily dealings with people who have grown up in a different culture. This, however, will be true only if they will know how to act as a bridge, which facilitates the circulation of life in its various expressions among different traditions or civilizations, and not a zone of discord which can cause great damage and choke natural development.

Active Solidarity

Certainly relations between states must be regulated by the norms of truth and justice, but they also derive great benefits from active solidarity, through mutual cooperation on various levels, such as, in our own times, has already taken place with laudable results in the economic, social, political, educational, health and sport spheres. We must remember that, of its very nature, civil authority exists, not to confine its people within the boundaries of their nation, but rather to protect, above all else, the common good of that particular civil society, which certainly cannot be divorced from the common good of the entire human family.

This entails not only that civil societies should pursue their particular interests without hurting others, but also that they should join forces and plans whenever the efforts of an individual government cannot achieve its desired goals. But in the execution of such common efforts, great care must be taken lest what helps some nations should injure others.

Furthermore, the universal common good requires that in every nation friendly relations be fostered in all fields between the citizens and their intermediate societies.

There are groupings of people of more or less different racial backgrounds. However, the elements which characterize an ethnic group must not be transformed into a watertight compartment in which human beings are prevented from communicating with their fellowmen belonging to different ethnic groups. That would contrast with our contemporary situation, in which the distances separating peoples have been almost wiped out. Nor can one overlook the fact that, even though human beings differ from one another by virtue of their ethnic peculiarities, they all possess certain essential common elements, and are inclined by nature to meet each other in the world of spiritual values, whose progressive assimilation opens to them the possibility of perfection without limits. They have the right and duty therefore to live in communion with one another.

Proper Balances Between Population, Land and Capital

As everybody knows, there are countries with an abundance of arable land and a scarcity of manpower, while in other countries there is no proportion between natural resources and the capital available. This demands that peoples should set up relationships of mutual collaboration, facilitating the circulation from one to the other of capital, goods and manpower. (58)

Here we deem it opportune to remark that, whenever possible, the work to be done should be taken to the workers, not vice versa.

In this way a possibility of a better future is offered to many persons without being forced to leave their own environment in order to seek residence elsewhere, which almost always entails the heartache of separation and difficult periods of adjustment and social integration.

Consequently, people live in constant fear lest the storm that every moment threatens should break upon them with dreadful violence. And with good reason, for the arms of war are ready at hand. Even though it is difficult to believe that anyone would deliberately take the responsibility for the appalling destruction and sorrow that war would bring in its train, it cannot be denied that the conflagration may be set off by some uncontrollable and unexpected chance. And one must bear in mind that, even though the monstrous power of modern weapons acts as a deterrent, it is to be feared that the mere continuance of nuclear tests, undertaken with war in mind, will have fatal consequences for life on the earth.

Justice, then, right reason and humanity urgently demand that the arms race should cease. That the stockpiles which exist in various countries should be reduced equally and simultaneously by the parties concerned. That nuclear weapons should be banned. And that a general agreement should eventually be reached about progressive disarmament and an effective method of control. In the words of Pius XII, our predecessor of happy memory: "The calamity of a world war, with the economic and social ruin and the moral excesses and dissolution that accompany it, must not be permitted to envelop the human race for a third time." (59)

All must realize that there is no hope of putting an end to the building up of armaments, nor of reducing the present stocks, nor, still less, of abolishing them altogether, unless the process is complete and thorough and unless it proceeds from inner convictions: unless, that is, everyone sincerely cooperates to banish the fear and anxious expectation of war with which men are oppressed. If this is to come about, the fundamental principle on which our present peace depends must be replaced by another, which declares that the true and solid peace of nations consists not in equality of arms, but in mutual trust alone. We believe that this can be brought to pass, and we consider that it is something which reason requires, that it is eminently desirable in itself and that it will prove to be the source of many benefits.

In the first place, it is an objective demanded by reason. There can be, or at least there should be, no doubt that relations between states, as between individuals, should be regulated not by the force of arms, but by the light of reason, by the rule, that is, of truth, of justice and of active and sincere cooperation.

Secondly, we say that it is an objective earnestly to be desired in itself. Is there anyone who does not ardently yearn to see war banished, to see peace preserved and daily more firmly established?

And finally, it is an objective which will be a fruitful source of many benefits, for its advantages will be felt everywhere, by individuals, by families, by nations, by the whole human family. The warning of Pius XII still rings in our ears: "Nothing is lost by peace. Everything may be lost by war." (60)

Since this is so, we, the vicar on earth of Jesus Christ, Saviour of the world and author of peace, and as interpreter of the very profound longing of the entire human family, following the impulse of our heart, seized by anxiety for the good of all, we feel it our duty to beseech men, especially those who have the responsibility of public affairs, to spare no labor in order to insure that the world events follow a reasonable and human course.

In the highest and most authoritative assemblies, let men give serious thought to the problem of a peaceful adjustment of relations between po-spirit of enterprise and the honest desire to be the first to promote their own advancement in every field.

The Evolution of Economically Underdeveloped Countries

Because all men are joined together by reason of their common origin, their redemption by Christ and their supernatural destiny, and are called to form one single family, we appealed in the encyclical "Mater et Magistra" to economically developed nations to come to the aid of those which were in the process of development. (61)

We are greatly consoled to see how widely that appeal has been favorably received. And we are confident that even more so in the future it will contribute to the end that the poorer countries, in as short a time as possible, will arrive at that degree of economic development which will enable every citizen to live in conditions in keeping with his human dignity.

But it is never sufficiently repeated that the cooperation, to which reference has been made, should be effected with the greatest respect for the liberty of the countries being developed, for these must realize that they are primarily responsible, and that they are the principal artisans in the promotion of their own economic development and social progress.

Our predecessor Pius XII already proclaimed that in the field of a new order founded on moral principles, there is no room for violation of freedom, integrity and security of other nations, no matter what may be their territorial extension or their capacity for defense. It is inevitable that the powerful states, by reason of their greater potential and their power, should pave the way in the establishment of economic groups comprising not only themselves but also smaller and weaker states as well. It is nevertheless indispensable that in the interests of the common good they, as all others, should respect the rights of those smaller states to political freedom, to economic development and to the adequate protection, in the case of conflicts between nations, of that neutrality which is theirs according to the natural, as well as international, law. In this way, and in this way only, will they be able to obtain a fitting share of the common good, and assure the material and spiritual welfare of their people. (62)

It is vitally important, therefore, that the wealthier states, in providing varied forms of assistance to the poorer, should respect the moral values and ethnic characteristics peculiar to each, and also that they should avoid any intention of political domination. If this is done, a precious contribution will be made towards the formation of a world community, a community in which each member, whilst conscious of its own individual right and duties, will work in a relationship of equality towards the attainment of the universal common good. (63)

Signs of the Times

Men are becoming more and more convinced that disputes which arise between states should not be resolved by recourse to arms, but rather by negotiation.

It is true that on historical grounds this conviction is based chiefly on the terrible destructive force of modern arms. And it is nourished by the horror aroused in the mind by the very thought of the cruel destruction and the immense suffering which the use of those armaments would bring to the human family. And for this reason it is hardly possible to imagine that in the atomic era war could be used as an instrument of justice.

Nevertheless, unfortunately, the law of fear still reigns among peoples, and it forces them to spend fabulous sums for armaments: not for aggression, they affirm—and there is no reason for not believing them—but to dissuade others from aggression.

There is reason to hope, however, that by meeting and negotiating, men may come to discover better the bonds that unite them together, deriving from the human nature which they have in common. And that they may also come to discover that one of the most profound requirements of their common nature is this: that between them and their respective peoples it is not fear which should reign but love, a love which tends to express itself in a collaboration that is loyal, manifold in form and productive of many benefits.

Part IV

RELATIONSHIP OF MEN AND OF POLITICAL COMMUNITIES WITH THE WORLD COMMUNITY

Interdependence Between Political Communities

Recent progress of science and technology has profoundly affected human beings and influenced men to work together and live as one family. There has been a great increase in the circulation of ideas, of persons and of goods from one country to another, so that relations have become closer between individuals, families and intermediate associations belonging to different political communities, and between the public authorities of those communities. At the same time the interdependence of national economies has grown deeper, one becoming progressively more closely related to the other, so that they become, as it were, integral parts of the one world economy. Likewise the social progress, order, security and peace of each country are necessarily connected with the social progress, order, security and peace of all other countries.

At the present day no political community is able to pursue its own interests and develop itself in isolation, because the degree of its prosperity and development is a reflection and and peace of all other couna component part of the degree of prosperity and development of all the other political communities.

Insufficiency of Modern States to Ensure the Universal Common Good

The unity of the human family has always existed, because its members were human beings all equal by virtue of their natural dignity. Hence there will always exist the objective need to promote, in sufficient measure, the universal common good, that is, the common good of the entire human family.

In times past, one would be justified in feeling that the public authorities of the different political communities might be in a position to provide for the universal common good, either through normal diplomatic channels or through top-level meetings, by making use of juridical instruments such as conventions and treaties, for example: juridical instruments suggested by the natural law become an instrument of one-sided interests and even should this not happen, it would be difficult for it to avoid all suspicion of partiality in its actions, and this would take from the efficaciousness of its activity.

Even though there may be pronounced differences between political communities as regards the degree of their economic development and their military power, they are all very sensitive as regards their juridical equality and their moral dignity. For that reason, they are right in not easily yielding in obedience to an authority imposed by force, or to an authority in whose creation they had no part, or to which they themselves did not decide to submit by conscious and free choice.

The Universal Common Good and Personal Rights

Like the common good of individual political communities, so too the universal common good cannot be determined except by having regard to the human person. Therefore, the public authority of the world community, too, must have as its fundamental objective the recognition, respect, safeguarding and promotion of the rights of the human person, this can be done by direct action when required, or by creating on a world scale an environment in which the public authorities of the individual political communities can more easily carry out their specific functions.

The Principle of Subsidiarity

Just as within each political community the relations between individuals are governed by the principle of subsidiarity, so too the relations between the public authority of each political community and the public authority of the world community must be regulated by the light of the same principle. This means that the public authority of the world community must tackle and solve problems of an economic, social, political and cultural character which are posed by the universal common good. For, because of the vastness, complexity and

Duty of Taking Part in Public Life

Once again we deem it opportune to remind our children of their duty to take an active part in public life, and to contribute toward the attainment of the common good of the entire human family as well as to that of their own political community. They should endeavor, therefore, in the light of the faith and with the strength of love, to insure that the various institutions — whether economic, social, cultural or political in purpose — should be such as not to create obstacles, but rather to facilitate or render less arduous man's perfections of himself both in the natural order as well as in the supernatural.

Scientific Competence, Technical Capacity and Professional Experience

Nevertheless, in order to imbue civilization with sound principles and enliven it with the spirit of the gospel, it is not enough to be illumined with the gift of faith and enkindled with the desire of forwarding a good cause. For this end it is necessary to take an active part in the various organizations and scientific training and religious instruction: the former continues and is extended until it reaches higher degrees, while the latter remains at elementary level. It is indispensable, therefore, that in the training of youth, education should be complete and without interruption namely, that in the minds of the young, religious values should be cultivated and the moral conscience refined, in a manner to keep pace with the continuous and ever more abundant assimilation of scientific and technical knowledge. And it is indispensable too that they be instructed regarding the proper way to carry out their actual tasks. (65)

Constant Endeavour

We deem it opportune to point out how difficult it is to understand clearly the relation between the objective requirements of justice and concrete situations, namely, to perceive the degrees and forms in which doctrinal principles and directives ought to be applied to reality.

And the perception of those Christ, but who are endowed with the light of reason and with a natural and operative honesty. In such relations let the faithful be careful to be always consistent in their actions, so that they may even come to any compromise in matters of religion and morals.

At the same time, however, let them be, and show themselves to be, animated by a spirit of understanding and detachment, and disposed to work loyally in the pursuit of objectives which are of their nature good, or conducive to good. (66)

However, one must never confuse error and the person who errs, not even when there is question of error or inadequate knowledge of truth in the moral or religious field. The person who errs is always and above all a human being, and he retains in every case his dignity as a human person, and he must be always regarded and treated in accordance with that lofty dignity. Besides, in every human being, there is a need that is congenital to his nature and never becomes extinguished, compelling him to break through the web of error and open his mind to the knowledge of truth. And God will never fail to act on his interior being, with the result that a person, who at a given ways and degrees in which work in common might be possible for the achievement of economic, social, cultural and political ends which are honorable and useful: these are the problems which can only be solved with the virtue of prudence, which is the guiding light of the virtues that regulate the moral life, both individual and social. Therefore, as far as Catholics are concerned, this decision rests primarily with those who live and work in the specific sectors of human society in which those problems arise, always, however, in accordance with the principles of the natural law, with the social doctrine of the church, and with the directives of ecclesiastical authority. For it must not be forgotten that the church has the right and the duty not only to safeguard the principles of ethics and religion, but also to intervene authoritatively with her children in the temporal sphere, when there is a question of judging about the application of those principles to concrete cases. Pontiff's Advocacy of Reform Is Reflected in His Encyclicals

Goal Is Progress Without Tampering With Basic Doctrine—1961 Missive Urged Aid for Poor Nations

By SYDNEY H. SCHANBERG

Those close to Pope John XXIII say his strongest trait is his love of people. This quality is reflected in the encyclicals he has issued during the four and a half years of his reign.

Also reflected is his belief that, to live in the 20th century, the Roman Catholic Church must promote reform without tampering with basic doctrine.

Yesterday's encyclical was his eighth since his election in Rome on Oct. 28, 1958. Of the previous seven, the most important in terms of global impact was the one published July 14, 1961, calling on rich nations to aid poor ones and appealing to men and states to improve the lot of working people.

In it also the 81-year-old Pontiff warned against the spread of fear in world affairs. In an apparent allusion to the East-West struggle, he said leaders of nations were unable to join hands because "each fears the other harbors plans of conquest."

Social Justice Urged

This encyclical, entitled "Mater et Magistra" ("Mother and Teacher"), was 20,000 words in length.

Its underlying theme was social justice. Pope John praised the gains made by the labor force in many nations but said much remained to be done. Workers should be given a greater voice in industry, he declared, and the standard of living of farm people should be raised, if possible, to that of city dwellers.

The "Mater et Magistra" encyclical marked the 70th anniversary of the first such document on modern social problems, the "Rerum Novarum" ("Of New Things") of Pope Leo XIII.

Issued in 1891, it deplored working conditions throughout the world and assailed "the hard-heartedness of employers, the greed of unchecked competition" and "rapacious usury."

Pope Leo called for swift action by governments. "Some remedy must be found, and found quickly," he said, "for the misery and wretchedness pressing so heavily and unjustly at this moment on the vast mahave been assisted in writing their documents by a group of clerical Latin scholars. This Vatican office, known as the Secretariat of Briefs to Princes, will be entrusted with two of the five copies of yesterday's encyclical, "Pacem in Terris." Two more will go into the archives of the Secretariat of State and one Pope John will keep for himself.

'Ad Petri Cathedram'

Pope John's first encyclical was issued July 2, 1959. In it he appealed to world leaders to "try every approach" that might ease international tensions. The letter, designated by the first words of its Latin text, "Ad Petri Cathedram" ("Near the Chair of Peter"), was viewed as a papal recommendation for continued East-West talks.

However, the Pontiff added an apparent warning to Western statesmen to be wary when dealing with their Communist counterparts because "those who oppress others undoubtedly can contribute nothing" to world unity.

His next encyclical, on Aug. 1, 1959, was directed primarily at the Catholic priesthood. The Pope urged all priests to pattern themselves after the French curate-saint of Ars, St. Jean-Marie-Baptiste Vianney, who died in 1859 after a life of asceticism and prayer. The title was "Sacerdotii Nostri Primordia" ("The Beginning of Our Priesthood").

An encyclical called "Grata Recordatio" ("The Grateful Memory") followed on Sept. 26, 1959. Its theme was an appeal to Roman Catholics everywhere to recite the rosary with particular devotion during the month to follow, praying that the world's rulers might settle their differences.

His fourth encyclical, "Princeps Pastorum" ("The Prince of Shepherds") was published Nov. 28, 1959, to mark the fortieth anniversary of Pope Benedict XV's apostolic letter on missionary work.

Next came the "Mater et Magistra." It was followed on Dec. 9, 1961, by an encyclical urging all Christians to seek a union of hearts and minds in the Roman Catholic Church.

Designated as "Aeterna Dei ily has always existed, because its members were human beings all equal by virtue of their natural dignity. Hence there will always exist the objective need to promote, in sufficient measure, the universal common good, that is, the common good of the entire human family.

In times past, one would be justified in feeling that the public authorities of the different political communities might be in a position to provide for the universal common good, either through normal diplomatic channels or through top-level meetings, by making use of juridical instruments such as conventions and treaties, for example: juridical instruments suggested by the natural law and regulated by the law of nations and international law.

As a result of the far-reaching changes which have taken place in the relations between the human family, the universal common good gives rise to problems which are complex, very grave and extremely urgent, especially as regards security and world peace.

On the other hand, the public authorities of the individual political communities — placed as they are on a footing of equality one with the other— no matter how much they multiply their meetings or sharpen their wits in efforts to draw up new juridical instruments, they are no longer capable of facing the task of finding an adequate solution to the problems mentioned above. And this is not due to a lack of good will or of a spirit of enterprise, but because of a structural defect which hinders them.

It can be said, therefore, that at this historical moment the present system of organization and the way its principle of authority operates on a world basis no longer correspond to the objective requirements of the universal common good.

There exists an intrinsic connection between the common good on the one hand and the structure and function of public authority on the other. The moral order, which needs public authority in order to promote the common good in human society, requires also that the authority be effective in attaining that end. This demands that the organs through which the authority is formed, becomes operative and pursues its ends, must be composed and act in such a manner as to be capable of bringing to realization the new meanings which the common good is taking on in the historical evolution of the human family.

Today the universal common good poses problems of world-wide dimensions, which cannot be adequately tackled or solved except by the efforts of public authorities endowed with a wideness of powers, structure and means of the same proportions: that is, of public authorities which are in a position to operate in an effective manner on a worldwide basis. The moral order itself, therefore, demands that such a form of public authority be established.

Public Authority Instituted by Common Consent and Not Imposed by Force

A public authority, having worldwide power and endowed with the proper means for the efficacious pursuit of its objective, which is the universal common good in concrete form, must be set up by common accord and not imposed by force. The reason is that such an authority must be in a position to operate effectively yet, at the same time, its action must be inspired by sincere and real impartiality: in other words, it must be an action aimed at satisfying the objective requirements of the universal common good. The difficulty is that there would be reason to fear that a supernational or worldwide public authority, imposed by force by the more powerful political communities, might be or might can more easily carry out their specific functions.

The Principle of Subsidiarity

Just as within each political community the relations between individuals are governed by the principle of subsidiarity, so too the relations between the public authority of each political community and the public authority of the world community must be regulated by the light of the same principle. This means that the public authority of the world community must tackle and solve problems of an economic, social, political and cultural character which are posed by the universal common good. For, because of the vastness, complexity and urgency of those problems, the public authorities of the individual states are not in a position to tackle them with any hope of a positive solution.

The public authority of the world community is not intended to limit the sphere of action of the public authority of the individual political community, much less to take its place. On the contrary, its purpose is to create, on a world basis, an environment in which the public authorities of each political community, its citizens and intermediate associations, can carry out their tasks, fulfil their duties and exercise their rights with greater security. (64)

Modern Developments

As is known, the United Nations Organization (U.N.O.) was established on June 26, 1945, and to it there were subsequently added intergovernmental agencies with extensive international tasks in the economic, social, cultural, educational and health fields. The United Nations Organization had as its essential purpose the maintenance and consolidation of peace between peoples, fostering between them friendly relations, based on the principles of equality, mutual respect, and varied forms of cooperation in every sector of human society.

An act of the highest importance performed by the United Nations Organization was the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, approved in the General Assembly of December 10, 1948. In the preamble of that declaration, the recognition and respect of those rights and respective liberties is proclaimed as an ideal to be pursued by all peoples and all countries.

Some objections and reservations were raised regarding certain points in the declaration. There is no doubt, however, that the document represents an important step on the path towards the juridical-political organization of the world community. For in it, in most solemn form, the dignity of a person is acknowledged to all human beings. And as a consequence there is proclaimed as a fundamental right, the right of free movement in the search for truth and in the attainment of moral good and justice, and also the right to a dignified life, while other rights connected with those mentioned are likewise proclaimed.

It is our earneest wish that the United Nations Organization —in its structure and in its means—may become ever more equal to the magnitude and nobility of its tasks, and that the day may come when every human being will find therein an effective safeguard for the rights which derive directly from his dignity as a person, and which are therefore universal, inviolable and inalienable rights. This is all the more to be hoped for since all human beings, as they take an ever more active part in the public life of their own political communities, are showing an increasing interest in the affairs of all peoples, and are becoming more consciously aware that they are living members of a world community.

economic, social, cultural or political in purpose — should be such as not to create obstacles, but rather to facilitate or render less arduous man's perfections of himself both in the natural order as well as in the supernatural.

Scientific Competence, Technical Capacity and Professional Experience

Nevertheless, in order to imbue civilization with sound principles and enliven it with the spirit of the gospel, it is not enough to be illumined with the gift of faith and enkindled with the desire of forwarding a good cause. For this end it is necessary to take an active part in the various organizations and influence them from within. And since our present age is one of outstanding scientific and technical progress and excellence, one will not be able to enter these organizations and work effectively from within unless he is scientifically competent, technically capable and skilled in the practive of his own profession.

Apostolate of a Trained Laity

We desire to call attention to the fact that scientific competence, technical capacity and professional experience, although necessary, are not of themselves sufficient to elevate the realtionships of society to an order that is genuinely human: that is, to an order whose foundation is truth, whose measure and objective is justice, whose driving force is love, and whose method of attainment is freedom.

For this end it is certainly necessary that human beings carry on their own temporal activities in accordance with the laws governing them and following the methods corresponding to their nature. But at the same time it is also necessary that they should carry on the activities as acts within the moral order: therefore, as the exercise or vindication of a right, as the fulfilment of a duty or the performance of a service, as a positive answer to the providential design of God directed to our salvation. In other words, it is necessary that human beings, in the intimacy of their own consciences, should so live and act in their temporal lives as to create a synthesis between scientific, technical and professional elements on the one hand, and spiritual values on the other.

Integration of Faith and Action

It is no less clear that today, in traditionally Christian nations, secular institutions, although demonstrating a high degree of scientific and technical perfection, and efficiency in achieving their respective ends, not infrequently are but slightly affected by Christian motivation or inspiration.

It is beyond question that in the creation of those institutions many contributed and continue to contribute who were believed to be and who consider themselves Christians and without doubt, in part at least, they were and are. How does one explain this? It is our opinion that the explanation is to be found in an inconsistency in their minds between religious belief and their action in the temporal sphere. It is necessary, therefore, that their interior unity be re-established, and that in their temporal activity, faith should be present as a beacon to give light, and charity as a force to give life.

Integral Education

It is our opinion, too, that the above-mentioned inconsistency between the religious faith, in those who believe, and their activities in the temporal sphere, results—in great part if not entirely—from the lack of a solid Christian education. Indeed, it happens in many quarters and too often that there is no proportion between manner to keep pace with the continuous and ever more abundant assimilation of scientific and technical knowledge. And it is indispensable too that they be instructed regarding the proper way to carry out their actual tasks. (65)

Constant Endeavour

We deem it opportune to point out how difficult it is to understand clearly the relation between the objective requirements of justice and concrete situations, namely, to perceive the degrees and forms in which doctrinal principles and directives ought to be applied to reality.

And the perception of those degrees and forms is all the more difficult in our times, which are marked by a pronounced dynamism. For this reason, the problem of bringing social reality into line with the objective requirements of justice is a problem which will never admit of a definitive solution. Meanwhile, our children must watch over themselves lest they relax and feel satisfied with objectives already achieved.

In fact, all human beings ought rather to reckon that what has been accomplished is but little in comparison with what remains to be done: because organs of production, trade unions, associations, professional organizations, insurance systems, legal systems, political regimes, institutions for culture, health, recreational or sporting purposes — these must all be adjusted to the era of the atom and of the conquest of space: an era which the human family has already entered, wherein it has commenced its new advance towards limitless horizons.

Relations between Catholics and Non-Catholics in Social and Economic Affairs

The doctrinal principles outlined in this document derive from or are suggested by requirements inherent in human nature itself, and are, for the most part, dictates of the natural law. They provide Catholics, therefore, with a vast field in which they can meet and come to an understanding both with Christians separated from this Apostolic See, and also with human beings who are not enlightened by faith in Jesus who errs, not even when there is question of error or inadequate knowledge of truth in the moral or religious field. The person who errs is always and above all a human being, and he retains in every case his dignity as a human person, and he must be always regarded and treated in accordance with that lofty dignity. Besides, in every human being, there is a need that is congenital to his nature and never becomes extinguished, compelling him to break through the web of error and open his mind to the knowledge of truth. And God will never fail to act on his interior being, with the result that a person, who at a given moment of his life lacks the clarity of faith or even adheres to erroneous doctrines, can at a future date be enlightened and believe the truth. Meetings and agreements, in the various sectors of daily life, between believers and those who do not believe or believe insufficiently because they adhere to error, can be occasions for discovering truth and paying homage to it.

It must be borne in mind, furthermore, that neither can false philosophical teachings regarding the nature, origin and destiny of the universe and of man, be identified with historical movements that have economic, social, cultural or political ends, not even when these movements have originated from those teachings and have drawn and still draw inspiration therefrom. Because the teachings, once they are drawn up and defined, remain always the same, while the movements, working on historical situations in constant evolution, cannot but be influenced by these latter and cannot avoid, therefore, being subject to changes, even of a profound nature. Besides, who can deny that those movements, in so far as they conform to the dictates of right reason and are interpreters of the lawful aspirations of the human person, contain elements that are positive and deserving of approval?

It can happen, then, that a drawing nearer together or a meeting for the attainment of some practical end, which was formerly deemed inopportune or unproductive, might now or in the future be considered opportune and useful. But to decide whether this moment has arrived, and also to lay down the principles of the natural law, with the social doctrine of the church, and with the directives of ecclesiastical authority. For it must not be forgotten that the church has the right and the duty not only to safeguard the principles of ethics and religion, but also to intervene authoritatively with her children in the temporal sphere, when there is a question of judging about the application of those principles to concrete cases. (67)

Little by Little

There are some souls, particularly endowed with generosity, who, on finding situations where the requirements of justice are not satisfied or not satisfied in full, feel enkindled with the desire to change the state of things, as if they wished to have recourse to something like a revolution.

It must be borne in mind that to proceed gradually is the law of life in all its expressions, therefore in human institutions, too, it is not possible to renovate for the better except by working from within them, gradually. Pius XII proclaimed: Salvation and justice are not to be found in revolution, but in evolution through concord. Violence has always achieved only destruction, not construction, the kindling of passions, not their pacification, the accumulation of hate and ruin, not the reconciliation of the contending parties. And it has reduced men and parties to the difficult task or rebuilding, after sad experience, on the ruins of discord.68

An Immense Task

There is an immense task incumbent on all men of good will, namely, the task of restoring the relations of the human family in truth, in justice, in love and in freedom: the relations between individual human beings, between citizens and their respective political communities, between political communities themselves, between individuals, families, intermediate associations and political communities on the one hand, and the world community on the other. This is a most exalted task, for it is the task of bringing about true peace in the order established by God.

Admittedly, those who are endeavoring to restore the relations of social life according to the criterions mentioned above, are not many. To them we express our paternal appreciation, and we earnestly invite them to persevere in their work with ever greater zeal. And we are comforted by the hope that their number will increase, especially among those who believe. For it is an imperative of duty, it is a requirement of love. Every believer in this world of ours must be a spark of light, a center of love, a vivifying leaven amidst his fellowmen: and he will be this all the more perfectly (the more closely he lives in communion with God in the intimacy of his own soul.

In fact, there can be no peace between men unless there is peace within each one of them: unless, that is, each one builds up within himself the order wished by God. Hence St. Augustine asks: Does your soul desire to overcome your lower inclinations? Let it be subject to Him who is on high and it will conquer the lower self: there will be peace in you true, secure and well-ordered peace. In what does that order consist? God commands the soul, the soul commands the body and there is nothing more orderly than this. (69)

The Prince of Peace

These words of ours, which we have wished to dedicate to the problems that most beset the human family today and on the just solution of which the ordered progress of society depends, are dictated by a profound aspiration which we know is shared by all men of goodwill: The consolidation of peace in the world.

As the humble and unworthy vicar of Him whom the prophet announced as the Prince of Peace, (70) we have the duty to expend all our energies in an effort to protect and strengthen this gift.

However, peace will be but an empty-sounding word unless it is founded on the order which this present document has outlined in confident hope: An order founded on truth, built according to justice, vivified and integrated by charity, and put into practice in freedom.

This is such a noble and elevated task that human resources, even though inspired by the most praiseworthy goodwill, cannot bring it to realization alone. In order that human society may reflect as faithfully as possible the kingdom of God, help from on high is necessary. For this reason, during these sacred days our supplication is raised with greater fervor toward Him who by His painful passion and death overcame sin—the root of discord and the source of sorrows and inequalities—and by His blood reconciled mankind to the Eternal Father, for He himself is our peace. He it is that hath made both one. . . . "And coming He announced the good tidings of peace to you who were afar off, and of peace to those who were near." (71)

And in the liturgy of these days we hear the announcement: "Our Lord Jesus Christ, after His resurrection, stood in the midst of His disciples and said, 'Peace be to you, alleluia!' The disciples rejoiced seeing the Lord." (72)

"He leaves us peace, He brings us peace: peace I leave with you, My peace I give to you, not as the world gives do I give to you." (73) This is the peace which we implore of Him with the ardent yearning of our prayer.

May He banish from the hearts of men whatever might endanger peace, may He transform them into witnesses of truth, justice and brotherly love. May He enlighten the rulers of peoples so that in addition to their solicitude for the proper welfare of their citizens, they may guarantee and defend the great gift of peace. May He enkindle the wills of all, so that they may overcome the barriers that divide, cherish the bonds of mutual charity, understand others, and pardon those who have done them wrong. By virtue of His action, may all peoples of the earth become as brothers, and may the most longed for peace blossom forth and reign always between them.

As a pledge of this peace, and with the ardent wish that it may shine forth on the Christian communities entrusted to your care, especially for the benefit of those who are most lowly and in the greatest need of help and defense, we are glad to impart to you, venerable brothers, to the priests both secular and religious, to the religious men and women and to the faithful of your dioceses, particularly to those who make every effort to put these exhortations of ours into practice, our apostolic blessing in propitiation of heavenly favors. Finally, upon all men of goodwill to whom this encyclical letter is also addressed, we implore from Almighty God health and prosperity.

The "Mater et Magistra" encyclical marked the 70th anniversary of the first such document on modern social problems, the "Rerum Novarum" ("Of New Things") of Pope Leo XIII.

Issued in 1891, it deplored working conditions throughout the world and assailed "the hard-heartedness of employers, the greed of unchecked competition" and "rapacious usury."

Pope Leo called for swift action by governments. "Some remedy must be found, and found quickly," he said, "for the misery and wretchedness pressing so heavily and unjustly at this moment on the vast majority of the working classes."

'Quadragesimo Anno'

Pope Pius XI's encyclical "Quadragesimo Anno" (Fortieth Anniversary") in 1931 was a restatement of the "Rerum Novarum."

Pope John, in his commemorative encyclical, called the "Rerum Novarum" the "Magna Carta of the economic-social reconstruction of the modern era."

Pope John's message drew wide praise and was front-page news in Western Europe and the United Sattes. Many of the plaudits came from religious leaders of other faiths.

Encyclicals are circular letters from the Pope usually addressed only to the Roman Catholic clergy and laity throughout the world. The tradition began with the First Epistle of St. Peter in Roman times.

In early times, encyclicals were often merely pastoral letters that could be written by many bishops for Christians about to take long trips. The letters served as passports to make the travelers welcome in Christian homes everywhere.

As the tradition evolved, the encyclical became a letter reserved for the Pope's pen. It also became the most familiar of all papal documents, which include constitutions, bulls, briefs and decrees.

Since the 14th century, Popes

Memory") followed on Sept. 29, 1959. Its theme was an appeal to Roman Catholics everywhere to recite the rosary with particular devotion during the month to follow, praying that the world's rulers might settle their differences.

His fourth encyclical, "Princeps Pastorum" ("The Prince of Shepherds") was published Nov. 28, 1959, to mark the fortieth anniversary of Pope Benedict XV's apostolic letter on missionary work.

Next came the "Mater et Magistra." It was followed on Dec. 9, 1961, by an encyclical urging all Christians to seek a union of hearts and minds in the Roman Catholic Church.

Sapientia" ("The Eternal Wisdom of God"), it was apparently issued as a preparatory step for the church's twenty-first Ecumenical Council. The council held its first session at the Vatican last year from Oct. 11 through Dec. 8 to consider, among other things, the possibility of a reunification of all Christendom.

Pope John's seventh encyclical was directly linked to the council. Published July 1, 1962, and entitled "Paenitentiam Agere" ("To Do Penance"), it urged Catholics to practice penance in preparation for the gathering of the church hierarchy.

The first of the great papal-letter writers was Pope Leo the Great (Leo I), who reigned from 440 to 461.

The modern era of encyclicals began in the 18th century with Pope Benedict XIV (1740-58). One of his famous letters, the "Quod Provinciale" of 1754, denounced, and forbade the sacraments to, Christians in certain areas for having taken Turkish or Moslem names to escape taxes and other punishments then imposed on Christians.

Another Pontiff noted for his encyclicals was Benedict XV, who dealt in his reign (1914-22) with the problems of World War I. Though he maintained a policy of strict neutrality, he made numerous attempts to secure a peace settlement.

The unprecedented four-day National Conference on Religion and Race drew delegates from 70 national religious bodies to Chicago. Much was achieved by this face-to-face confrontation of the top leaders of all faiths and both races. However, the real test of the success or failure of the Conference will be at the local level throughout the country.

HISTORY was made in Chicago this year. To understand why this is so, we might look into a huge meeting held at the Edgewater Beach Hotel on January 15th. A short, bearded man, looking and speaking like an Old Testament prophet, was addressing the audience. In the third row of the audience Cardinal Meyer, of Chicago, was sitting. To his right was J. Irwin Miller, President of the National Council of Churches of Christ. At his left was Rabbi Julius Mark, President of the Synagogue Council of America. Archbishop Cousins, of Milwaukee, also sat next to Mr. Miller. The speaker was Dr. Abraham J. Heschel, of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

It is not unusual for high church and synagogue leaders to share the same speaking platform. We need only to go back to the inauguration of President John F. Kennedy to find a recent example. But such meetings have nearly always been under the auspices of an outside organization. They have been governmental or civic in nature. What made this gathering unique and historic is the fact that it was called by the major religious groups of the United States. And they gathered to examine America's foremost moral problem, racial discrimination.

Many persons have criticized the religious leadership of our country for being too slow in facing up to this problem. Our Attorney General, Robert Kennedy, has twice lectured the clergy on their duties in this area. A prominent weekly news magazine, in an article that set a record for poor reporting, dismissed the Chicago Conference as a meaningless gesture. But delegates to the Conference, many of them veterans of hundreds of national meetings, were practically unanimous in calling this gathering historic.

The four-day National Conference on Religion and Race drew delegates from 70 national religious bodies. There were almost 700 delegates and 500 observers. The delegates were men and women of stature and responsibility in their respective organizations. There were over 20 Catholic bishops present, four of them archbishops. The delegates came to work, and they stayed through the final session. They departed in a mood of unparalleled enthusiasm.

While the purpose of the Conference was to discuss the moral and religious aspects of race relations, it achieved a major success in a totally different area, that of interreligious action. In the United States, before the present Ecumenical Council, the record of interreligious co-operation has been spotty. Catholics in particular have been hesitant about engaging in interfaith discussions or programs. Our contacts with other religious groups have tended to be formal and aloof. By contrast, the Chicago meeting seemed to be a gathering of long-separated relatives. There was nothing artificial or forced in the genuine friendliness that pervaded every session, even those few where there was heated discussion or strong dissent. An official of the National Council of Churches remarked to this writer, in tones of awe and admiration, that the simplicity and democracy of our bishops won the respect of all.

This growth in interreligious understanding, important as it was, can be considered as incidental to the main purpose of the Conference. This purpose was realized in two stages. First, the main addresses and the moving "Appeal to the Conscience of the American People" adopted as the concluding action of the Conference, stressed a unanimous religious response to the problem of racism. In simple terms, the delegates held that no one who accepts God as a father may discriminate against any of His children. As one speaker put it, racism is blasphemy.

Eloquent and moving statements of our common belief in the dignity of all men were only a first step. The real heart of the Conference was its 30 workgroups in which delegates studied and discussed case histories involving every area of organized religious life. The results of these discussions were presented as concrete recommendations for future action. In addition, a special committee worked out detailed follow-up proposals to implement the conclusions reached at the Conference. Ten target cities were selected for intense interreligious action in the field of race relations. From the experience of these cities, it is hoped that patterns useful in every part of our country will emerge.

Before listing specific suggestions, it may be useful to note certain general attitudes and conclusions. One dominant attitude was humility and contrition in face of past failures and inadequacies of religious bodies. There was no tendency to play up past achievements, even when these were real and substantial. Still less was there any disposition to compare or criticize the work of other religious groups. Rather the mood was one of sober realization of the immensity of the problem, and the need for full dedication on the part of all.

Another general feeling was that the real test of the success or failure of the Conference would be at the local level throughout the country. After all, most national religious organizations have condemned racial discrimination. These views can be reinforced by joint and solemn restatement. Much was achieved by face-to-face confrontation of the top leaders of all faiths and both races. But the hard reality would continue to be the local congregation, the segregated church or school, the neighborhood closed to colored homeseekers. Even churches with a high degree of centralized authority, such as Catholic, Episcopalian and Methodist, feel the gap between official pronouncements and local performance.

The problem of authority prevented any real consideration of a permanent interreligious secretariat to co-ordinate the interracial activities of church and synagogue. None of the delegates had the authority to commit his organization to such a program. Even had the authority been available, the formation of a national service agency would probably have been premature. A substantial body of local experience must first be accumulated to show the need, if any, for such service and the form that it should take.

This much being said, the delegates were equally firm in the conviction that interreligious contacts at the national level should persist. While the Conference secretariat will probably be disbanded this June, it is planned that a widely representative steering committee be organized for future consultation over an indefinite period. There was also some sentiment for holding a second national conference on religion and race in another five years, to assess progress and problems revealing themselves during the interval.

The workgroups were assigned phases of four general problems: 1) The Inner Life of the Church and Synagogue; 2) the Responsibility of Church and Synagogue as Institutions in the Community; 3) The Role of Church and Synagogue in a Racially Changing Community; and 4) The Relation of Church and Synagogue to Other Community Forces.

Under the first heading, one of the most difficult problems was the segregated worship service. "The most segregated hour in America is eleven o'clock Sunday morning." Of the major speakers, Mr. Miller, President of the National Council of Churches of Christ, addressed himself to this problem with sympathy and insight. He was not content merely to denounce segregated churches, but offered concrete suggestions for winning over congregations who lack Christian views on this matter.

Other Protestant discussants raised a question about doctrine and discipline in their churches. It was felt that acceptance of the Christian teaching on race should be a condition of membership in a congregation. Dr. Littell was particularly forceful in expressing the view that churches should seek depth of faith, and not mere growth in numbers, as an indication of their vitality. Quite apart from the question of race, it is interesting to note how the Christian churches are drawing together in this matter.

In connection with the internal problem of the churches, there was considerable discussion of the economic plight of the minister who may lose his pastorate because of his opposition to segregation. It was suggested that national church bodies give aid and support to such pastors. But particular emphasis was laid upon the duty of religious education on moral issues. Here the unanimity of religious groups is helpful, since rebellious congregants cannot claim that policies of racial justice are merely private views of one pastor or one particular church.

But religious groups are more than centers of worship. They are often, collectively considered, powerful economic bodies. They employ a substantial number of workers. They control large building programs. Their total purchases of goods and services can be impressive in many communities. They are educators and hospital administrators. Most have sizable charity and welfare programs. If these economic resources are used in a racially sensitive fashion, they could make a notable difference in the area of job opportunity. If all religious institutions were to insist upon buying from firms that have fair hiring policies, and if similar clauses were enforced in building contracts, job discrimination could be wiped out.

Beyond the confines of direct action by religious organizations is an area of community problems that have strong impact on church and synagogue. A particular example is the racially changing neighborhood. Even when a church or synagogue practices no racial discrimination, it may be vitally affected by mass movements of Negroes into neighborhoods previously predominantly white. American Negroes are not likely to apply to the local synagogue for admission, although there are Negro Jews in India and Israel. The majority of Negroes are not likely to be Catholic. Even Protestant Negroes may have a different religious tradition from that of the existing Protestant churches in the neighborhood. Thus the result of mass migrations may be half-empty or even abandoned churches and synagogues.

Some congregations fear and even resist neighborhood racial changes because of the impact on homes, churches and synagogues. Others feel that resistance is morally wrong, so they endure passively the hardships incidental to these social changes. At the Conference, the sentiment of the delegates was that both of these attitudes are deficient. It is wrong to deny to Negroes the opportunity to secure adequate housing. But it is also wrong to permit them to have houses that are physically suitable, but marred by de facto segregation. The proper approach is for religious groups to foster open occupancy throughout both central city and suburbs, so that Negroes will be welcome everywhere and there will be no racially exclusive enclaves, either white or colored. Virtue in this case will pay off economically, since there will be fewer abandoned religious institutions.

Father Vizzard, Washington director of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference, offered an interesting analysis in this connection. He noted that the bulk of racial problems in the North stemmed from mass migration of Negroes from Southern rural areas. This in turn was caused by technical changes in farming that displaced over a million farm workers and their families. If the Federal Government had an adequate retraining and resettlement program for such workers, most could have found land or suitable work in their native areas. They would not have congregated in Northern city slums as unskilled labor poorly adapted for urban living. Work along these lines is still needed, he indicated.

As various programs evolved, delegates were cautioned against excessive emphasis on what may be done for the Negro, to the exclusion of what may be done together with him. The direct-action movements and also the Black Muslim minority indicate a basic change in Negro mentality. The Negro wishes to be consulted as an equal, and not be merely the passive recipient of programs designed to help him. The acceptance of his moral status as an equal is more important than even such basic issues as educational opportunity, job rights, fair housing and voting rights. There is a certain holy impatience in the Negro community today. If discrimination and segregation are morally wrong, as the religious conscience of the nation insists, then they should be abolished totally, not piecemeal and gradually. What is wrong must go entirely and at once, not bit by bit.

This theme was urged with remarkable eloquence and scholarship in the concluding major talk, given by Dr. Martin Luther King. Churchill at his best was not more eloquent than Dr. King, and he merited the standing ovation given before and after his address. His assured mastery of his subject was in itself a dramatization of both the ideals and achievements of the Negro today. It was a tragedy that this plea was not given on all national television networks on prime time.

One theme that was not strongly stressed at the Conference was the role of religiously inspired love of neighbor in rehabilitating the victims of decades of discrimination and prejudice. Yet this is one of the unique tasks of religion. Laws can outlaw segregation, but only religion can impel people to accept their neighbor, regardless of race, cultural handicaps, or economic status. This acceptance is badly needed by those demoralized and bewildered by racial strife and agitation. Better economic and social conditions may be helpful in meeting problems raised by slum living, but something more is needed to give self-respect to those who feel that they have no rights and no status in modern society.

No matter how the problem is faced, the immensity of the task is staggering. Some have raised the question whether or not our religious bodies are able to face up to their duties in this regard. History may reassure such questioners. Surely the problems we confront today are less critical than those facing the Apostles and the early Christian missionaries. The teaching of Christ transformed pagan Rome. The challenge of the National Conference on Religion and Race is that of summoning equal resources, with God's help, to transform the face of America.

CHURCH, STATE, AND THE JEWS

ARTHUR HERTZBERG

"THE TIME has come," editorialized the Jesuit magazine America in the wake of the Supreme Court decision in the Regents' Prayer case, "for [Jews] to decide among themselves precisely what they conceive to be the final objective of the Jewish community in the United States—in a word, what bargain they are willing to strike as one of the minorities in a pluralistic society." Many Jews were offended by the question, and indeed the rhetoric of the editorial was in some ways offensive, but the question is nevertheless a fair one and deserves an honest answer.

The answer, however, must at once be both simple and complicated. Complicated, because in order to find the true meaning of the Jewish position on church-state issues, it must be understood at the outset that words like "religion," "secularism," "society," have resonances in Christian tradition and post-Christian secularism that they do not have for Jews. Before the challenge from America can be taken up, then, it is necessary to recognize that Jews—even Jews alienated from their own religious and historic traditions—differ from Christians not only in the conclusions they draw from society but in the premises they hold about it. We can, though, begin by stating simply that while there are of course deep differences of outlook within the Jewish community, the overwhelming weight of both feeling and opinion among contemporary Jews is for the strictest kind of separation between religion and the state—and even between religion and society. Nor is this opinion merely a tactical response to the current situation in America; it is in fact the expression of an attitude to society that has deep roots in Jewish history, especially in the Western experience of the last eighteen centuries.

But for Christians, too, there is the matter of the bargain they have struck to attain the freedom that American society offers them—a matter which has tended to get obscured in the controversy now raging about the meaning and intention of the First Amendment. For the controversy has up to now largely centered on the question of how much, if any, support the government of the United States may extend to religious groups as such, or to religion in general. Yet the equally important question of what American society requires of religion in exchange for the freedom it offers has remained relatively unexamined.

Stated too simply, the notion of freedom of religion can be misleading. For crucial to the particular kind of free society created in this country is the implicit demand it has always made on religion. What the First Amendment grew out of and subsequently determined was less the notion of strict religious "freedom" than the idea of a "compact" to be struck between society as a whole and the religious groups comprehended within it. Society undertook not to coerce any of the various religious sects through the power of the state, guaranteeing the "free exercise" of all spiritual faiths—and on the other side, the sects were to pay for this freedom by giving up their right to coerce society.

On this point the lesson of American history is as clear as a human record can be. It was decided long ago by the Supreme Court, for instance, that a Mormon may not practice polygamy, despite the serious religious conviction that commands him to do so. Nor is a man, merely by proving that he objects to bearing arms on religious grounds, thereby exempted as a matter of undeniable right from the military draft; such exemptions are granted by individual acts of legislative grace.

NOT ONLY in this kind of detail, however, nor only in relation to unpopular minority sects, does American society assert its right to effect the modification of religious practice; by extension this right is carried into the domain of doctrine itself. For while each religious group in America may continue to view itself as the absolute vessel of God's true revelation of Himself—dealing absolutely with those who freely elect to accept its discipline—and while each is scrupulously protected with respect to the requirements necessary to the exercise of persuasion on the broadest scale, they must all renounce their claim on the souls of those who reject their doctrine. It is unthinkable, for example, that in America the Roman Catholic Church should sue to enjoin a baptized Catholic from remarrying after a civil divorce. In sum, American society has always asked, and continues to ask, of religious groups something previously unknown and almost unimaginable: that each of them, remaining for itself and in private the only true and revealed faith, behave "publicly" as if its truth were as tentative as an aesthetic opinion or a scientific theory.

Now, the concept of the limited state on which the American Constitution is based is not a new one in Western history. Medieval political theory declares the state to be subordinate to natural law and to the authority of the church. In the name of this idea a pope once made an emperor kneel in penitence in the snows of Canossa. Of course, the limits set for a medieval monarch by the authority incarnate in the church militant were different from those that were defined by a sovereign people for its new American state; nevertheless the act of limiting the power of the state did have precedents in the political tradition. What was really new—and unique—in the American experiment was the concept of the limited church.

This concept was a construction of history, not of theology. To be sure, it was foreshadowed in the theories of Roger Williams, but it was not through these theories that the idea came to triumph. A recent document produced for the United Presbyterian Church, called Relations Between Church and State, states the case most aptly:

> Although colonial and subsequent Presbyterians played active and dramatic roles in the evolution of the concept of church-state separation, it is a mistake to assume that this concept has grown out of any doctrine of Christian theology. Separation of church and state in the United States was not a product of theological reflection alone. In a real sense it was a decisively secular development and obtained most of its meaning from the national experience of the United States of America.

Left to themselves, the major faiths of the Western world have not thought about each other very much, except as potential objects for conversion. The American stance on freedom of religion is based on the implicit announcement to each of the various religious groups that the others are here to stay. What name one may wish to give to this announcement is irrelevant. But that it has shaped the religions in America, and in a more positive way than by simply providing them with empty space in which to expand and collide, seems undeniable. So, for example, in the bitter debate about the Catholic faith which marked the political campaign of 1960, when Catholics in America were charged with everything that had ever happened in the Middle Ages or was happening in places like contemporary Spain, they answered in essence that America is different and the Catholics have themselves become different by assenting to the American experiment and by living loyally within it. And this is true. It is inconceivable today in America that Roman Catholic priests should be involved in the leadership of an anti-Semitic movement—precisely what is happening in Argentina, where the hierarchy has failed to silence priests who are spokesmen for the racist Tacuara organization.

At least to someone looking from the outside, it seems that the 1960 election had certain crucial consequences for Catholics and for America above and beyond the election of a Catholic to the Presidency. In the height of the campaign several important statements were made on behalf of the American hierarchy; they amounted to a formal promise to abide by the self-limiting tradition of the sects in America —i.e., to behave in actual practice as one among many churches. It was thus that the Catholics purchased the inevitable ticket of full admission into American society.

THIS sundering of private faith from public policy is, for good historical reasons, extremely congenial to Jews, for they have experienced public policy over the centuries as a force inimical both to the practice of their religion and the safety of their lives.

Historians have generally emphasized that the Jewish community prior to its political emancipation (which is nowhere more than two centuries old) was dominated by its own "established" faith. To be sure, the ghetto community was monolithic and highly disciplined, but its authority could only operate on people who chose anew each day to resist apostasy. In the eyes of those who wielded the real political power, for a Jew to leave Judaism and become a Christian was considered a virtue; the only kind of apostasy that was ever a crime against the state in Europe was defection from the dominant Christian faith. The Jew who defected was thereby relieved of the burden of persecution and often treated with special consideration. Consequently, the Jews were not merely under persistent pressure and temptation throughout the Middle Ages to convert from their faith; they were the sole community in the Christian West in such a situation. What greater proof than this very fact did the Jews need in order to believe that religion could be sustained without support from the power of the state?

The predominant Jewish experience of the state in medieval Europe was one of cowering before its enmity. A Jew could only hope, in the words of the oft-repeated prayer, that "the hearts of kings and princes be turned with favor toward Thy people Israel." Furthermore, the state was usually either neutral or faintly well disposed toward Jews in a directly inverse ratio to the influence over its rulers by prelates. There were occasions in European history when the Church protected Jews from rapacious princes, but these occasions were exceptional. The establishment of Christianity in the Roman Empire by Constantine, immediately accompanied by persecution of the Jews in the name of the true faith, seemed to fix the norm for the rest of Christian history.

The experience of all those centuries does, however, bring up two points that are relevant to the question of present-day America. Jews have come to know, almost by instinct, that their freedom is safest—indeed that their freedom can only be achieved—in societies where the dominance of the church in public life has been blunted. Research into modern Jewish history provides convincing evidence that an early impetus toward the ultimate emancipation of the Jews came from the 17th- and 18th-century mercantilist powers, who were no longer thinking of the state as Christian and who therefore tended to be hospitable to any people who brought realistic advantage to the country. In the second place, Jewish experience with inimical rulers can be summarized in what the greatest of contemporary Jewish historians, Salo Baron, has called virtually a "law": the Jews and Judaism are better off, and feel safer, in a pluralist society made up of a number of national groups and/or religious sects than they are in a unitary political or religious structure. Thus another seed of political freedom for Jews can be found in the agreement in the 17th century to end the wars of religion and to accept religious diversity as the norm of Western Christendom. The multi-national and multi-religious Austro-Hungarian Empire was a far happier place for Jews than a monolithic Germany proved to be.

THE RISE of the modern secular state, then, was the sine qua non for Jewish emancipation. For Christianity, however, this same historical development has meant a position of lesser power in men's affairs. The power of Protestantism has been affected as well as the power of Catholicism, but for various reasons, the Catholic Church has responded with more direct animus against the forces it has held to be responsible for the declining influence of religion. The Syllabus of Errors, promulgated by Pius IX in 1864, in which the "liberal revolution" and all its implications were condemned, was such a response. Pius IX's censures of the separation of church and state, religious liberty, and public education no longer constitute Catholic doctrine, certainly not in America. It is one thing, however, to make a necessary accommodation to the secular state; and it is quite another to hail it—as Jews have done—as your liberator from age-old oppressions.

In this—which points to nothing less than the different meanings of anti-Semitism for Jewish and for Western history—we have arrived at the heart of the matter. The mainstream of Western thought, both Christian and post-Christian, affirms that the history of the West has been on the whole a good human record marred by many imperfections, among them hatred of the Jew. Therefore, except for the initiators of radical revolutionary movements, few people doubt that Western tradition need only be carried along further in the direction in which it has always been going, with some necessary reforms to broaden and purify its culture. And the eradication of anti-Semitism is generally included among the reforms to be achieved in an ever progressive West.

Many Jews share with the gentiles this view of their civilization—at least intellectually they do—and they also share in the common belief that reform will suffice to put the Jews at last out of danger. But in that place where the heart stores its forebodings, most Jews do not believe it at all. European history has boasted too many pogroms, auto-da-fés, and death camps for Jews to believe, with Olympian calm, that these phenomena are an unfortunate but accidental feature of European civilization. The Jews must diagnose the Western tradition as not merely prone to the virus of anti-Semitism but chronically, or endemically, ill with it. For their own safety and for the future lives of their children, Jews must look to a radical change in the very foundations of Western civilization.

This special Jewish need has been little understood; in the light of it, we find that the two main streams of Jewish modernism —Zionism, which has generally been considered a radical solution to the Jewish problem, and assimilationism, which has appeared to offer the solution of gradualist accommodation to Western culture—exactly reverse their positions. Zionism is in fact the conservative position, basing itself on two propositions: one, that all basic identities are, or ought to be, national; and two, that anti-Semitism is a hideously aggravated but essentially rational response to a national imbalance that can quite simply be rectified. Theodor Herzl, the founder of modern Zionism, asserted that it was the "abnormality" of the Jews' being everywhere a national minority that had brought what were otherwise normal tensions between national groups to the pitch of traditional European anti-Semitism; if the Jew therefore reorganized his identity into the recognized form, all abnormal hatreds would automatically disappear. Zionists, moreover, in their profound understanding of the fact that culture is more than political identity, have been willing to admit that in some fundamental sense Western culture will remain pervasively Christian. There can and ought to be, then—for the sake of everybody's peace and dignity—a comparable Jewish national culture. Such a culture could even be (indeed in Israel it largely is) post-Jewish, but it would at least be as related to its own religious history as contemporary post-Christianity is related to the historic values and experiences of the church.

The Zionist conception of the relation of religion to culture was recently given an important expression in the decision of the Israel Supreme Court in the case of Brother Daniel. A Catholic monk of Jewish birth, Brother Daniel had been admitted to Israel and was, under its law, free to ask for naturalization as a citizen of the state. He sued instead for automatic admission under the Law of Return, the state's provision that any Jew, of any provenance, can automatically demand citizenship in Israel. Brother Daniel demanded to be described as a Jew by nationality and a Catholic by faith. One minority view in the Supreme Court of Israel supported this demand, in the name of the absolute separation of religion and national identity. The majority opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Silberg:

> I have not come to preach religiosity and I do not represent any particular view as to a proper future development of the Jewish people . . . but one thing is held in common by all parts of the people which dwells in Zion (except for a minuscule minority), and it is this: We are not cutting ourselves off from the historic past, and we are not denying our ancestral heritage. . . . Only a fool would believe or think that we are here creating a new culture, for—it is much too late! A people which is almost as old as mankind itself does not start ab ovo. . . .

The Brother Daniel decision has implications beyond the borders of Israel. Brother Daniel's rights to every consideration for his faith will be guarded zealously, but within a society which is overwhelmingly and publicly Jewish. Just so, one could say that Jews must be politically indistinguishable from all other citizens in America, but that the religio-cultural issues must work themselves out separately. Here, as in Israel, the state is neutral, but here the majority culture is Christian. Jews must accept the fact that they are a cultural minority and that properly temperate expressions of the majority outlook in our public institutions (e.g., Christmas celebrations in the public schools that are not offensively Christological) are as acceptable as are Purim carnivals in the schools of Tel Aviv. What, in the contemporary translation of the Zionist outlook, the Jews have a right to ask is that they be treated with every consideration a majority can offer the sensibilities and sensitivities of a minority.

HOWEVER, the real thrust of Jewish modernity, beginning with the political emancipation of the Jews in Europe, has been in another direction—has, in fact, been tied to the dream of a basic transformation. Its most extreme form, that of belief in total assimilation, is not, as so many Jewish ideologists have claimed, the one most accommodating to gentile culture, but the most radical in its demands on that culture. The source of this dream in Jewish tradition and consciousness is, of course, the vision of the Messianic age, of "a new heaven and a new earth," when all the old order of the world would be overturned completely and Jewish suffering would be brought to an end. The expansive spirits at the dawn of Jewish modernity immediately saw in the beginnings of political emancipation a wholly new possibility for achieving the Messianic age—in this world and by human agency. Had not the advanced minds of the Enlightment envisaged a world in which all "medievalism"—i.e., all artificially imposed differences among men—would disappear in the name of the oneness of humanity? Was not Progress the new deity for their age?

It was inevitable that, more than any other single community, the Jews should have greeted the radical change promised by the Enlightenment: they longed to be not merely fully protected citizens but brothers to their fellow Europeans. Hence the now-famous passion of so many Jews for all the new 18th- and 19th-century ideologies, from the Rights of Man to Marxism to the Freudian unconscious. The generous promise of modern movements, liberal and socialist, was a world in which there would be neither Jew nor Christian. The movements were embraced not only by Jews who wished to give up Judaism and worship at the new altars of man; many fervently religious Jews also became partisans of various secularist political movements because they held out the hope of an end to anti-Semitism.

That hope was not to be realized in Europe, cradle of Western civilization. One need not even go so far as to mention Nazism and Communism. The liberal anti-clerical Third French Republic, for instance, after the Church was totally disestablished, could not produce a situation of real cultural equality. Public school classes to this day are held on Saturday in France and could never be held on Sunday; so it is possible to raise one's children to be Christian, but impossible to raise them as Jews, without coming into collision with the practices of state institutions. By now, then, the first flush of Jewish fervor for modern secular ideologies has been tempered or rendered timid: anti-Semitism in Europe has certainly not been obliterated, and in some cases secularism has lent it an even greater virulence.

ALL THIS makes the encounter of the Jew with America uniquely important. The enormous attraction that this country has always held for European Jews —both those who came to it and those who could not do so—did not merely lie in its open frontiers and economic opportunities. In America was located the one society in the Western world which had had no medieval past: no ghetto, no pogroms, no anti-Jewish state. Here the Jew might share as an equal in the creation of that modern dream, the "new man." Here was the last, best hope of the Jew to become a normal part of a national culture. It is interesting to note that the Jews were the only ethnic group in America which in the years of the great depression still showed a surplus of immigrants over emigrants. After their untold wanderings, America for its Jews has become not another way station but the end of the line.

Most American Jews thus have an investment in this country that commits them to something far beyond being a benevolently treated minority in a Christain culture presided over by a neutral state. A generation ago this commitment was expressed in the idea of "cultural pluralism," according to which every American was to live in two cultures, the public culture common to all and the subculture of his own particular ethnic tradition. Of course, cultural pluralism proved to be a chimera because all the other ethnic groups chose to become totally acculturated. The grandchildren of the non-Jewish immigrants—as Will Herberg famously pointed out in his book Catholic-Protestant-Jew—have maintained only one distinctive characteristic: the religion (but not the ethnic consciousness) of their ancestors. Though Herberg himself was careful to say that religion has, and must have, cultural and social implications, his analysis has been assimilated into the public mind as a blueprint for a secular public culture shared by all Americans, who will differ from one another only in being members of three distinct enclaves of private religious faith. The image is best projected nowadays at Presidential Inaugurations, where clergymen of all three major divisions of faith offer prayer. For Jews the participation of rabbis in the Inaugural ceremonies is undoubtedly far more impressive than is the participation of bishops to Christians. The matter-of-course appearance of a rabbi at the most sacral moment of American civic life is visible proof indeed that they are full co-owners of American culture.

The instance of prayers at the Inauguration serves to illustrate a further point: namely, it is simply not true that Jews are completely and consistently fixed in their strict interpretation of the First Amendment. Such things as chaplains in the armed services, prayers at state occasions, tax exemptions for religious institutions—while the most doctrinaire member of the Supreme Court, Justice Douglas, would now like to strike them down in the name of intellectual and legal consistency—are no more troublesome to Jewish than to Christian opinion. For these practices extend to the Jews in every respect exactly as to all other denominations in America; no pressure of the majority or of its faith is being exercised upon them. Jews speak of the separation of church and state in absolute terms only on those occasions when they are asked to submit to practices which force them to admit to themselves that their status in America is no more than that of a generously tolerated minority. The First Amendment is not the real dogma of the American Jew. His deepest and most messianic need is not a completely secular state; it is a truly equal status in American culture.

The true meaning of the battle currently raging over the First Amendment, then, is not that it is a confrontation between Christian defenders of the religio-cultural status quo and Jews in a somewhat uncomfortable league with the secularists to alter it. In fact, Jewish pressure on the status quo has far less significance than Catholic pressure to create a change in the balance between religion and the public culture. For one brief moment in history, on the day that John F. Kennedy was barely elected to the White House, Jewish and Catholic feeling and interests coincided. And Jews gave a politician for whom, in his own person, they were certainly far less enthusiastic than they had been for Roosevelt, the largest majority of their votes in history. So, naturally, did Catholics. Since that day, however, Catholics have not merely redoubled their efforts to get tax aid for parochial schools, they have largely replaced Protestants in the van of defending religion in the public schools. These are the very public schools that Catholics once abandoned as being too "godless" at a time when Christianity (i.e., Protestantism) was being much more overtly practiced in them than it is today. Indeed, Catholics have largely replaced Protestants as the guardians of that whole complex of practices once created to serve a sub-Protestant public piety. However one may characterize Jewish policy, it is now clearly in conflict with the new Catholic drive for a more Christian America.

And what of the Protestants in all this? Of course, there is no such thing as one Protestantism in America; that which we call Protestantism is a composite of several often conflicting traditions. In the South, for instance, fundamentalism is virtually a state church. For fundamentalists, devotion to the First Amendment expresses itself, as during the 1960 election, in the form of a simple anti-Catholic nativism. Fundamentalists are against any kind of aid to parochial schools on grounds of separation of church and state, but they are equally violent about any attempt to remove Christian practices from the schools.

At the other extreme of theological sophistication are many Protestant leaders who support the absolute separation of church and state for very positive religious reasons. Men like Franklin Littell are eager to keep Protestantism entirely free of any hampering relationship to American culture, and especially to American patriotism, so that the church may unambiguously become what it ought to be, the critic and the conscience of society. The document of the United Presbyterian Church cited above suggests to Presbyterians the following position: "Theologically, the church must be aware that the sole constant in its mandate is the fact of Jesus Christ. It is to the Christ that the church bears witness, not to a theological articulation of the place of the political order in the structure of reality." Therefore, in such a practical matter as tax exemption for religious agencies, "the church must regard special status or favored position as a hindrance to the fulfilling of its mission."

BUT THE main impulse of American Protestantism lies somewhere in between. The "stated clerk" of the very denomination for whom the above study document was prepared, Eugene Carson Blake, spoke rather differently in the summer of 1960, when he was afraid that a Roman Catholic might wind up in the White House. The grounds for his fear, he said, were that "a Protestant President is free to participate in the many interfaith activities that have been built up so carefully over the years. But a Roman Catholic is not." Obviously, even in the heat of that turbulent summer, Dr. Blake knew very well that attending interfaith activities is not a constitutional duty of the President. What he really feared was an impairment of the image of our culture in which the various sects are treated as equals, and religion as a whole is in some deep sense the American Establishment. And it was in the same spirit that Bishop James Pike deplored the decision in the Regents' Prayer case.

But perhaps the most significant reactions to the Regents' Prayer decision came from Reinhold Niebuhr and John C. Bennett, who, as leaders of liberal opinion among Protestants on interreligious and social issues, took many people by surprise with their opposition to the Supreme Court's strict separationist stand. Niebuhr held that "the prayer seemed to be a model of accommodation to the pluralistic nature of our society" and deplored the possibility of a "consistently secular education that the Founding Fathers certainly did not intend."

There are two things implied in a position like Niebuhr's: one, that religion in America is quasi-established, and two, that the terms of that establishment include only such rituals and restrictions as keep the three main historic faiths equal. From such a point of view one can imagine a public policy that would include teaching about religion in the schools as a fact of culture; experimenting with "shared time"; inclusion of Bible reading in the school programs, but elimination of sectarian practices like Christmas celebrations and the Lord's Prayer; observance of some blue laws, with legal exemptions for Jewish Sabbath observers; agitation to remove such laws as those on the books of Massachusetts and Connecticut pertaining to birth control; but a growing concern, in the name of fairness, for the special Catholic burden of supporting an expanding parochial school system.

As for the Jews, the policy outlined above—though unsatisfying to their particular interests in many details—is nevertheless in essence a fair representation of their own wishes for American society. It grants their cherished desire for a tri-faith image of America. And further, it assumes the existence of a genuine religious consensus based, not on some lowest common denominator Christianity, but on the biblical values common to both Judaism and Christianity. Thus Jews and Protestants are actually approaching one another more closely on the questions of church-state relations—in proportion to the growing Protestant acceptance of the mutually self-denying bargain that religious denominations have struck with American society in exchange for their freedom.

CATHOLIC commitment to such a self-limiting pledge is of course far more problematic in the very nature of Catholicism. But even in Catholic thought there is some stirring in a new direction. John Courtney Murray—theologically far too much of a Catholic classicist to entertain for a moment the notion that any other religion than his own is ultimately true—has spoken in a way indicating movement toward the other faiths:

> There may indeed be some three hundred religious bodies in America. But there are not that many "styles" of religious belief. In fact, there are generically only three—the Protestant, the Catholic, and the Jewish. They are radically different "styles" and no one of them is reducible, or perhaps even comparable, to any of the others.

Official Catholic policy, however, appears to be determined by other, special, considerations. The violence of the Catholic response to the decision in Engel v. Vitale could clearly not have been occasioned by the excision of a short prayer of little, if any, religious significance. Behind this response lurked the grave problem for Catholics of the future financing of the parochial schools. Cardinal Spellman's statement on the decision, although his most important concern was for maintaining the Christian flavor of American culture, forthrightly linked the two issues. Such decisions as that prohibiting the Regents' Prayer, he said, tend to "the establishment of a new religion of secularism." The same attitude had been expressed a few months earlier in the Boston Pilot, the official paper of the diocese of Cardinal Cushing, which was even more vehement about a suggested breach in the blue laws. The Senate of Massachusetts had already passed a bill exempting all Jewish Sabbath observers, whatever their business, from the prohibition to keep open on Sunday. The editorial in the Pilot was willing to concede this right to establishments purveying kosher food and the like, primarily to Jews, but it called any further liberalization a "shocking assault," "unjust and offensive," and evidence that a "carefully organized minority has done its work to destroy the Sunday." The editorial then named the senators who had voted for the bill, clearly asking that pressure be brought upon them. (It was, and the bill was rescinded.) In the heat of that moment it was forgotten that in 1960, in the crucial last week of the Presidential election campaign, Cardinal Cushing had assured the country that the hierarchy would never dictate to voters on any issue. And examples of this kind multiply. No one even attempts to deny, for instance, that the bill for major federal aid to education has thus far been defeated by pressure brought to bear on the members of Congress from the Catholic hierarchy, who want a bill that includes parochial schools or no bill at all.

Yet it would neither be true to say that "liberal" Catholic views were merely campaign oratory nor that there is a continuing Catholic drive to "dominate" America (whatever that word may mean in this context). What then is the character of Catholic policy? It seems to me that Catholic demands can only be explained in the light of Catholic conceptions of the future of American society and of America's role in the world. Within America, Catholics are (and from their point of view, it must be said, rightly) fearful of "indifferentism," the sin of believing that one religion is as good as another. To be sure, such a belief does not really operate today among theologians—except possibly for Reinhold Niebuhr and Paul Tillich, who approach it—but it does in a very untheoretical way pervade American consciousness. From the middle of the 19th century, when Catholics fought hard for the First Amendment, to the present, Catholic policy has really moved in a straight line; for it has always been one of keeping Catholics out of an "indifferentist" consensus. What makes the difference today is that the Roman Catholic Church is paradoxically both strong enough—in numbers and in generations of rootedness in America—and weak enough—in the overextension of its economic resources—to join in open battle for a different kind of America, an America in which it might win tax support for creating "a truly pluralist educational order."

An even larger concern of Catholic policy is Communism. Christianity as a whole has lost heavily in recent decades, and the Catholic Church more heavily than Protestantism. Naturally, the danger from Communism is most immediate to the heaviest losers. To the Catholic mind, schooled as it is to think in terms of faith and dogma, the confrontation with Communism is a war of ideas between religion and anti-religion. America, as the leader of the West, is cast for the role of the knightly defender of the faith. But for America to be true to this sacred mission, the Christian character of her public life must be buttressed. Parochial schools will teach the Catholics; and the children of others must get at least enough indoctrination in the public schools to give them an appreciation of the trust which as Americans they bear.

All the various positions in America, religious and secular, have in common their rootedness in a basic cast of the Western mind. The precision of Aristotelian logic and the beauty of Platonic ideas have made of that mind a thing enchanted with tidiness and the abstractions it brings. Life, however, is concrete and diffuse; it is very untidy and its stuff does not fit easily into definitions. The faith-counterfaith definition of the West's struggle with Communism in fact contains the seed of America's certain defeat in the world at large. For what America can uniquely offer to the peoples of Asia and Africa is not the vision of a Christian or a Judeo-Christian society but precisely of a pluralistic world order in which all men are permitted, nay encouraged, to pursue their own faiths, hopes, and aspirations.

THE taking over of the Western ideological bent of mind by so many Jews on their being emancipated into the modern world seems now to have been inevitable: not only, as we have said, because the new ideologies bespoke a new society that would transcend at once all those centuries of hatred and exclusion of the Jews. The Jew's acceptance of dogmatic Western secular "religions" was also his first instinctive gesture of acculturation to a characteristic Western mode of thought and belief. At its deepest, this is what the abandonment of the talmudic academy for the European university meant. Essentially, however, the Jew is the product of a tradition which is intellectually unideological. Only for Aristotle is A not non-A; classically the Jew can be at one and the same time a bearer of a universal religion and a particular national tradition, a member of the "chosen people" and the possessor of no special rights or qualities. His history is correspondingly unlogical. The ideological ages and societies have always attempted to do away with the Jew, in the name of order. He has flourished where the "theology" of rulers has been tempered by pragmatic common sense.

Thus today the American Jew cannot share in the prevailing Catholic concepts of America and the West. He must, however, equally resist the blandishments of "First Amendmentism." Any dogma taken to the extreme is ultimately the enemy of freedom, and, as the Jew should by now have re-learned from his experience with modern ideologies, it is his enemy. Constitutional logic by itself could not prevent, say, some future generation's opening the public schools on Saturday, for the purpose of intensifying education; in the end, only the untidiness of intergroup arrangement, compromise, and, sometimes, counterpressure will make such a thing impossible.

At the moment some Jews, along with some Protestants, are committed to their own parochial schools and therefore in agreement with Catholics on the question of federal aid. An alliance of this kind must no more be taken as a permanent one than the alliance of most of organized Jewry with secularists to support a strict interpretation of the First Amendment. For religious alliances, like political ones, are ad hoc. What is permanent is the continuing network of intentions and special needs of each of the faiths. So, the most parochial and Orthodox of Jews may agree with others that there is need for more religion in public life, but he will recoil when this need is fulfilled in such fashion as to add an iota to the coercive power of the Christian majority over him. Most Jewish leaders would probably have preferred not to have the Regents' Prayer question litigated before the Supreme Court when it was. If the time had really been ripe for the removal of some sectarian practices from the schools, specifically Christian ones like Christmas observances would have been of far greater concern to Jews than a non-denominational prayer. Similarly with the continuing dispute about Bible readings and the recitation of the Lord's Prayer in the classrooms. Jews can accept, and may even strongly favor Bible readings: so central to our civilization is the Bible that not to know it is to be almost uneducated.

However, the protection of the First Amendment extends not only to religious minorities all of whom have the Bible in common; it must also shelter the non-Judeo-Christians, including atheists and agnostics. In any case, the task of teaching the Bible were better left to religious institutions, since the current practice of reading a few verses without comment in the morning does exercise pressure on the children of agnostics without even beginning to teach the Bible adequately to the children of believers. Jews who are opposed to Bible reading are therefore no more strongly so, nor for any different reasons, than many other people. The Lord's Prayer, however, is another matter entirely; it is a specifically Christian prayer and its recitation in the schools is clearly a sectarian practice, to which all Jews without exception are adamantly opposed.

So much of the present church-state controversy revolves around the schools for the obvious reason that, more than any other institution, it is the schools that shape our culture. For the vast majority of Jews the public school is the object of a primary, tacit commitment; it is the first and foremost institution for their integration into America. Jews are thus perhaps the strongest defenders of public education. Arguments about whether the public school is secular or secularist (it is in truth neither) are irrelevant. American intellectual and civic tradition exerts its influence as much through the general atmosphere of the school as through specific teachings. Everyone is today committed to pluralism, but do we want a completely fragmented America? That which pulls our diversities together into a viable common society—call it Americanism or Americanness—is largely the creation of the one place where most Americans do spend a crucial part of their lives together. If parochial, or class-determined private schools were to become the norm for America, we would be going a long step toward erecting a society of co-existing ghettos. This is not to say that some parochial education will not, and should not, continue to exist, but it must not, in most Jewish views, become the dominant or even the equal educational form.

Discussions of religion and culture these days tend to dwell largely on the questions which separate the various religious denominations in America, and we tend to overlook how very much they have in common in the realm of social policy. No major religious group in America is racist; all are devoted to a democratic order in politics; and all their pronouncements on social justice are indistinguishable from one another. It is, then, far easier to achieve consensus in action than in thought or even in prayer. This fact goes with the very nature of the American tradition, with its tentativeness and its emphasis on the needs of the day. Perhaps the only phrase that adequately describes the complicated pattern into which American tradition, law, and religion have become interwoven is "not quite." Religion is neither established nor completely disestablished in America. There is separation of church and state, but it is not absolute. Nothing seems clearer than that there is a body of specifically American attitudes that have to some extent reshaped religious denominational life, but this body of attitudes is neither doctrinaire nor is there complete agreement about its precise nature. Jewish life in America can also be characterized as "not quite." Certainly Jews here are no longer in Exile, by any traditional definition of that term; but neither are they co-founders of American culture. In most things they are "just like everybody else"; in some, they are uniquely different.

The Founding Fathers have, in the First Amendment, given Americans not a dogma but a clue, a clue to how to live with such complications as we all now face in an undogmatic way: standing separately for various truths, standing together for the peace of society, and delicately avoiding that which is hateful to any of us. These are the terms of the "bargain" that the Jews are willing to strike as one of the "minorities in a pluralistic culture."

National Council Publishes Study On Aid To Schools

A major study detailing the Protestant position opposing public support of church-related schools was published on April 18 by the National Council of Churches. The 56-page booklet, "Public Funds For Parochial Schools?" was commissioned by the Council's Department of Religious Liberty. The author, George LaNoue, is a specialist in church-state law and a doctoral candidate in political science at Yale University.

Commenting on the new publication, the Rt. Rev. Malcolm E. Peabody, chairman of the Department, noted that it presents "a forthright discussion of the Protestant view of one of the most controversial issues of the decade." The Bishop is the former head of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Central New York.

The carefully documented study counters arguments in a Roman Catholic study issued in December 1961, which contended that there is no constitutional bar to public aid to the church-related school "in a degree proportionate to the value of the public function it performs." The National Council study declares that "almost all legal arguments in favor of using tax funds to support religious schools" are "misinterpretations" of legal decisions handed down by the Supreme Court.

"Public Funds For Parochial Schools?" is being distributed across the country as a resource document for those in the field of education and public policy, including legislators and educational administrators.

The Rev. Dean M. Kelley is executive director of the National Council's Department of Religious Liberty. He emphasized that the publication is not an official statement of policy of the National Council of Churches although it does include the pronouncement "Public Funds for Public Schools" adopted by the Council's General Board in February 1961.

THE MOST REV. LAWRENCE J. SHEHAN, D. D., archbishop of Baltimore, recently issued a pastoral letter which the National Conference believes is of sufficient importance and significance to quote here in part:

> "...There is, I hope, no need to say that in our churches and in our parochial life generally there must be not only no racial segregation, but also no distinction of rank or place or treatment based upon racial difference...
> "...In our schools, both elementary and secondary, the same general policy holds. As Catholic schools, they are meant primarily, although not exclusively, for Catholic students --- for ALL Catholic students insofar as facilities can be made available --- without racial or any other discrimination. This means that in the registration of students a common policy, approved by our Catholic School Board, must be followed in the case of all Catholic children living within the boundaries of every parish fortunate enough to have its own school. The same policy must govern all transfers from one school to another. Within the school, identical academic standards must apply to all students and all must be treated with equal justice and charity...

"...It is some months now since all our Catholic hospitals gave formal approval and acceptance to the policies of non-discrimination I specifically proposed to them. This means that they have agreed to admit and treat applicants for medical and surgical service without distinction in their out-patient departments; to follow the same procedure in admitting into the hospital, and in assigning beds to them; that there shall be no discrimination practiced in handling applications for membership on medical, surgical, and nursing staffs; that advancement within each staff will be governed only by ability, training, experience, and character; that a policy of integration and non-discrimination is to be effective for all employees of the hospital...

"...The duty of justice and charity applies not only to our churches, our schools, our charitable organizations and institutions, and our hospitals, but also to all of us as individuals. It must guide us in our personal relationships --- within our block, our neighborhood, our community; in our social and fraternal organizations; in the business we may conduct; at work and at play; in all the circumstances of every-day life...."

Hundreds of Negro families visited white homes throughout the Chicagoland area on Sunday, March 24. This interracial home visit was a sequel to the program held on January 6 when 2,000 white people were welcomed into hundreds of Negro homes. KENNETH CLARK, an Episcopalian and social psychologist at the City College of New York, and the RT. REV. JOHN BURGESS, Suffragan Bishop of Massachusetts. Member churches of the Terre Haute (Indiana) Council of Churches were presented with an open church covenant at the Spring assembly. The churches were to state their willingness to adhere publicly to renunciation of all racial barriers. MRS. KAY THOMPSON, executive secretary, relayed the proposal to the National Conference on Religion and Race and said its timeliness is accented by the current relocation of families in Vigo County.

The three Dayton, Ohio delegates at the Chicago Conference reported to a representative group at the University of Dayton. MRS. ROGER RUPPERT, the REV. CAWLEY STINE and REV. WILLIAM J. COLE presented their interpretations of the meeting. A great deal of enthusiasm was generated, and a follow-up committee was authorized to implement the findings and recommendations. MR. WILLIAM BACON, executive director of the Community Welfare Council, was asked to be the convener of the follow-up committee.

HIS EMINENCE ALBERT CARDINAL MEYER made some suggestions for individual action on a TV program recently:

.Invite Negroes to your home who are in the same line of work as yourself.

.Join in interracial council activities.

.Employ Negro workers.

.Invite Negroes to Christian family movement meetings.

.Read Negro publications.

.Take an active part in neighborhood and community organizations.

Three major faiths hold meeting to find answers to problem

SUMMIT CONFERENCE ON RACE, RELIGION

SOME 3,200 years ago, Moses and Pharaoh met on Mt. Sinai in what has been termed the first recorded conference on religion and race. Since then, there had been no major meeting of religious leaders on racial problems until early this year when Catholics, Protestants and Jews joined at the National Conference on Religion and Race in Chicago.

The $40,000 meeting, convened during the centennial of the Emancipation Proclamation and attended by nearly 1,000 clerical and lay leaders of the three major faiths, was hailed as the largest single project on such a high level to map a solution to U. S. racial problems. Chaired by Dr. Benjamin Mays, president of Atlanta's Morehouse College, the meeting was covered by over 50 newsmen who came from as far away as did delegates.

Coming together as strangers, personally and spiritually, delegates bared their inner-most feelings to each other in closed-door workshops to honestly determine why prejudice exists. While education, employment and housing were blamed, delegates also concluded "religious leaders, through the sin of silence, are as guilty as the bigoted home builder."

Throughout the four days of talks and planning, many delegates expressed fear the conference would produce nothing but talk. "Fortunately," said keynote speaker Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. of Atlanta, "many here are interested in more than a four-day discussion. I think there will be more coming forth."

"I hope," said Dr. Mays, "churches and synagogues will move rapidly towards desegregation, completely, of their congregations. If a man is worshipping Sunday morning where there is absolutely no segregation, he won't be a stickler for segregation in schools or elsewhere."

Chaired by Dr. Benjamin Mays of Atlanta, the conference was hailed as "the most significant meeting of the century" by one delegate. A forum for exploration into prejudice, the historic conference attracted more than 1,000 religious representatives. "I hope this will motivate churches to move rapidly toward mixing," Dr. Mays said.

Taking advantage of the opportunity afforded to make new acquaintances, the Rev. Wyatt Tee Walker, assistant to Dr. King, and Dr. Gary Oniki, like most delegates, discuss coming end of prejudice over their lunch.

CONFERENCE APPEALS TO AMERICA'S 'CONSCIENCE'

REALIZING the convention's decisions were not binding upon the respective religious groups, and equally aware that no such meeting would produce all the answers to racial prejudice, the Negro and white religious leaders met in hope they "might come up with one or two things to move us forward." Their attitudes were reflected in a published "Appeal to the Conscience of the American People" which read in part: "Racism is our most serious domestic evil. We must eradicate it with all diligence and speed."

Warned by Dr. King against letting the historic meeting diminish into a "paralysis of analysis," the follow-up committee designated 10 cities in which all religions are to coordinate an attack on all forms of bias. The cities are Atlanta, New Orleans, San Antonio, Seattle, San Francisco, Oakland, Chicago, Detroit, Pittsburgh and St. Louis.

Real core of the conference were the workshops such as this where, usually behind closed doors, the delegates delved frankly into such problems as bias in schools, jobs, and housing as well as churches, synagogues.

Delegate who addressed the 1,000 guests at the closing session, the Rev. C. T. Tucker said he tried for 40 years to get such a meeting convened. Months of preparation preceded conference.

Taking opportunity to address the general session, the Rev. A. Wayman Ward of Chicago praised leaders of the major faiths for calling the meeting. Some delegates regretted absence of minority religious groups.

Leader of a workshop discussion group and an official spokesman who helped interpret events to newsmen, Rabbi Balfour Brickner listens intently as he is queried at a news conference.

Visitor in Chicago from India looked in on the interracial conference. Observing a luncheon session climaxing the four-day tribute to brotherhood, the guest is accompanied by the Rev. Ralph Abernathy of Atlanta.

Listening attentively at one of the informal sessions, engrossed trio of delegates put into practice the brotherhood principles the conference stood for. Delegates came from across nation.

Attending the closing luncheon session as an observer, Chicago Muslim leader John Ali noted his group was not invited to attend. Some delegates voiced feeling extremist groups should have been heard.

Quizzed by newsmen, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. rubs his chin as he ponders the question. Attended by nearly 1,000 delegates, the convention was covered by some 50 newsmen from across the nation.

Attending reception sponsored by Host Chicago Committee, visitors are greeted by a reception line headed by Catholic Archbishop Albert Cardinal Meyer (l.). Event was one of several that mixed pleasure with formal conference sessions.

Awaiting the arrival of guest soloist Mahalia Jackson, delegates gather around buffet tables. A hush fell over the packed hall and guests stood shoulder to shoulder to hear the gospel singer. Reception was one of highlights of conference.

Heedless of surroundings, Cardinal Meyer and U. S. Judge James Parsons are engrossed in conversation in one of the meeting's dramatic side lights. Judge Parsons, of Chicago, was chairman of host committee arranging for long-awaited meeting.

Congratulated on performance, Mahalia Jackson joins Judge Parsons (l.) and the Rev. Archibald Carey at reception. Delegates called for a reign of love "in which racial barriers will be eliminated; the stranger will be sought and welcomed."

INTEGRATED CONFERENCE WAS NEW EXPERIENCE FOR SOME DELEGATES

PUTTING into practice the theories that were preached, conference officials interspersed the workshops, panel discussions and general sessions with informal breakfasts, luncheons and "bull sessions" where visitors, from the South as well as the North, got better acquainted —many in an integrated setting completely foreign to their regular way of life.

As the week's work neared an end, delegates socialized over cocktails at a reception where they were welcomed by a greeting line that looked like a living Who's Who of the Religious World. Dramatic moment in the great, white-columned ballroom of the Edgewater Beach Hotel, where the reception was held, was the period of complete silence as delegates stood elbow to elbow awaiting a program by famed gospel singer Mahalia Jackson.

The programs, parties and other social events were really just sidelines of the conference. The bulk of the time was taken up with serious consideration of the problems at hand—bias, segregation and discrimination in the United States.

Praising the conference as "useful," most observers agreed with Dr. King: "The real success will be determined by implementation." Observed ex-Birmingham resident and civil rights leader the Rev. Fred Shuttlesworth, "What we're doing here on the national scale, we need to go back and do on the local level."

Assured they are dining in accord with their religious beliefs, a group of women claim Kosher table at closing luncheon session. Coming together as strangers, with individual beliefs and prejudices, delegates themselves benefited from confab.

Not all benefits of conference came from workshops or organized discussions. At end of "formal" day, delegates (l. to r.) Fred L. Shuttlesworth, Rabbi Philip Hail, Bishop E. P. Murchison and Father John F. Cronin hold a "bull session" in room.

Hallway discussion groups, such as this one Father Cronin takes part in, were also common place. "Communication is the word of the hour," one delegate said, indicating real value of meeting was bringing people together to talk.

Serving as official spokesmen for workshop meetings, four leaders face a battery of newsmen eager to interpret conference's significance. Hailed as first interreligious meeting of its kind, it was covered by papers, radio, TV and magazines.

. . . THE CHURCH IN HUMAN RELATIONS

Volume 10, Number 3 April, 1963

That the Church May Lead

FOUND GUILTY

Some of our readers may remember that seventy-five religious leaders participated in a protest demonstration in front of the city hall in Albany, Georgia, August 28 of last year. All of them were arrested. Some remained in jail three days, some six days, until $200 bail money had been paid by or for each of them. They had come from our two major metropolitan areas, New York and Chicago, to identify themselves with the Negro citizens of Albany.

Through the Albany Movement these people were trying to throw off the shackles of second-class citizenship which the white society of that area had forged. The links of the chains of racial injustice and discrimination were many: fear that Negroes would gain power and then repay in kind, and fear of being ostracized from the white society if they spoke out; ignorance spawned by a designing local press that feeds them on a racial diet of scorpions instead of fish and of stones instead of bread; ignorance of the real issues involved, leading them to say and to try to believe that "Negroes want it that way," that it was only the "agitators from the outside who were disturbing the peace"; apathy and indifference, the twin devils born of sinful selfishness; pride that must have someone to whom the finger can be pointed as being inferior; violence, hanging like an ominous pall over the heads of all Negroes throughout the region, which can suddenly erupt with lightning-like fury in the destruction of six Negro churches within the span of less than six weeks.

All these and many more were the links in the chain of Negro bondage in Albany, Georgia, and the surrounding countryside, while Negroes joined hands to throw off the chain, and while they sang "We shall overcome some day." And as they joined hands and voices, they were thrown into jail, twenty-five, fifty, at a time, until their number was eleven hundred.

No, they were not lawbreakers and disturbers of the peace. They were only doing what the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of Georgia had said they could do, and, by saying so, suggested that they do so: "The people have the right to assemble peaceably for their common good and to apply to those vested with the powers of government for redress of grievance by petition or remonstrance."

Until now only eight of the seventy-five religious leaders jailed in Albany on the 28th of August have stood trial. On March 15th this writer was one of three that faced the judge in the Recorders Court in Albany on three charges: blocking the sidewalk, disorderly conduct, and failure to obey the command of a police officer.

THE TRIAL

For many years I had read of the miscarriage of justice in the courts of law in the South when a Negro is the defendant and a white person the plaintiff, or when a Negro is the plaintiff and a white person the defendant. But to read about such a trial and to experience one are two different matters. Though one of the three standing trial on this occasion was a Negro, for all practical purposes, at least in as far as the meting out of justice is concerned, all three of us were Negroes. For a Negro in the United States is not one whose skin color, hair texture, and facial features identify him with the people of Africa. He is rather one who is so grouped in our society as belonging to those whom we have chosen to call Negroes. Yes, perhaps the closest that I ever came to being a Negro was during the two-hour trial in the Albany court room.

As the three defendants were about to enter the court room in the company of their attorney, several police officers stood at the door. The two Caucasians were admitted without difficulty; the Negro defendant was not. It was only after our attorney had satisfactorily identified the Negro as a defendant that entrance into the court room was permitted.

The Sixth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States says: "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial." This is made applicable to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment.

"A speedy and public trial"? "Speedy"? More than six months passed by before we were tried; and sixty-seven have not until now been summoned to stand trial. "Public trial"? Although there was no evidence of disorder that might interfere with the due process of law — no one was in sight except those involved in the trial proper, about ten in all, including the judge and the police — the only persons permitted to enter the court room were the ten, plus three or four carrying press cards.

Almost without exception throughout the trial, when our attorney would object to extraneous or prejudicial material being introduced by the prosecution, the judge would overrule the objection. And vice versa, almost without exception, when the prosecuting attorney would object to what he considered irrelevant or prejudicial matter presented by our attorney, the judge would sustain the objection. For example: Although the obvious reason for our having come to Albany in August and our having appeared before the city hall at that time was to protest the inhuman segregation practices that were the order of the day in that Southern community, the prosecution objected to any reference to segregation, and the objection was sustained.

The chief argument of the prosecution was that our appearance before the city hall on the 28th of August interfered or was posible of interfering with traffic. The space between the curb and the first step leading into the city hall was admitted by the prosecution to be thirty-three feet. The testimony of the defense was to the effect that not more than five of the thirty-three feet, beginning at the curb and extending in toward the city hall, were occupied by the persons who had come there in a demonstration to protest segregation practices; and a picture taken at that time was introduced as evidence which sustained the testimony of the defendants. The witnesses for the prosecution and the defense both testified that there was no interference with traffic in front of the city hall. Both testified that the seventy-five participating in the demonstration conducted themselves in an orderly manner and that they did not disturb the peace.

When both the prosecution and the defense rested the case, the prosecuting attorney made no endeavor to make a summation of the trial with the intent of proving the validity of their case; rather, he turned to the judge — it was then about 12 o'clock noon — and asked that he be excused, saying that his lunch was awaiting him.

Mr. C. B. King, the Negro attorney for the defense, then addressed the court. In about a twenty-minute eloquent address, he in a most brilliant manner presented a statement of the law involved as well as the innocence of the defendants. While he was doing so, the judge seemed occupied with other thoughts and other matters, continually looking through papers lying on his desk. And moments after the defendants' attorney had completed his summation, the judge declared the three of us guilty — guilty of all three charges placed against us. He made no statement as to why he found us guilty. He then gave us the maximum penalty permitted by the law: a $200 fine or sixty days in jail. We chose neither!

WHOSE SPIRIT?

From some of the negative reaction to our participation in the Albany demonstration — though much of the reaction has been that of warm approval — one must conclude that some Christian folk are inclined a priori to agree with the decision, in the first place of the law-enforcing authorities and then with the court in sustaining the accusation of those authorities. Although it is a pure coincidence, it may be interesting to our Christian readers to know that these lines were written on the morning of Good Friday, shortly before going to church to participate in a Tre Ore service. — A certain Jesus whom Christians call the Christ, the Incarnate Son of God, was, contrary to justice, taken captive by the law-enforcing authorities of that day and found guilty by a judge of the court of that day; and the maximum penalty was imposed — crucifixion.

Some of our correspondents who disapprove seem to think it is the Christian thing to do to wash one's hands of the bloody mess, stand aloof, keep one's skirts clean, leave it to the other fellow. Well, yes, one Pontius Pilate whose name will be mentioned more than once today, had a way of washing his hands too.

"I don't quite understand why any clergyman should inject himself into a political and social problem in the manner they apparently have been doing."

"A preacher who is also a pastor has violated the high duties God has conferred upon him when he meddles in a political situation."

"Your comments will give me the benefit of learning why Valparaiso University and the Lutheran Church had its good name blemished by this episode."

"The Gospel of Jesus Christ is important. It is much better to engage in its spread than in civic and political matters."

Is it the spirit of Christ or of Pontius Pilate that prompted these responses? Or whose spirit is it?

CASE APPEALED

No, we accepted neither the fine of $200 nor the sixty-day jail sentence. Each of us paid an additional $100 and appealed the case.

One person from the State of Georgia wrote: "What possible good can be derived for the Kingdom of God from such continued litigation?" We have been told that all seventy-five persons involved, when and if they are summoned to court, will not only go and stand trial; all of them, if found guilty, will also appeal their cases to a higher court. If we do not appeal, much of the good that was hoped would result from the trip and the demonstration will have been lost; and the powers of segregation will have gained a substantial psychological victory. If they were disturbed by our coming and submitting ourselves to being jailed, they would no doubt rejoice were we to pay the fine or accept the sentence and by doing so be branded as criminals by the court and by a large segment of the populace.

ALBANY, et al

When we were on the bus riding to Albany in August, and as we bypassed Birmingham, Alabama, someone said (and it was repeated while we were in jail): "Birmingham is a more vicious city, race-relations-wise, than Albany." Those of us who made the trip to Albany have within the past week been asked, if possible, to stand ready, or to find others who will be willing to stand ready, to make a similar trip to Birmingham.

The newspapers, the radio, and TV have in the past days been reporting racial incidents in Birmingham. Negro citizens there are trying to exercise their constitutional rights peacefully to picket and/or boycott business establishments that discriminate against them on purely racial grounds. The police tactics of brutality — long the established practice of that community — are in evidence. These young people trying to demonstrate, all within the framework of their constitutional rights, are being met by police officers long schooled in protecting segregation at any cost who, rather than protecting human beings in their constitutional rights, are confronting these young people with angry police dogs. And many of the picketers are at this writing in the Birmingham jails.

It happened in Greenwood, Mississippi, too, where police dogs were let loose into lines of Negroes going to registration places to carry out their duty as responsible citizens of the community.

It's spreading like wildfire throughout the South: Negro young people — and some not so young — not only singing "We shall overcome some day," but also doing something now to rid themselves of their burden, and us of our shame.

WHO WILL LISTEN?

The VANGUARD is the publication of the Lutheran Human Relations Association of America. It is committed to a Christian witness in every area of the world-wide race issue. How does participating in and reporting on social action intended to combat racial discrimination in society in general fit into the framework of the objectives and the expressed purpose of its publication, The VANGUARD?

These pages have tried to give an answer to that query many times. The purpose of this article, however, is to answer by means of an anecdote.

Shortly after returning from the trial in Albany, Georgia, this writer received a phone call from the secretary of the Calumet Chapter of the Indiana Civil Liberties Union. A conference dedicated to a reaffirmation of the principles of the Bill of Rights was to be held, at which the main topics to be discussed were freedom of residence, freedom of the press, and academic freedom. Because the writer had gone to Albany to identify himself with the Negro people there in their struggle, he was asked to be an honored guest at the conference luncheon to be held in Gary, 25 miles from Valparaiso. He and his wife went.

Besides others, the area chapter of the Civil Liberties Union seems to have — especially among its leaders — a goodly number of Unitarians and Jewish people. When we arrived, there was an immediate introduction, as though some dignitaries had suddenly appeared in their midst. Then, before going to lunch, there were many personal introductions, and I noticed especially among our Jewish and Unitarian friends a very warm welcome and acceptance of my wife and me.

We were introduced again at the luncheon, when some two hundred stood in another expression of warm acceptance. I was then asked to tell them about my experiences in Albany and of my motivation in going there.

I was fully conscious of the fact that I was not addressing a conservative Lutheran group but that, on the contrary, many in the group were non-religious intellectuals as well as people of the Jewish community and others of non-Trinitarian persuasion.

I said very little about the trip to Albany, the demonstrations there, and the trial of March 15; they were well-informed people and knew the Albany story well. I spoke to them about why I, a professing Christian and a member of the clergy of a conservative Christian church body, went to Albany. This gave me opportunity, as I seldom had in the thirty-eight years since my ordination to bear witness to the faith that is in me. I told them that I went there and participated in this social action endeavor because I believed in the incarnation, because I believe in the deity of our Lord Jesus Christ, because I believe in the atonement through His blood, because I believe in the new life that is ours through Christian baptism.

Did they stone me? Did they throw me out? The very opposite was the case. They listened with hushed silence. Whether they accepted what I said about my Lord, I do not know. But one thing was sure from their applause and from the words of gratitude and thanks which I heard after the luncheon — they had heard what I said about a Christian motivation for social action and they seemed to recognize that a person of a conservative theological confession can be interested in and concerned for human beings who are suffering under the crushing load of man's inhumanity to man.

R. S. V. P. SUCCESS STORY

In the summer of 1960 the St. Louis Chapter of LHRAA participated in the Association's program called Rural Summer Vacation Placement. The program was set up to enable Negro boys and girls from St. Louis to meet and live for a time with white Lutherans in the rural areas of Missouri and southern Illinois.

From a small town in southern Illinois came one white Lutheran family to pick up two small Negro children for a week-long stay in the fresh air of the Illinois prairie country. A few irate church people phoned the family; one even suggested that the family be whipped out of town (figuratively, of course). Otherwise all was quiet. The children attended Sunday school and church, played with the white children of the host, visited farms, saw sheep, ducks, turkeys, and even a herd of buffalo kept by a more prosperous farmer in the area. And — joy of all joys — they picked endless numbers of apples from trees. The two Negro children — a girl of nine and a boy of eleven — went back to St. Louis to life in their high-rise apartment building. A few letters were exchanged between the boy and the host family. One letter in particular proved the success of this venture. The boy announced that he wished to study for the ministry, was working hard to keep his grades up, and attributed his desire in part to his happy week in the farm country. The host family encouraged him and indicated how he might find financial aid. Today that young man is a student in the high school department of St. Paul's College (pre-theological training school) Concordia, Missouri.

FORT WAYNE STUDENTS DEMONSTRATE

Is this a trend, or just a flash in the pan? Will Lutheran students preparing for active full-time work in the church as pastors or teachers allow themselves, already during their college and seminary years, to become involved in life?

On March 18 Governor Ross Barnett of Mississippi addressed the Rotary Club in Fort Wayne, Indiana. About thirty students from Concordia Senior College of that city picketed the meeting. According to a mimeographed sheet handed out by them while picketing, they acknowledged the right of the Governor to speak in Fort Wayne, but they protested the actions of the Governor in the Meredith case, the undemocratic racial discrimination found in Mississippi, and the hypocrisy of northern cities "such as Fort Wayne." A member of the faculty of the College said that, although there was some unfavorable reaction to the student activity, it was warmly accepted by almost all of the faculty.

If higher education is to serve humanity, it cannot be divorced from humanity. Students, even while the learning process is going on, must become emotionally involved. They must have some understanding of the world of their day, and their academic pursuits must be mingled with personal, emotional involvement. It's happening all over the world, in Asia, Africa, South America, and in some European countries — also among our Negro high school and college students in the South. It's too bad when students in Ghana, Nigeria, Mexico, or Venezuela protest by breaking the windows of foreign embassies. But one thing must be said in their favor: they are not indifferent to what is happening about them; they feel themselves a part of the world in which they are living. Perhaps the ignorance of what is going on in the world or the apathy and indifference of students on a college campus is worse.

-- Ft. Wayne Journal Gazette Photo

There is great potential in our college youth. Soon the reins will be in their hands. If those at our educational institutions will help to educate for meaningful participation in life on the side of justice and equity and will help to guide their students in orderly but courageous participation, helping them to fit the good action to the good word that is spoken, our schools will be rendering a most needed service to church and nation. That's living dangerously.

Well, that's what we sing: "I walk in danger all the way." Shall it be nothing but a song?

"Wisdom is justified by her deeds."

A SOUTHERN TOWN AWAKENS

The Associate Press release put it this way:

"Ronald Victor Costly was the victim of a heart attack March 14. President of the student body of Wirt County High School, an outstanding athlete and an honor student, Ronnie, 19, was the lone Negro among the school's 400 students.

"The funeral was held March 16 in the school gymnasium. More than 1,000 persons attended, or 250 more than live in this farm town which hasn't a single Negro family. All but 75 present were white . . .

"'We all loved Ronnie,' school Principal Ray G. Jarvis said. 'He was an outstanding boy who overcame tremendous obstacles to win the respect and admiration of everyone who knew him. When he ran for student body president last year we had a hard time finding anyone to oppose him. He was so popular that he won by a 10 - 1 margin . . .

"'The day after he died it was terrible. Students were crying openly in the classrooms.'

"'Many of the schools in the conference never had competed against Negroes before Ronnie played,' basketball coach Joseph Craffey said, 'yet nearly all of them sent flowers. This is something I never heard of before.'"

It all happened in Elizabeth, West Virginia. And Elizabeth, West Virginia, is a richer town for the experience. What the children and townspeople alike learned from all this is incalculably great.

How could it happen at all in that Southern town? Only by setting aside the cold walls of segregation. It can likely be assumed that, had the much maligned Supreme Court not ruled as it did back in 1954, this community would have been deprived of this enriching experience. But one wonders how many communities that stubbornly resist school desegregation and so desperately fear its consequences are not robbing themselves and their children of similarly enriching experiences and, in frustrating American ideals and stiffling Christian desires, may be denying countless brothers of Ronald Costly their place in the sun.

ON OTHER LUTHERAN FRONTS

By L. W. Halvorson
Secretary, Human Relations
National Lutheran Council

WHERE HAVE WE FAILED?

Are you willing along with me to ask ourselves a few very pointed questions? The questions come from an exchange of letters, the first of which was addressed to me, and herewith is quoted in full.

Dear Sir:

Having commenced my pointless and fruitless associations with the Lutheran Church through you, I thought I might advise you of its termination.

Your church, which of course speaks with the authority of God, is satisfied in having poured on me a bit of tepid and stagnant water.

As a professional Christian you will undoubtedly experience some curiosity about the entire matter, but inasmuch as there is no attendant newspaper publicity I cannot properly bore you with details.

Signed_____

Mr. S_____ is a Jew who was baptized into the Christian faith about three years ago. I first met him at a midweek discussion group in a Lutheran church out on Long Island. He had heard that I was to speak on the subject of the Christian responsibility to bear witness to the Jew as well as to the Gentile. He was interested in the Christian faith and we had several visits together following this first meeting. I remember in particular a visit we had in a restaurant in Port Authority in New York where he was full of questions and comments. Following that visit I was not at all sure that he would ever become a Christian. But he did. On his own initiative he sought out a Lutheran pastor and received Christian baptism.

About the same time I moved to my present office in Chicago. There was occasion to keep in touch with him only at a distance. I met him only once since then and this was at the funeral service of a mutual friend. This was last fall, and then came the letter quoted above. My reply expressed regret at what must have happened between him and the Lutheran Church. I suggested that the church must have failed at some point in providing the sustaining fellowship he needed in order to feel that he was really a part of the communion of saints. My letter expressed a prayer that he would remember that Christ had not failed him although the church seemingly had done so. His reply gave no details but had further statements expressing his bitterness against the Lutheran Church.

Your reactions are perhaps the same as mine after reading the second letter. I said to myself that this man is a crank and that what he thinks is not worth taking seriously. I said that his own words condemn him and that his insinuations against the church are unreasonable and unfair. But on second thought, I feel bound to ask myself some questions concerning my attitude toward the Jew and of what I and the church have really done to reach them with the gospel.

The first question is this: Do we honestly believe that the Jew is included in the Great Commission of our Lord? Does Christ expect us to bring the gospel witness and invitation to him as well as to the Gentile? If we say we believe so, are we really trying to do so?

Thank God there are some pastors and congregations that can honestly answer "yes" to these questions. But all too many must answer "no."

A second question follows: What is it in the church that seems a stumbling block to the Jew both before and after he may become a Christian? Before the cross is understood it will, of course, be a stumbling block especially to the Jew. But there must be other things in the church that make the Christian Jew feel no sense of "belonging." He is so seldom really accepted in the church even though he is received through baptism. This is what Mr. S_____ infers and what I know to be true in many instances.

In his book entitled The Jewish People and Jesus Christ, Jacob Jocz has a chapter on "The Church and the Jews." In it he shows how history has given the Jew occasion to be very suspicious of the church as such. All too often he finds that the historic church has shown attitudes and practices of anti-Semitism. The chapter closes by saying: "Between Jesus and the Jews stands the 'Christian' church." By this the author means that the greatest barrier to the Jewish acceptance of Jesus Christ is the outward structure of the church. This is as true today as it ever was.

And so my question remains. What is it within the outward church that does not conform to the Spirit of Him who is Lord? The Jew seems to see it more quickly than anyone else and he either refuses to join the church or he leaves it when he does see it. And the Jew typically is not slow to speak his mind and heart. We need to ask ourselves if what he says is true. I am not answering the question but merely asking it.

A third question has to do with our willingness to adapt our church's witness for the sake of the Jew. Remembering that Paul was willing to become "all things to all men" in order

A SALUTE TO —

The Rev. Clemonce Sabourin, pastor of Mount Zion Church in Harlem (New York City), president of LHRAA, and author of Let the Righteouss Speak, is to receive the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws (LL.D.) from Valparaiso University at the commencement exercises in June.

The VANGUARD congratulates Pastor Sabourin on this high honor to be conferred upon him. The University, too, is to be congratulated, for in honoring Pastor Sabourin who has done so much for the church during his ministry, the University is adding to its own honor.

The friends of LHRAA and of Pastor Sabourin who will find it possible to attend the commencement are encouraged to come to witness the ceremony and to be on hand to congratulate our good friend. The commencement is scheduled for Sunday, June 9, at 2:30 p.m. Please mark that date on your calendar and come if you can.

While in Valparaiso, the Sabourins will be guests of the Schulzes; and the friends of the Sabourins attending the commencement are invited to the Schulze residence (505 Yellowstone Road) to greet the Sabourins after the commencement ceremonies.

Two other distinguished persons in the Lutheran Church in the United States are to be honored by the University, together with Pastor Sabourin. They are Dr. Fredrik Schiotz, the President of the American Lutheran Church, and Dr. Oliver Harms, President of The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod. Congratulations also to these distinguished church leaders.

to "save some," just how willing are we to even try to look at the church from the Jewish viewpoint? Without question there are things we believe and even things we practice within the church that cannot be changed for the sake of any one individual or group. But there are personal attitudes and habits and witnesses that Christians can and ought to modify in a variety of ways for the sake of the one to be reached. Does the Jew bring forth such adaptation on the part of very many within the church?

A final question is this: When we seek the Jew to become Christian do we let our approach be strictly Christian? By this I mean: Is it for Christ's sake and Him alone that we seek the Jew? Or do we seek him as we do some other people — to help us build a church and a congregation? When we invite a Jew to "come to church" and he does not respond, do we say that he had his chance but he failed to take it? At this point the Jew will be impressed with nothing but a Christian witness as such. This specifically Christian witness may have to take a variety of forms for his sake. For too many of us seek "members" for our churches more than we seek believers in Jesus Christ. In seeking the Jew it must be Christ first, and the church second place, before we can have hope of reaching him. Perhaps our frustrations in winning the Jews for Christ, and in keeping them after they have been won, are intended by God for our instruction in priorities and even in theology.

When all "the details" are known concerning what made Mr. S_____ think as he does, then perhaps some of these questions will be answered in part. The questions, however, would still remain — not only about the Jew but also about others. Our Lutheran Church has still to create the image that we are in dead earnest about bringing the gospel to all people. If we were, there would undoubtedly be times when we would use other than traditional methods.

A LOOK AROUND

Martin H. Scharlemann

MARTIN, NEGRO LAY BROTHER

Martin of Lima was canonized by the Roman Catholic Church last year. Following are some lines written by Sister Mary Augustine to commemorate the event:

Martin, Man of God,
What message lies within the shadows of your face?
What healing can you bring to this sore-ridden world — some anodyne,
some way to meet a need?

Martin, model for a people seeking life, life only found in folding it away — the seed in God's own bosom buried deep.

Martin do we dare to love
completely?
What if we cast
this one last crust of bread upon these ancient waters?

Martin, let your silence tell us of the song that hearts can sing
that are in love with God.
Let your blackness usher forth the light we need to splinter blindness from our naked eyes.
Let your greatness tell us of the kingdom hid within.

Martin, help us; Martin, Man of God.

EMANCIPATION — 100 YEARS

The unfinished task of U.S. democracy, and, of necessity, the ongoing concern of the church is clearly expressed in the 1962 Holiday Seal Campaign letter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP):

"All during 1963 there will be speeches, demonstrations, newspaper features, radio and television programs in observance of the hundredth anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. The NAACP will be doing its share, as it should, to bring home to people's hearts and minds the significance of that historic step.

"The Presidential Order ending Negro slavery in the rebellious states gave the Civil War a meaning for all mankind, a meaning which up to that time it had not had. The war became a struggle against the greatest of evils, and it is fair to say that, without the abolition of slavery as its purpose, it would not have mattered very much whether the North or the South was victorious on the field of battle.

"But a celebration of the Emancipation Centennial that did not focus on the unfinished business of Emancipation would be just as meaningless. So long as black citizens are shot down, their churches burned, their livelihoods ended because they want to cast a ballot, Emancipation is not finished. So long as Negro children are denied the educational opportunity which is their birthright — be they in the North or in the South — Emancipation is not finished. Wherever and whenever the color of his skin keeps an American from buying the home of his choice or getting the job he needs or eating the meal he is ready to pay for, Emancipation is not finished."

Conflict

by Marcy Rice

CATHOLICISM, THAT MOST POWERFUL UNITING FORCE, and racism, that equally powerful dividing force, today in America meet in conflict. The focal point of this conflict is the American Negro. Black, human, a son of God, he is the white man's black beloved brother. So Catholicism preaches, so it believes, for the Negro with the White, with all men, has God as his First Cause and Last End, and Christ as his Redeemer. Racism, however, on the basis of genetic origin, on the basis of blackness, attacks the fundamental dignity of the Negro. "Black, inferior, semi-human, he must be condemned either to subjugation or segregation." Upholding this theory, practicing it, indoctrinating others with it, the racist violates the laws of love and justice. Racism is both a contradiction of and a direct assault upon the basic principles of Catholicism.

When a man concentrates on a single object in a landscape, all else soon fades and he is acutely aware of only that one object. The racist has concentrated so fixedly upon color that he has lost sight of man. To his mind's eye the Negro appears as blackness. This blackness represents everything base, offensive, repugnant. The racist reacts to his distorted concept of the Negro by the practices of segregation and discrimination. These become the fruits of racial prejudice.

Racism corrodes society. It victimizes both the White and the Negro who are caught in an age when social intercourse is strained. Discord and confusion infiltrate the society and the individual. These, the consequences of racism, the consequences of segregation and discrimination, have, in turn, their own consequences. They hinder the spiritual and social development of the White and the Negro.

Racial attitudes are learned by Negroes and Whites; they are inbred at an early age. "The child assimilates prejudices and stereotypes of his group." Subjected to compulsory segregation and discrimination, the Negro child tends to experience frustration, conflict, feelings of inferiority, and a loss of respect. Whereas some react to these experiences by demonstrations of overt aggression and hostility toward Whites, others react by withdrawal, by apathy, by lack of initiative. Neither the vindictive, nor the defeatist, nor the hypersensitive Negro can face life normally. Each of these attitudes impedes the spiritual and social development of the Negro child.

The vindictive Negro has one end, revenge, which warps his mind. He may study assiduously, work relentlessly, learn doggedly, yet his motive corrupts his knowledge. In such a person hatred stifles love. It destroys the greatest bond of social union. He grows progressively antisocial — hostile and aggressive not only toward Whites but also toward other Negroes. A product of racism, he is an angry, lone, and perverted man.

The Negro with the defeatist attitude defeats himself. In his opinion, self-betterment is the impossible; subjugation, segregation, and discrimination, the inevitable. Offered education, he rejects it. Given a job, he sluggishly does it and sullenly loses it. He develops neither intellectually nor socially. His life is completely stagnant.

The hypersensitive Negro suffers intensely from frustration. An acute inferiority complex renders him over-perceptive to derision. Where hostility does not exist, he imagines it. Apprehension and fear breed within him, taint his actions, pervert his development. A lack of initiative results. Withdrawing from his prospective antagonists into a shell of apathy, he too tends to stagnate.

The injurious consequences of racism infect all societies. Not immune to them, the white child also suffers, and often from the same ailments which afflict the Negro. He becomes frustrated and confused. At school he proudly reads, "All men are created equal." At church he is told, "All men are brothers; every man is your neighbor; love your neighbor as yourself." Outside of school, outside of church, he confronts injustice and hatred, prejudice and discrimination. He is torn between the democratic principles and the brotherhood of men which he is taught, and the racial prejudice and discrimination which he observes. Such a conflict may lead to guilt complexes, to cynicism, to rejection of authority, or to rigid and unreasoning conformity. Each of these consequences hampers a normal spiritual and social development.

To whom do I owe my loyalty; in whom should I place my trust? Truth, goodness—what do they mean? These questions harass the White. He tends to develop a split personality. In one instance he practices discrimination; in another, he curses prejudice. He possesses no true values. Since a correct set of values is at the base of a productive spiritual development, the man without these values fails to develop. Throughout his life suspicion and vacillation conflict with love, with true and loyal friendships. Such a man soon hates all men, himself included. He is a finished product of racism.

Not alone on the natural but also on the supernatural level, racism impedes the spiritual and social development of the White and the Negro. Segregation and discrimination foster prejudice which blinds the intellect. A man who estranges himself from his neighbor estranges himself from God. If the White and the Negro fail to find God in each other, they fail to know, love, and serve Him. They fail as His sons. Segregation and discrimination sever the bonds of spiritual union. Brotherly love vanishes and the spiritual society disintegrates. In the United States today, as a result of racism, we have men devoid of faith, of hope, of love—empty men who lead empty lives.

Through her maternal eyes the Church sees all men as her beloved sons. Each, whether an actual or potential son, she loves purely, simply, unselfishly. Harm or abuse to any of her sons arouses her righteous anger. She realizes that racism causes discord and misery among the White and the Negro. Our Holy Mother the Church, she to whom Christ gave the mission of developing the love of God and the love of one's neighbor, meets the threat of racism. Her hierarchy, her clergy, her white and Negro laity fight the war against racism, the war to restore love and equality and unity among men.

The duty of the hierarchy is to issue directives, to teach the priests and the laity, for prejudice is a result of ignorance. To search its nature, to study its extent, to see the fallacy upon which it is founded is to deal racism its first blow. Whereas the hierarchy has an instructive duty, the priests and the laity have a social duty. Truth must be lived as well as known, "communicated to all phases of life."

The priests must rally their congregations, spread the teachings of the bishops, and vivify the principles of justice and charity. The white laity must live by justice, the Negro by patience, both by love. Deprived of jobs, excluded from certain neighborhoods, denied the right to develop fully his God-given talents, the Negro must still persevere. Each time he suffers unjustly he must forgive his oppressor and renew his efforts. The task of the White is equally difficult. In an atmosphere charged with prejudice he must never fail in his obligations to his brother, nor ever violate his brother's rights.

Racism compels Catholics to live their faith. By its very threat to unity, it drives Catholics to unite. Racism in the United States is both a menace and an impetus to the Catholic Church. "In no area have Catholics faced a sharper challenge or had a wider opportunity to give body to abstract morality and life to theoretical charity." (Catholicism and the Negro, in Jubilee Magazine.) Today in these United States racism is forming a Catholic Church united and strong and great.

Dear Friend:

Enclosed are a series of conversations originally prepared for radio transcription that emerged from the recent Institute for editors of the religious press sponsored by the National Conference of Christians and Jews. You are welcome to publish excerpts of the exchanges in article form or in a news release. The project feels that the confrontation here of some of the basic arguments is instructive and constructive.

THE ROLE OF THE RELIGIOUS PRESS IN INTER-RELIGIOUS RELATIONS

Introduction:

The National Conference of Christians and Jews has inaugurated a new program entitled, Religious Freedom and Public Affairs. This project will bring together on a national and regional level, priests, ministers and rabbis across the country for the purpose of discussing those issues in the public order about which religious groups differ. Complex and knotty questions such as public funds for the church school, religious practices in the public school, the distribution of birth control devices and Sunday closing laws are on the agenda.

Recently the project, Religious Freedom and Public Affairs, called together thirty five editors of Catholic, Jewish and Protestant publications. For the first time these editors of church and synagogue magazines and newspapers confronted each other in frank and honest discussion. Participating in this symposium held during the Editors' Institute are: Mr. James O'Gara, Managing Editor of the Commonweal and Rabbi Samuel Dresner, Editor of the Conservative Judaism. The topic for discussion: "The Role of the Religious Press in Inter-Religious Relations."

Arthur Gilbert: Mr. O'Gara, how would you characterize the present state of interreligious relations in this country? Do you think things are getting better among our religious groups, or worse?

James O'Gara: Well, the thing goes in two directions. Primarily, I believe things have improved a great deal. The climate of religious and inter-cultural relationships in the last 10 years has improved tremendously. At the same time we are encountering the differences among us and are beginning to confront them honestly; this leads to a certain inevitable amount of tension.

Arthur Gilbert: Rabbi Dresner, would you add some further light on the present state of interreligious relations as you see them?

Rabbi Dresner: The Ecumenical Council in Rome has given Catholics a great impetus to move out into the general community. This has been welcomed, certainly by the Jewish groups and also by Protestants. We are now witnessing a kind of burgeoning of the Ecumenical Council, not only in Rome, but on Main Street throughout America. There is, I think, a new spirit in the air.

Arthur Gilbert: Yet there is this paradox, is there not, that at this very time when priests, ministers and rabbis are getting together to talk to each other and Bishops are appearing before ministerial associations to report on the Ecumenical Council, that the front pages are also full of the news of the conflict among our religious groups on such issues as, public funds for the church school or religious practices in the public school? There is this kind of paradox. How would you account for this growing tension among our religious groups on these public issues? Will this strife threaten our American democracy? Is there something constructive to emerge from such controversey?

James O'Gara: Well, this was precisely my point. I think that we are emerging into a genuinely pluralistic society where minority groups feel secure to express themselves in the public forum and this inevitably leads to a certain amount of tension, at least on the surface level. The point that should be made about the Ecumenical Council, however, is that the Council should not be seen in isolation. It is not just one historic event, but rather it has to be seen in the context of modern church history. It is a culmination, if you will, of 70 years of determination on the part of the church to come to grips with modern problems and deal with problems of our own time.

Arthur Gilbert: Is the Ecumenical Council as exciting to Jews, Rabbi Dresner, as it has been to Protestants who saw in this effort of the Catholic Church some pastoral concern for their difference with the Church? How do Jews react to the Ecumenical Council? Does it really make any difference to Jews in their relations with Catholics?

Rabbi Dresner: Certainly the Jews are less related to the direct concerns of the Council than Protestants. The Ecumenical Council is directed to Catholics and to Protestants and we were not represented at the Council in Rome. We are nevertheless aware that if the Catholic Church is concerned with moving outward into the world, and in reaching out not only toward the "separated brethren," the Protestants, but towards Jews too - since we find a unity in the Bible that binds all of us together - then we can join forces against the great threats that stand before man: both atheistic communism and atomic war. We greet this new Ecumenical movement and we are hopeful that it will meet with success and we want to contribute to that success.

Arthur Gilbert: Both of you are editors of church-related religious magazines. James O'Gara, yours is a lay managed and edited Catholic magazine and yours, Rabbi Dresner is related to the Conservative movement in Judaism. As editors, how would you judge the role of the religious press in contributing to the present interreligious climate? Do you think the press itself has added to the spirit of ecumenicity and good fellowship? Or, on the other hand, have church reports on these public issues about which we differ sometimes actually created the tension and exaggerated problems?

James O'Gara: There are real differences between us. Very often these differences are exaggerated and misunderstood because of ignorance. It seems to me that the church-related press has a definite moral obligation to present facts objectively and as free from bias as it is possible to do. I do think that within the last five, perhaps ten years, the religious press in this country has improved tremendously on this score.

Arthur Gilbert: How has the Jewish press been handling these issues?

Do you notice the same sense of openness and development within the Anglo-Jewish press in this country?

Rabbi Dresner: I think there is a great variety, both in the Jewish and in the Christian religious press. One can find highly sophisticated publications and one can find poorly edited publications. One can find bigotry and one can find broadmindedness.

Arthur Gilbert: That means that the church press is like every other press in that sense. Well then, what would make the religious press unique? Would it be proper to say that the religious press speaks just to narrow religious issues or is there evidence of a religious press in this country that seems to have a broader vista and concern?

James O'Gara: It seems to me that the religious press insofar as it is purely parochial fails. If religion does not concern itself with the wide range of human endeavor, then it is failing in its duties.

Arthur Gilbert: Your own magazine, Mr. O'Gara, does report and editorialize on every conceivable issue in the public concern, presenting a Catholic point of view and insight. Your magazine indeed has caused quite a stir recently by some of your ecumenical efforts.

James O'Gara: One of the things we did recently, for instance, was to add to our staff a Protestant columnist, Dr. Robert McAfee Brown, who is a distinguished Protestant theologian.

Arthur Gilbert: A Protestant on the staff of a Catholic magazine?

James O'Gara: That is right, and I think that the public response to this is what was most interesting. I don't think this would have been possible, perhaps 10 years ago. When we did it, however, a few months ago, the response was overwhelmingly favorable from both Catholic, Protestant and Jewish sources.

Arthur Gilbert: How has your magazine dealt with the Jewish issue? Has this been a part of your concern?

James O'Gara: Well, we have always had a very strong position on the subject of anti-Semitism, going way back; we were particularly strong in connection with the rise of Hitler. In the more recent American past it was typical of "Commonweal," for example, to open its pages to present a complete issue in which Jewish spokesmen gave their views about the recent Supreme Court Decision on the Regents' Prayer. The feeling was prevalent in many quarters that the Jews were being used as scapegoats or butts in an attack from people who didn't like the Supreme Court decision. We turned our pages over to various Jewish writers and theologians to express their views on how this issue looked from various Jewish viewpoints. Again, I think the public reaction is interesting. We had almost overwhelmingly favorable reaction to this, especially from Catholics.

Arthur Gilbert: That represents a significant kind of openness in at least one Catholic magazine to the concerns of Jews and Protestants. I wonder, Rabbi Dresner, if the Jewish press has yet reached that point where it would give over an entire issue to Protestant or Catholic spokesmen to deal with their concerns.

Rabbi Dresner: I don't know of any complete issue of a Jewish magazine where that was done. I do know, certainly that Jewish magazines invite Catholic and Protestant theologians to contribute. With all its shortcomings, however, there is a dimension which the religious press brings in to the entire general press in America that would otherwise be less apparent. This is the element of moral concern which so often one doesn't find in the secular newspaper or our weekly periodicals. This is one of the great obligations and one of the great responsibilities of the religious press: to take the great insights of the religious tradition and to relate them to the moral concerns of the day. This, I think, can be done and is done sometimes spendidly by the religious press of both, Jew, Protestant and Catholic.

Mr. O'Gara: A further point might be made that the religious press should not be talking solely to people who are, so to speak, formally religious. There are many non-believers in this country who are very often simply offended by what they see passing under the name of religion. The religious press should be concerned with these people as well as with the formal believer.

Rabbi Gilbert: A significant part of the religious press in this country is organized in associations. The Catholic press in the Catholic Press Association, the Protestant press in Associated Press Church and some of the Jewish press of the local communities participate in an Anglo-Jewish Press Association. Recently the representatives of these press associations came together for confrontation and discussion with each other. During the course of the discussions there was evident a new kind of concern: that we had to present information about each other in an objective fashion; that while we might on various issues editorially differ with each other we had a responsibility to help our own readers and constituency hear the other from their best spokesman. Do you have any concluding observation?

Mr. O'Gara: I agree that the meeting itself was rather historic. I too detect this same feeling that we have to be ever more open to voices outside of our own communities. The editors are more and more concerned to do this in what I would call the best American tradition of openness and fairness and objectivity.

Conclusion:

This exchange points up the important function of the church press to inform its constituents concerning religious principles as they apply to social problems. While the religious press has a right and a duty to editorialize and make comment on important problems in the social order, it has a responsibility also to provide this information as fairly and as objectively as possible, and to help its constituency understand the motivation and the viewpoints of those with whom they differ.

The Project Religious Freedom and Public Affairs hopes through continuing dialogue and confrontation in the spirit of this presentation, to lift the level of public debate in this country aiding the cause of religion and the public good.

RELIGIOUS PRACTICES IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Introduction:

The National Conference of Christians and Jews has inaugurated a new program entitled, Religious Freedom and Public Affairs. This project will bring together on a national and regional level, priests, ministers and rabbis across the country for the purpose of discussing those issues in the public order about which religious groups differ. Complex and knotty questions such as public funds for the church school, religious practices in the public school, the distribution of birth control devices and Sunday closing laws are on the agenda.

Recently the project, Religious Freedom and Public Affairs, called together thirty five editors of Catholic, Jewish and Protestant publications. For the first time these editors of church and synagogue magazines and newspapers confronted each other in frank and honest discussion. Participating in this symposium held during the Editors' Institute are: Mr. Floyd Anderson, Managing Editor of the Central California Register, Mr. Kenneth Wilson, Executive Editor of the Christian Herald. The topic for discussion: "Religious Practices in the Public Schools."

Rabbi Gilbert: Recently the American people were aroused by a decision of the Supreme Court ruling that the state may not compose or sanction prayer for use in the public schools of the U.S. I noted, Mr. Anderson that the Catholic press throughout the U.S. editorialized quite vigorously in criticism of the Supreme Court. Would you explain for us how Catholics feel about this problem of religious practices in the public schools?

Mr. Anderson: Well, I might point out, Rabbi Gilbert, that at the time of that decision, Catholic opinion was quite divided. I recall two editorials for example, both entitled, "Black Monday," which took absolutely opposite opinions. Many Catholics fear that we might be losing some part of religion from American life. Others recognized that the government does not have a role in prescribing a certain form or type of prayer.

Rabbi Gilbert: You are suggesting then, that while at first blush it seemed to appear that Catholics were quite aroused by the decision, there were some second thoughts; and there were editorials in some Catholic publications that supported the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Anderson: Yes. And I think this also, that there may have been some hasty reporting on the decision. The reporters involved disclaim this. But as the decision first came through to many people it was not as clear as it was after they got the full text and they were able to study it more carefully.

Rabbi Gilbert: Now, Mr. Wilson, it appears from my reading of the Protestant press that Protestants also were quite divided in reaction to this issue; there didn't appear to be any one prevailing viewpoint. How would you interpret Protestant concerns with regard to this question of religious practices in the public school?

Mr. Wilson: Well, first of all I think there is a division simply because we are Protestants. We take varied views on a given subject. Many Protestants saw in the New York prayer a violation of the principle of Church and State. It is a very dear principle to Protestants. Others, however, felt that this decision was a watering down of a rightful religious influence in the public schools. I think part of this reaction stemmed not only from the ruling itself but the way one of the Supreme Court Justices projected the implications of this ruling.

Rabbi Gilbert: Yes, as I recall Justice Douglas indicated that this prayer service was a form of financial aid to the public schools. He suggested that there might be a whole host of other involvements of church and state that can be called into question, such as religious slogans on the coinage and the opening of Congress with prayer, and so on. I imagine some of the critical Catholic reactions to the decision in fact was a reflection of the fear that if Justice Douglas would see in the recitation of the 23 word prayer in the public school a form of financial aid to religion, then quite possibly the kinds of aid that Catholics are now requesting for the Church related school would certainly be unconstitutional.

Mr. Anderson: That is very likely true, Rabbi Gilbert. Many feel that way. In fact I was talking to a Catholic editor the other day who felt a logical projection of Justice Douglas' view, would compel us to drop all chaplains out of the armed forces because this is in a sense financial aid to religion.

Rabbi Gilbert: Justice Douglas' view however wasn't really upheld by the majority. There was a footnote in the majority decision indicating that patriotic exercises where reference is made to God are not considered unconstitutional; therefore this particular decision didn't really remove any and all references to God from public life.

Mr. Wilson: That is correct. Justice Douglas brought in all these implications which I think were perhaps of more concern to more people than the decision itself.

Mr. Anderson: If I might interject here a minute this whole question is a very complex one. It is very difficult to come up with a reasonable answer that will be constitutional and satisfactory to most people.

Mr. Wilson: Don't you think, Mr. Anderson, that part of the problem is not that any of us, Catholic or Protestant takes particular exception to this philosophy of the separation of church and state or "the wall of separation" as Protestants tend to call it; rather the disagreement comes at the point of how high this wall should be built? Most of us are not wholly consistent in this. We don't want a wall that goes all the way but we want a small wall.

Mr. Anderson: Well, Mr. Wilson, I think one of the great problems and one of the great worries of many people is the growing secularization, the growing materialism of our national life. This is what they are concerned about. When something comes up which seems to chop off a bit of religious practice or religious life or religious belief, they instinctively feel that this is tending toward something which I don't think any of us want.

Rabbi Gilbert: Yet as you gentlemen know, most of the Jewish community enthusiastically supported the prayer decision of the Supreme Court. Here is a religious community that holds to the judgment that when religion seeks to gain strength by using the state or state imposed religious practices as a means of furthering its sectarian purposes, then actually such practices will harm religion. The kind of religion in which we can engage in the public school is superficial. If we encourage a public school religion and a public school God we may actually "water down" the contribution that religion can make to the public order. This court decision ought challenge the people of religion to recognize how crucial is the home and synagogue and church. We must deepen the religious life of the individual if we really want to make religion meaningful and powerful in American public life.

Mr. Anderson: I think it is very true Rabbi that no religious group can depend on the public school to promote or teach religion. Certainly Catholics don't, and I don't think Protestants do. But they are a little bit afraid of dropping these last vestiges of some religious belief. Nevertheless I agree with you absolutely, the decision throws more stress on the church and synagogue, and especially on the family because this is the primary means of education, or should be.

Rabbi Gilbert: Mr. Wilson, what do you think will be the reaction of some of the Protestant communities to the possibility that the Supreme Court will this May or June rule that Bible reading or the recitation of the Lord's Prayer may not constitutionally be part of public school practice? Do you think there will be a growing effort on the part of Protestants to seek some kind of constitutional amendment in order to change the reading of the First Amendment?

Mr. Wilson: I don't know that the idea of a Constitutional Amendment will get very far, though many or most Protestants are going to be deeply disturbed if the Court rules against Bible reading. At the same time, as you say, Rabbi Gilbert, anything that throws back upon the church and the home a sense of additional religious responsibility is to the good. Whatever comes, we are going to just have to make the best of it, to seek to get out of it the greatest values we can.

Mr. Anderson: Isn't one of the problems, Mr. Wilson, that very often the people in the home are not fulfilling their obligations in teaching religion to their children. They are looking for some outside agency to do it, the Sunday school or the parochial school or the Jewish Saturday school. Aren't they seeking for somebody else to be doing what they should be doing?

Mr. Wilson: That is very true. We are always seeking the easy way out of difficult problems. But even if we depended on the school we'd have to examine our responsibilities. Certainly the reading in the public school of verses from the Bible is not going to contribute a very great degree to religious education. The one thing that it does, it seems to me, is to give the child in school the feeling that this is important.

Rabbi Gilbert: Jewish leadership probably will oppose any effort to use the public school as a means of engaging in religious rites and devotions, or as a means of winning membership to religion. The use of the Bible, for example, as part of a religious exercise is opposed by the Jewish community. On the other hand, there are many of our leaders who suggest that it is part of the knowledge we must have in Western civilization to know about religion and to know about the Bible. It is part of our background, in a sense. We ought to enrich the curriculum therefore where it would be intrinsic to the subject matter and teach about religion, providing much more information to our young people than we now do through the public schools. While teaching about religion might be accepted, depending on how it would work out, the Jewish community will maintain its opposition to the public school setting itself up as a church, as it were, engaging in prayer and in liturgical rites and exercises.

Mr. Wilson: I think that is quite a reasonable approach. Now matter how the decision goes we need to be concerned that we understand the viewpoint of the Jewish community and others, and that we recognize that we are all in this together; and that we are seeking the ultimate ends of Brotherhood and good Americanism.

Mr. Anderson: I would agree with that. I don't think anyone wants the public school to turn into any kind of a church or to teach church practices.

Rabbi Gilbert: Well, certainly this is clear. This issue of the role of religion in the public school is a complex one. There is, on the one hand, the question of whether we will engage our children in religious exercises and prayers and devotionals. There is also the question of whether we will release chidren for religious instruction. Then there is the question: can we teach about religion in the public school, and if so do we have proper textbooks, are our teachers trained enough to be sensitive to all the children in the school? If there is to be any solution to this problem certainly religious leaders must come together and understand each others points of view, find out where the shoe pinches on each others foot, as it were, and come to some terms so that educators will be enabled to provide a constructive and healthy program for our school children.

Conclusion: This exchange points up the important function of the church press to inform its constituents concerning religious principles as they apply to social problems. While the religious press has a right and a duty to editorialize and make comment on important problems in the social order, it has a responsibility also to provide this information as fairly and as objectively as possible, and to help its constituency understand the motivation and the viewpoints of those with whom they differ.

The Project Religious Freedom and Public Affairs hopes through continuing dialogue and confrontation in the spirit of this presentation, to lift the level of public debate in this country aiding the cause of religion and the public good.

THE QUESTION OF PUBLIC FUNDS FOR THE CHURCH-RELATED SCHOOL

Introduction:

The National Conference of Christians and Jews has inaugurated a new program entitled, Religious Freedom and Public Affairs. This project will bring together on a national and regional level, priests, ministers and rabbis across the country for the purpose of discussing those issues in the public order about which religious groups differ. Complex and knotty questions such as public funds for the church school, religious practices in the public school, the distribution of birth control devices and Sunday closing laws are on the agenda.

Recently the project, Religious Freedom and Public Affairs, called together thirty-five editors of Catholic, Jewish and Protestant publications. For the first time these editors of church and synagogue magazines and newspapers confronted each other in frank and honest discussion. Participating in this symposium held during the Editors' Institute are: Monsignor Daniel Moore, Editor, of the St. Louis Review, and Dr. Harold E. Fey, Editor, of the Christian Century. The topic for discussion: "The Use of Public Funds for the Church-Related School."

Arthur Gilbert: Monsignor Moore, would you describe the position of the Catholic community with regard to public funds for church-related education?

Monsignor Moore: First of all, the Catholic community is very definitely interested in a high level of educational excellence for our country. There are, as you know, some 6 million children in the Catholic educational system. Our request for Federal aid is based upon the fact that we are paying taxes for educational purposes and we feel that as a matter of justice, distributive justice, as we call it, our parents should be deriving some benefit from the taxes they pay.

Arthur Gilbert: Do I understand correctly, Dr. Fey, that most Protestants would hold that there is no question of "justice" here and that public funds ought not be given to schools that are church-related?

Dr. Fey: That is a correct statement of the Protestant position. We believe that the religious communities in this country have prospered very well under a system that keeps church and state separate. We also believe that if public support were given to the schools of any church this would introduce the element of government control; that it would set in motion an unfortunate competition among religious groups and would undermine the public schools.

Arthur Gilbert: Do Catholics fear this possibility that provision of public funds to the church-related school will probably lead to government control?

Monsignor Moore: I think there is a genuine basis for a fear of that kind. But I would take particular issue with the suggestion that this is a religious issue. I don't think it is specifically a religious issue. It is simply true that most of the children who are in private schools, non-public schools are Catholics; but the fact that they are Catholic is irrelevant to the problem. That a religious division would arise I think would be very unfortunate and most unnecessary. You might say it is simply a matter of money. Let's put it that way, money and taxes.

Arthur Gilbert: I get the impression, Dr. Fey, that it is your conviction that if public funds were made available to church-related schools, there will be a proliferation of many church-related schools springing up in response to the availability of such funds. This is undoubtedly a challenge to the public school system.

Dr. Fey: That is correct. The competition - for it would amount to that - of a very large, state-subsidized system of schools controlled by one church would obviously stimulate a very great concern on the part of other churches for their own survival. Now they object to the establishment of such subsidies to church schools. If the objection fails to register then they will unquestionably seek to set up their own systems of parochial schools to be subsidized by the state. I feel that this would be divisive and that it would undermine public education.

Arthur Gilbert: On the other hand, Dr. Fey, don't church-related schools serve the public interest by educating our children? Why shouldn't we have a concern for the welfare of all children in all the schools of the U.S.?

Dr. Fey: I think we should have this concern and I agree with Monsignor Moore that the general level of education should be raised. It is quite obvious as we look around the world and see the challenges that confront the American community why this level of education must be raised. At the same time there is something fairly important in the voluntary nature of religious exercises. The maintenance of freedom of religion without subsidy by the state or interference with civil authority on the part of the church should be precious to all of us. The support by people of their churches on a voluntary basis strengthens their religious faith and strengthens their own testimony to society.

Arthur Gilbert: I have the impression, Monsignor Moore, when you use the words, "distributive justice" that Catholics believe that they are entitled by right to such public support for their church schools. How do you counter the argument raised by many that the provision of public funds for church-related schools would be a violation of the First Amendment of the United States?

Monsignor Moore: There are many things that I could say, in this brief time, that could be constructive, I am sure, and argued with; but when I say that prices are going up I don't think that that could be contradicted. Parents of children who are going to private schools feel this very, very much. Then they look at the Constitution and some of the decisions that have been rendered by the Supreme Court, particularly the Pierce Decision of 1925 which entitles children to go to any school of their choice, even a private school. In a sense, you see, this decision set the private school up as a public school. Actually, our schools satisfy the requirements of the state. Thus, the parents are saying, "We are entitled to this, for we send our children to a sort of a public institution which satisfies the requirements of the state." So in this matter of distributive justice, Catholic parents are paying taxes for educational reasons. They are entitled by the Constitution to send their children to these schools. Why should they not derive benefit from it?

Arthur Gilbert: Would it be fair to say, Monsignor Moore, that if in the present Congressional session public funds were not made available for the church-related school, Catholics would join in an effort to defeat the President's bill for public education?

Monsignor Moore: That they would openly oppose it, you mean?

Arthur Gilbert: Yes, unless the Catholics' request is met, the Catholics will oppose any program of public support for public education.

Monsignor Moore: Well, there are some Catholic agencies who have already indicated their opposition to a bill of this kind, simply because they feel that the bill is unjust. In the democratic process this is their perfect right. Whether or not they could actually kill the bill, that, of course, is something else again.

Arthur Gilbert: Are there some Catholics who are opposed to the general position that has been maintained by the Bishops? Are there some Catholics who would be opposed to a grant of public funds to Church related schools?

Monsignor Moore: Oh, I think that it is a matter of public record that that is true, yes.

Dr. Fey: It is a fact that federal aid to public schools has been discussed for a very long time, perhaps 30 years. Federal aid bills have been defeated year after year, sometimes by vote, sometimes by being sidetracked. Now, I feel that it is a real challenge to the religious communities to put aside their differences and allow a bill to pass. If the bill before Congress doesn't mention the religious issue then no group can say it is discriminated against on that score. Passage of a bill to aid public schools would leave the question as to the distribution of these funds up to the states. The states could include or exclude parochial schools according to their own Constitutions. If we believe in a high level of education, for all of our children, I cannot see how we can oppose such legislation much longer. We've lost a generation of opportunity already and our school system's inadequacy becomes more and more apparent as the years go by.

Arthur Gilbert: Do most Protestants and Protestant publications support the President's program of federal funds for public education?

Dr. Fey: Yes, all that I know about would say that if federal funds are voted for education they should be confined to the public schools. However, there are many Protestants,I regret to say, who agree with organizations like the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. They oppose Federal aid to education on any basis.

Arthur Gilbert: Are there some Catholic Bishops who are opposed to Federal aid to public education?

Monsignor Moore: The statement that the Bishops made on this matter of Federal aid to education indicates that they believe it has to be objectively studied. I would agree with Dr. Fey, however, on one point, that of a high level of education for all children and that ought include the 6 million children who are in private schools.

Arthur Gilbert: It seems to me then, that both of you share this concern that we must develop and strengthen education in America and that this education must be strengthened for all American children. The question is, how will this be achieved? Shall we provide federal funds for public education and if such funds are provided, shall funds also be provided for church-related education? If direct grants or funds cannot be made available to church-related education, are there other ways by which benefits can be provided for the children who attend parochial schools or for their parents, such as bus transportation funds or the distribution of public school textbooks? Issues such as these challenge and confront our nation. We are glad to note that the religious leadership of this land is joining together for frank and honest discussion of our points of view and our differences. May this eventually reap a benefit for all our children.

Conclusion:

This exchange points up the important function of the church press to inform its constituents concerning religious principles as they apply to social problems. While the religious press has a right and a duty to editorialize and make comment on important problems in the social order, it has a responsibility also to provide this information as fairly and as objectively as possible, and to help its constituency understand the motivation and the viewpoints of those with whom they differ.

JESUIT SEES END OF U. S. RACISM

Cause Is Hopeless, Murray Says at Catholic Dinner

A leading Catholic theologian said here last night that forces in this country opposed to interracial justice were doomed to defeat and that they knew it.

"I think this is why they fight their hopeless battle with such desperate passion," said the theologian, the Rev. John Courtney Murray, professor of theology at Woodstock (Md.) College.

Father Murray, a Jesuit, was the principal speaker at a dinner in the Americana Hotel at which the Catholic Interracial Council presented a citation to Mayor Wagner.

Mr. Wagner was cited for sponsoring legislation and establishing agencies to combat discrimination in employment and housing. The Rev. John LaFarge, an editor of America, the Jesuit weekly, made the presentation.

In discussing current racial unrest, Father Murray said it represented "the workings out of a past tradition of injustice, ignorance, apathy, distrust, even hatred."

He said that while recent legal decisions had pushed forward the frontiers of racial justice, the legal achievement was "a severely limited one."

Matter of Conscience

"The victory of the law only raises a further and more profound issue for the social conscience of our country," he added. "When the limits of law have been reached, as they have, the whole issue in all its subtlety of reach, is inescapably presented to the higher tribunal of conscience."

Father Murray said that "the force of love" in individuals and the community was powerful enough to move the course of history toward freedom and justice.

In an implied warning against such movements as the Black Nationalists, Father Murray asserted that "the separatist idea is dangerous." He said it would lead to antagonisms and the consequent contest for power."

Mayor Wagner, in accepting the citation, said that the challenge to civil rights had to be met not only in Birmingham but "everywhere throughout the South."

The Catholic Interracial Council, organized here in 1934, now has 48 additional councils operating in different parts of the country.

William A. Shea, a New York lawyer, was chairman of the dinner. Frederick O'Neal, the Negro actor who is vice president of Actors Equity, was the toastmaster. About 400 persons attended.

JESUIT SEES U.S. RACISTS
LOSING 'HOPELESS BATTLE'

By Religious News Service (5-21-63)

NEW YORK (RNS) -- A prominent Jesuit theologian and author declared here that the forces opposed to interracial justice are fighting a "rearguard action" and that their cause is doomed to defeat.

"It has, in fact, already been defeated. I think this is why they fight their hopeless battle with desperate passion," said Father John Courtney Murray, S.J., professor of theology at Woodstock (Md.) College and author of "We Hold These Truths" and other books.

Father Murray was the principal speaker at a dinner held by the Catholic Interracial Council (CIC) of New York which honored New York's Mayor Robert F. Wagner for efforts to promote racial harmony.

In a tribute to Mr. Wagner, Father John La Farge, S.J., chief founder of the CIC and an associate editor of America, national Catholic weekly magazine, cited the mayor's support of legislation and formation of agencies in the city to combat discrimination in employment and housing.

In the past, Father Murray said in his address, the fight for interracial justice has been fought in the courts. While successful, he noted, the legal achievement in the racial field has been a "severely limited one."

"The victory of the law only raises a further and more profound issue for the social conscience of our country," he asserted. "When the limits of law have been reached, as they have, the whole issue... is inescapably presented to the higher tribunal of the religious and moral conscience."

Interracial justice, Father Murray declared, can be achieved through legal means, "up to a point."

"But the achievement of our higher national objective, which is to form the more perfect union, can only be a work of freedom," he said.

"The schism in our national life cannot be cleverly settled," the theologian emphasized. Racial peace, he stated, must be achieved from within, not through force.

Father Murray went on to attack racial separatist movements, Negro and white alike, as divisive in the American framework. "The separatist idea is dangerous," he warned. "It prevents our ideal of coming together."

The Jesuit asserted that only the "force of love" in individuals and the community can bring about racial harmony. He added:

"Only if the social conscience is informed by this force of love ...shall we be able with any confidence to face the formidable question: Negro and white, who are equal before the law -- how are they to be one in the oneness of the one American community?"

Mayor Wagner, in response to the tribute from the CIC, said he considered the promotion of better intergroup relations and the racial equality to be "the most important single test of our moral sincerity of any now confronting us."

Commenting on Pope John XXIII's recent encyclical, Pacem in Terris, Mr. Wagner noted that it contained a "clarion call to conscience" on the promotion of interracial justice.

"We can only pray that that call will be heeded by men and women of all faiths and regions of our country and the earth," he declared.

(more)

Other speakers at the dinner included Dr. John Morsell, assistant secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), and Gerard L. Carroll, chairman of the board of directors of the CIC.

Msgr. Joseph T.V. Snee, assistant vicar for religious in the New York archdiocese, conveyed greetings to the dinner from Francis Cardinal Spellman of New York.

Toastmaster at the dinner, attended by about 400 persons at the Hotel Americana, was Frederic, O'Neal, a Negro actor who is vice-president of Actors Equity. William A. Shea, a New York attorney, was dinner chairman.

The Catholic Interracial Council of New York, founded in 1934, is the parent body of some 50 similar Councils throughout the country.

What Color Is God?

GARRY WILLS

James Baldwin is a disarming man, against whom it is necessary to arm ourselves. Which, oddly enough, may be what he is trying to tell us.

He has written an indictment of Western civilization—more precisely, of that civilization's religion, of "the white God"—that is carefully and consciously "outrageous." He edges toward us—in every sentence—his credentials as the most sensitive and discriminating articulator of Negro suffering; while, fully aware of the incongruity, he constructs an intricate sympathy for the crudest kind of Negro racism, that of Elijah Muhammad and his Black Muslims. There is virtuosity, even a dark gaiety in his anger: he does not try to hide the logical weaknesses in his argument, considered solely as an argument. He candidly bases his view of religion on his special experience of "the church racket": at the age of fourteen, he became a boy preacher in order to break the hold over him of his father, an hysterical minister who, after torturing his children with hatred and piety, starved himself to death.

It is a story Baldwin has told many times—in detail as Go Tell It on the Mountain, obliquely in the opening pages of Giovanni's Room, as autobiography in an essay on his father's funeral. Like the fourteen-year-old John of Go Tell It on the Mountain, Baldwin let himself be swept out to sea, for one night, on the current of longing that runs through the store-front churches; suffered all night the redeeming plangencies of the saved; mounted the pulpit and began to preach out of "a merciless resolve to kill my father rather than allow my father to kill me." (In the novel, it is put this way: "John excelled in school, . . . and it was said that he had a Great Future. He might become a Great Leader of his people. John was not much interested in his people and still less in leading them anywhere, but the phrase so often repeated rose in his mind like a great brass gate, opening outward for him on a world where people did not live in the darkness of his father's church.")

The Fire Next Time, by James Baldwin. Dial, $3.50

Up against an audience that has its Freud by heart, an indictment of religion based on this experience is almost bound to misfire; to be read as the private fight of an Oedipus, not as part of the public struggle of a race for recognition. Baldwin knows this; knows, nonetheless, that he can give the game away and still win it. He makes no effort to soften the hard lines of inconsistency that extrude everywhere in his piece—saying, in one breath, that it is too late for us to convince the Negro of our good faith, since the growth of black power in the world makes any gesture on our part look like an effort to buy off our future conquerors; then, with a change of mood, but no answer to the former argument, singing that our nation is the one best equipped to lead the world into a new era of racial love. Earlier, we are told that it is impossible for the Negro not to hate his oppressor and respond to Muhammad's call; but in the rosier last pages, the Negro is extolled for having resisted the temptation to hate. Then, as a cap on all these incongruities, he sent us his apocalyptic "Letter From a Region of My Mind" interleaved with the Lanvin ads of the New Yorker. One can read it now between hard covers, as The Fire Next Time.

I

THE Fire Next Time falls into three major sections. The first is lyric and intensely felt, the story of his struggle with his father, and with God, and with the white man. The second, his interview with Muhammad ("He made me think of my father and me as we might have been if we had been friends"), puts the Black Muslim doctrine, or as much of it as will submit to the treatment, into effective oratorical form: "The Christian world has revealed itself as morally bankrupt . . . a civilization sexually so pathetic that the white man's masculinity depends on a denial of the masculinity of the blacks . . . the fact of the Third Reich alone makes obsolete forever any question of Christian superiority, except in technological terms . . . [so that the Jews' position] would be my position on the day that the United States decided to murder its Negroes systematically instead of catch-as-catch-can." The rhetorical coarsening reflects a turn of the argument toward special pleading: the white reaction to the Muslims is in no way motivated by opposition to violence or racism—since we whites are restless with barely suppressed desire for war, and condone white racism—but by "the attempt of the white man to destroy him [the Negro]—for that is what it is."

The last part is mechanically protreptic to a degree that is startling in Baldwin. He parades all the Liberal clichés in their pristine naiveté—the wave of history, the courage to change, the need to export our revolution. The "American dream" is shattered by "our curious role in Spain" and in "pre-Castro Cuba." We are accused, and without defense, before "any Cuban peasant or any Spanish poet." We must be "willing to change," our task is "to trust and to celebrate" this change; "everything white Americans believe must now be re-examined" under the advent of an "historical vengeance, a cosmic vengeance." This inevitable tide, so inevitable that its beneficence, direction, or source do not need to be described, forces us to swear allegiance to "an age of revolution." "Any attempt we make to oppose these outbursts of energy is tantamount to signing our death warrant." Baldwin, who wrote, in Notes of a Native Son, "I am not one of the people who believe that oppression imbues a people with wisdom or insight or sweet charity" here becomes "one of the people who." The Negro, we are told, has been forced "to look beneath appearances, to take nothing for granted, to hear the meaning behind the words," thus achieving an aristocracy of the spirit, the only aristocracy America has ever known.

The modulations that carry us from the opening pages—so aware of human evil and contradiction—to the homiletic conclusion (simply love, children, surrender yourselves to love "as a state of being, or a state of grace") are almost imperceptible. It is a tour de force. Yet, despite the manifesto prose about "changing the world," the contrived effects, the unexpected stridency, it is intensely moving; it has, in fact, had a seismic effect whose tremors are not even beginning to subside. Why is this?

II

THE QUESTION is really two questions. Why did he write it, and why did it have such impact? It won't do to think that the first question can be answered simply by saying that he meant to shock, to create an "effect"—though, characteristically, and with the same aplomb that is mixed with his real anger, Baldwin would not deny that this was a factor in the performance. He is too good an artist not to see in aesthetic terms the contrast between his introspective, restrained early essays, and this rousing attack. A blurb on one of his books quotes some early review: "His Olympian detachment is almost frightening. . . ." The novelist so aware of the heart's mystery (his favorite adjective is "unreadable"—all his characters have unreadable faces; and his indispensable noun is "conundrum"—all the situations his unreadable ones find themselves in are conundrums) puts himself, for once, at the head of the simplifiers.

When Norman Mailer criticized Baldwin ("too charming . . . paragraphs sprayed with perfume"), the one thing that seems to have hurt was the statement that Baldwin seems incapable of hurling obscenities at the reader. At least Baldwin went out of his way to win this supposedly unattainable distinction, addressing Mailer's two unprintable words to Mailer by way of the printed page; and few readers of Baldwin's last novel will feel inclined to repeat the charge. In fact, much of the uneasiness that reviewers showed when faced with this novel seems to have come from the suspicion that Baldwin was answering some such dare. The man who had brought off a "sensitive" novel on race and a "dignified" novel on homosexuals suddenly upped the decibels. Baldwin has an uncanny way of writing to a background music that somehow gets transmitted along with the words. In Go Tell It on the Mountain, everything went to the moaning and keening of spirituals. In Giovanni's Room, the music was put away, with Giovanni's violin; but there are occasional hints of the saccharine Parisian tunes Guillaume or Jacques would force Giovanni to play if he ever took down that Italian violin in his French exile. In the last novel, an hysterical and cruel jazz whips the words forward. The stridency, the ambitious rhetoric of the New Yorker piece make their first appearance in Another Country. Baldwin is obviously a man who can do anything with words—even defy his reputation for sensitivity and restraint. It must be fun; and he would not deny the fun, even if he were fighting in dead earnest.

James Baldwin—"Asking for immediate secession from our civilization."

And, of course, he is. The slightly apologetic air of the reviewers—patronizing, ready to let him "blow off a bit of steam," even (poor Baldwin, still haunted from the pulpit) paternal—covered a total ignorance of what was happening in the novel. What was happening, among other things, was the New Yorker piece.

RUFUS SCOTT, the doomed jazz drummer of Another Country, and his sister Ida, a singer, are surrounded by white rebels against white society. They feel themselves turned into symbols of nonconformity, occupying a position somewhere in the scale between a white Villager's beard and his "boyfriend." They are test cases, love for whom is a gesture of defiance toward someone else. When Vivaldo wants to hurt his parents, he threatens to bring Ida home with him. And yet Vivaldo loves Ida; loves her even while he tries to use her to prove something. And Ida, tortured by her alertness for the least sign of this elaborate, self-justifying "tolerance," loves Vivaldo, without ever being able to trust him or herself. She feels loved not as Ida Scott, but as part of an obscure test whereby the white man is to learn how to live with himself—a medium or vehicle of white narcissism. She cannot shake him out of the introspection that glazes his eyes when he is near her. She attacks him, over and over, trying to make those eyes blaze outward; but they only blur, and his tears infuriate her. As Baldwin wrote elsewhere, "the interracial handshake or the interracial marriage can be as crucifying as the public hanging or the secret rape."

In this way brother and sister—Rufus and Ida—who bore hatred with dignity, are eaten hollow by love. Anonymity in hatred is bad enough, but anonymity in love is a total solvent. It leaves nothing. Against this menace Ida arms herself, determined to destroy the love that can so easily destroy her, that did destroy her brother. She will take power from the white man, beat him at his own game. (Baldwin has remarked that Eartha Kitt was in his mind when he described her cold drive toward success.) The shrill note, new in Baldwin's work, is hers, the brassy sound that covers terror. Part of the peroration of the New Yorker piece, about "a bill coming in," is taken from one of her speeches.

Baldwin has described, in an interview, how Ida forced herself on his story. Rufus, who dies early in the novel, was obviously meant to be the one Negro dominating it, haunting it from his grave. But Rufus somehow fails to convince or fascinate. We have to take his artistry, his magnetism exercised over all the other characters, as a given. The "given" is, of course, the thing a proof (or a novel) does not offer to give us in its own demonstration; but Rufus' mystery is precisely what the novel should have given us in the first eighty pages, made unforgettable for the hundreds of pages after Rufus' disappearance. Baldwin seems to have been so intent on making him a portent, a puzzle for the others to read, that the sign becomes abstract, dehydrated. Yet the riddle lay in the fact that Rufus was a person who was treated as a thing. The novelist is guilty, aesthetically, of the thing he attacks in the realm of morals. In fact, almost all of Baldwin's own criticism of Richard Wright's hero, Bigger Thomas, can be applied to Rufus. Ida becomes the "voice of the Negro" in this tale—not pathetic, irritating, a lingering mystery, but aggressive and bound to win.

III

In some as yet unconfessed way, Baldwin seems to be launched on the self-lacerating task that Ida set herself—to see if, in the amorphous tolerance surrounding the "accepted" Negro, some fire of human dignity and spontaneity can still be kindled. Only this, it seems to me, can explain the odd union of jauntiness and agony forced to the surface of the New Yorker article. Baldwin dares us to attack his inconsistency, as Ida dares Vivaldo to criticize a "spook." Calling herself such names is much like Baldwin's deliberately provocative praise of Muhammad.

But, though he hit us as hard as he could, though he took the most sacred things as his target, though he mocked Christianity, called its missionaries the willing agents of exploitation, though he was as outrageous as he could be, though he was obscene enough even for Mailer, he has been met with a vast tolerance and sympathy, a vague clucking of tongues over the plight of Harlem Negroes, a superficial flurry of comment on how brave the New Yorker was, and how eloquent Baldwin is, and how wicked Mississippi is. It must be very frustrating.

And this is the real reason for the article's impact, the deep impression it made under all the superficial chatter about it. He found our weakness, pushed his hand right through it. That weakness is not that we have been cruel to the Negro. We have, more than we know; more than we want to know. But this terrible accusation is not the real point of Baldwin's challenge. He does not attack us for not living up to our ideals, for lapsing, for sinning, for being bad Christians. He says we do not have any ideals: we do not believe in any of the things our religion, our civilization, our country stand for. It is all an elaborate lie, a lie whose sole and original function is to fortify privilege. And he proves this by attacking all our so-called beliefs, then standing back and observing that no one defends them. In fact, everyone rushes to defend him.

Understand, then, that Baldwin is not, as one might gather from some treatments of his article, simply advocating, in more compelling words, an acceleration of the sit-in movement. In 1949, it is true, he wrote that the Negro wants acceptance and advance of status within the present community—what the NAACP is laboring for. But now he makes a different analysis: "The American Negro has the great advantage of having never believed that collection of myths to which white Americans cling." As such, the Negro is naturally fitted for the task of weaning us from the evil nourishment of our delusions: "How can the American Negro's past be used? The unprecedented price demanded—and at this embattled hour of the world's history—is the transcendence of the realities of color, of nations, and of altars."

Those Christians not ready to "transcend their altars" are reminded that belief in Christ is based on an ignorance of "several elementary historical details," e.g., "that the real architect of the Christian church was not the disreputable, sunbaked Hebrew who gave it his name but the mercilessly fanatical and self-righteous St. Paul. The energy that was buried with the rise of the Christian nations must come back into the world; nothing can prevent it." This energy is not given any further characterization, but it seems to be the tide of resistless change we are all to ride, a tide that puts in an astonishingly early appearance in Baldwin's assemblage of "elementary historical details."

So let us be clear about what is actually being said: Baldwin is asking for immediate secession from our civilization. "This, then, is the best that God (the white God) can do. If that is so, then it is time to replace Him." And the Negro is the natural instrument of this process. "The only thing white people have that black people need, or should want, is power—and no one holds power forever." This is the challenge of the compulsive rebel against the present order—the White Negro of Mailer, or the anarchistic monster Bigger Thomas—that Baldwin himself has so mordantly criticized before, here flung in our face. And proving what Ida knows—that a Negro can say anything: his words can never soften the white racist's fear and hatred, and they will all be taken as "excusable"—and, of course, eloquent—by the solicitously "tolerant."

We are not treating the Negro as an equal until we can be angry at him, until we are willing to grant that his words mean something, that they are worth analysis, refinement, and (if need be) refutation. By this test, few of Baldwin's critics (only F. W. Dupee, to my knowledge) have begun to treat him as an equal.

There are many reasons for this. One always moves under some suspicion—indeed, must keep suspecting oneself—of hypocrisy when discussing, from comparative safety and comfort, the pain and danger of other men. But that is, after all, what we do whenever we discuss a serious problem having repercussions in the life of man, the most exposed and endangered creature we know. The solution is not to forswear discussion. Somewhere along the line, then, somebody should take Baldwin's charges seriously enough to ask, not whether they are moving, or beautiful, or important, or sincerely meant —they are obviously all these, and there has been enough repetition of the obvious—but whether they are true. When Baldwin says the Negro's sufferings cannot be overstated, those who believe that skill in wielding our language exacts some responsibility to words must speak out. The evils of racism—like those of fascism, Communism, diabolism—can be overstated, stated in such a way that the problem is "spread" out of shape, made unrecognizable, unmanageable. And such overstatement of evil is a way of advancing the evil.

> That sinners have always, for American Negroes, been white is a truth we needn't labor, and every American Negro, therefore, risks having the gates of paranoia close on him. In a society that is entirely hostile, and, by its nature, seems determined to cut you down—that has cut down so many in the past and cuts down so many every day—it begins to be almost impossible to distinguish a real from a fancied injury. One can very quickly cease to attempt this distinction, and, what is worse, one usually ceases to attempt it without realizing that one has done so . . . Most Negroes cannot risk assuming that the humanity of white people is more real to them than their color. And this leads, imperceptibly but inevitably, to a state of mind in which, having long ago learned to expect the worst, one finds it very easy to believe the worst.

IV

IS IT TRUE, for instance, if we look at the content of Baldwin's accusations rather than the hurt eloquence that urges them, that Christianity has done nothing for the Negro, that it had nothing to do with the abolition of slavery? For that matter, is it true that Christianity should have rejected its entire Hellenic inheritance because of the monstrous blot, on it, of slavery? The reasons Baldwin gives for abandoning the Christian West would have served an early Christian as an excuse for dismissing the whole of "natural" civilization so laboriously built up over the centuries. The Christian message might have been one of the rather simple kind that Baldwin brings—simply love one another, brethren, and forget your libraries, since these are full of Platonic and Aristotelian justifications of slavery. To cure a sick and monstrously distorted limb, they might have cut down the tree. But they did not chop down the tree; and they did cure the limb.

Ironically, one of the reasons for the importation of black slaves into our culture was the fact that white slaves had been freed. Baldwin's ancestors were slaves; so, probably, were mine. The oppressed became the oppressors (and can do so again). But is it true that nothing was learned in this process? The Western history of black slavery is an instant of time compared with the ages of white servitude we lived through and, finally, purged. To throw away that experience would be like throwing away the experience of the Negro, articulated by Baldwin and introducing us into our own frightening history. In fact, the one experience is based on the other. Baldwin himself says that the Negro has no language to describe his situation; the language —of freedom, morality, human dignity, inhuman cruelty—that Baldwin uses, he learned, as we all learn it, from the centuries of other men's sufferings, from this struggle with each other and with words. These literally "trying" centuries are not lost to us but made operative by their distillation in our libraries. If the assault on evil is not to be a mere succession of rulers and ruled, the oppressors becoming the oppressed in a dreary cycle of directionless revulsion, man has to learn from the past, has to have the past kept somehow present to be learned from. The achievements that Baldwin counts as irrelevant, or the excuses of those in power, are actually the only things that can keep the Negro, and the white man as well, from despairing. If the civilization that has wronged the Negro contains, somewhere in its many chambers, things worth treasuring, then the years of pain are not entirely wasted. New treasures can be salvaged even from a disaster like slavery in America, can be stored away for future use. I am not suggesting that one "buys" human pain with cultural gifts; there is no way to measure, or recompense, the suffering of a man. But if the suffering is going to take place, and if one is ever to steel oneself to it, then the ability to read part of its lesson, to use what would otherwise be total waste, is one of the triumphs of man, a triumph indissolubly linked with that other, more complex, extensive, vulnerable thing, civilization itself. The advantages of civilization do not excuse the evil inflicted in its name—they intensify that evil—but they do give hope to those who suffer the wrongs.

It may be asking a superhuman objectivity to demand from a man that he see all the merits of a system that has crippled him. But that objectivity is precisely what we must ask from anyone who enters upon the task of destroying parts or all of a civilization (and every change involves some destruction, some replacement, some clearing of ground in the process of improvement). One must know something about the uses to which others have put apparent anomalies before one can decide whether they are in fact superfluous and will not be needed again. In fact, objectivity is the prime characteristic of civilization. It has no subjectivity, because it is not a person, to be damned for its sins. It commits no sins, it has no virtues. Only the individual man loves or hates. A civilization is a tradition of truths tested or accepted or found useful, customs moulded on these truths, habits of social coherence facilitating the arrival at the truths and the participation in the customs.

Every civilization is bound to operate, for the achievement of those aims, with a tremendous inefficiency. Given the stuff of men, its truths will be largely neglected truths. But they will persist, be present, even when neglected. That is the real service of civilization—it keeps truths present against all the forces working to erase them. It guarantees that momentary convenience, spasms of evil, sloth, fear will not lead to the rapid expunging of time's lessons. When a Dachau happens, are we—as Baldwin suggests—to tear up all the Bibles, disband all the police forces, take crowbars to the court buildings and the libraries? Is it not a sign of man's awareness of his own depths that makes him esteem civilization, take precautions that something will be left if ever we are guilty of a Dachau, of Indian massacres or the slave lynchings? Does he think we will be any less liable to these dark exhalations of unreason if we have none of these institutions? Does he think we will recover from them more rapidly, or reduce their frequency, by treating Dachau as the direct product of the Decalogue?

A CIVILIZATION often preserves its lessons against the tremendous odds of man's evil ingenuity and ambition, by working the truth into unobtrusive corners, or avoiding a direct confrontation with the forces of destruction, or by intertwining truth's structure with privileges that will not lightly be surrendered, or by letting it become pale and partially inoperative. But these very devices make the truth survive, even if no one wants to recognize it or mobilize it to its proper effect. The civilization succeeds, if it succeeds at all, in keeping its truths entire even when invisible; can produce them when challenged. Men, who try to ignore them, use them, periodically revive them, become finally haunted by their presence, their irritant indestructibility.

Such truths may seem neutral, dull, irrelevant; excuses for the vivid things in life—power, lust and pain. Ideas, like God, have no color. It is their weakness from a novelist's point of view. To the tortured subjectivity of the wounded or lonely person they offer an exasperating objectivity. It is their job. It keeps them—and us—alive.

TAKE, for instance, this single truth —the Christian concept of man's dignity. Every man, goes the doctrine, has a soul made and saved by God, bought with His blood. This bond between men should overcome anything that divides them. For many reasons, in many cases, perhaps in most, it does not. The doctrine of man's future happiness has been used to bribe Negroes, for instance, to dull their resentment. Are we to condemn the hypocrisy by denying the truth? Take, by way of contrast, the materialist vision of life on earth. In its present most effective form, this vision looks to the harmony to be attained on earth by a social renovation. Its heaven is here, and it can work with undivided energy for this single goal. It has removed evils, in several years, that our civilization has failed to rectify in decades of halfhearted effort—as, Baldwin observes, Muhammad has succeeded in giving many Negroes pride and purpose and discipline.

On this record, are we to accept this earthly apocalypse and call the Christian idea of heaven an opiate merely? Such short-term advantages are often purchased at a terrible cost. As a Christian, I must believe in the priceless value of any black man. I must believe this truth even if I ignore it, even if I am damned for failing to live up to its demands. But a materialist believer in progress has no fixed reason for holding that all men are, eternally, equal. If man is a moving phenomenon, evolved from lower forms of life, divesting himself of its gross remains, advancing to new levels of awareness and action, then there is no reason why some branches of the human family should not succeed where others fail, should not evolve faster, should not leave behind the less adaptable. Man will, in fact, be obliged to do this for the good of the race.

Given this philosophy, and the will to use it for one's own ends, the Southerner will not comfort the Negro with the Bible and squeeze what profit he can from his labor. He will give a helping hand to "natural selection" by means of the kiln or the lynch-rope. Conversely, a Muhammad, convinced of white inferiority, can use scientific materialism even more effectively for attaining his ends than he uses the Manichean version of Christianity that he wrested from the Bible. The practical question to be faced is not whether some Christians have been false to their creed, but—given the drive of man to worship and destroy himself — which doctrine can be most easily twisted to the purposes of hatred and oppression.

So far, our social revolutionaries have not been any more notable for consistency than have Christians. But one never knows when, under the pressure of private vision or public disaster, of calculation or fear, some revolutionary is going to remember that, on his own materialist principles, killing off one strain of men can be justified as analogous to the elimination of inferior offshoots in the process that produced our race and its great promise. Teilhard de Chardin, for instance, so popular now with those who believe in man's evolution toward an earthly perfection, admitted that progress has its price. He was convinced that Ethiopians and others had dropped out of the running for the Noosphere, that only sentimentality made one regret this obsolescence of one of nature's experiments, so necessary to the purification of man. In line with this belief, he wrote to friends on the responsible committees to deplore the statements drawn up by the League of Nations and the United Nations proclaiming man's equality. It was not his Christian faith, but his belief in the redemptive processes of evolution, that led Teilhard into this cruel error. Why is Baldwin so certain that this cannot happen to others, that all we have to do is move with evolution, "accept and celebrate" Change? How does he know that change has not been going in this direction all the time, or that it will not veer off to this goal, unchecked by any surviving belief that man is more than the most advanced collocation of atoms?

VI

COME at the problem from another side: it is precisely the modern materialism that has made the Negro's situation so bafflingly difficult. For it is the contention of the materialist, whose only real order is the actual structure of earthly society, that a man's worth should be expressed and measured by, perfectly coextensive with, his social role. It is no longer possible for classes to perform different roles without a comparison of prestige or ease or privilege, a comparison reducing itself, with destructive speed and simplicity, to a question of human superiority and inferiority. A man is not a man at all, in this monochromatic world of material function and reward, unless he has exactly the same vote as every other man, exactly the same privileges, unless his opinions have equal weight on any subject.

It has been the business of tragedy to deny this simple equation between a man's ultimate value and his public performance. Judged by the standards that rulers must live up to, Hamlet is a failure; but Hamlet was written precisely to suggest that man's measure is not adequately taken by these standards. We need another set of scales. Again, Christianity, with its insistent reminder that the dregs of our society may enter the City of God before the Scribes and Pharisees, that the last will be first, has given dogmatic reinforcement to this sense of man's worth as something extending beyond—moving mysteriously behind—the limited sphere of any individual's social influence.

This view is in direct contrast to modern egalitarianism. John Fischer, in a recent Harper's editorial, analyzed the operation of this egalitarian ethic in the field of education: since to give social expresion to any failing is, in the insanely symmetrical world of the materialist, to deny the essential dignity or definition of that person as a man at all, we are learning to live with the fictions that there is no such thing as stupidity, that people should not be trained to accept less glamorous tasks in our society, that the social recognition of human qualities will somehow create those qualities, that a low I.Q. can be flattered out of existence.

A Negro can justly object, at this point, that he is not being trained for any spectacularly dignified tasks; that debates on how to treat "gifted" individuals have little to do with the saving of Negro children condemned to the slums. All this is true; but, unfortunately, it is impossible to face the problem of injustice to the Negro, of removing intolerable conditions, of righting criminal complacency and neglect, without getting entangled, over and over, in the false problems raised by the false new standards of human dignity. Every social disadvantage is presented to us as if it constituted a denial that the Negro is a human being at all. Every difference in social performance is placed on a set of sociologically calibrated scales, and any imbalance is treated as a metaphysical affront to the doctrine of man's worth. If every difference is a denial of the Negro's essential humanity, then every difference is of equal weight. All differences must be attacked with the same fervor for the same reason. And the Negro can never escape the numberless shadow-fights that are, in this way, intermixed with his real struggle for adequate social recognition; he cannot escape them because white men find it increasingly hard to escape them, as Fischer's article indicates. The Negro will only enter the white man's own pursuit of an impossible social equality, and with far greater disadvantages than the white man.

There are, as a matter of fact, certain differences between white men and colored men. Though we partially share each other's history, we do so in a way that is hard to use from the viewpoint of sheer social practicality. No one has described better than Baldwin the odd, intertwined inaccessibility of white and colored people who are in the same room and yet on different planets. To hope that this difference can be erased overnight is, as Baldwin has said over and over, ridiculous. In fact, it can never be overcome if every difference is seen as an evil thing, signifying that one or the other person is inferior. To say this is to assert a single rule for the measuring of man's complexity. An orange can be superior to an orange; but a man can no more be superior to another man than an orange can be superior to a triangle. There is no test we know that can reduce men to a measurable single dimension. Only when these simple facts are clearly grasped again, that is, when we have entered once more into the full Christian tradition, can we define the injustices perpetrated against the Negro, decide on an order of priorities in righting these wrongs, and actually right them. We will be freed from the necessity of living with elaborate fictions, from trying to cultivate color-blindness, from pretending that we know men who are in fact strangers to us, from believing that we must have this knowledge or be guilty of condemning them—or us—to a subhuman status. To think any man is open to our gaze, and easily plumbed, is the one surest way to treat him as subhuman.

In this case as in the other one we looked at, the belief that any difference is "discrimination" can be effective in short-range terms, can give an overwhelming urgency to the obliteration of real injustices, along with imagined ones. But here too the probable cost is a heavy one. The materialist's own weapons are turned against him by prejudice. The undeniable fact of human difference will be read as proof of certain men's inferiority. The white racist arms himself with I.Q. statistics, brain measurements, performance charts. He demands a uniformly high performance from every Negro given an education; since so much is to be proved by these "experiments," he must hope desperately that the Negro will fail, and every failure will have the same rigid norms applied to it that the materialists have used in condemning "discrimination." Social advantage should produce, visibly, human excellence; and the entire human mystery should be judged by that excellence of immediate performance. Any inconsistency resulting from this theory—inconsistency the racist uses vindictively—can be very disillusioning to the Liberal materialist, who finds reality strangely reluctant to his categories. If he is to cling to his equation of worth with role, he must increasingly take measures to regulate the role, "prove" equality by a more ambitious moulding of men through their environment. Or, if he surrenders the attempt to achieve an impossible uniformity among men, the materialist will have learned too well how to make the best of his "material." After all, a human nature conferred by the social distinction of the vote or the diploma can be taken away as easily, the problems of dealing with men can be solved by demoting some men from human status, everything can be put at the service of society as the single norm of human usefulness. Victims to the state are always sacrificed "for the good of Man."

I do not say that every materialist social improver is consistent, or applies his principles with the rigor they are capable of, any more than every Christian is a saint. I am only asking what code or creed seems more related to reality, more useful if applied, less menacing if perverted. And, again, it seems to me, the Christian tradition of the West is our best hope. That tradition asserts that every man is a mystery, that his value was proved when Christ died for him, that we cannot prove or disprove anything about it by means of social experiments. It holds that differences between white men and black, like those between men and women, adults and children—like any of the differences that mark us out, every one—are simply manifestations of the range of the human mystery, different manifestations of the divine; that we owe justice and charity to every man as a man; that this is to be rendered directly, to the individual, not by creation of a "status" that can circumscribe his meaning. Only on the basis of these truths—not on the decisions of the Supreme Court, not on the legislation of any Southern state—can we build a firm understanding between the races. Political concepts, like "equality" on the one side and "states' rights" on the other, can too easily be used to prevent the encounter of individuals in charity. Beneath the public debate, more intimate demands upon the conscience must do their work.

A CONSERVATIVE CREDO

The Christian ethic can, of course, be used to deceive man. Under cover of its profound recognition of the soul's worth, those in the various "church rackets" can steal food from the body. But the code is not to be weighed by man's submission to it. If anything, it is to be weighed by man's ultimate inability to escape from it. And Christianity has passed this test, time and again. When it seemed no longer useful, it endured. When men tried to forget, they were forced to remember. The Christian's death-bed repentance, the sudden bequest to the poor, are often mocked at. But this crisis in the individual's life reflects a process that is always going on in a Christian civilization, the recurring crises of sin and repentance, the perpetual encounter with an unbending creed that looks beyond time, a creed whose God is colorless, no matter how many Christians are white.

It is this complex, disreputable, inspiring history of defeat and victory that Baldwin would dismiss with a reference to the Third Reich. And, though we may understand his anger, we must do battle with his arguments. Baldwin has an important message to deliver. He has wounds to bare, an indictment to make. It is good, presumably, for his soul—and certainly for ours—that he make it. But when he voices, not his private agony, not his experience as it can correct or add to our tradition, but a sudden desire to destroy that whole tradition, then we must have the courage to defend the ideals we have, perhaps, not lived up to, but only known to be true. It takes a special courage to bear witness in this way; to be wrong, yet defend what was right; to be what one is, yet continue to fight for what one should have been; to oppose a better man than oneself in the service of a better creed than his. When Baldwin says policemen have no possible use because policemen have hit him, we have to defend the uses of policemen, even if we have bribed the police to beat him. It is this task, demanding self-knowledge, forcing one into a reassessment of his own life and his world's history, that men have not been willing to take upon themselves in the face of the challenge Baldwin made. They preferred to sever their connection with the civilization that could have wronged Negroes so terribly; they sympathized from the sidelines, as if they were not in the game. Their accents were not the least bit Galilean.

VIII

And so Baldwin won the game. But I wonder if he wanted to. For he knows the uses of civilization. I could construct a cogent defense of civilization and description of it from his own past writings. But, in his unique position for seeing the rottenness of our society, it must take an heroic effort to remember the "case" for that society, especially when no one else seems very anxious to remind him of it. The subtlety of his earlier essays, the constant return on a statement to see its reverse side, the way a denial of what he has just said can catch another aspect of his subject and make what was first said more valid—all the qualities that make reading Baldwin so infuriating and enlightening—must be cruelly difficult to sustain. The need must grow on him simply to scream. And so, in this essay, things suddenly become very simple—literally, brutally simple. There was no love in the Negro church he preached in; there is no love in the white churches either; all white men are obsessed with Negro sexuality; there is nothing worth saving from the past, so any change is for the better; we need only "accept change." It is a message delivered with intimidating emotional intensity, but it is, in its essential content, the message of Ida. Faced with all the complexities of her relation with Vivaldo, she would prefer, at times, simply to shatter that relation with one blow, even if the blow crushes both of them. And Baldwin, faced with the complexities he lives with and writes about, must feel at times the temptation to call the whole tangle a lie or an illusion. Hoping it isn't.

It is not enough for us merely to sympathize with Baldwin's unhappy childhood, felicitate him on his style and send him back to Paris with more scholarships and literary prizes. He deserves an answer; he deserves a fight. He is an adversary worth our best arguments, and one of the uses of the fight is that it may force us to remember what our best arguments are. Once we do that, we have won; and so has he.

Pablo Casals

RALPH DE TOLEDANO

If you listen carefully to Pablo Casals, particularly in the Beethoven Sonatas for Cello and Piano which he recorded with Rudolf Serkin, or in the Schubert trios of the Prades Third Series (all on Columbia), you will notice that he uses the vibrato as an instrument of musical delineation. By that I mean that in the passages which contribute to the melodic unfolding, you can hear his rigorously restrained but marked vibrato, whereas in other passages the vibrato is almost nonexistent.

If you listen or watch, you will notice that despite his considerable age, he has greater control of his bow than any other cellist now playing. The pressure and the movement are fabulously even, at either end of the bow, and such variations as the ear detects are deliberate on the part of Casals. His fingering is something Casals developed and modernized from an earlier master. Today, though Casals has told me that "technically there is no better" cellist than Janos Starker, he was not including himself. Virgil Thomson almost, but not quite, said that cello performance as we know it today derives exclusively from Casals—and he was almost, but not quite, right.

It is nevertheless true that Pablo Casals is clearly "Mr. Cello" and that he brought both technique and an ars musica to an instrument which prior to his time had succumbed to maudlin lamentations. Casals brings to the cello warmth, color and tonal variety—but more important than this, he illuminates whatever music he plays. (The conductor Fürtwangler and the pianist Schnabel had the same quality, but there are mighty few in this company.)

I was thinking of this as I listened to a Casals recording of a Bach Suite for Cello Unaccompanied. (All six have been issued by Angel, repressing, I believe, the old HMV masters that RCA issued some years ago.) The Bach cello suites are much music—taxing instrument, performer and audience. But if it is not lèse majesté to say it, they can sometimes be great room emptiers. As a rule, you must be in the mood and ready to shut out from your mind everything but the architectonics of the score to be able to take massive doses of the suites. FULL TEXT OF STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDING BISHOP OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE U.S.A.

Recent events in a number of American communities---Birmingham, Chicago, Nashville, New York, and Raleigh, to mention only the most prominent--underscore the fact that countless citizens have lost patience with the slow pace of response to their legitimate cry for human rights. Pleas of moderation or caution about timing on the part of white leaders are seen increasingly as an unwillingness to face the truth about the appalling injustice which more than a tenth of our citizens suffer daily. While we are thankful for the progress that has been made, this is not enough.

Our Church's position on racial inclusiveness within its own body and its responsibility for racial justice in society has been made clear on many occasions by the General Convention. But there is urgent need to demonstrate by specific actions what God has laid on us. Such actions must move beyond expressions of corporate penitence for our failures to an unmistakable identification of the Church, at all levels of its life, with those who are victims of oppression.

I think of the words we sing as we hail the ascended Christ, "Lord and the ruler of all men", and of our prayers at Whitsuntide as we ask God to work His will in us through his Holy Spirit. And then in contrast to our praises and our prayers our failure to put ourselves at the disposal of the Holy Spirit becomes painfully clear. Only as we take every step possible to join with each other across lines of racial separation in a common struggle for justice will our unity in the Spirit become a present reality.

It is not enough for the Church to exhort men to be good. Men, women and children are today risking their livelihood and their lives in protesting for their rights. We must support and strengthen their protest in every way possible, rather than ~~to~~ give support to the forces of resistance by our silence. It should be a cause of rejoicing to the Christian community that Negro Americans and oppressed peoples everywhere are displaying a heightened sense of human dignity in their refusal to accept second class citizenship any longer.

The right to vote, to eat a hamburger where you want, to have a decent job, to live in a house fit for habitation: these are not rights to be litigated or negotiated. It is our shame that demonstrations must be carried out to win them. These constitutional rights belong to the Negro as to the white, because we are all men and we are all citizens. The white man needs to recognize this if he is to preserve his own humanity. It is a mark of the inversion of values in our society that those who today struggle to make the American experiment a reality through their protest are accused of disturbing the peace. And that more often than not the Church remains silent on this, our greatest domestic moral crisis.

I commend these specific measures to your attention: 1) I would ask you to involve yourselves. The crisis in communities North and South in such matters as housing, employment, public accommodations, and schools is steadily mounting. It is the duty of every Christian citizen to know fully what is happening in his own community, and actively to support efforts to meet the problems he encounters.

2) I would also ask you to give money as an expression of our unity and as a sign of our support for the end of racial injustice in this land. The struggle of Negro Americans for their rights is costly, both in terms of personal sacrifice and of money, and they need help.

3) I would ask you to take action. Discrimination within the Body of the Church itself is an intolerable scandal. Every congregation has a continuing need to examine its own life and to renew those efforts necessary to insure its inclusiveness fully. Diocesan and church-related agencies, schools and other institutions also have a considerable distance to go in bringing their practices up to the standard of the clear position of the Church on race. I call attention to the firm action of the recent Convention of the Diocese of Washington which directed all diocesan-related institutions to eliminate any discriminatory practices within six months. It further requested the Bishop and Executive Council to take steps necessary to disassociate such diocesan and parish-related institutions from moral or financial support if these practices are not eliminated in the specified time. I believe we must make known where we stand unmistakably.

So I write with a deep sense of the urgency of the racial crisis in our country and the necessity for the Church to act. Present events reveal the possible imminence of catastrophe. The entire Christian community must pray and act.

President Miller Appeals To NCC Members To Fight Discrimination

In a message to the 31 member communions of the National Council of Churches, J. Irwin Miller, president, urged them to designate June 2 to "pray in penitence for reconciliation among different races in every community." This is the date of the observance of Pentecost or Whitsunday in the churches.

"Racial discrimination violates Christian love and is man's denial of God's rule and authority," Mr. Miller declared in connection with recent events in Birmingham, Ala., Greensboro, N.C., Nashville, Tenn. and elsewhere. "It is an idolatrous substitution of the god of race supremacy for the holiness of the Lord ... whose spirit at Pentecost united men of diverse tongues and backgrounds in a new fellowship of love."

Declaring that "Christians must act to build a society in which love and justice are a reality for all people," Mr. Miller concluded his message to the churches: "Above all, let Christians pray that God, in his grace, may lead us to act more fervently and forthrightly in eliminating racism from our hearts and from our practices."

The National Council president last week accepted the chairmanship of the policy-making Continuation Committee of the National Conference on Religion and Race. Dr. Benjamin E. Mays, president of Morehouse College, Atlanta, Ga., and chairman of the National Conference held in Chicago last fall, is one of four vice-chairmen of the new continuation committee. Its members include Dr. J. Oscar Lee, director of the Department of Racial and Cultural Relations of the National Council, and Mrs. Stuart Sinclair, vice-president of United Church Women.

The NCRR also made permanent the appointment of Dr. Galen R. Weaver, secretary for racial and cultural relations, United Church of Christ, as executive secretary of the National Conference, which was sponsored by 70 religious bodies in the United States.

THE PROTESTANT AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS

by MILDRED M. HERMANN

Before you all start writing letters to the editor decrying unprofessionalism in the ranks, let me set the record straight.

This article is neither an objective report of research done on the subject of the Protestant and Public Schools, nor is it such a study.

Instead it is an admittedly biased, wholly prejudiced, and totally one-sided comment made by one who has neither children nor any other particular competence to enter the discussion – except as conscience impels me to speak out as one who survived 16 years of public education in none too flossy schools and one who has taught long enough to know that teacher and attitude and not equipment, buildings, or apathy of children and/or parents makes the difference between learning and time wasting.

I write also because my understanding of the Christian faith leads me to believe that the Church's hope for faithful witness in the urban world depends largely upon her ability to permeate the common life with her proclamation of the Lordship of Jesus Christ.

I call Tillich to my theological rescue when I maintain that proclamation includes participation – not to mention some rather obvious indications given in the life and ministry of Christ.

Communication, Tillich writes in his book THEOLOGY OF CULTURE, is a matter of participation in the concerns of people, not by condescension but by sharing in such a way that a definite decision is made possible for or against the gospel.

What this says to me about Protestants and the Public Schools is that in a pluralistic society such as ours there is no hope of education for the vast numbers of children and youth except as communities shoulder their responsibilities for the full development of all children. Education cannot be dependent upon income or religious commitment, or lack of it, obvious or hidden talent, race, or any other circumstance. We either believe that all created are potentially heirs of the riches as well as the terrors of human existence, that God indeed makes the rain to fall upon the just and the unjust, or else we play the losing game of making ourselves God and pit our paltry judgments against His.

Neither token support for the public school as the answer for those who cannot afford anything better nor the withdrawal of the resources and leadership of those who can afford to pay a double educational bill is in my mind any answer to the worst problems of the public schools – you name it – overcrowding, segregation, triple sessions, rape on the staircases, out-dated curricula and books, playground gang fights, perfunctory teaching, or whatever.

The argument that Protestant parochial schools would better

Let's Have More Albanys

Charles W. Rawlings in his article "Down With Albany" says that the Albany venture did not impress many people. One receives the impression from this article that those who participated were naive about the problems of urban America, especially in regard to low status Negroes and whites.

According to Mr. Rawlings, the really urbane approach to the race question, the poverty question, and the ineffectiveness of the white community is "politics up to our necks."

The direct opposite is true. The Albany situation is the perfect example of the ability of leaders such as Martin Luther King to create conditions where a decision is possible. It was for this reason that many went to Albany. The conditions requiring a decision were created; something could be done.

Unfortunately we are not all urbane or sophisticated enough to create conditions where decisions can be made. To even suggest that the political sphere is the arena to "specialize in" is naive. The trouble with the politician is his inability to create the conditions required for decisions.

A realistic approach is to create conditions where businessmen, politicians, the Church, the whole community is forced to make a decision.

Let's have more Albanys. Let's create conditions that require politicians and churchmen to "put up or shut up!"

THE STRIKE IS OVER

by G. DANIEL LITTLE

The train I was on stopped at Trenton. Opposite my window on a bill board was a large poster: "Seek truth: read the New York Times." A sarcastic humorist had scribbled across the margin: "Truth is on strike."

I was on my way to give a talk on the church's stake in the city. I thought back to all the books, articles, speeches, bull sessions which have outlined the church's retreat from the city. "Seek God's truth: go to church." With the church on strike, many have been saying, "God's truth is on strike."

Now the New York papers are back. The church too is no longer in full scale retreat. It is coming off strike. And it is with new determination picking up the pieces which are closest at hand. In a recent meeting, at which synods and presbyteries were reporting among other things on their urban work, it was clear that two pieces especially were being picked up:

1. There is a new growing concern for urban mission strategy in judicatories. Presbyteries are enquiring more aggressively into the attitudes and goals of their member congregations. They are equipping themselves to counsel over the long haul with the churches. They are beginning to be willing to pay the price of difficult decisions.

2. There is a new imaginativeness in ministry to people of special need, people not typically Presbyterian. The growing list includes school drop-outs, the elderly, those who work at night, urban immigrants from the Southern Mountains, those who live in public housing communities, racial and language minorities, etc.

There is much to be thankful for in these two which are becoming permanent in many urban presbyteries. They spell the end of the strike. However, neither of them responds to several of the major characteristics of the urban revolution:

1. The characteristic of decay and renewal in cities takes on new possibilities and new dangers with the infusion of vast sums of federal and local money into immense urban renewal projects. In a very few places only is the church even aware of the role it might play in the debates which result in these projects, the debate over social planning and its goals.

2. The characteristic of racial tension in urban places is another which the church has barely begun to approach in broad social terms. We can claim a beginning in integrating some of our churches, but have little to show in concern for the broad patterns of racial injustice. In New York City the Negro population accounts for 14% of the total population; in Philadelphia 26.4%; in St. Louis 28.6%; in Detroit 28.9%; in Washington, D.C. 53.9%. Such facts and lagging movement of civil and employment rights which accompany them call for more than integration of congregations.

3. The presence of two cultures is another characteristic of our cities. Across the country about one fourth of our population is outside of the mainstream of American culture and life. These people, who make up our poor, are concentrated in our cities. They constitute a separate culture, which has no real stake in America. They are the depressed, unemployed and unemployable, socially dependent poor. They are the "Other America," as Michael Harrington calls them. ("Other America" by Michael Harrington, Macmillan Company, 1962). Baskets at Christmas and counselling to those in broken homes do not suggest that the church understands the deep social roots of this other culture.

A new concern for guiding churches to minister to their communities, and a new willingness to serve people of special

The Urban Need for Open Occupancy

by BILL LORENZ

One of the surest ways for a minister in a typical northern or western community to damage himself is to openly and actively help a Negro family obtain housing in an all-white neighborhood. Laymen in these regions expect to hear sermons about nondiscriminatory employment practices, freedom to use public facilities, and equal educational opportunities for Negroes. If a Negro visited their all-white church, they probably would receive him cordially, and would expect the minister to be the most cordial of all. But housing is a different matter. Millions of these same laymen say, "I believe in equality and opportunity for Negroes, but not next door."

Why not "next door"?

The reason most frequently given is that "property values go down." A number of fears are involved in this idea. People have seen the expansion of the Negro ghetto in every major city in the country since World War II, and the possibility of a Negro family moving into their neighborhood makes them fear that the diabolical strategists of the NAACP have marked their areas as "next" in the spread of the ghetto. Also, many whites have a distorted idea of what Negro neighbors would be like. They are afraid that the house next door would be overcrowded with children, unwed mothers, indigent men, and relatives who arrive in Cadillacs for wild parties which last until early morning. Thirdly, most white families choose a neighborhood in which to live because the area complements their idea of their status; they fear that if a Negro family moves in the neighborhood's status image will change and other families will move away. They seem to be unaware of the numerous studies on this subject which demonstrate that property values in stable middle-class all-Negro and integrated neighborhoods have a tendency to be equal to, if not higher than, property values in corresponding all-white communities.

There are other fears, too. A Negro family living next door demands that one's theories on inter-racial relations be put into practice, and many people are afraid they cannot pass the test. In addition, some parents are unsure of their children's acceptance of their values, and fear that if the children come into contact with Negro children in school, they will date and eventually marry Negroes.

Since a number of powerful and irrational fears militate against unrestricted housing for Negroes, why should one even consider promoting open occupancy? The answer is simple: open occupancy involves several important advantages to both the white and the Negro races.

The first reason that unrestricted housing for Negroes is important to the white community is the fact that America's city residential areas are rapidly becoming all-Negro and the suburbs all-white. If the present discrimination in housing and expansion of the Negro ghetto continues, control of the political machines and other devices of power and communication in the cities will be concentrated in the hands of the Negroes. Two separate and powerful communities, one Negro, the other white, will emerge. If Negroes are denied acceptance into the American culture, and at the same time receive the metropolitan land and political power because the whites have abdicated it, the Negro community will inevitably develop its own justification for remaining separate. And the battle between the two groups will be long and bitter.

Unless America's metropolitan areas quickly adopt the practice of open occupancy, the pattern of two separate and strong communities may become so entrenched that it can never be changed. Instead of Negroes becoming a part of the mainstream of American life and making their contribution to it, Negro culture will withdraw and become increasingly distinct. Such a cleavage within urban life in America would have devastating economic, emotional, and spiritual effects on both races.

The white community also needs open occupancy because the expansion of the Negro ghetto is leaving a wake of human misery, especially among older people. Negroes are moving to the cities in increasing numbers, the Negro population of every major American city is expanding, and the pressure for Negro housing is building up. In cities where open occupancy laws do not exist, the segregated Negro community usually expands in such a way as to engulf any racially-integrated neighborhoods, and control of the situation falls into the hands of real estate speculators, or "block busters".

When the block buster moves a Negro family into an all-white neighborhood, the other residents usually panic and begin to sell their homes and move away. The people who are most damaged in this process are the older couples who have lived in the neighborhood for a long time. Many of the younger couples were already planning to move to the suburbs as soon as they had saved enough money for the down payment, and they are still young enough to qualify for 20-30 year mortgages. But the older people thought they had made their last move; they planned to spend the rest of their lives in their present home. Many of them have no choice but to stay, because they haven't the money to purchase another home in a different location.

Thus many of the older people tend to remain in their homes and get acquainted with their new Negro neighbors. But gradually their white neighbors move away. Sometimes the church moves out too, and leaves the older people stranded. And then the sons and daughters say, "Gee, Mom and Pop, I hate to think of you living in that old neighborhood with all those niggers." At this point the

Put this high on the required bibliography for anyone seriously engaged in inner-city work. As impossible as it is to enter that real other world still courageously resistant to middle-class phonies, the author has, shall we say, penetrated. Even into areas which usually elude even the long-standing inner-city church worker.

Jimmy is a 19-year-old white sophomore in the big city college and son of a Cadillac-driving father who is chairman of the "Anti-Obscenity Committee" back home. Overcome by loneliness, fraternity taunts, and patriotic righteousness, our young hero journeys to a Negro "ill-repute house" for sociological research. Believe it or not, dear inner-city readers, there are many many types like this around, full of the crusading spirit of Madison Avenue, Goldwater, and Kinsey, Gover has not overdone our straight man, Jimmy.

Kitten is the 14-year-old illiterate prostitute-philosopher and protector of simple truth. Need I tell you that she is real too - at least on 12th Street in Kansas City and miraculously around our Communion Table.

Jimmy writes every other chapter in his stilted college monologue. Kitten gives her account of the same events in alternate chapters. Never do they communicate. But Gover communicates with the reader. You will easily understand the idiom, style, and dialect of both Kitten and Jimmy.

Should borrowers ever let the book sit idly on your shelves, don't be afraid of those who don't like four letter words. There aren't any. Kitten slurs to 2 or 3 letters or more often polyphonically embroiders to 23. It is a language too high for the blue noses or thrill seekers to understand.

It is composed of reports on Highland Park, Michigan; New Rochelle, N.Y.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; and St. Louis, Mo.

The report on New Rochelle is, to me, particularly interesting. It reads something like "Anatomy of a Murder." The legal battle is reviewed with the logic for the different approaches discussed. John Koplan, the author, is on the staff of Northwestern University Law School. His style is engaging. As a result, you read with increasing attention and gain a sense of the emotions that were and are a vital part of the New Rochelle Story.

In the town where I live, de facto segregation in the public schools is an important issue. Most of us are unaware of the complexities involved. I wish a large number of citizens in my town would read the Commission's report, for then we would have a group of citizens who would have some common background on the issues, the feelings, and the need for justice as we discuss how to have good schools for everyone.

Reviewed by Jack Worthington

This brief, brief book is a serious attempt to see the urban culture of our time as a whole. It rejects the partial images created by political scientists, urban sociologists, and economists. Greer's work is highly suggestive of the kind of wholistic view that is necessary to comprehend our urban culture. However, what he has to say does not fully define that view. It does indicate with maddening doggedness the elements which must be included in that view simply because they will not go away, if for no other reason. The picture that he creates of the city is not unlike the opening scene of Hell in C.S. Lewis's THE GREAT DIVORCE. The great city goes on and on and on. In successive chapters, Greer describes the "City in Crisis," "Order and Change in Metropolitan Society," "The Citizen in the Urban Worlds," "The Community of Limited Liability," "The Urban polity," "The Problems of the Metropolis," "The Changing Image of the City." The government of any city is a big operation. Yet it is surrounded by suburban municipalities which so limit their liability as to be almost guilty of shirking all responsibility for government at all. Most attempts to provide metropolitan government which would recognize the interdependence of the inner and outlying areas have been defeated at the polls and so the cities go on, always fighting a rear guard action against their problem and unable to get far enough ahead of them ever to be engaged in really creative innovations.

In many ways this sobering book is the culmination of realistic investigation such as the New York Metropolitan Area studies. However, Greer would like to see less study and more action.

THE PROTESTANT AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS

equip children and youth to understand the demands of their faith, reinforce the efforts of home and church to lead the young in the way of discipleship, and so eventually help leaven the secular lump that is the real America, ignores two dangers, I think. It smacks somewhat of the mission-compound approach, which protected the integrity of the missionary community and family fairly well but also insulated the gospel pretty well at the same time.

The argument also carries with it the danger of rejecting - or seeming to reject, which amounts to the same thing - the people and the situation it is, in theory, in time designed to redeem.

Tillich writes that there is always an element of risk involved in the kind of participation in human affairs that really communicates the meaning of the gospel.

I've been playing around with this idea of risk - and how far the Christian is called to go - for a long, long time. Being a sentimentalist, I've wondered, over and over, how a Negro parent could send, or take his child into a Southern school where he knew catcalls, spitballs, and other such would inevitably go along with any book learning to which the child might be exposed. Also being a sentimentalist, I've wondered what a Negro parent, North or South, thinks of those of us who withdraw our own young from the neighborhood schools from which, for most of the community, there is no withdrawal, except through truancy or drop-out.

What does this communicate? I wonder. That parents talk up a storm about wanting good schools in the community, but can't take the risk of letting their own home take the guff of a bad school until a better one can be had one way or another? That it is better to put a couple of extra hundred dollars into a private school, or a church school, rather than to pay higher school taxes or to make the effort to upgrade the public school? That income, culture, or the educational achievement of parents makes a real difference in the potential or actual worth of a child? That one saves one's own first and another's second? That some children just have to take tough situations because they are part of a fight for justice and god-given rights, but that others can be excused? That there's something suspect about a Son (fatherhood held in doubt by some anyway) sent not to a rabbinical, temple or royal life but to a carpenter's bench?

All are very human responses to the very human response to a less than desirable situation. But what price do we pay as a church by our failure to take some of the risks - or, even less dramatic, our failure to use some of the imagination that could make a difference in so many of the school situations that baffle, frighten, and threaten to defeat us?

The public schools, it seems to me, are some of the "arenas," "intersections," "situations" (you pick the word according to your theological bent), in which Christians are called for an "encounter" or "engagement."

There are many ways for the engagement to begin - some of them not only painless, but pleasurable.

For instance, in one Midwest city a group of Jewish housewives from the suburbs (all with educational courses or actual teaching experience) are staffing two pilot kindergartens in a school in a low-income, decaying community. A grant covers supplies; the women give their teaching time. According to reports through the project, which has more educationally "official" counterparts in several cities, the children are getting the hang of school discipline and behaviour (not to mention a love of books, teachers, and learning) before they are crowded into first grade rooms; the suburbanites, who bring in books and toys their own children have enjoyed at home, are learning something of the inevitable costs of segregated education and housing; the parents are being helped over their distrust of the schools as well as the suburban temper.

In more churches than I know of, I'm sure, study halls, tutoring services, reading rooms, and other arrangements are beginning to bring together some of the skills of church members and the needs of children. Are we, in addition, recruiting, relating or releasing skilled laymen for volunteer work in the schools and on school boards? (In New York City, for instance, there is an appeal each year for volunteers to help enrich class teaching by their art, drama, craft, music, dance, recreational, storytelling, or other skills.)

What would happen, I wonder, if instead of so many of us sending - or thinking about sending - our children to private schools or those sponsored by other Protestant denominations, we, as parents, made the tuition money available to the local school or church for a project that would help get at some of the basic reasons the public schools seem not to be presently presentable? If, for instance, as seems true, special classes for children of homes that are non-educationally oriented mean the difference between the children's later ability to read well or poorly, who don't we help provide or encourage the provision of such classes. (It would be one way, perhaps, of ridding ourselves of the excuse that we can't tolerate public education because the poor readers are holding up the ones with a headstart.)

Or, instead of ignoring the child whose home cannot help him with his school work we draw him into the effort to help our own children in our own home or block? Or, if there is no art, music, or drama program, why, instead of withdrawing, can't we care enough to provide an interim program at the church, or, acting as parents who care, find a way to provide it through the school?

Why, in short, do we withdraw - or threaten to withdraw - rather than take the risk (which is not the greater one if we take such things as discipleship, creation, Christ's Lordship, and life eternal seriously) of participating?

The Urban Need for Open Occupancy

old house and neighborhood, which once were comfortable and pleasant, become shabby and despised, symbols of poverty and useless old age.

Enforceable open occupancy laws would stop the spread of the Negro ghetto. When Negroes can live anywhere in the community, no stigma will be placed on having Negro neighbors, and elderly white people can live out their lives with dignity in the homes they prefer.

The third advantage of open occupancy to white families concerns the children. Most white children of today are growing up in completely segregated neighborhoods which leave them ill-equipped for living in the cosmopolitan, racially-mixed world of tomorrow. These children, particularly those who will be the future leaders of the country, will have to function well in an integrated society and world, and must be able to relate constructively to people of other races. The best training a child can receive for this experience is to grow up in a community which is racially and religiously mixed.

The advantages of open occupancy are not nearly so specific for Negroes as they are for whites. For Negroes, decent housing at competitive prices is the doorway to normative American life. If white Americans have a distorted view of Negro life, Negroes have an equally distorted view of white life. Many Negroes know white people only through watching their antics reported in the press, displayed on the screen, and observed in the homes of those wealthy enough to hire servants. They have little idea of what goes on in the average middle-class white neighborhood and of the value judgments involved in living on a medium income.

Probably very few Negro parents are aware of the advantages their children can receive from attending an integrated school. For most Negro parents, having children in an integrated school is a status symbol proving equality. But for the Negro child, integrated schooling means that he learns to feel natural in an integrated world. He doesn't find the palms of his hands becoming moist when he meets his counterpart in the white race. He is able to measure himself against his peers as persons and therefore is realistic about his goals, neither aiming too low because he is a Negro nor aiming too high because he doesn't know his natural limitations.

Open occupancy does not mean a few economically privileged families living in upper-class suburban communities and sending their children to the best schools and colleges. It means a wide dispersal of Negro families on the basis of economic ability and cultural preference. It means Negroes living next door to other Americans with similar incomes and goals. It means boys and girls from stable middle-class Negro homes attending school with white children with the same backgrounds and motivations.

With the increasing urbanization of American Negroes and the accelerated automation of industry, the country's urban centers are approaching a crisis. Unless open occupancy for Negroes becomes a reality in the near future, every American city will be divided into two camps: one Negro, the other white. If such divisions become solidified, it will mean the end of the American dream for millions. Negroes will contribute less and less to the productive side of American life; they will become an increasing drain on the public welfare rolls and a financial burden to the white community. These things can be predicted. What cannot be predicted at this time is the destructive hostility which can grow in both races and transform our cities into hells.

need are signs that the strike is broken. Both will continue permanently. But neither gets at the broader issues of social justice which characterize our cities. A few starts have been made in response to them, but it will take a much broader base of experimentation and risk before we can say fully "the strike is over."

Principles of Urban-Suburban Cooperation

I. Urban-Suburban mission is a two way street.

II. For suburban church members to witness most effectively in the inner-city their involvements should include:
- A. Consistent, responsible, non-paternalistic, service
- B. Commitment to particular tasks for a stated time period (6 months, 1 year) - should be subject to renewal
- C. Willingness to participate under direction of local leadership (pastor; Session; neighborhood house directors)
- D. The possibility of associate membership or transfer of regular membership to the inner-city congregation.

III. There are also possibilities for a second type of direct service by suburbanites in inner-city:
- A. Sharing of special skills on a regular basis (drama, teaching, group work, athletics, legal advice, etc.)
- B. Participation in one shot or short term projects (visitation, census, family nights, voter registration campaigns, study groups, etc.)

IV. For inner-city church members relating to suburban communities the following are possible kinds of involvement:
- A. Efforts leading to desegregation of suburbs
- B. Witness in helping to overcome job discrimination
- C. Sharing knowledge of positive values in city life

V. We need to develop opportunities for involvement of suburbanites, for witness in "public responsibility" through:
- A. Community organizations
- B. Direct social and political action
- C. Bringing Christian perspective to vocation

VI. We need to develop opportunities of inner-city churchmen to take part in the witness of "public responsibility" in suburban communities through:
- A. Community organizations
- B. Direct social and political action
- C. Bringing Christian perspective to vocation

VII. As in other forms of witness, participation in urban mission is not an option chosen "out of the goodness of one's heart," but a response to the mandates of commitment to Christ. The more clearly we see the opportunity for faithful service, the more freely and joyfully we are able to serve.

VIII. All inter-church efforts shall be oriented away from inhibition of local leadership development and toward supplementing, strengthening and supporting the local lay leadership in the churches and the initiative of residents in areas served by neighborhood houses.

OBSERVATIONS

1. Though in recent years most forms of inter-congregational cooperation have been through joint efforts involving suburban and urban congregations, it is becoming clear that the term "suburban-urban cooperation" leaves undescribed the many relationships among various city churches. We need a fuller understanding of the unity of mission that must involve all congregations in sharing whatever resources a congregation may possess at a particular moment in history with those places where the need is most compelling at that moment.

2. In the future we will certainly be more heavily involved in ecumenical relationships that will change the patterns of recent years. Cooperative efforts will be less narrowly Presbyterian; more broadly related to other denominations.

THE ECUMENIST

A journal for promoting Christian unity, published bi-monthly by the Polist Press in collaboration with the Center of Ecumenical Studies, St. Michael's College, University of Toronto, and edited by Gregory Baum, is a very worthwhile journal for Protestant clergymen and laymen to read. The editorial office is 401 West 59th Street, New York 19, New York. The magazine is published free at this time, so contributions would be gratefully accepted.

Presbyterian Interracial Council

by Kenneth Waterman

A new organization called THE PRESBYTERIAN INTERRACIAL COUNCIL is being formed within the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. The purpose of the movement is "to provide United Presbyterians a means to work together as churchmen in learning and implementing their denomination's teachings on race and brotherhood." Invitations to join the movement have been sent to over 6000 urban pastors and laymen.

THE PRESBYTERIAN INTERRACIAL COUNCIL will be chartered Thursday, May 16, 1963, at a 7:30 A.M. breakfast meeting at the Kirkwood Hotel in Des Moines, Iowa, during the time of the General Assembly, the annual meeting of the denomination's highest governing body. The deadline for charter membership and/or breakfast reservations is May 6; reservations may be made through the Interim Secretariat for the organization, c/o the First Presbyterian Church, 1112 East 10th Street, Kansas City 6, Missouri. Annual membership is $5.00 and breakfast is $2.00.

Dr. James H. Robinson, Director of "Crossroads Africa," will be the kick-off speaker at the May 16 breakfast. His topic will be "The Church and the Next Emancipation." Dr. Robinson is a widely known United Presbyterian minister, author and the founder of "Crossroads Africa" which sponsored 292 American teachers, physicians, technicians, and students working in 16 African countries in 1962.

THE PRESBYTERIAN INTERRACIAL COUNCIL is envisioned as an independent movement, not officially related to or dependent upon the denomination or any of its boards or agencies. Several groups of ministers and laymen have been planning for the organization for several months. Kenneth S. Waterman, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Kansas City, Missouri, has been the coordinator of these efforts. Planning groups in Chicago, New York, and Kansas City are currently preparing for the May 16 organizational meeting where officers will be elected and by-laws adopted.

These groups hope that the PRESBYTERIAN INTERRACIAL COUNCIL will become one of the foremost independent movements within their church. "P.I.C. will not discourage Presbyterians from actively working in other civil rights and social justice groups," Mr. Waterman observed. "Our purpose is to mobilize concerned Presbyterians vigorously and responsibly to make themselves instruments for promoting integration within the Church, the communities in which they live, and the whole nation. It is hoped P.I.C. will have the character of a laymen's movement."

With the forming of the national organization in Des Moines, a campaign to establish local and regional units will begin. It is planned that most of the impact of the Presbyterian Interracial Council will result from the work of local chapters.

Principles of Community Organization

by SAUL ALINSKY

(a) It is rooted in the local tradition, the local indigenous leadership, the local organizations and agencies, and, in short, the local people.

(b) Its energy or driving force is generated by the self-interest of the local residents for the welfare of their children and themselves.

(c) Its program for action develops hand in hand with the organization of the community council. The program is in actual fact that series of common agreements which results in the development of the local organization.

(d) It is a program arising out of the local people, carrying with it the direct participation of practically all the organizations in a particular area. It involves a substantial degree of individual citizen participation; a constant day to day flow of volunteer activities and the daily functioning of numerous local committees charged with specific short-term functions.

(e) It constantly emphasizes the functional relationship between problems and therefore its program is as broad as the social horizon of the community. It avoids, at all costs, circumscribed and segmental programs which in turn would attract the support of only a segment of the local population.

(f) It recognizes that a democratic society is one which responds to popular pressures, and therefore realistically operates on the basis of pressure. For the same reason it does not shy away from involvement in matters of controversy.

(g) It concentrates on the utilization of indigenous individuals, who, if not leaders at the beginning, can be developed into leaders.

(h) It gives priority to the significance of legitimate self-interest. The organization itself proceeds on the idea of channeling the many diverse forces of self-interest with the community into a common direction for the common good and at the same time respects the autonomy of individuals and organizations.

(i) It moves toward goal of self-financing. This not only testifies to its representative character in that local residents support their own organizations financially, but insures to the local council the acid test of independence: "the ability to pay one's way."

NCC Calls For Action To Secure Civil Rights For All The Religious weekly 6/11/63

Religion

In the face of "a crisis involving the entire nation and the fundamental concepts of freedom and justice," the General Board of the National Council of Churches has called on the churches "to confess omission and delay and to move forward to witness to the essential belief that every child of God is a brother to every other."

Declaring that "words and declarations are no longer useful in this struggle unless accompanied by sacrifice and commitment," the Board mapped a three-point strategy "for immediate action":

--- "To invite Roman Catholic and Jewish ecumenical leadership to share with us in action to aid in desegregation of American life;

--- "To urge every member communion to impress upon its people the serious nature of the present hour and to press vigorously for their involvement in every phase of the struggle for justice, including negotiation and demonstration ...;

--- "To commit ourselves, as members of the General Board, to engage personally in ... direct action; to invite Roman Catholic and Jewish leadership to join us in making a united presentation before Congressional committees on the subject of civil rights legislation; (and) to issue a call to Protestant and Orthodox leaders, and an invitation to religious leaders of all faiths, to assemble in Washington as soon as is strategic."

To implement this action, the General Board called on President J. Irwin Miller to appoint a 25-member interracial Commission on Religion and Race. This commission will be directly related to the office of the General Secretary "to make commitments, call for actions and take risks in behalf of the National Council which are required by the situation and are consistent both with the substance and the implications of the actions and decisions of the National Council in the area of religion and race."

Action by the Board came unanimously following the report on the racial situation, drafted by a temporary committee of six appointed by President Miller following the winter meeting of the Board.

General Board Says Religion Has No Place In Public Schools

In a major pronouncement adopted by churchmen representing 31 Protestant denominations, the decision of the Supreme Court in the N.Y. Regent's Prayer case was upheld. Declaring that "neither true religion nor good education is dependent upon the devotional use of the Bible in the public school program," the General Board members agreed that the Bible is a necessary source book for other subjects and that "teaching about religion is an essential part of many subjects such as social studies, literature and the arts."

Recognizing the "wisdom and authority" of the Supreme Court's ruling on prayer in public schools, the pronouncement did not rule out prayers altogether. "Prayers for special occasions may well be left to the judgment of those responsible for the program of the public schools in the local community," it said.

The Board also affirmed its belief that the First Amendment to the Constitution, in its present wording, affords the "maximum protection for the religious liberty of all our citizens." Nearly 50 proposals to amend the religious freedom provisions of the First Amendment have already been put forward, the pronouncement noted.

"Religious ideas, beliefs and values, and the contributions of churches, are an integral part of our cultural heritage," said the pronouncement, (but) "teaching for religious commitment is the responsibility of the home and the church or synagogue, rather than the public schools."

A dissenting opinion was presented to the General Board on behalf of Archbishop Iakovos of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America, a member of the National Council.

INTERRACIAL COUNCIL
LAUDS PRESIDENT'S NEGRO RIGHTS TALK

NEW YORK, June 13--The Catholic Interracial Council of New York said President Kennedy showed "forthright leadership" and an understanding of the racial situation in his nationwide broadcast on Negro rights.

"For years many Americans have waited for a president of this nation to say what needed to be said with respect to the racial situation in the United States," the council's executive committee said in a statement. "This President Kennedy has done. His address captures the scope, depth and breadth of these issues which have remained unsolve for over three centuries."

The committee said it was particularly "heartened by the President's words" referring to the racial situation as"a moral crisis" facing the country and its people.

"Our confidence in the destiny of America has been renewed by the forthright leadership of our President," the statement concluded.

President Kennedy had stated in his address (June 11) that "we are confronted primarily with a moral issue."

"The heart of the question," he said, "is whether all Americans are to be afforded equal rights and equal opportunities; whether we are going to treat our fellow Americans as we want to be treated."

The President also said: "One hundred years of delay have passed since President Lincoln freed the slaves, yet their heirs, their grandsons, are not yet fully free...And this nation, for all its hopes and all its boasts, will not be fully free until all its citizens are free."

He said that "we face...a moral crisis as a country and a people, and "it cannot be met by repressive police action."

"It is a time to act in the Congress, in your state and local legislative body, and, above all, in all of our daily lives," he stated.

The President said he is sending to Congress sweeping legislation designed to speed school desegregation and to open public facilities to every American regardless of color.

MEMORANDUM TO THE PASTORS OF THE AMERICAN LUTHERAN CHURCH

RE: (1) Civil Rights and the American Negro

(2) The Supreme Court Decision on Bible Reading and Prayer in the Public Schools

In 1942 Dr. Gunnar Myrdal published his monumental two-volume Carnegie study of the racial dilemma in the United States. He found that in our dealing with the Negro we were ignoring the beautifully stated guarantees of freedom set forth in our Constitution and in the ideals of the nation. But he concluded that there was cause for hope in the fact that the United States had a bad conscience about this Pharisaism.

Since Dr. Myrdal wrote, much progress has been made, but this has also tended to highlight how much remains to be done. The birth of new nations in Africa, conferring greater dignity and freedom on the African Negro than his brother possesses in the United States, is robbing the American Negro of his patience. Increasingly the American Negro leaders who counsel patience and forbearance are losing the confidence of their own people.

Today President Kennedy met with about 200 religious leaders whom he had summoned to the White House for a consultation about civil rights. In his address he pointed out that in the last seven to eight weeks there has been a rapid acceleration in the feelings and determination of the Negro people to realize the full rights of American citizenship. He asked for cooperation in achieving a significant breakthrough during the months of July through September. He declared that our job is to make the transition as smooth and as peaceful as possible. Then he pointed out that the time schedule will not be set by Congress or the churches, but by the Negro community.

Many people will remonstrate against the Negro's impatience. Within 24 hours two different cab drivers did this with me. But we have had a hundred years in which to get the job done. We witness today a God's "fullness of time." Eschatalogically, the time for the practice of patience is tapering off for the Negro and it is setting in in earnest for the white man. Are not Amos's words "You have turned justice into poison" applicable to us as a nation? (Amos 6:12b)

In the President's consultation the Attorney General reported that integration in the use of public facilities and equal opportunities for employment and housing meets with a much larger degree of success in communities where the clergy give their support rather than remaining aloof. What can we as pastors in the congregations of The American Lutheran Church do?* I submit the following suggestions:

(1) If you are without convictions on this issue, ponder the gravity of this hour of judgment in the life of our nation, and let your people know where you stand. (This is important even in northern, rural congregations where there may be no colored people living. With the frequent movings that occur, today's farmer may be tomorrow's city dweller.)

(2) Be sure that your own congregation does not withhold the hand of welcome from a Negro guest or applicant for membership. (See the enclosed copy of a resolution passed by the February, 1963, meeting of the Church Council.)

(3) The Christian has a commission to pray. In your Sunday worship services during June-September, include a weekly petition that God may dispose our hearts in penitence for our racial sins and in a hunger to allow "justice to roll down like waters, and righteousness like an everflowing stream" (Amos 5:24).

(4) Encourage your people to write to their senators and congressmen. It is not for us to tell them what kind of legislation is required; but they should know that we expect them to support any legislation that looks toward insuring the Negro of his rights as an American citizen. Let senators and congressmen be advised that this is no time to stymie action by support of or participation in filibustering.

(5) Be quick to encourage your lay leaders to participate in community consultations, bringing together white and Negro leaders for conversation and peaceful action.

Finally, all of us are concerned about the dishonor present events bring to our nation. Communism makes hay out of our iniquity. The proclamation of our foreign missionaries is robbed of much of its power. But God can make the present evil serve for good. Before us lies the possibility that our nation may be the first one wherein God has an opportunity to demonstrate the blessings He can pour out upon a people that recognizes and acts on the truth that God is the Creator and Redeemer of all men.

* * * *

This 17th day of June is also the day when the Supreme Court announced its decision with reference to Bible reading and use of the Lord's prayer in the public schools. It is easy to misunderstand the implications of this decision. This is borne out by the agitation of some people to amend the Constitution, and thus possibly to override the Court's decision. Such action would, in my judgment, be folly. Let us thank God that we have a government that jealously guards the church's right to be the church; but let us not contribute to an anti-clerical, anti-church atmosphere by confusing the rights of the two kingdoms.

* See enclosed resolution adopted by Southeastern Minnesota District Convention

Our Department of Public Information was solicited for a statement on the Supreme Court's decision. In order that you may be informed of what I said, I submit the text below:

"Today's Supreme Court decision points up a situation that has long existed through tolerance rather than constitutional right. The decision may actually be a plus for the Christian church. It will alert its people to the certainty that community agencies carry no responsibility for Christian nurture. This privilege belongs to the family and the church. Clear recognition of this fact may provide a new sense of "ought-ness" in the church's assumption of this privilege and obligation.

"Without having had an opportunity to see the text of the Court's 8 to 1 decision, it appears that it may become the occasion for new questions. If schools are not to be allowed religious use of the Bible and prayer in instructing the children, is it permissible for a government body to practice this same religion? Congressional opening prayers and the invocation of the grace of God at the opening of the Supreme Court will no doubt receive new scrutiny. The support of chaplains in the armed forces would come in a different category.

"Many earnest Christians may misunderstand the ruling of the Supreme Court and interpret it as antipathy to religion. This possibility is enhanced by the fact that the Court's opinion was occasioned by a case brought by Mrs. Madalyn Murray of Baltimore, Md., an acknowledged atheist. It is therefore increasingly important that Christians use every legitimate opportunity to make it evident that 'we are a religious people' as was stated by the Supreme Court in a decision handed down in 1952. What an opportunity for Christians elected to office or in the service of the government to underscore this statement by their speech, action, and participation in worship services!' "

Southeastern Minnesota District Convention's Resolution

At the Southeastern Minnesota District Convention, where I shared the information that I intended to send this memorandum to our pastors, the following resolution was passed unanimously:

"WHEREAS, Dr. Fredrik A. Schiotz, General President of The American Lutheran Church will represent The American Lutheran Church at the conference for churchmen called by President John F. Kennedy for next Monday, June 17, 1963, to explore problems in the area of civil rights; and

"WHEREAS, We are mindful that in our own area the matter of civil rights and freedom from discrimination involves the minority group of American Indians as well as Negroes and other minority groups; be it therefore

"Resolved, That the Southeastern Minnesota District go on record as fully endorsing and heartily encouraging Dr. Fredrik A. Schiotz in his announced intention to support, on the basis of clear teachings of God's Word, the current endeavors of the President of the United States, to secure legislation that would promote the enjoyment of civil rights on the part of the citizens of this nation; and be it further

"Resolved, That we solemnly pledge to put forth every effort in parish and community to end racial discrimination."

Resolution Adopted by the Church Council of The ALC February, 1963

"WHEREAS, The conference on 'The Church's Concern for a Diverse Society' met in Chicago, November 13-16, 1962, and was sponsored by the National Lutheran Council, Division of American Missions, with representatives from the boards of American Missions of the Lutheran Church in America, The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod and The American Lutheran Church; and

"WHEREAS, The following statement was referred by the conference to the respective church councils of the church bodies which were represented:

'It is sad that the Church constantly is being robbed of its best weapon: the testimony of non-discrimination in its own congregational life. But, it is infinitely worse that the Church tolerates discrimination in its own confines without doing anything about it. Here we are called to battle and to assert the dominion of Christ in His own Church against powerful enemies who have taken over the leadership. Against these powerful enemies the common church member is powerless. Here the Church is challenged to make use of the disciplinary powers given it by God . . . .'; and

"WHEREAS, The preamble of the Articles of Union of the churches that united to form The American Lutheran Church provides that we 'covenant with one another to face together the responsibility for proclaiming more effectively the Gospel of our Lord at home and abroad, without limitation of nationality or race'; and

"WHEREAS, The Division of American Missions of The American Lutheran Church operates under the policy that new congregations which are established shall be open to people of all nationalities and race; and

"WHEREAS, The Letter of Call currently used in The American Lutheran Church provides that the pastor shall lead the congregation in fulfilling the responsibility of the parish to witness for Christ and to enlist in active membership in His Church all in the community who are not actively affiliated with a Christian congregation; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the pastors of The American Lutheran Church be requested to renew their effort to instruct congregations in the position of the Church in proclaiming the Gospel to all people; and be it further

"Resolved, That should a congregation not practice the proclamation of the Gospel of our Lord without limitation to nationality or race and not admit to membership in the congregation Lutherans who may wish to transfer into the congregation or not admit people to membership classes who may wish to be instructed, the district president shall report this violation of church practice to the Executive Committee of the District and to the Church Council."

A CHRISTIAN VIEW:

BEHIND THE FIGHT AGAINST SCHOOL PRAYER

BY THE REV. H. B. SISSEL SECRETARY FOR NATIONAL AFFAIRS, UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE U.S.A.

IN FEBRUARY, 1958, the Edward Schempp family of Abington, Pa., filed suit in Federal court to stop Bible reading and other devotional practices in the township's public schools. The Abington case and a similar one, begun in Baltimore, eventually wound up in the U. S. Supreme Court, and have provoked vigorous debate throughout the nation.

I lived near the Schempp family and in April, 1958, went to call on them. They showed me some of the scores of letters they had received from all over the country. The vast majority were critical, as might have been expected. But many of them were vicious, and not a few were obscene. Several of the latter were signed, "In the name of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ"! The Schempps are church-going Unitarians.

I left their house with the vague feeling that something was wrong somewhere, not only with religious people who could write in such hatred, but with a religiously oriented society that could voice hatred in the language of faith. But I couldn't put my finger on the problem.

Several weeks later, I saw a television film based on George Bernard Shaw's play, Androcles and the Lion. In one scene, a group of Christians are huddled together in a dungeon beneath the Colosseum in Rome. They are to be thrown to the lions the next day. One of their number, a beautiful Christian girl, returns the love of a Roman commander whose troops had marched the prisoners from their remote village to Rome. In the middle of the night, the commander comes to try to persuade his beloved to save herself from the lions by meeting the requirement of the Roman Government—putting a pinch of incense in an altar fire dedicated to Jupiter. She refuses.

"But it's such a little thing," he pleads. "Why should you die for being so stubborn? You don't have to give up any of your beliefs or take on any new ones. We don't ask you to stop being a Christian. All you have to do is just this little thing, so that the Government may know that you are a loyal subject. Then you and I can get married and live in peace. Is a pinch of incense so great a sacrifice for life, love and happiness?" Again, the girl refuses, although she loves him.

As I watched the TV screen, the memory of my visit with the Schempps flashed across my mind. That memory stirred up others. I thought of the Christmas carols blaring from loudspeakers on Main Street during December, the Nativity crèche on the courthouse lawn, the Easter merchandising madness, the attractive billboards suggesting that all "worship in the church or synagogue of your choice" (courtesy of the local lumber company), the "Jesus Saves" signs along the highways—all sights and sounds testifying that "religion," particularly "Christianity" of some kind, is popular, accepted and more or less "official" in our land.

It occurred to me that since the first century, the tables have been turned. Now, "we" are doing it to "them"—in a much more civilized way, of course. The believer is no longer in danger. Quite the contrary. Today, it is hazardous to disturb the gentle currents that waft church and society along in a mutually supporting relationship.

For today, in dozens of ways, our culture is saying to the non-Christian, the Christian, the Jew, the Unitarian, the humanist, everybody: "Sing the hymn and carol, send the Easter card or Christmas card, support the public prayer, bow your head, say the words, display the Bible, offer the pinch of incense. You don't have to change your beliefs or even your behavior. Just follow the forms. It's to your advantage, you know. But be warned. Do not attack any of the symbols of public piety."

When it was worth a person's life to say he was a Christian, his avowal had enormous significance. But when a profession of faith is a worldly advantage and its absence a worldly liability; when the church is at peace with the world—Old Testament prophets called it being "at ease in Zion"—then thoughtful religious people become deeply troubled.

What is a religious community, a church or synagogue, to do in this kind of situation? Today, in spite of mounting budgets, swelling membership and more and more programs, the churches of America seem increasingly like mere Sunday refuges from the frustrations of an organized mass society. Their behavior as social institutions (which is all that can be seen by those on the outside) makes them seem little different from any other benevolent, voluntary associations or lodges. What are they to do? How can their institutional life, the part that is visible to the world, make manifest what they profess in their worship: that they are not man's, but that they belong to Another? How can they speak on public issues and, unlike other social and benevolent institutions, reflect a point of view that rises above self-interest? What, finally, distinguishes a church from a corporation?

When President Kennedy presented Congress with his tax-reform proposals, one recommendation was that a five percent floor be placed under deductible items, including contributions to charity. Many social-welfare agencies that depend upon voluntary contributions for their programs opposed the suggestion. So did many churchmen, and at least one major denominational body expressed deep concern that the proposal might lessen incentives for church giving. The reaction of the welfare institutions was predictable. Unfortunately, that of the churches was too.

As a member of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., I must ask myself and my church: What does it mean to be a Christian in America today? How should a religious community speak and act in such a time? What does God ask of his people, here and now?

There used to be a sign on trains that read: "Dining Car in Opposite Direction." This didn't tell you precisely where the dining car was to be found, but if you were looking for it and ran across the sign, you knew you had to turn around and go the other way.

It may be that this advice is worth being considered by religious people in America, and by their churches. If so, a good way to begin is to examine what they say and do about church-state issues and about the problems of a society that is becoming not more secular, but more, if only on the surface, "religious." Can the direction be changed?

My own denomination, the United Presbyterian Church, has made a small beginning. In May, its highest court, the General Assembly, devoted considerable time to weighing a provocative report full of recommendations on church-state problems and implications about the relations between the churches and American culture. Among other things, the report went on record against many of the practices superficially thought of as being in the self-interest of Protestantism:

- It opposed prayer and Bible reading, as religious observances, in the public schools.
- It opposed the use of public property for religious displays, like the crèche.
- It urged, not Roman Catholic, but wealthy United Presbyterian churches to consider making a voluntary donation to local taxing authorities in lieu of the taxes they don't have to pay.
- The report also suggested that special privileges for clergymen, like those for churches, are at best mixed blessings, because they tend to blunt church capacity for sharp criticism of government and society.
- It urged United Presbyterians to seek amendments to Sunday closing laws that do economic injustice to persons who celebrate the Sabbath on Saturday.

tists, United Church of Christ—are undertaking similar studies, both of their relationships with the state and the "religious" climate of our society. The National Council of Churches has called a study-conference on the same subject for February, 1964. These signs are encouraging. But all this systematic concern by church leaders may not be enough to produce the kind of widespread, informed awareness that America's 70 million adult church members need to recover a sense of their own uniqueness and integrity. Nor may it be what is needed to help our nation solve the critical problems of health, education, welfare and politics that are all wrapped up in the church-state, religion-culture dilemma.

There are really two basic problems at issue. One is the problem of the social establishment of religion; the other, its legal establishment. Remember the pinch of incense required by the Roman Imperial Government? Suppose our Government made no such demand, but all of the forces of public opinion required it. Would that be an important distinction? Yes, it would. It would be the difference between a socially established custom enforced by popular opinion and a legally enacted statute enforced by the coercive power of the state. This is an important distinction, but not as clear as it might appear to be.

The two problems are so interwoven that in practice it is almost impossible to separate them. But it is of critical importance that Americans—especially churchmen—separate them in their thinking.

Too many Americans still cannot distinguish between what is done by voluntary private agencies and what is done by governmental agencies, between what belongs to some of the people and what belongs to all of the people. If I choose to erect a Nativity crèche on my front lawn, or on my church's front lawn, and all my Jewish neighbors choose to find it objectionable, so much the worse for their offended sensibilities. In our society, such an act of mine might be a sin against good taste, but it is certainly not an offense against civil law. And the law should protect my right as an individual to express my faith—or whatever I want to express—in this way.

But if the city council decides to build such an exhibit on the courthouse lawn, with or without taxpayers' money, not only may Jews legitimately object, but Christians as well—and take the matter into court if they feel strongly enough about it and have the courage and the money to do so. In my opinion, the state, the Government, has no right under our Constitution to promote one religion, or even all religions, by means of symbol or practice.

It is interesting that the Presbyterian report opposes crèches on public property, not on constitutional, but on theological grounds. They are not "an effective witness to the Lordship of Christ" in this society, says the report.

The First Amendment to the Constitution states that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. . . ." Legal establishment, as the courts have defined it, case by case, is thus unconstitutional. Social establishment is not. And that is what we have in the United States—a social establishment of religion. This means that pious persons and organizations, as well as those that wish to appear so, can continue to place highly visible religious symbols at various places in our common world. In fact, they can figuratively blanket our society with references to God, prayer, faith, religion. As long as they do it with private money, on private property, or in private institutions, and do not make a public nuisance of themselves, no Government power can stop them. Any responsible civil libertarian, including the few atheists I know, would defend to the death their right to do so. It is protected by our Constitution.

But, at the same time, this social establishment of religion is pushing our Government agencies constantly toward a legal establishment. It generates a mass attitude that tends to overlook the tragic lessons of history, the instances in which a dominant church or sect translated ecclesiastical law into civil or criminal law—from the Inquisition of Spain to the theocracies of Calvin's Geneva, John Cotton's Massachusetts and a few modern states. Past religious tyranny led James Madison to ask of his fellow Virginians, "Who does not see that the same authority which can establish Christianity, in exclusion of all other religions, may establish with the same ease any particular sect of Christians, in exclusion of all other sects?"

"Today's cozy link between church and state encourages zealous churchmen to press the state to do what they cannot get their churches to do for themselves."

Equally important to churchmen is this: A social establishment of religion tends to erase the distinctions between the legitimate functions of the state and the unique functions of the church. It encourages zealous churchmen or financially needy church institutions to press the state hard to do what the churches cannot or will not do for themselves. If the churches and parents cannot adequately accomplish the religious and moral education of their children, or cannot reach enough children, then what is more natural than to ask the state to assume that responsibility in the public schools on the ground that it is necessary for the good of society? Or if a church college, started under Christian auspices and intent upon bringing a distinct religious dimension to its campus life, cannot finance itself from private sources of income, what is more natural than that it seek tax funds to continue its work on the ground that higher private education performs a needed public service?

Nevertheless, social establishment tends toward legal establishment. When the Supreme Court ruled that a prayer composed by state officials to be recited in New York public schools was an establishment of religion, public outcry was loud and long. Sen. Jacob K. Javits received in one month 6,146 letters opposed to the Court's decision and only 389 supporting it. Congressmen and senators rushed to introduce bills—74 in the House; 3 in the Senate, sponsored by 22 senators—that would amend the Constitution to permit such prayers by schoolchildren in classrooms.

Two years ago, the Supreme Court held that Sunday-closing laws were legal because they no longer fulfill a "religious" purpose. These laws, went the reasoning, enable millions of Americans to get a day of rest, sleep late, enjoy family recreation or do whatever they please. Therefore, said the Court, such laws come under the legitimate power of the state to legislate for the general welfare. This finding caused rejoicing in the Lord's Day Alliance, a religious association that is dedicated to promoting the Christian observance of Sunday and has been politically effective in the fight to preserve Sunday-closing laws in some states. But one Protestant theologian's reaction was: "Should we also pray that prayers in the public schools will be adjudged 'nonreligious'? How many such 'victories' should we hope to win?"

As a matter of fact, this kind of "victory" places religious persons in the paradoxical position of having their most treasured acts of devotion degraded to the status of mere teaching tools or gimmicks. For, in order to make sense legally, the argument must take an ironic twist. Here is a paraphrased exchange that took place before the Supreme Court last February (no transcript of the hearing was taken), when the current Bible-reading and Lord's Prayer cases were heard:

Attorney Philip H. Ward III (for the Abington, Pa., School Board): We are teaching morality without religion, cut adrift from theology.

Associate Justice William J. Brennan, Jr.: If that is true, then why does your state permit pupils to be excused if their parents object? You don't excuse them from arithmetic, do you?

Ward: Maybe we shouldn't excuse them, but that's what the people of Pennsylvania want. Pupils may also be excused from physical and dental examinations.

Associate Justice Arthur J. Goldberg: Isn't that downgrading the Bible?

Ward: No, your honor. The Bible has historical and literary value as a part of our nation's heritage. The people of Pennsylvania have chosen it as the vehicle for instilling morality in school children.

Chief Justice Earl Warren: If the state required children to say the Lord's Prayer, would you say that was constitutional?

Ward: I would make a distinction between prayer as a formal religious act and Bible reading as a nonreligious act aimed at teaching morality.

The attorney for the city of Baltimore couldn't make this distinction. He had to defend Bible reading and the Lord's Prayer taken together. He asserted that this did not constitute a "religious act." In fact, he maintained that one purpose of the practice was to calm the pupils.

In the Abington case, the Deputy Attorney General for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania claimed that Bible reading in the public schools is not a "religious practice." But he closed his argument with a counterclaim that "ripping out this practice would express hostility to religion."

I repeat, therefore, that social establishment tends toward legal establishment.

Says the report presented to the United Presbyterian General Assembly, "A church seeking to be itself constantly challenges the state to be a true and authentic state." In other words, a church that has a clear-cut understanding of its unique mission can help the state to delineate its own legitimate sphere of operation and stay within it. If nothing else, the church's being itself will discourage church people from asking the state to perform the religious tasks that not only belong uniquely to the church, but will, in fact, be corrupted if usurped by the state.

A former seminary teacher of mine used to say that the practice of political liberty is not only a sign of the inner freedom of the Christian man, but also the necessary occasion for its renewal. I think he meant this: The Christian who does not join in specific struggles for liberty in the civil order will almost surely lose the spiritual freedom that is one of the richest fruits of faith. And the church that is content merely to speak of liberty in general, while avoiding the struggle for liberty in particular—in the schools, in the courts, in the streets, in city hall, in the union and the factory and the office—that church is in danger of losing its own freedom.

For this reason, it is imperative that more and more churchmen turn their most serious attention to the knotty problems of church and state that today trouble our society, problems whose handling will require unusual maturity, common sense and self-restraint by clergyman and laymen alike. Religious integrity is really tested when it must face pragmatic problems.

Take the problem of Federal aid to education. Most Protestants who believe that the public schools are in urgent need of Federal help also believe that such help should be withheld from parochial schools. They believe that the Roman Catholic Church has a perfect right to maintain its own schools in order to indoctrinate its children in their faith. But they would deny that the Roman Catholic Church—or any other church—has any right to claim tax money, paid in by everyone, for what Protestants would call sectarian education. The United Presbyterian Church-State Report reaffirms this opposition to the use of tax funds, either directly or indirectly, for the support of parochial schools.

At the same time, Protestants cannot be indifferent to this fact: One out of every eight children—future citizens—gets his education in Roman Catholic grade schools and high schools. The quality of education parochial-school children receive will help determine the kind of citizens they will become and the kind of society we will have. So, if only out of purely self-interested concern for the future of their country, Protestants must care about Catholic education.

Furthermore, well-informed Protestants know that Catholic parochial-school systems are in serious financial difficulty. Classroom and teacher shortages have forced a number of dioceses to give up the early grades of parochial education. For example, in St. Leo's Elementary School in Fairfax City, Va., there are 62 pupils in one second-grade classroom. St. Leo's pastor recently announced that next fall his parish school would close its kindergarten and first grade, and the next two grades in 1964 and 1965, in order to improve the educational facilities in grades four through eight. Catholic children will then have to attend public schools during the first four years of their education. In Cincinnati, Columbus, Spokane, St. Paul and other cities, many parochial schools have also eliminated grades. In St. Louis, Joseph Cardinal Ritter announced that no new parochial schools would be built until qualified teachers were found. Five new St. Louis parishes have no grade schools.

If it comes to a choice between poor education in all grades or good education in some, a number of Catholic dioceses will build only high schools and eliminate grade schools.

The plight of public education in many areas is almost equally serious. While a few dissident voices are heard, there seems to be little real argument about the urgent need for some kind of general Federal aid to overcrowded, ill-equipped, understaffed public schools. And if Protestants have a vested interest in the quality of education given to the 14 percent of the nation's youth in parochial schools, Catholics and others have an even larger stake in the quality of education given the great majority who go to public schools.

Yet Federal-aid legislation has been stalemated in the last two sessions of Congress, and indications are that the stalemate will continue. Why? Because Roman Catholics can block education bills that don't include parochial schools, and Protestants can block any proposals that do. Further, Protestants predict a proliferation of non-Catholic parochial schools if tax aid ever becomes available for them. This, they say, would lead to a deterioration of the public-school system and to its eventual destruction.

Nobody now knows the way out of the deadlock. What seems clear to me is that high-level interfaith conversation must go on in a search for a way out. And the sooner this is done the better. The Presbyterian report offers some suggestions. It says, in effect, that "shared-time" arrangements may help; that maybe—just maybe—it is possible and constitutional for tax money to be considered for use in the scientific and technical parts of the parochial-school curriculum. In any case, says the report, let's not stop searching for a way out of the blind alley at a time when the general education of all the nation's youth is running down.

Another area in which religious doctrines impinge directly upon public policy is that of birth control and general public-health practices. In 1959, the United Presbyterian General Assembly stated its approval of the use of contraceptives for family-planning purposes. While the Assembly has made no positive statement in favor of our Government's making birth-control information and technical aid available to a foreign country, it implicitly has no objections to such a program. This same general position would hold true for the making of birth-control advice and devices available on request in tax-supported clinics and hospitals. The 1959 Assembly also opposed state legislation that prohibits the sale of contraceptives or their prescription by physicians in private practice.

Catholics have an understandable objection to the spending of their tax money for public-health programs—such as Chicago's—that promote the use of birth-control information and devices they believe to be immoral. There is a reverse side to this coin. Seventeen states prohibit the sale or distribution of contraceptives except through doctors or pharmacists; five states ban all public sale of such devices. Although these statutes were enacted in the 19th century under Protestant pressure, times and attitudes have changed for many Protestants. Today, they believe that Catholics have no right to keep such laws in operation. Some Catholic spokesmen have agreed that their church is not officially interested in trying to make the private behavior of non-Catholics conform to Roman Catholic canon law. Meanwhile, the laws stay on the books, though they are being tested in the courts.

Still another controversy centers on the use of public money to support church-related hospitals in which medical practice is limited by church dogma. The Roman Catholic Church will not permit therapeutic abortions, while many Protestant churches do not formally oppose them. The Presbyterian report upholds the right of church-related hospitals to restrict medical practices according to church doctrinal commitments, but opposes the granting of public funds to such hospitals.

"The so-called 'wall of separation' between church and state has been breached often by both, each using the other for its own ends."

Despite the fog of church-state confusion in which they are enshrouded, these and other urgent and critical questions of public policy must be resolved quickly, and practically. In any case, the so-called "wall of separation" between church and state is a wall in which history has left holes. It has been breached scores of times both by the Government, which has tried to use the churches for its purposes; and by the churches, which have tried to use the Government for their purposes. I myself went to a seminary on the GI Bill, as did hundreds of others. I heard no objections to the benefits the churches derived from this program. Few people complain about the Government's paying the salaries of military chaplains, although the Presbyterian report points out that this raises serious questions for the churches. Many, for example, ask: Are the preaching of the Word of God and the administering of the Sacraments for sale?

I know it is a sign of my bias as a Christian (I hope many other Christians share the bias) that I believe, in the long run, that political and civil liberties are safest when the church is free to be the church. And by "free," I do not mean just free of external coercion. The freedom of the church lies in its recognition of its basic mission: to be deeply involved in the personal, social, political and economic life of the world—but not to be identified with the world; to encourage compassion, a desire for justice and a vision of what it means to be truly human; and to renew that vision by living close to the wellspring of its faith.

Churches and synagogues, clergymen and churchgoers, all must regain the unique sense of purpose and mission that God has given them to perform by worship within and witness without. All need to face, and to deal with, the urgent problems bound up in the issue of church and state. And all need to recognize that when men of faith begin to look to the state as a pillar of religion, the edifice of faith they seek to save has already begun to collapse.

Crisis

N.C.C. Acts on Racial Crisis

Xian Century - June 19, 1963

New York city.

✦ IT IS NOT EASY to meet the challenge of radical change in race relations and at the same time to act responsibly on several important issues of a different character. But that is what the General Board of the National Council of Churches attempted and accomplished at its meeting here June 6-8. Throughout the meeting the atmosphere seemed taut with awareness of and concern over the current racial crisis. Repeatedly it was predicted that this summer the racial crisis will not only persist in southern states but will spread to northern cities. The General Board confronted the crisis boldly, as befits a body which has led in warning the churches and the country over the dire consequences of injustice and inequality.

Religion

In a significant move the General Board set up a commission of 25, headed by Arthur C. Lichtenberger, presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church, with a staff under the leadership of Jon L. Regier of the N.C.C.'s Division of Home Missions. The commission will invite the cooperation of Roman Catholic and Jewish organizations, perhaps under auspices of the continuing organization of the Religion and Race Conference. It is expected to send representatives to testify before Congress in behalf of civil rights laws, to organize "negotiations" and "demonstrations," to press for reform within the churches as well as in the civil order. The tone of the action is reflected in the statement that "the General Board authorizes this commission to make commitments, to call for actions, to take risks . . ."

ters should be stripped from the central areas of the nation's capital in a vast urban renewal program. Open occupancy should be applied legally to the whole district. The Negro churches' moral reformation movement is laudable, but it cannot succeed if Negroes continue to be subjected to inadequate housing, inferior schooling and discriminatory employment practices.

Do-Gooder? Who Else!

✦ IT IS A SIGN of cynical times that "do-gooder" has become a term of derision or contempt. Almost any humane or redemptive cause or organization can be and often is blasted by newspapers which hang this label on its advocates. The tag is quite sufficient to intimidate at least some supporters of decency and compassion in human relations. It is particularly effective in terrifying those who consider themselves realists, who find comfort in "sophistication." Hence it is readily employed by tough legislators, who build political careers by protecting the affluent from the needy, and by hanging judges who are gentle with gangsters and fierce with juvenile delinquents. It is a potent weapon in the hands of the John Birch Society and of the radical right generally. It is equally favored by the school of community organizers who "reorganize" communities by conquest, imposing monolithic "democracy" by deriding existing community leadership as do-gooders. The word even appears in editorials of publications whose policies are generally humanitarian and liberal. It is time for some editors to take stock of the verbal company they keep and decide whose side they are on. What is so bad about doing good? If contempt is the proper attitude to take toward the do-gooder, are we by the same token expected to idolize the evildoer?

Quotes and Notes

✦ INTERCONFESSIONAL relations in Colombia were discussed at a recent meeting between 15 Protestant and 11 Roman Catholic churchmen in the Bogota home of President Arnfeld C. Morck of the Evangelical Lutheran Church's Colombia synod. Commenting on the "informal and friendly" exchange, Stewart W. Herman, director of the Lutheran World Federation's committee on Latin America, said: "It [is] especially noteworthy that a meeting of this kind should occur in Colombia, which for many years has been regarded as a notorious example of the persecution and suppression of the Protestant witness. This kind of contact is occurring with increasing frequency all over Latin America."

December 1965 was set as the target date for inauguration of a new united church by delegates from Anglican, Methodist and Presbyterian churches in Nigeria during a recent meeting in Lagos. A scheme for union will be distributed within weeks to members of the negotiating churches.

Again this summer Scarritt College for Christian Workers in Nashville, Tennessee, is offering a three-week graduate seminar designed for people called on to work in the church school with handicapped or unusually gifted children.

Beginning June 23 and continuing through September 29, the American Broadcasting Company's radio series entitled "Pilgrimage" will be devoted to the nature and work of the National Council of Churches. Tapes of the programs (moderated by Rector James W. Kennedy of the Episcopal Church of the Ascension in New York) will be available for use on any radio station after the first run on A.B.C. Since local broadcast times vary, inquiry to the nearest A.B.C. outlet is advised.

N.C.C. Acts on Racial Crisis

New York city.

The tone of the action is reflected in the statement that "the General Board authorizes this commission to make commitments, to call for actions, to take risks . . ."

Cont. back

A mass meeting in Washington was reported to be an early project.

The General Board also endorsed the use of economic pressures as a legitimate means of removing race barriers, pointing out that economic pressures are unjustly used to deprive citizens of minority races of their rights and that it is the business of the churches to reconcile and abate such situations where possible. The board declared further that "when other efforts to secure these rights do not avail," churches and churchmen should "support and participate in economic measures where used in a responsible and disciplined manner to eliminate economic injustice and to end discrimination against any of God's people based on race, creed or national origin." That this is an action of far-reaching importance may be seen in the fact that it applies to campaigns of "selective buying"—a device whose earlier name was boycott—which are currently being used to convince business establishments of the unprofitability of racial discrimination.

Some heat was generated in debate over a long-delayed pronouncement on "The Churches and the Public Schools," authorized in 1953. This is the one issue in relation to which there are more cases pending in U.S. courts than in relation to racial desegregation. The pronouncement expressed the support of the churches for the U.S. system of public education as "a major cohesive force in our pluralistic society" because "we believe as Christians that every individual has a right to an education aimed at the full development of his capacities as a human being created by God." It also endorsed the right of religious groups to establish schools at their own expense and the right of parents to decide whether their children shall attend public or nonpublic schools, but held that churches and parents still have obligations to the public schools. The statement favored the schools' teaching about as opposed to instruction in religion, advocated use of the Bible as a source book but not as devotional material, supported the "wisdom" and "authority" of the Supreme Court's ruling in the regents' prayer case that "it is no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as part of a religious program carried on by the government."

But not all persons at the meeting concurred in the statement. Attorney Charles Rafios, representing Archbishop Iakovos of the Greek Orthodox Church, interpreted it as calling for a ban on the name of God in public life. He argued that the statement capitulated to the Supreme Court on the Bible reading issue before the court had handed down its expected verdict and held that any General Board pronouncement "should use care not to seem to repudiate God." He ended with the threat: "If this statement goes out with N.C.C. endorsement, it may be necessary for the Orthodox Church to repudiate membership in the council." It was not clear whether the threat was that of the speaker or of Archbishop Iakovos himself. Henry Pitney Van Dusen attacked the statement on the ground that it failed to mention that God is the "source, ground and vindicator of the truth" and that any system of education that does not recognize this fact is incomplete. The statement was then referred back to its sponsors for revision in the light of criticisms leveled against it; they retained the phraseology supporting the Supreme Court and added to the preamble Dr. Van Dusen's theological affirmation. In this form the statement was approved by the General Board.

Despite concerted pressure from the National Association of Broadcasters on members of the General Board and their constituencies, the board voted 55-5 to urge the Federal Communications Commission to exercise greater oversight of the networks in relation to program content. Its statement scored the broadcasting industry for "lack of accountability" and for subservience to audience ratings. It recommended that the F.C.C. continue periodic reviews of broadcasting licensees, hold stations accountable for public service programs, and make networks as well as stations accountable to the F.C.C. The report also urged Congress to clean its own house by eliminating conflicts of interest among its own members in relation to laws affecting broadcasting, and to prohibit station and network owners from sitting on congressional committees dealing with communications. Passage of this resolution in the face of strong pressure for postponement from the industry demonstrates that the General Board is no rubber-stamp organization.

The meeting completed action on a report from the N.C.C. committee on policy and strategy. This report called for revision of the council's constitution, subject to approval by the General Assembly, which meets in Philadelphia early in December. At an evening dinner in Riverside Church the council paid its respects to and expressed its affection for National Council General Secretary Roy G. Ross, who retires June 30. Two volumes of letters, a silver tray and gifts of money from the N.C.C. staff and the General Board were presented to Dr. Ross at a ceremony presided over by President J. Irwin Miller. Speakers included former council presidents Henry K. Sherrill, Edwin T. Dahlberg and Eugene Carson Blake; Luther A. Weigle, head of the committee of scholars responsible for the Revised Standard Version of the Bible; and R. H. Edwin Espy, associate general secretary. Mr. Espy has been nominated by the General Board to succeed Dr. Ross. Election of a general secretary is the responsibility of the General Assembly. In his response Dr. Ross called the National Council "a means for arousing a public conscience, feeding the hungry, giving guidance to people who have been misguided by their prejudices and helping to build a wholesome society."

PASTORS' MANIFESTO - 6-19-63

We, the Pastors of Albany, God-fearing servants, accept the responsibility which the trend of our time has thrust upon us. We are faced with the task of establishing relationships between the white and Negro citizens of Albany in order to reach agreements necessary for peace and progress in our city. We prayerfully approach this task in our Lord's Name, asking His guidance and seeking to do His Will.

This nation is an active and growing democracy and we are in full understanding of the ideals and goals of her people. We are called upon to establish the democratic ideal and make it evident in our lives.

We, the Albany Pastors, call upon all God-fearing people in our city to unite as never before, laying aside old wounds, to build a city of true brotherly love.

Since laws which have separated us have been wiped from the books, we seek to encourage responsible, civic minded, and moral citizens to rid our city of the evils of undemocratic living. We pledge to work for the enforcement of the spirit of the law as well as the letter of the law - words written "not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God -- for the Spirit gives life."

The problem of our community is a part of a world-wide problem, and by observation we have noted that whenever and wherever men of good will have come together and were willing to reason their problems out, workable solutions have been found. We believe with the help of the Almighty God the same may be obtained here.

We pledge that we as ministers of the Gospel and leaders of our congregations will make the needed sacrifices, will work shoulder to shoulder with all Albanians to seek to understand, to forgive, to work unceasingly for honest discussion and solution of our present problems. We remember the words of our Master:

> "A man may say, 'I am the light'; but if he hates his brother, he is still in the dark. Only the man who loves his brother dwells in light; there is nothing to make him stumble. But one who hates his brother is in darkness; he walks in the dark and has no idea where he is going, because the darkness has made him blind."

With the full realization that love is not a matter of words or talk, but must prove itself in action, we a group of 47 ministers pledge our strength in overcoming the evils in our city.

United Church of Christ

A Committee for Christian Social Action has been appointed by the Convention of the South, acting conference of the United Church of Christ (Congregational Christian Churches), meeting in Atlanta, Georgia, June 18-21. The Convention of the South is composed of 25,000 members residing in ten states from Virginia to Texas. Being duly appointed and authorized by the Convention of the South the Christian Social Action Committee releases the following statement for guidance and implementation:

First, we call upon the President of the United States, the Congress, and State and local governmental officials to act personally and through all channels and authority available to them in setting the course of this Nation in the pursuit of racial justice. We wholeheartedly endorse the Civil Rights Bill proposed by the President of the United States and further call upon the Congress of the United States to enact immediately the Civil Rights Bill. In particular, we encourage those senators and congressmen from the states located in the South to abondon such tactics as the filibuster and face this over-riding moral issue of our time. We submit that acts of evasion and accommodation on the part of all governmental officials must be replaced by Christian and democratic conviction as evidenced by forthright and immediate legislative action.

Secondly, we call upon all of the United Church of Christ in America to give full support to the forthcoming proposal of the President of the United Church of Christ in his efforts to implement an effective program to end discrimination now. In this connection, all clergymen and churchmen of the United Church of Christ in America are reminded that they are obligated to act personally and directly to give financial support to the General Synod of the United Church of Christ; to become personally involved in putting our own house in order in the pursuit of racial justice; to make available our church buildings, facilities and resources to be utilized as places of assembly or as otherwise needed.

Thirdly, we call upon each member of the Convention of the South and each member of the United Church of Christ in America to free themselves from provincialism and out-moded traditions and stand up and be counted without fear of arrest or economic reprisal. We remind each member that by his commitment to the Gospel of Jesus Christ that he is responsible, under God, for setting the course the United Church must take in the pursuit of racial justice. In this connection, the Convention of the South, through the General Synod, pledges financial support for those who have the courage to stand and who may be arrested. It also pledges financial support to those who may be the victim of economic reprisals as a result of their stand in this struggle for human decency.

Fourthly, we call for the immediate realignment of all conferences and associations, of the United Church of Christ, along geographical rather than racial lines. To facilitate this matter we recommend that the various conferences and associations discard delaying tactics, imaginary fears, and general pussy-footing with a revolution and get down to the business of a courageous program of action in the realignment of all conferences and associations within the United Church of Christ.

Finally, the Convention of the South supports continued demonstrations for freedom and justice wherever conditions warrant such demonstrations. We would further suggest that a means to end demonstrations would be the total removal of all those elements and devices which tend to obstruct freedom and justice. Until such time we suggest that demonstrations continue until all men are truly free. It is our prayer that men and women who honestly possess good will rise to the occasion and by God's help resolve the greatest issue of our time.

National Council Leaders Comment On Supreme Court Ruling

Following the recent decision of the Supreme Court concerning Bible reading and prayers in the public schools, spokesmen for the National Council of Churches declared: "The Supreme Court has again fulfilled its function of settling peaceably disputes in the American community."

The statement signed by J. Irwin Miller, President, and Dr. Roy G. Ross, General Secretary, underlined that "the National Council of Churches has expressed its concern for the freedom of conscience which the decision of the Court seeks to serve."

Quoting passages from the action taken this month by the Council's General Board, the statement said: "The Council agreed with the Court that it is 'no business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as part of a religious program carried on by the Government.'"

"The decision of the Supreme Court serves as a reminder to all our citizens that 'teaching religious commitment is the responsibility of the home and community of faith rather than the public schools,'" said the statement in conclusion.

Another early reaction to the Supreme Court's decision came from Presiding Bishop Arthur Lichtenberger, Protestant Episcopal Church, who stated: "The Court makes it clear that it is not the task of public schools to inculcate religious beliefs or habits of worship. This is the task of our homes and churches and synagogues." The Bishop underlined that "We are indeed a religious people," and added that "the Court does not rule out objective study of religion in public schools -- indeed the Court encourages such study."

Perhaps no living American has better expressed the revolutionary spirit of our age than Martin Luther King, Jr., the man portrayed on the cover of this publication. When Dr. King was in Birmingham jail he addressed a letter to clergymen who had criticized him for the "poor timing" of the Birmingham demonstrations. Excerpts from that letter are printed on this page and the next. If you read nothing else in this issue, read the letter. Ponder it. Enter into it. And then perhaps you will understand not only the seething momentum that is gathering within a Negro community that has determined in mass numbers to throw off the shackles of slavery and segregation. Perhaps you will also see that your destiny as an individual—our destiny as a nation—is dependent on a willingness to do all that is possible to eradicate the sin under which we all live.

There is an uncompromising quality in the remaining articles in this issue. Some offer deep understanding of the racial dilemma. Others offer concrete courses of action which Christians and others can take to speed the end of racism. But without exception the articles recognize that we live in a time when the compromises we have made with ourselves and our Negro brothers are no longer possible. Look long at the photographs of Robert Newman, taken during the Birmingham crisis. Read carefully the suggestions of Will D. Campbell regarding the possibilities of church action. Search your heart, as you digest the suggestions of Raymond Hilliard, to see whether you are not implicated in the forms of segregation he describes and whether or not you can work to end these barriers.

If you find yourself discouraged, unable to act, seek counsel from those who have taken their own faltering steps toward brotherhood.

Above all, realize that the very integrity and life of Christ's Church in America is at stake: "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar, for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

EMANCIPATION—1963

By MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

We know through painful experience that freedom is never voluntarily given by the oppressor; it must be demanded by the oppressed. Frankly, I have never yet engaged in a direct action movement that was "well timed," according to the timetable of those who have not suffered unduly from the disease of segregation. For years now I have heard the word "Wait!" It rings in the ear of every Negro with a piercing familiarity. This "Wait" has almost always meant "Never." It has been a tranquilizing thalidomide, relieving the emotional stress for a moment only to give birth to an ill-formed infant of frustration. We must come to see with the distinguished jurist of yesterday that "justice too long delayed is justice denied."

We have waited for more than three hundred and forty years for our constitutional and God-given rights. The nations of Asia and Africa are moving with jet-like speed toward the goal of political independence, and we still creep at horse and buggy pace toward the gaining of a cup of coffee at a lunch counter. I guess it is easy for those who have never felt the stinging darts of segregation to say, "wait." But when you have seen vicious mobs lynch your mother and father at will and drown your sisters and brothers at whim; when you have seen hate-filled policemen curse, kick, brutalize and even kill your black brothers and sisters with impunity; when you see the vast majority of your twenty million Negro brothers smothering in an air-tight cage of poverty in the midst of an affluent society; when you suddenly find your tongue twisted and your speech stammering as you seek to explain to your six-year old daughter why she can't go to the public amusement park that has just been advertised on television, and see tears welling up in her little eyes when she is told that Funtown is closed to colored children, and see the depressing clouds of inferiority begin to form in her little mental sky, and see her begin to distort her little personality by unconsciously developing a bitterness toward white people; when you have to concoct an answer for a five-year-old son asking in agonizing pathos: "Daddy, why do white people treat colored people so mean?"; when you take a cross country drive and find it necessary to sleep night after night in the uncomfortable corners of your automobile because no motel will accept you; when you are humiliated day in and day out by nagging signs reading "white" men and "colored;" when your first name becomes "nigger" and your middle name becomes "boy" (however old you are) and your last name becomes "John," and when your wife and mother are never given the respected title "Mrs.;" when you are harried by day and haunted by night by the fact that you are a Negro, living constantly at tip-toe stance never quite knowing what to expect next, and plagued with inner fears and outer resentments; when you are forever fighting a degenerating sense of "nobodiness;" — then you will understand why we find it difficult to wait. There comes a time when the cup of endurance runs over, and men are no longer willing to be plunged into an abyss of injustice where they experience the bleekness of corroding despair. I hope, Sirs, you can understand our legitimate and unavoidable impatience.

Of course, there is nothing new about this kind of civil disobedience. It was seen sublimely in the refusal of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego to obey the laws of Nebuchadnezzar because a higher moral law was involved. It was practiced superbly by the early Christians who were willing to face hungry lions and the excruciating pain of chopping blocks, before submitting to certain unjust laws of the Roman Empire. To a degree academic freedom is a reality today because Socrates practiced civil disobedience.

I must make two honest confessions to you, my Christian and Jewish brothers. First, I must confess that over the last few years I have been gravely disappointed with the white moderate. I have almost reached the regrettable conclusion that the Negro's great stumbling block in the stride toward freedom is not the White Citizens' Council-er or the Ku Klux Klanner, but the white moderate who is more devoted to "order" than to justice; who prefers a negative peace which is the absence of tension to a positive peace which is the presence of justice; who constantly says "I agree with you in the goal you seek, but I can't agree with your methods of direct action;" who paternalistically feels that he can set the time-table for another man's freedom; who lives by the myth of time and who constantly advises the Negro to wait until a "more convenient season." Shallow understanding from people of goodwill is more frustrating than absolute misunderstanding from people of ill will. Lukewarm acceptance is much more bewildering than outright rejection.

There was a time when the church was very powerful. It was during that period when the early Christians rejoiced when they were deemed worthy to suffer for what they believed. In those days the church was not merely a thermometer that recorded the ideas and principles of popular opinion; it was the thermostat that transformed the mores of society. Wherever the early Christians entered a town the power structure got disturbed and immediately sought to convict them for being "disturbers of the peace" and "outside agitators." But they went on with the conviction that they were a colony of heaven: and had to obey God rather than man. They were small in number, but big in commitment. They were too God-intoxicated to be "astronomically intimidated." They brought an end to such ancient evils as infanticide and gladiatorial contest.

Things are different now. The contemporary church is so often a weak, ineffectual voice with an uncertain sound. It is so often the arch supporter of the status quo. Far from being disturbed by the presence of the church, the power structure of the average community is consoled by the church's silent and often vocal sanction of things as they are.

But the judgment of God is upon the church as never before. If the church of today does not recapture the sacrificial spirit of the early church, it will lose its authentic ring, forfeit the loyalty of millions, and be dismissed as an irrelevant social club with no meaning for the twentieth century. I am meeting young people every day whose disappointment with the church has risen to outright disgust.

Maybe again, I have been too optimistic. Is organized religion too inextricably bound to status-quo to save our nation and the world? Maybe I must turn my faith to the inner spiritual church, the church within the church, as the true ecclesia and the hope of the world. But again I am thankful to God that some noble souls from the ranks of organized religion have broken loose from the paralyzing chains of conformity and joined us as active partners in the struggle for freedom. They have left their secure congregations and walked the streets of Albany, Georgia, with us. They have gone through the highways of the South on tortuous rides for freedom. Yes, they have gone to jail with us. Some have been kicked out of their churches, and lost the support of their bishops and fellow ministers. But they have gone with the faith that right defeated is stronger than evil triumphant. These men have been the leaven in the lump of the race. Their witness has been the spiritual salt that has preserved the true meaning of the gospel in these troubled times. They have carved a tunnel of hope through the dark mountain of disappointment.

I hope the church as a whole will meet the challenge of this decisive hour. But even if the church does not come to the aid of justice, I have no despair about the future. I have no fear about the outcome of our struggle in Birmingham, even if our motives are presently misunderstood. We will reach the goal of freedom in Birmingham and all over the nation, because the goal of America is freedom. Abused and scorned though we may be, our destiny is tied up with the destiny of America. Before the pilgrims landed at Plymouth we were here. Before the pen of Jefferson scratched across the pages of history the majestic words of the Declaration of Independence, we were here. For more than two centuries our foreparents labored here with wages, they made cotton king; and they built the homes of their masters in the midst of brutal injustice and shameful humiliation —and yet out of a bottomless vitality they continue to thrive and develop. If the inexpressible cruelties of slavery could not stop us, the opposition we now face will surely fail. We will win our freedom because the sacred heritage of our nation and the eternal will of God are embodied in our echoing demands.

Negro children: "You have to concoct an answer for a five-year-old son asking in agonizing pathos: 'Daddy, why do white people treat colored people so mean?'"

EPITAPH FOR AN ERA

As dawn broke on Sunday, May 12—a Mother's Day whose significance was extolled from the pulpit of almost every church in the city that morning— I stood on the balcony of my motel in Birmingham watching the giant flames rise a scant three blocks away. For hours I had witnessed with a mixture of shock, frustration and fear the aftermath of the two bombings which wrecked the A. G. Gaston Motel and the home of the Reverend A. D. King and imperilled the fragile bi-racial agreement that had been concluded between Negro and white leaders after more than one month of unprecedented demonstrations in the city whose adage is, "Hard times come here first and stay longest". The flames licked the sky; the breeze pushed billows of smoke out toward the steel mills, symbol of Birmingham's metamorphosis from a rural post-Civil War junction to a steel city of a half-million segregated souls which, from its founding, has been dependent on Northern capital and an uneasy racial status quo.

The flames, an outgrowth of rioting near the bombed Gaston Motel, were emblems of the meaning of Birmingham: after three-hundred and forty years of servitude Negroes in a citadel of massive resistance to integration were standing with backs straight, some violent, most nonviolent, declaring to the world what the world should have realized when Rudyard Kipling's notion of "the white man's burden" crumbled in the wreckage of colonial empires; "We shall overcome!"

Perhaps the most important meaning to be drawn from the Birmingham experience is precisely this: that Negro leadership—until now either nonviolent or oriented toward court decisions—can no longer afford to move, in Martin Luther King Jr.'s phrase, "at horse-and-buggy pace to get a cup of coffee at a lunch counter".

The new era that has emerged is, after Birmingham, completely recognizable. It is recognized by the Chicago taxi driver I listened to on my return from Birmingham. Suddenly, when held up in traffic by a Negro-driven car, he shouted, "I'd like to run over every one of those jigs." "Why?" I asked. "Because they're getting too much too fast." He was not entirely correct. In Birmingham, indeed throughout the country, progress for most Negroes has been almost non-existent. Even if the terms agreed to by white and Negro leaders in Birmingham are implemented, they can only be a spur to future demonstrations—Nashville, Tennessee, is the best example of this pattern—when Negroes realize how little they have won. What the cab driver did see, however, was that the time for a show-down has come.

A Birmingham mother joins hundreds at the mass meeting which followed the bombings. In her face lies the answer to the question, "Do Negroes really want freedom?"

"What occurred was not some long-anticipated development, but a painful, shattering, six-week revolution which left whites only embryonically aware of the implications of Uncle Tom's departure from the Southern landscape."

Where were the voices of reason in Birmingham? The question is somewhat naive. For most clergymen "reason" constituted a return to peace. For local businessmen, reeling under the weight of an effective Negro boycott, coupled with the fear of shopping downtown that had gripped white residents, "reason" constituted at least some concession to Negro demands.

On Monday, May 13, I met with a small group of white persons in an office of Birmingham's University Medical Center; the doors were closed "to avoid the possibility of offending a neighbor who does not share our views." The group included local pastors and members of the Alabama Council on Human Relations. For years the Alabama Council has tried to exert a reconciling influence in the area of race relations. The Birmingham chapter used to meet in the offices of the local Chamber of Commerce until "the Klan chased us out" in 1954. Klan members arrived at a meeting, took pictures of participants, and the Council changed its meeting place in order "not to embarrass the Chamber of Commerce." The conversation which took place on Monday sheds much light on the background of the Birmingham crisis.

The group was unanimous in feeling that the white climate of opinion in Birmingham had changed radically during the past several years. Two years ago a triumvirate city commission, which included "Bull" Connor and which ran on a racist platform in the wake of Negro demonstrations in 1960, was elected by an overwhelming majority. Parks and other public facilities—except for the zoo —"They didn't know what to do with all those animals."—were closed to circumvent court decisions ordering integration. Birmingham's economy, already jeopardized by the city's racist image, suffered further decline. In 1963 the city, having voted to change its form of government, elected Albert Boutwell as mayor. In a brief two years, Connor's repressive reign had been rejected—largely by a coalition of younger business leaders, Negro voters, and possibly in one observer's view, persons who "were tired of not being able to play golf". With Boutwell's election there seemed to be a majority in the city who recognized that racial accord of some sort was essential to economic survival. Birmingham seemed ready to accept George Leighton's view of 1937: that "the social cost of 'keeping the nigger in his place' is beyond computation."

The role of white churches in the Birmingham crisis is best introduced with an incident recounted by Episcopal clergyman Louis Mitchell whose efforts to speak out on racial matters in Birmingham have forced his resignation from the suburban parish where he serves as assistant to the minister: A local clergyman berated white realtor-spokesman Sidney Smyer, Sr., for reaching the four-point bi-racial agreement on the basis of materialistic motivations. In reply Smyer openly acknowledged the economic motive and made no apology for it. What Smyer's clerical critic failed to realize, says Mitchell, is that his reasons as a minister for not speaking out were equally motivated by economics. The best way for a white minister to hold down a job in Birmingham is to remain silent on the racial issue.

Some clergymen have broken the pattern of silence. The pastor of the local Unitarian Church, which has traditionally seated Negro worshippers, has spoken out against racism. But the emergence of a liberating voice in Birmingham has been immeasurably damaged by the failure of local newspapers and radio stations to give coverage to public utterances such as the statement of five white and four Negro ministers issued on April 11. The statement was signed by the Reverends Paul E. Cosby, Joseph Ellwanger, Robert Brank Fulton, Harold D. Long, Louis L. Mitchell, Jr., Ervin R. Oermann, J. E. Robinson, G. L. Terrell and H. C. Terrell. The statement read, in part: "We . . . affirm the rightness of the aims of all who seek equal employment opportunities and equal access to all public facilities regardless of color or creed." These aims, the statement concludes, are rooted "in the historic Christian teaching of the oneness of humanity in Christ." One of the signers observed that it would have been possible to obtain more signatures from Negro pastors but that "it was thought well to have more of the former variety." When the Birmingham Ministers Associa-

"The judgment—that the Negro will attain equality—has been passed upon America. The white man's only freedom lies in responding to that judgment, whether with dogs and fire hoses which further incite the Negro, or with repentance that may, or may not, alleviate the inevitable suffering involved in predestined social change."

tion was asked to endorse the four-point bi-racial agreement, the Association's Executive Committee refused to do so. Why? I asked a prominent white clergyman. Were the ministers afraid or did they refuse because of personal conviction? For both reasons, the clergyman responded.

On Monday evening the Vestry of one of Birmingham's wealthiest churches met. The main item of business: sprinkler systems.

The most outspoken and incisive white resident of Birmingham is a man who would shun any label, a brilliant lawyer in his early thirties whose office wall is hung with blown-up political cartoons related to his successful advocacy of reapportionment in Alabama. He has defended Negroes. He has angered extremists on both sides of the fence. After receiving a threatening phone call during the administration of former Mayor Art Hanes, he called Hanes in the dawn hours and indicated that he would call Hanes at any hour of the day in response to any future telephone intimidations. For a time, the calls ceased. On Monday afternoon I joined reporters in the office of Charles Morgan, Jr., reporters who had come to the young lawyer to gain insight into the Birmingham crisis.

What had been the decisive factors in the reaching of a truce in Birmingham? Morgan echoed the opinion of other observers who noted that the use of large numbers of children and youth in demonstrations had broken the back of white resistance. "The Negroes have a new tactic: the use of kids." It is "an excellent technique", Morgan observed, "but it is not nonviolence." He referred to the children running through department stores and knocking merchandise out of place. In defending the use of children, Martin Luther King, Jr., had emphasized that they, along with all demonstrators, were schooled in the nonviolent technique. Every demonstrator was required to give allegiance to the "Commandments for Volunteers", ten rules which include the injunction: "Refrain from the violence of the fist, tongue, or heart." It is generally agreed that none of the acts of violence perpetrated by Negroes during the Birmingham demonstrations were committed by demonstrators.

What did Morgan feel about the church's role in the crisis? "The church has not been a leader, but a follower . . . The new motto today is 'Go to the Supreme Court of your choice on Sunday, but go to the Supreme Court.'" The church has existed far too long under the illusion that this is "a world of sweetness and light." But "the church doesn't have any idea of what it's supposed to be. This world is not a world of sweetness and light, and that's the joy of living here, besides the fact that it's home."

Birmingham attorney, Charles Morgan, Jr.

"I'm trying to seel this thesis," said Morgan earnestly. "This city is an example of what people go through when they are consistently denied the rights of the First Amendment. Nobody here had any education concerning the basic problems. The network TV shows (about segregation in Alabama) were never shown here." His point was well taken. For it was evident in the faces and words of Birmingham residents, particularly after the Saturday bombings, that what had occurred was not some long-anticipated historical development, but a painful, shattering, six-week revolution, a revolution which left whites breathless with fear and only embryonically aware of the implications of Uncle Tom's departure from the Southern landscape.

Many aspects of the Birmingham crisis remain unexplored. What of the influence exerted by the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company (a division of U.S. Steel) on Birmingham's economic situation? T. C. I. pours an estimated five million dollars a week into the city's economy. U.S. Steel President Roger Blough reportedly urged reconciliation in Birmingham, but it is inconceivable that a company whose dependents number one in six Birmingham residents could not have exerted more influence at an earlier date, had it chosen to do so.

What of the future of the nonviolent movement? A number of critics focus their fears on the Black Muslim Movement, failing to recognize that the nonviolent movement has aroused far more white violence than the Muslims have aroused Negro violence. Today the Black Muslim Movement may be feared less as a political force than as an ideology which bears striking resemblance to white racist extremism, a long term phenomenon that has provoked far less antipathy than the recently promulgated Muslim philosophy. What whites are finally realizing—and prematurely and erroneously linking with the Black Muslim Movement—is that the Negro stands very close to the use of overt violence in the struggle for freedom.

If such violence occurs it will be due in large part to the failure of the nonviolent movement to successfully organize the rapidly-growing militancy of Negroes. For it can now be said with some accuracy that in both the South and the North, William Stringfellow was right when he contended, at this year's National Conference on Religion and Race, that initiative in racial matters has passed from the hand of the white man to the hand of the Negro.

From a theological standpoint, the judgement—that the Negro will attain equality—has been rendered. The white man's only freedom lies in responding to that judgement, whether with dogs and fire hoses which further incite the Negro, or with repentance that may, or may not, alleviate the inevitable suffering involved in predestined social change.

Perhaps the Birmingham experience will finally enable the white man to acknowledge the fact that the Negro is as potentially sinful as the white man—in moments of honesty—knows himself to be.

A white Southern Christian points a way for the Church

A TIME FOR REPENTANCE

By WILL D. CAMPBELL

The question comes, what can we do? Although I insist that a more appropriate question is, "What can we be?" the question deserves treatment. But any treatment I give the question presupposes true renewal of church and synagogue in their inner life. Until we are able to proclaim categorically and with authority, "We are Jews and this is the way we behave in this household of God," and, "We are Christians and this is the way this family behaves because of what it is." Until we are able to say that—there is nothing we can do, for we are too much a part of the culture in which we live.

And I would say further that generally someone who has to ask doesn't really want to know. Often what we really mean is, "What can we do to improve race relations and still maintain the strength and rate of growth of the institution?" The answer to that question is, "Nothing!" For the cobblestones of a daring and radical and prophetic religion is the road to death. Furthermore, even if we ask the question in all sincerity with a well-defined and established inner life we must understand that the secular agencies and government are better prepared to do most of it than we are. We must understand that our actions must be based, not on what we may be able to accomplish, but on the basis of what we are, and on the basis of our very nature.

The first thing we can do is repent. There can be no reconciliation without repentance. And we are all involved. You don't have to own a cotton plantation in Sunflower County, Mississippi, to be involved. If you wear a cotton shirt you contribute to American racism, you are a part of the sin we are discussing.

Across the street from where I once had an office in an American city there was a house of prostitution—so they said. A small grocery located in the building was managed by a Negro lady. The establishment proper was owned by whites. We used to go there for take-out sandwiches when we had interracial gatherings and had to eat in the office.

On one such occasion when I went for the sandwiches, the manager of the grocery was not there and in her place was the white proprietress. When I inquired as to where Mrs. X was, the white lady began to weep and told me of the untimely death of Mrs. X the night before. And then in fits of tears she told me of her deep affection for Mrs. X. And it was apparent that her tears were not the patronizing tears of the Old South weeping for a passed-on Aunt Jemima or a departed Mammy. Here was genuine grief for a friend and peer.

This was in the era of the kneel-ins. And as I sought to console this proprietress of a house of prostitution, I could not help but feel the tragedy of a culture in which this woman would have been unwelcome in the respectable churches in the area, but was deeply mourned for in a bawdy house. No wonder a prophet whom most white council members and most neighborhood protective association members call Lord said to some of the "good" people of his day that those who sold their bodies for pay and those who cooperated with occupying forces for pay were closer to the Kingdom of which he spoke than they—"Truly I say to you, scalawags and whores enter the kingdom of God before you." Woe unto a generation when a human soul finds more acceptance and community in a whore house than in a church house!

Having repented what can a local congregation do—where can it go from there? Are we suggesting that the duty of the local congregation is to get together every weekend and say, "God is Supreme, let us pray"? Far from it.

Certainly high up on any list would be the area of housing. I am grateful that churches and religious groups have already pioneered in that field to some extent. Both the National Council of Churches and several denominational and religious groups have provided advisory services on a sustaining basis to local community organizations which have done such things as securing open occupancy pledges, gathering information and data on the private housing market, putting buyer in touch with seller and following up the situations in the capacity of counsellor as long as it is needed. These have been pilot projects.

Now with the recent Executive Order on housing there will be a ready made opportunity in every American town and city for local congregations to carry out such a program. Any one of the convening agencies of this conference is prepared to offer materials which would give you the information needed. Whereas the school desegregation crisis has affected but a few southern communities, the housing order has more far-reaching implications and will offer every church and synagogue a chance not only to be the conscience of the community but also an opportunity to involve itself in appropriate direct action. It takes no genius to predict that the housing order, if enforced and supported, will do far more to change the racial picture in America than did the Supreme Court decision on public school education of 1954.

A second dramatic and significant development among minority groups is the current emphasis on voter education and registration. In some states nearly half the population is disfranchised on the grounds of race alone. Such agencies as the NAACP, CORE, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee, and the Urban League are cooperating in voter education drives in a project administered by the Southern Regional Council. What more appropriate could a local congregation do than to sponsor one such drive itself working through its youth. It is disheartening to me that about the only time religion is mentioned in political circles is when the bigots inject it to discredit a candidate. Could it not become a major moral influence through such efforts as the one mentioned?

A number of previously all-white colleges and universities have now declared an open policy. But they are finding that no Negro students apply. Why could not a local congregation recruit and offer scholarships for students to attend these schools? Especially since most of the schools in that category are church related.

I would also mention a very interesting movement among some African Christians to send missionaries to America—not to preach racial tolerance, but to preach the gospel as they have understood it from other missionaries. If that movement develops the very act of their preaching to us, white America may be spared. Local congregations can ask for such help just as African congregations have requested it in the past. But it can't be done in the old patronizing manner of thinking there is something virtuous in seeing the cute and quaint African costumes on Sunday morning or during Brotherhood Week. Rather we must ask because we need the freshness

For the past seven years Will D. Campbell, an American Baptist minister and Episcopal Lay Reader in the Diocese of Tennessee, has served as Director of the Southern Office of the Department of Racial and Cultural Relations of the National Council of Churches. In that capacity he has observed at first hand every major racial crisis in the South. His duties have ranged from visiting and counseling with local pastors caught in racial crises to advising and administering special bi-racial committees appointed by city officials until they could employ their own director and personnel. He has lectured throughout the country to such diverse groups as national church bodies in annual session to Laymen's Conventions in deep southern states. His articles on race relations have appeared in more than a dozen journals.

Race and the Renewal of The Church, his only book, made a strong plea to the churches to channel their approach in race relations away from humanistic and humanitarian efforts to manipulate society to the more daring and radical demands of Christian theology.

Mr. Campbell recently resigned his position with the National Council over what he termed "basic theological and metholological differences existing within the department." His plans for the future are uncertain but he hopes "to remain in the South and preach the Gospel—the only hope for ending American racism."

Downtown Birmingham. As we go to press, the future of many large cities is in jeopardy, pending the peaceful solution of racial problems which are common to many areas of this country. More than ever, the time for constructive action is now.

of their preaching, because we need their witness and ministry for the health of our souls.

Once a congregation has discovered its real nature it no longer fears criticism or persecution and no longer needs to protect its institutional growth. It is then willing to be used up in the service of God and mankind. Thus it can then make use of the mass communications media to reach the community. Who, having a light, hides it under a bushel? Who? Why, churches and synagogues. When the going really gets rough if we venture out at all it is often after we have made sure the press won't be there and that no names will be named and no pictures made lest we ruin our effectiveness.

Now we aren't really worried about our effectiveness are we? We're worried about our institutional hides. So for the most part we have turned radio and T.V. over to the bigots and crackpots who hawk their wares of bigotry in the name of religion on every band and channel in the country. When we have finally declared that we are a people of God and are against discrimination and injustices of all kinds we are no longer afraid to shout it to the winds. And he that hath ears to hear let him hear.

Or a local congregation can do what one let its leaders do in Oxford, Mississippi, on what the natives call "the longest night." Their priests went out into the face of death and hell as a sort of two-man truth squad, relieving students of knives, shovels, bottles, bricks and other more advanced trinkets of pleasure. What happened on that night made me proud to be a Mississippian, for a few native sons, James Meredith one of them, Father Duncan Gray another, showed what it meant to be men of faith, and they are both products of Mississippi. Certainly I was ashamed of the chaff, but the grain stood out in a manner seldom witnessed in this century. And there is a subtle Oxford almost daily in the average American city.

What's the difference really if two people are killed by bullets or two people die because they are forced to a life of squalor and poverty and ghettos and lack of opportunity because of the color of their skin? What difference except social respectability and headlines and subtleties? And it happens every day. But how many cities have a James Meredith to challenge it and how many local congregations provide or would even tolerate a Duncan Gray or a Kilmer Myers to "light the dark streets" in support of the challenge? This is not a defensive effort to say Mississippi isn't so bad after all. It is rather an effort to say it is worse than its most severe critics say but that it isn't different from the rest of America—it is typical.

Take a neighborhood in Manhattan where 80% of the young people between 16 and 18 years old who have finished high school or have dropped out and are Negroes and who find it utterly impossible to find employment and turn to all forms of death and despair—drug addiction, alcoholism, illegitimate relations, crimes of various sorts. Thousands are dying daily and their lives of crime are retreats from society and they suffer the same kind of denial—the denial of fellowship and opportunity—that James Meredith suffers. Consider the increasing breakdown of relationships between white liberals and Negro youths in these areas and it is frightening. When a congregation has found renewal, has found itself, it will not only lend its minister and laity to such a ministry, it will literally push them into it. The well have no need of a physician.

Or again Sunday Schools can get their studies out of cinder block classrooms painted a pretty blue and often as far from the world God placed us in as Oral Roberts is from the Mayo Clinic and the laboratory of human life; the human world of various racial and ethnic groups. Where is the community that does not offer a local church a peace corps situation, a childern's camp to be built, a widow's house to be painted, a desecrated synagogue or a bombed church to be rebuilt? I would trade one weekend of such labor by an inter-racial group of young people who discuss with their leaders and experience with one another the dimensions of their faith, for a year's curriculum in the average Sunday School.

Well, I'm finished. We began by saying it is too late. It is never too late for faithfulness. In the process of our being faithful to the God we worship and seek to serve, society might be changed. But we must not be faithful in order to change society. And if there is to be any increase from the fruits of our labors, let God be the giver.

What of the North?

NEW HORIZONS, NEW HOPES

By RAYMOND M. HILLIARD

What is the common denominator of the poverty that afflicts millions of Americans in this space age? Take a hard look at the poor people who are huddled and hidden away in your own community. What will you find? You will find: illiteracy, ignorance, or an educational deficiency of some sort to be the oppressor which commits the poor person and his dependents to a sorry condition of dependency on public support and is keeping him there. True you will find some who are dependent because of illness but these will be a minority. The uneducated person who is not poor today will be poor tomorrow.

In yesteryear there were all kinds of jobs for the uneducated, good jobs with good pay, jobs with dignity, whose holders were respected citizens of all of our communities. In yesteryear there were countless young people who dropped out of school—far more than now—but there were plenty of useful, remunerative things they could do. Today the young people who drop out of school can find nothing to do; they face a whole lifetime of idleness which must lead inevitably to dependency, deterioration, despondency or delinquency. The people on relief today with all of their dependents are those who dropped out of school yesterday; the people on relief tomorrow will be those who are dropping out today.

This age of automation is awakening America to a recognition of the causal relationship between illiteracy and poverty. Three frightening additional phenomena are also emerging:

- That illiteracy is far more extensive than had been realized;
- That number of grades or years in school is not a safe measure of educational attainment;
- That, whereas ability to function at the fifth grade level has been the definition of functional literacy, that level has risen and is rising very rapidly as a standard or level of economic literacy—the level at which a person can secure and hold a job. Most employers have their doors shut tight against anyone without a high school diploma.

Here then is the major cause of today's poverty; here is the reason for high costs of relief. Punishing people for their poverty won't help, badgering them with investigations, violating their small rights of privacy, condemning them for alleged immorality, putting them in jail, calling them loafers, and idlers, and cheats and frauds, which few of them are, will avail nothing. Such escapist approaches, together with the quack remedies, such as high residence laws, arbitrarily cutting relief grants below an already irreducible minimum, stopping grants to children after a mother has an out-of-wedlock child, these also avail nothing except to hurt people already terribly hurt by deprivation. Citizens, officials and organizations who take refuge in the luxury of such primitive, punitive proposals are enemies of progress. For poverty is the real illness of our American society and he who stands in the way of its cure is indeed an enemy. A legislator in Illinois has said: "We want to make it uncomfortable for people on relief. The only way we are going to give any inducement to go out and find jobs and get off relief is to make it uncomfortable for them to live."

PROSPERITY BLINDS US

The fact that most of our people are prosperous—have never had it so good—tends for them to obscure the very existence of the poor hidden away in their wretchedness, their hopelessness and their despair. As Michael Harrington points out in his book, "The Other America, Poverty in the United States," the poor are becoming more and more invisible. They live in another world cut off from communication with the world we know and seeming to be without hope that things can ever be better.

Where, then, in this bleak scene are new horizons, new hopes?

The new hope is education, especially of adults, and especially of drop-out prone children. In Chicago, we have seen the new light of hope radiate from the faces of our welfare recipients. I wish you had been with me to attend a recent graduation of 211 adults from the eighth grade and had seen the face of each, beaming with pride, illuminated with hope, as he or she received an elementary school certificate.

I wish you could have been with me to see 25 men go off relief in a body, at a graduation exercise of a class where they had learned to become Yellow Taxi drivers. Five such classes have not been completed and many more will follow. Many of these men were able to qualify because they had been taught to read and to write in Chicago's basic literacy classes and, as a result, they could make out trip sheets, write receipts and reports and read street signs.

But, you will say, we have always had education and have recognized its value. Where is the new hope in education? The new hope is the recognition by society that education is now indispensable to independence. The new hope must also be a determination by society that all people get whatever education they need for as long as they need it to enable them to rise from their dependency on relief and get a job. It is this determination which underlies the action taken on March 14, 1962 when Chicago launched its massive attack on illiteracy. Where necessary, able-bodied people, now dependent on relief, are required to attend basic literacy and other classes to which they are assigned. They report as assigned, and do the work assigned or they forfeit their grants. The welfare department refers and the Chicago Board of Education educates. As our saying has it: We in welfare furnish the customers; the school people take it from there. Two great public agencies, welfare and the school system, have thus joined forces and pooled resources to attack a problem of mutual concern and the results so far have given us hope that now at long last we are using the proper instrument to attack the bed rock cause of poverty.

BUT WHERE ARE THE JOBS?

At this point many people ask: Suppose you succeed in educating and even training all of these people, where are the jobs? There are 6,000,000 unemployed in our land. Will the hopes of these people be dashed when, at the completion of their education or training, they find no jobs awaiting them? Here again, I think I see a new horizon, a new hope, if we but have the courage and the sense to reach for it and seize it. It is, as I hope you will agree, an attainable goal, one long overdue. It lies in an all out attack on the underemployment of Negro and other minority group people.

For a long time, there has existed in this country, a secondary, less discernible, form of discrimination, a habit, even among firms with non-discriminatory hiring policies, of always hiring the Negro for the lowest level job and then keeping him there or thereabouts, not permitting him to rise to his highest skill or his highest ability. In Chicago, I often wonder how many Negro college graduates are working sorting mail in our huge post office. There are few Negroes studying medicine, because hospital appointments for them are rare. Same for dentists, same for nurses, same for medical and hospital technicians, same for airline stewardesses. I know how few Negro executives, senior and junior, there are in Chicago because as I walk around our business district, the only Negroes I see are dressed in the garb of laborer or messenger, except for a sprinkling of Negro lawyers. Jobs as clerks, jobs in banks, even jobs in factories, or as waitresses are seldom open to Negro girls. Their life so far is confined principally to domestic service and, worst of all, day work. Negro secretaries still are rarities. Too few Negroes are used in the food service industry.

RACIAL BARRIERS

Here then, is the hope: that a significant, sizable number of jobs may be opened up by means of ending this form of underemployment.

There are all kinds of jobs going begging, not that the unemployed of today, the people on relief, can fit into them, but there are people already in the labor force or about to enter the labor force who can move up and fill the available upper echelon jobs.

- Negro young men can study medicine and reduce the shortage of doctors which is particularly acute in institutions which are now staffing with men from abroad. We have the material at home; let us develop it, not bar it. What is said of doctors is true of dentists.

Birmingham's A. G. Gaston Motel and the remnants of an adjoining trailer court following the bombing of May 11. Will the great cities of the North become the subjects of photographs such as this? Or will what Raymond Hilliard calls "the forces of enlightenment and righteousness" rise up with creative visions and strategies to eliminate the root of prejudice that stands at the base of virtually all urban problems?

- Negro girls can become nurses to fill the nurse shortage which the hospitals try to meet by recruiting nurses from the Philippines and from Ireland.
- Negro men and women, now in menial hospital jobs can, through attention, training, and removal of barriers, become technicians of the various kinds which are in such short supply.
- Attractive Negro girls can fill the airline stewardess positions for which the airlines are forever recruiting.
- Negroes in business and in industry, with the education they already have or the education they can get, can become executives if only the racial barrier is removed.
- Negro girls can clerk in department stores as was demonstrated to all Chicago by our Carson, Pirie, Scott and Company and its courageous pair of top executives, John Pirie and Virgil Martin.
- I despair of the banks, but maybe prayer and the good example of industry customers can persuade them to permit a Negro to be at least a teller.

Going along with all of these steps is another giant step that would not only facilitate employment but would also be the beginning of an almost automatic solution to the problem of segregation in schools and racial tensions between groups, and this giant step would be open occupancy. In Chicago, many of our businesses and our industries, large and small, have left the city and relocated in the suburbs. In every case they have left their Negro employees behind simply because their Negroes are unable to follow them. They are not allowed to live in the suburbs or in neighborhoods nearby. A simple change in suburban attitudes on race would save suburban tax dollar going for relief.

CONDEMNED FATHERS

Removing racial barriers and investing in education and training of the people deficient therein can also be the most significant and promising solution to the present problem of large numbers of people now relying on Aid to Dependent Children. The real cause of this dependency is the inadequacy of the typical Negro ADC father. He is condemned to this inadequacy, however, by being deprived of the qualification that is the number one requirement for a good American father. What is that requirement? The good American father must be a good provider and our typical ADC father with his shortage of skill, lack of education, and racial barriers to surmount can never be a good provider and his marital union, legal or otherwise, is doomed from the start. This principal cause of ADC and its attendant illegitimacy can be dealt with by seeing that this father is permitted to get a job, have the equipment in education and training to hold it, and earn a decent wage. He'll stay home and ADC will diminish.

These are just some examples to show that there is hope, that removal of racial barriers of discrimination against initial employment and against advancement in employment can open up countless jobs and give to the people who will move into them a higher horizon and to those who fill the vacated lower down jobs, a new hope. It can also offer hope to the taxpayer—hope of lightened taxes for relief.

But what is the hope that this attack on the underemployment of Negroes and others can be effective? The new hope, as I see it, is the recent entry into the ranks of those who have been trying to fight discrimination of a majestic, divinely-guided, new power whose force and whose strength can be greater than government, greater than any community or national organization, greater than any force that could take the field.

A MIGHTY ARMY

This new force was mobilized recently when all of the major religious groups of America came together in official assembly, set aside all doctrinal differences, and united to join their forces and their might in a great new crusade against a social and economic injustice which all have agreed and have declared to be an enemy and a sin in their sight and in the sight of God. The three major faiths, convened by their top leadership—the Synagogue Council of America, the National Council of Churches, and the National Catholic Welfare Conference —came last January to Chicago for an unprecedented historic meeting in which they declared their holy and unified purpose of putting an end to the evil of race discrimination in America. This was the National Conference on Religion and Race. In this, there is hope, a mighty army led by God.

The hope of wiping out poverty in Chicago and in America should not be blocked by any fear that it will cost a lot of money because it won't; the result is attainable at negligible cost. Take the year ahead in Chicago. We will spend in the neighborhood of $200,000,000 in relief grants and the amount will rise if poverty increases. To attack poverty in Chicago which is costing such great and needless sums in relief grants, would involve dealing with about 50,000 family heads, a group of manageable size, and preparing them through education chiefly for a transition from dependency into independence and the pride of self-support.

The education would cost (for 20,000 of the 50,000 this coming year)	$1,300,000
Abolition of discrimination in all hiring would cost	Nothing
Abolition of underemployment would cost	Nothing
Letting Negroes live where they wish would cost	Nothing
Open occupancy would cost	Nothing

The price is right; the time is right. If the forces of enlightenment and righteousness will take the field, there can be for the poor people of America a new life, new horizons, new hopes.

From his book, "The Fire Next Time":

A MESSAGE TO ALL AMERICANS

Behind what we think of as the Russian menace lies what we do not wish to face, and what white Americans do not face when they regard a Negro: reality—the fact that life is tragic. Life is tragic simply because the earth turns and the sun inexorably rises and sets, and one day, for each of us, the sun will go down for the last, last time. Perhaps the whole root of our trouble, the human trouble, is that we will sacrifice all the beauty of our lives, will imprison ourselves in totems, taboos, crosses, blood sacrifices, steeples, mosques, races, armies, flags, nations, in order to deny the fact of death, which is the only fact we have. It seems to me that one ought to rejoice in the fact of death—ought to decide, indeed to earn one's death by confronting with passion the conundrum of life. One is responsible to life: it is the small beacon in that terrifying darkness from which we come and to which we shall return. One must negotiate this passage as nobly as possible, for the sake of those who are coming after us. But white Americans do not believe in death, and this is why the darkness of my skin so intimidates them. And this is also why the presence of the Negro in this country can bring about its destruction. It is the responsibility of free men to trust and to celebrate what is constant—birth, struggle, and death are constant, and so is love, though we may not always think so—and to apprehend the nature of change, to be able and willing to change. I speak of change not on the surface, but in the depths—change in the sense of renewal. But renewal becomes impossible if one supposes things to be constant that are not—safety, for example, or money, or power. One clings then to chimeras, by which one can only be betrayed, and the entire hope—the entire possibility—of freedom disappears.

—JAMES BALDWIN

Epilogue

Perhaps there can be no epilogue. For it is patently obvious that we write these words in the midst of a revolution, a revolution perhaps even more justified in its intent than the American Revolution. If this be an epilogue, let it be an epilogue to the era during which white Christians were largely unwilling to accept the Negro as an equal. Let it be an epilogue to hypocrisy, to inaction, to rebellion against the clear call of God manifested in history.

The greatest tragedy confronting white Christians today is that the faltering steps toward the elimination of prejudice may be motivated by fear rather than by compassion. Indeed, it almost seems too late for the Church to be more than an onlooker as the wave of equality crashes on the beach of history. Before the Civil War the abolitionists were willing to suffer for their profound belief that slavery was evil. Many abolitionists were also Christians. But after the Civil War, when the Negro was technically freed, the very persons who advocated freedom began to retreat. Meeting the Negro "face to face" these white liberals of their day lost some of the fervor that they had had. The Negro was, after all, human. The effects of enslavement and torture made him unattractive, unfit—in the white man's view—for participation in "civilized society". The white emancipators backed off. The Negro became a victim first of paternalism, then ultimately of segregation and discrimination.

Years of segregation have left vast majorities of Negroes little more prepared for participation in what the white man arrogantly considers to be "civilized society", namely "white society" than they were a century ago when Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation. Perhaps this is the reason why the white liberals of our day seem to be on the retreat. It is one thing to love the Negro in the abstract, to weep for his sufferings in the comfort of a seemingly invulnerable security; it is another thing to accept the Negro as a brother, to live with him, to accept him personally, yes, even to criticize him in the way that one criticizes a good friend. There can be no greater betrayal of the Negro at this point in history than the failure to couple compassion with the immediate willingness to accept the Negro in person when he comes to your home, your church, your place of employment, your golf club.

We have reached the point when it is utter hypocrisy for white persons who call themselves Christian to justify themselves with the array of slogans that have become the stock and trade of persons who would avoid the real issue at stake: "I have some very good friends that are Negro" (meaning that only Negroes who please the white person, who measure up to the right sanitary standards, the acceptable educational level, are worthy of friendship). "I'm personally for integration, but I wouldn't want to offend my neighbors" (meaning that one is no more willing to accept integration than his neighbors, only more sophisticated in motivation). "Negroes have to earn their right to citizenship" (meaning that the white man shares no responsibility for the denial of citizenship).

We have reached the point in history when we must raise the question, "Will the Negro accept the white man?" before even considering the question of whether the white man will accept the Negro.

As the Negro gains his freedom—with or without white assistance—what can the Christian do? He can—with the Grace of God—throw away all of the rationalizations and preconceptions that have secured him against involvement in the struggle. He can—with the Grace of God—join forces with those who are working to bring peaceful change. He can—with the Grace of God—prepare himself to stand alone, willing to suffer for the sake of belief. In innumerable ways he can participate in the great change that is remaking the fabric of American society.

Finally he can accept the awesome judgment contained in the First Letter of John: "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: . . . for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

Extra copies of this issue of RENEWAL can be obtained in bulk mailings of 10 or more for ten cents per copy. We hope this issue will be useful in Church study programs as laymen seek to come to grips with the thorny problems of race relations in their own communities. Order from RENEWAL, Room 1302, 19 So. La Salle St., Chicago 3, Illinois.

RENEWAL's next issue will appear in September.

The expense of publishing and mailing RENEWAL has impelled us to ask churches receiving bulk mailings to pay a nominal fee for this service. A letter to this effect has been sent to recipients of bulk mailings. The fee for one year's bulk mailing is one dollar per year per issue ordered, half price for bulk orders in excess of 100.

TO OUR READERS:

The imperatives which led us to publish this issue prevented us from printing letters that have been piling up on our desk for months. We were also prevented from printing a glowing editorial of thanks to those readers who have voluntarily contributed more than $2000 to help cover printing and mailing costs of RENEWAL. In the brief space of this page, we'll try to respond to some of these items.

RENEWAL wishes to thank individual readers and also the William C. Whitney Foundation for its recent grant of $2500. Contributions from these two sources will enable us to cover publishing costs for 1963. We would also like to welcome new readers. Our present circulation numbers almost 14,000, more than twice what it was when we began publication as a magazine for laymen in September 1962.

If we could sum up the content of the letters on our desk, their message might be this: Protestant laymen are becoming more and more interested in seeking ways to increase the scope and depth of their faith. While acknowledging the need for "the church building", they seem anxious to seek new forms of discipleship. We received one letter from a minister indicating displeasure with Gordon Cosby's article in the April issue. In his article Cosby suggested that the church give up its present institutional structure. Our correspondent stated: "I guess I am just sick of hearing the attacks upon the Church which has all my life wrapped up in it." This conflict is symbolic of the era we are entering: an era of doubt, an era of exploration, possibly an era of renewal and reform.

The Rev. Julius Belser, minister of the West Side Christian Parish's Church of Hope in Chicago, writes: "In Illinois the poor pay proportionally higher taxes. The poor wash dishes, wash cars, pick the crops, do many strategic jobs on which we all count...The present proposal to put ceilings on public aid amounts smashes hardest the most needy--the large or most disadvantaged families...This is no solution, it can only increase the delinquency, school drop-out rate, etc. These families need more intensive care...There is a tremendous need for communication between the inner city and the outer city people in our society." Perhaps the only thing that will convince those in power that rehabilitation is a more sensible solution than revenge is the growth of an informed public willing to speak out on complex and often irrational issues. In this spirit, we join others in congratulating the Chicago Daily News and WBBM-TV for their recent work in publicizing the effects of slum life and for showing that there is only one way to eradicate slums: take the profit out of them.

Two important new programs are being developed by the Chicago City Missionary Society. Mr. James Twomey, an Episcopal layman and housing expert, has joined the CCMS staff to develop a Middle Income Housing Program under Society sponsorship. The Rev. William Cohea joined the Society staff on June 1. His job will include the inauguration of vocation-centered discussion groups within Chicago's business-industrial community. Full elaboration of both these programs and their implications will be presented in forthcoming issues of RENEWAL.

Pope John. He wanted no long obituary. He did want unity. He did want world peace. The era of Protestantism as a "religion unto itself" has past. One suspects that Pope John saw that the era of the Roman Catholic "religion unto itself" was drawing to a close. The new era, by God's grace, will take cognisance of these words of C. G. Jung: "Anyone who appreciates the legitimacy of the two viewpoints, of the two branches into which Christianity has been split, cannot maintain the exclusive validity of either of them, for to do so would be to deceive himself. As a Christian, he has to recognize that the Christendom he belongs to has been split for four hundred years and that his Christian beliefs, far from redeeming him, have exposed him to a conflict and a division that is still rending the body of Christ. These are the facts, and they cannot be abolished by each creed pressing for a decision in its favor, as though each were perfectly sure it possessed the absolute truth. Such an attitude is unfair to modern man; he can see very well the advantages that Protestantism has over Catholicism and vice versa, and it is painfully clear to him that this sectarian insistence is trying to corner him against his better judgement--in other words, tempting him to sin against the Holy Ghost." Let Christians--Protestant, Roman Catholic, Orthodox - accept the fact that if God wills Christian unity, unity will come. Let us be ready to accept the unity that He ordains.

RENEWAL is published monthly September through June by the Exploratory Program in Journalism of the Chicago City Missionary Society, a Protestant agency concerned with the renewal of the church in the metropolis, the Reverend Don Benedict, General Director. Protection of persons engaged in voter registration, and a felling of registration barriers against Negroes were reported priority goals of the Department of Justice today.

Attorney John Doar of the Department's Civil Rights section told the 20th Annual Race Relations Institute at Fisk University that the Justice Department plans increasing the staff of its Civil Rights section this fall, or earlier. The section now employs 20 lawyers, 22 persons in special research and 10 others to handle records. He outlined a number of cases the Department has handled or, is working on, involving use of the 1957 Civil Rights Laws, mostly in Mississippi.

The Department expects to bring before a three judge federal court by fall what it calls "The Big Suit Against the State of Mississippi". If successful the single case would wipe out racial discrimination by registration boards in that state.

In detailing cases, Mr. Doar cited several where federal action brought release from jail for Negroes arrested in connection with voter registration, principally in Mississippi. The Department has some of these cases pending.

Citizens have now a secured right to engage in voter registration, affirmed in U. S. vs. Wood, a case in which youthful John Hardy of Nashville, Tennessee. was beaten and jailed in Walthall County, Mississippi. He had accompanied two persons to the Walthall court house to get registration blanks. The breach of peace charges were dismissed by federal court order.

Passage of legislation such as Title III congress refused to put in the 1957 Civil Rights Laws would enable the Justice Department to extend its area of action where Negroes are denied the right to engage in non-civil rights activities, Mr. Doar said.

He outlined among deterrents to voting Negroes face in Mississippi, disallowance to pay poll taxes, threats and actual violence upon the person and property of Negroes seeking to register, arrests on "trumped" charges for engaging in voter registration. Along with legal action, the Justice Department is employing a"persuasion program" to enlighten recalcitrant officials on the enormity of racial discrimination in voting rights about them. He cited a case where the government paraded some 45 illiterate and near-illiterate whites, all of whom had been registered without difficulty, together with a larger number of Negroes in the same county whose economic standard and education was far superior to that of the white witnesses, but who had been denied voting rights.

Mr. Doar said the Department discovered that in several Mississippi counties hundreds of Negroes had been registered and voting prior to 1954 when the Supreme Court handed down its school desegregation decision. Since, he said, only a few have been issued registration certificates under revised election laws.

The youthful Justice Department aide lauded southern Negro youths as "the real heroes who are fighting the battles in the south" and who are shaping a new nation. They, he said, will have a big role "in our future as a nation. There's no question about this."

The nation's liberals, colored and white, were urged to "bridge gulfs and tear down walls" on the civil rights front by a Southern Regional Council official, Tuesday night.

Attorney Marion A. Wright, vice president of SRC, rallied liberals to participate in the "birth of a genuine partnership between white and Negro" which began with the sit-in efforts of four Negro college students at Greensboro, North Carolina in February of 1960 to the end, or near end, of segregation and racial discrimination. "We have moved towards the millenium of the South when those who could, took up the cudgel for those who couldn't eat at lunch counters," he said. "We now have a lasting, common fraternity between the races and we must never again go our respective ways."

Attorney Wright sees problems yet to be resolved. Among them: 1. development of strong civil liberties to implement civil rights gains; 2. and establishment of a world government to redress racial wrongs. "Clouds of fear still hang over the heads of many southerners, causing men to whisper their views rather than shout them from housetops", he said, adding: "civil rights will never be secured until civil liberties are secured."

Mr. Wright warned that, while segregation is on the way out, "southern political minds haven't changed an iota since the days of John C. Calhoun." He also warned against those who "would drive lines separating us" among forces already at work to negate gains. The SRC executive charged that history shows northern states ended discrimination only to re-establish it in more effective, subtle forms.

Segregated housing is the "root" of all other forms of racial discrimination, and is increasing rather than decreasing, the 20th Annual Race Relations Institute was told at Fisk University today.

John McDermott, Director of the Catholic Interracial Commission of Chicago, said residential segregation is the "most intimate" of segregation problems, and both north and south, especially in the suburbs of urban communities, is greater than ever before, increasing while segregation in other categories is being decreased. Southern communities, he said, are adopting housing segregation patterns of northern cities as a device for retaining segregated public schools.

Two federal housing officials, Albert Thompson of FHA and Hubert Jackson of PHA, both of The Atlanta Regional Housing Office detailed counter segregated housing federal programs by the Presidential Order of November 20, 1962. The Order (No. 11063) and other federal directives represent a "shift from support to opposing" residential segregation by the government, Mr. Thompson said.

"We won't get to the root of segregation until we do something about segregation in housing", McDermott said. He and the other speakers described residential segregation as being "accepted under agreements" among real estate agencies, developers and builders of housing, and lending agencies. Thompson outlined 12 sections of the executive order, which was one of five steps McDermott suggested as aides in resolving a "tough issue". They are:

1. Fair Housing Laws; 2. a New Presidential Order, implemented to be made effective; 3. increase in number of builders already practicing integration in developments, etc. 4. support of new Veterans Administration and FHA policies; and 5. increasing the number of Fair Housing Committee groups, which Mr. Thompson said number over 250.

PHA, established in 1937 to aid low-income families, has maintained an equal or proportional percentage of units in each area for minority groups, Mr. Jackson said; and adopted a policy aimed at eradication of residential segregation. New contracts of the agency, he said, definitively outlaw segregation, and housing projects are instructed to operate similarly to a plan adopted at Louisville, Kentucky following a 1957 NAACP suit. The "Louisville Plan", permits a family to exercise a choice for rental use of any one of the housing projects.

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING ADMINISTRATION'S CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

AS BACKGROUND FOR MEETING

HOTEL ROOSEVELT, JULY 2, 1963

This memorandum is intended to be of assistance to the groups meeting on July 2nd in considering what techniques to utilize and how best to work together to bring about the passage of the Administration's Civil Rights bill. The memorandum outlines the significant provisions of the bill and makes clear that what the President is asking from Congress is as moderate and restrained as it is necessary to the future of our country; it also sets forth some of the legislative problems in both the House of Representatives and the Senate and some of the immediate target areas for mobilization of opinion.

WHAT THE PRESIDENT'S CIVIL RIGHTS BILL CONTAINS

The President's civil rights program has been introduced in the House by Congressman Celler as H.R. 7152 and in the Senate by Senator Mansfield and 45 others as S. 1731. It is the most comprehensive civil rights bill ever to receive serious consideration from the Congress of the United States.

The "Civil Rights Act of 1963" contains eight titles relating to voting rights, public accommodations, school desegregation, Community Relations Service, Civil Rights Commission, non-discrimination in Federal programs, Commission on Equal Employment Opportunity, and miscellaneous provisions.

TITLE I -- Voting Rights

The first title relates to voting rights. It repeats, without substantial change, the Administration's voting bill sent to Congress in February of this year. It would:

(1) Prohibit the application of any standard, practice or procedure in determining qualifications to vote in any Federal election different from those applied to individuals similarly situated who have been found qualified to vote by State officials.

(2) Prohibit denial of the right to vote in Federal elections because of immaterial errors or omissions in registration applications or other acts requisite to voting.

(3) Require literacy tests given in connection with registration to vote in Federal elections to be in writing or transcribed.

(4) Establish sixth-grade education as a presumption of literacy in connection with any test given to qualify to vote in a Federal election.

(5) Amend the 1960 Civil Rights Act to provide that, when less than 15 per cent of potential colored voters are registered in the area, the court shall issue orders entitling qualified Negro applicants to vote and may appoint temporary referees to take applications for registration pursuant to its order.

(6) Provide for expeditious handling of voting cases in which the United States is plaintiff.

These voting provisions constitute improvements in the operations of the 1957 and 1960 Civil Rights Acts. But it is readily apparent that they are both moderate and limited and wholly within the spirit of the 1957 and 1960 Acts. Indeed, the first four provisions noted above apply only to Federal elections, although there would appear to be constitutional authority to apply them to state elections as well.

The first two provisions, although primarily declaratory of existing constitutional and statutory requirements, will help persuade some reluctant judges by making the constitutional requirements clear.

The requirement that literacy tests be in writing or transcribed would make proof of discrimination simpler in many instances.

The provisions relating to a presumption of literacy based on a sixth grade education would make arbitrary denials by state officials more difficult and, when any arbitrary denials are challenged in court, this provision would take effect and create a presumption of literacy in favor of the person applying to register.

The provision for court orders entitling qualified Negro applicants to vote when the complaint alleges that fewer than 15 per cent of the Negroes of voting age in the area involved are registered to vote, makes possible meaningful interim relief during the customary lengthy litigation period. And the provision for temporary voting referees, despite the failure to date of the referee provisions of existing law, may nevertheless help persuade some judges to move ahead on this front.

The provision for expediting voting cases brought by the United States cannot make hostile judges act quickly, but it can be useful in some situations and will expose those judges who deliberately slow down judicial proceedings in voting cases.

There are stronger proposals in the voting field than those contained in the Administration bill. One of these, for example, is the Federal registrar system proposed by the Civil Rights Commission in 1959 and rejected by the Congress in the 1950 legislative battle. Administrative action of this character can provide mass enfranchisement which the court-centered programs never can accomplish. Yet every legislative advance cannot be obtained at once and the Administration proposals outlined herein will reenforce the 1957 and 1960 laws and give the Department of Justice additional tools in this important area.

TITLE II -- Public Accommodations

This is the most important title in the Administration bill. It would establish the right to service free from discrimination in places of public accommodation and business establishments. Included would be (i) any hotel, motel, or other public place furnishing lodging to transient guests from other states or traveling in interstate commerce, (ii) any motion picture house, theater, sports arena, stadium, exhibition hall or other public place of amusement customarily presenting entertainment which moves in interstate commerce, (iii) any retail shop, department store, market, drugstore, gasoline station, restaurant, lunchroom, lunch counter, soda fountain, or other public eating places, if goods and services are provided substantially to interstate travelers, or goods held out to the public have moved in interstate commerce, or the activities or operations substantially affect interstate commerce.

Those refused service would have the right to sue for preventive relief. In addition, the Attorney General could enter suit on receipt of a written complaint, if the complainant is unable to bring suit because of financial reasons or fear of reprisals. If successful, a complainant would be entitled to reasonable attorney's fees.

Before filing suit, the Attorney General would be required to refer the complaint to the Community Relations Service provided under Title IV of the bill and to any appropriate state agency with authority to prohibit the discriminatory practice.

The bill relies on both the Fourteenth Amendment and the interstate commerce clause for its constitutional base, although the Attorney General in his June 26th testimony before the House Judiciary Committee relied almost exclusively on the interstate commerce power. Some Republicans prefer the Fourteenth Amendment route and it would probably be well to urge that the bill continue to be predicated on both constitutional bases. Added emphasis on the Fourteenth Amendment would also obviate the necessity of drawing lines between interstate and local facilities as does the Administration bill.

The President has acted decisively in meeting the problem of discrimination in places of public accommodation and this provision is certainly the most significant provision of the Administration's civil rights package. By the same token, it will inevitably engender the most opposition in Congress and the most efforts to compromise it.

One such compromise proposal is already being discussed — namely, a limitation on the size of the establishment covered by the provision. It is true that a small rooming house in which the owner resides, the so-called "Mrs. Murphy rooming-house", retains many of the characteristics of a home and there may there be some reason for protecting the right of privacy of the home-owner. But there is no privacy in a store or restaurant or entertainment facility open to the public and, all such facilities, large or small, should be covered by the bill.

Even more dangerous - far more dangerous - is the compromise being suggested in some quarters to take the enforcement provisions out of the bill and leave it as entirely voluntary through conciliation. But conciliation is only valuable if there is ultimate enforcement behind it and anything that deprives the Administration package of an enforceable public accommodations title would be a tragic defeat for civil rights. What happens on the effort to take the enforcement provisions out of the public accommodations title will be a measure of success or failure for the Administration's bill.

TITLE III — School Desegregation

Under this title, technical assistance, grants and loans would be made available to school boards to meet problems arising out of school desegregation or the adjustment of racial imbalance in schools.

The more important part of this title authorized the Attorney General to institute civil actions for school desegregation upon receipt of complaints and a determination that the complainants are unable to institute legal proceedings.

As the Attorney General made clear in his testimony on June 26th, this title "would thus combine a program of aid to segregated school systems, which are attempting in good faith to meet the demands of the Constitution, with a program of effective legal action by the federal government . . .these programs would smooth the path upon which the Nation was set by the Brown decision. The school desegregation title is second only to the public accommodations title in furthering civil rights in America.

As in connection with the voting provisions of Title I, the moderate and limited nature of the President's proposals on school desegregation should be noted. The school desegregation provisions contain no requirement that school districts begin compliance with the Supreme Court's decision in 1963 as was promised by the Democratic Platform and as is contained in S. 772 and H.R. 1766, the so-called Clark-Celler bills. Furthermore, the Attorney General is limited in the Administration's bill to bringing suits only where complainants are unable to institute legal proceedings, a restriction on his freedom in school desegregation cases which was not included in the 1957 grant of authority to act in voting cases. Finally, it should be noted that there is no provision in this title or elsewhere in the bill for an across-the-board Part III authorizing the Attorney General to bring suit, not only in school cases, but in all situations where persons are denied their constitutional rights because of race, color, religion, or national origin. Such a provision (which could be offered as an emendment to the President's bill) would not only reach hospitals, libraries, parks and other recreational facilities, public buildings, etc., not covered by the Administration's bill, but would also give the Attorney General power to enjoin state interference with peaceful protests as in Birmingham and elsewhere. But moderate and limited as Title III is, it is a major step in the direction of integrated schooling and a vital and necessary part of any civil rights package.

TITLE IV — Community Relations Service

A new agency, Community Relations Service, would be established under this title of the bill. Its purpose would be to help resolve problems arising from discriminatory practices by bringing together the people of influence in both races.

Such an agency would serve a useful function if the bill as finally enacted provides strong protection for the constitutional rights of minority group citizens. It could in no way be considered as a substitute for enforcement authority. As a complement to enforcement authority, it should have real value.

TITLE V — Civil Rights Commission

Title V would extend the life of the Commission on Civil Rights for four years and authorize it to serve as a national clearing house to provide information, advice, and technical assistance to private and public agencies.

Because of its fine record, the Commission is deserving of support for extension and additional grant of authority. It could be hoped, however, that the agency could be made permanent in order to free it of the necessity of constantly revising its plans and to give it the stability it needs to conduct a continuing operation.

TITLE VI — Withholding of Federal Funds

This title would authorize withholding of Federal funds from any program or activity that receives Federal assistance, directly or indirectly, by way of grant, contract, loan, insurance, guaranty, or otherwise, when discrimination is found in such a program or activity.

Again the moderate nature of the President's civil rights bill is evidenced by this provision. Many persons believe that the President already has the authority to withhold federal funds from any program or activity in which unconstitutional discrimination is found. (Nevertheless the President has asked for this authority from Congress, apparently to buttress with Congressional approval what he desires to do in this area.) While the President would probably be in a position to act on his own initiative, this provision would add Congressional support for his action and should have the full support of all the groups. Federal funds contributed by all the people should never be utilized in a way that discriminates against some of the people who contribute those funds.

TITLE VII — Equal Employment Opportunity

Under this title, the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity would be reestablished as a Commission and given statutory authority under which to operate.

The authority proposed should be granted. The present Committee is handicapped by limited funds and manpower. It is also apparent that it is reluctant to exercise its full authority because of fear of Congressional reprisals. A Congressional grant of authority with subsequent financial support could considerably strengthen the agency in fulfilling its mission.

The enactment of this provision is not, however, a substitute for national FEPC. Such a law with strong enforcement procedures, as promised in the 1960 Democratic platform, is one of the most necessary legislative requirements. Several bills establishing an FEPC are pending in Congress. The adoption of one of these as an amendment to the Administration's civil rights bill should be strongly supported and the President's message to Congress gives his stamp of approval to this effort.

TITLE VIII — Miscellaneous

The last title authorizes necessary appropriations and provides a separability clause in the event any provision of the bill is held invalid.

* * * * * * *

As we have seen, the President's bill is wholly necessary if freedom and equality are to win out in America. It is a strong and a good bill. Yet, as we have also seen, it is far from an extreme or all-encompassing measure. There is no room for compromise or weakening. The task of the groups who are meeting and mobilizing is to see that neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate weaken this vital measure.

B.

OBTAINING PASSAGE BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

OF THE ADMINISTRATION BILL, H.R. 7152

The object of the pro-civil-rights organizations should be to obtain the passage through the House of Representatives of a bill at least as strong as H.R. 7152, and, if at all possible, a stronger bill. The stronger the bill that comes out of the House, the less the damage from any dilution by the Senate. Certainly every effort must be made to safeguard against any weakening of the Administration's bill in the House.

This will not be easy. Most of the public attention has been focused on the Senate because of the drama involved in a filibuster in that body. But there are many pitfalls in the House as well.

H.R. 7152 is presently before the House Judiciary Committee. The Attorney General testified in support of the Administration bill on June 26th and hearings will likely go on through July. Consideration should be given to having the strongest possible testimony presented to the House Judiciary Committee without unduly delaying the Committee's action reporting out the bill. Possibly some of the organizations will want to combine their testimony. Thus, for example, if the three religious faiths were to present joint testimony (for the administration's bill and possibly for strengthening amendments) this would have a real impact upon the Committee.

The first focal point of pressure must be upon the members of the House Judiciary Committee:

Democrats	Republicans
Emanuel Celler, New York	William M. McCulloch, Ohio
Michael A. Feighan, Ohio	William E. Miller, New York
Frank Chelf, Kentucky	Richard H. Poff, Virginia
Edwin E. Willis, Louisiana	William C. Cramer, Florida
Peter W. Rodino, Jr., New Jersey	Arch A. Moore, Jr., West Virginia
E.L. Forrester, Georgia	George Meader, Michigan
Byron G. Rogers, Colorado	John V. Lindsay, New York
Harold D. Donohue, Massachusetts	William T. Cahill, New Jersey
Jack Brooks, Texas	Garner E. Shriver, Kansas
William M. Tuck, Virginia	Clark MacGregor, Minnesota
Robert T. Ashmore, South Carolina	Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., Maryland
John Dowdy, Texas	James E. Bromwell, Iowa
Basil L. Whitener, North Carolina	Carleton J. King, New York
Roland V. Libonati, Illinois	Pat Minor Martin, California
Herman Toll, Pennsylvania
Robert W. Kastenmeier, Wisconsin
Jacob H. Gilbert, New York
James C. Corman, California
William L. St. Onge, Connecticut
George F. Senner, Jr., Arizona

Concentration should be had on the Republicans (other than Lindsay who is extremely pro-civil-rights), as most of the non-Southern-Democrats will probably support the Administration's bill. All should be urged to support H.R. 7152 in full and to substitute an across-the-board Part III for the limited school-desegregation Part III in the bill.

Assuming that the Administration bill, as is or as strengthened, comes out of the House Judiciary Committee, the next major problem will be the Rules Committee. It is likely that Chairman Howard Smith will try to avoid Committee meetings and thereby stall a rule on the bill. There is, however, a procedure for forcing a Committee meeting which requires the support of 8 members of the 15-member Rules Committee. There are only 5 certain supporters for such action (Madden, Delaney, Bolling, O'Neil and Sisk, all Northern Democrats). The other 5 Democrats are Southerners and it will therefore be necessary to get the support of 3 of the 5 Republicans on the Rules Committee for this maneuver. The 5 Republicans on the Rules Committee are Brown of Ohio, St. George of New York, Smith of California, Hoffman of Illinois and Avery of Kansas. Although this matter will not be before the Rules Committee until August, efforts to build support for H.R. 7152 and for a rule to bring it to the floor in the Districts of those five Congressmen should be undertaken immediately. Obtaining the support of the Republicans on the Rules Committee will not only make it impossible for Chairman Smith to stall interminably by avoiding meetings, but will also assure the necessary votes for the rule once the meeting is held.

Of course, there are alternative ways around the Rules Committee. One is a discharge petition of 218 signatures. The other is what is known as calendar Wednesday. But both of these procedures are difficult and time-consuming and a real mobilization of sentiment upon the 5 Republican members of the Rules Committee can render them unnecessary.

Sometime in late August or more likely in September, the bill should reach the floor of the House. If the bill at that time is as strong as we hope it will be, the job will be one of defeating weakening amendments. If the bill is weaker than the present Administration bill, the job will be one of strengthening it. Unfortunately, strengthening amendments are subject to a strict germaneness rule, but this is a bridge which need not be crossed at this time.

The job of the organizations when the bill reaches the floor of the House will be to bring maximum pressure on 50 or 60 possible but not certain votes. There are about 150 Democratic votes from outside the South that can be counted on for the Administration's bill. There are some 10 to 20 Republican votes that can be counted on. The winning votes will have to come from approximately 10 questionable non-Southern Democrats and 40 or 50 Republican moderates. At an early date, these possible but uncertain votes must be identified and mobilization of opinion pinpointed upon their Congressional districts.

C.

OBTAINING PASSAGE BY THE SENATE OF THE

ADMINISTRATION BILL, S. 1731

It can be estimated that the House bill will most likely come to the Senate in September. But that by no means indicates that there is nothing that should be done in relation to the Senate at this time.

Only 46 Senators (37 Democrats and 9 Republicans) have signed the Administration bill, S. 1731. An immediate task is to get non-Southern Democrats and moderate Republicans to sign the bill, so that there is a very clear and definite majority committed to the President's package. The non-Southern Democrats (and liberal Southerners) who have not signed are Anderson, Bartlett, Bible, Cannon, Edmondson, Gore, Hayden, Kefauver, Lausche, Monroney and Yarborough. The moderate Republicans who have not signed are Aiken, Allott, Boggs, Carlson, Miller, Morton, Prouty, Saltonstall and Smith. By immediate concentration on these Senators, it should be possible to get a majority of the total Senate in support of the bill at once. (On the technical question of how a Senator puts his name on a bill which has already been introduced, it is suggested that he ask Senator Mansfield to request unanimous consent that such Senator's name appear as a sponsor on the next printing of the bill).

The hearing situation in the Senate is more complicated than in the House where the Administration bill will undoubtedly be reported out in some form or other by the House Judiciary Committee. In the Senate, the normal Committee to handle this bill is also the Judiciary Committee, but because of its Chairman and its composition, the Senate Judiciary Committee is unlikely to report out a bill. Despite the unlikelihood of reporting out a bill, it is probable that the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee will hold hearings on the Administration bill. A strong record should be built by the organizations in support of the Administration's bill and strengthening amendments, as Senator Ervin, Chairman of the Subcommittee, will be using his remarkable talents to build a negative record.

Since the Senate Judiciary Committee has always been a roadblock to civil rights legislation, the Senate Commerce Committee, which has the public accommodations provisions of the Administration package before it, is holding hearings on those provisions (S. 1732). Certainly the pro-civil rights groups will want to testify and build a strong record in support of the public accommodations bill. It is important that as strong and favorable a report on this bill be made to the Senate as early as possible. The Senate Commerce Committee consists of the following:

Democrats	Republicans
Warren G. Magnuson, Washington	Norris Cotton, New Hampshire
John O. Pastore, Rhode Island	Thruston B. Morton, Kentucky
A.S. Mike Monroney, Oklahoma	Hugh Scott, Pennsylvania
Strom Thurmond, South Carolina	Winston L. Prouty, Vermont
Frank J. Lausche, Ohio	J. Glenn Beall, Maryland
Ralph W. Yarborough, Texas
Clair Engle, California
E.L. Bartlett, Alaska
Vance Hartke, Indiana
Gale W. McGee, Wyoming
Philip A. Hart, Michigan
Howard W. Cannon, Nevada

Of these, Magnuson, Pastore, Engle, Hartke, McGee, Hart, Scott and Beall have already supported public accommodations by sponsoring S. 1731 and S. 1732. The remainder, other than Thurmond, should be urged to give S. 1732 their full support.

Senate hearings will also be held on FEPC legislation (S. 773) by Senator Clark, a subcommittee of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee. The groups will want to support this legislation with testimony and demonstrate strong support for strengthening the Administration's package with an FEPC amendment.

It is not clear yet what the strategy will be when the Administration bill comes over from the House to the Senate. The normal procedure would be for the House bill to go to the Senate Judiciary Committee, but this would likely be sending it to almost certain death. One possible alternative would be to stop the bill at the desk, as was done in 1957, and not refer it to the Senate Judiciary Committee at all. Another alternative would be to refer the House bill to the Judiciary Committee with instructions to report it to the Senate within a week or two weeks. Still another possible alternative would be for the Senate to take up the bill on public accommodations from the Senate Commerce Committee (S. 1732) and amend it with the additional provisions of the House bill; by changing the number of the House bill, it could then go to conference with the House bill. There are undoubtedly other possibilities as well, but this bridge need not be crossed at this time.

What should be understood at this time is that in one form or another the Southerners will try to water down the bill. They can filibuster against taking up the bill and they can filibuster against the bill itself. The filibuster against taking up the bill will be more difficult for the Southerners because they can only speak twice on a bill or motion and their time will run out. The filibuster against the bill is easier because they can speak twice not only on the bill but on all amendments. The answer to this, of course, is to table the amendments as fast as they come up. It is, therefore, important that at some stage we obtain the pledge of 51 Senators to round-the-clock sessions of the Senate and to the tabling of all amendments.

This discussion of the Senate situation is based on the assumption that cloture (2/3rds of those present and voting) will not be obtained. It is hoped that this assumption is incorrect and that cloture may be obtained. Sometime in September or October, it will be the role of the organizations to seek to obtain the 10 or 15 doubtful votes needed for cloture. If this can be done, round-the-clock sessions will not be necessary. If it cannot, however, round-the-clock sessions will be necessary and 51 determined Senators can break the filibuster.

The Administration wants no compromise; it is in this fight for its own bill for all it is worth. If the groups do their job of mobilization, there can be a total victory for the Administration bill. This is the year it can be done — and must be done.

UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST
FISK UNIVERSITY
NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE

July 3, 1963

Approximately 10 percent of the nation's Negro workers are unemployed against two percent of the white workers out of work. The higher incidence of Negro unemployment is explained in racial discrimination by employers and, an inadequate background of training of Negroes. The federal government is working on both factors.

This was the gist of what Hobart Taylor, Jr., executive vice chairman of the President's Committee On Equal Employment Opportunity, told the 20th Annual Race Relations Institute at Fisk University today.

COEEO, or the President's Committee, was created by President Roosevelt's executive order 8802 in 1941, primarily to harness the nation's labor resources in support of World War II; it handled complaints of industry and business denying jobs to Negroes on a race and color basis.

Presidents Truman and Eisenhower continued the agency with executive orders of their own. However, the agency had no power to force an industry or firm found discriminating to quit doing so.

President Kennedy retained COEEO in Executive Order 10925 in 1961, but vested it with power, then and subsequently, to deal with discrimination in employment differently than had been the case with his predecessors. For one thing, the agency assessed changes brought on by automation, technology, degree of training, effects of residential segregation, etc. Secondly, it was given power to recommend cancellation of contracts of firms doing business under government contractual involvement, or "black list" firms who fail to drop employment discrimination.

Mr. Taylor reports that the agency has not cancelled a single contract since the Kennedy order. Firms that have been ordered to comply with non-discriminatory provisions of their contracts, they have done so.

Mr. Taylor said that before COEEO's present program was effected Negroes represented about 3.8 percent of the employed. A check of 44,000 newly employed persons showed 11,000 or 25 percent of them colored. The agency has handled about 4,000 cases involving discrimination charges during its first two years, half of which involved the federal government; the remainder involved non-government firms. It achieved 70 percent success in the federal area and 40 percent with non-government.

The agency official estimated it may take the next 100 years to work out of economic, educational and sociological drawbacks of the Negro worker and place him on par with white qualification and preparation; industry and labor unions are both enlisted to help train and use Negro workers. One hundred unions signed anti-discriminatory pledges last year, Taylor said, and are being urged to live up to promises.

Taylor saw jobs for Negroes as the major objective of the current Negro drive and "an important part of the answer" to the race problem. The question "certainly is not who wants to associate with whom", he said. "Negroes realize they are on the shortend of the stick and don't want to live any more like they have had to."

He urged individual responsibility as aiding solution and: 1. young people should remain in school; 2. technical training for Negroes; 3. use of the older citizen; and, 4. understanding, "which is the true basis of our efforts - developing individual Americans."

A CALL FOR RACIAL JUSTICE NOW

Adopted by the General Synod of the United Church of Christ, July 5, 1963

WHEREAS, the racial crisis in this summer of 1963 is a sign of God's action in the history of the United States, the Church must now become radically committed at particular times and places to the struggle of our fellowman:

TO GET the best job for which he is qualified and not be told to "come back later;"
TO WORK at the top jobs and not just those in the lowest-paid categories;
TO ESTABLISH fair employment practices in Federal law and in all other levels of government, since discrimination in employment robs a man of daily bread for himself and his family;
TO EXPOSE the cant and hypocrisy which keep him down even among those supposed to be his friends, whether they be churches, labor unions, management or political organizations;
TO LIVE where he pleases without paying the double-standard dollar;
TO GET the best schooling possible even if desegregation upsets educational traditions;
TO GAIN acceptance as a person of worth who may marry whomever he loves and whoever loves him;
TO SECURE public accommodations freely and without insult;
TO EXERCISE his God-given rights to protest injustice without suffering the intolerable penalties that we regularly read of in the newspapers;
TO GAIN a larger share in the ownership and use of capital;
TO RECEIVE equal protection under the law and equal justice in the courts;
TO OBTAIN crash programs of special assistance in such critical areas as health, education, welfare, citizenship, housing, and employment to enable victims of racial discrimination to achieve equality-in-fact;
TO PUSH for all that is due here and now without heeding those who counsel patience, moderation, and gradualism;
TO REGISTER, VOTE, AND RUN FOR OFFICE without fear of retaliation, either overt or subtle;

THEREFORE, the General Synod, in session in Denver, Colorado, seeking to bring the light of the Christian gospel to bear on the present crisis in race relations confronting our country and the world, and thankfully recalling the long established positions of the Congregational Christian Churches and the Evangelical and Reformed Church and now the United Church of Christ in the field of relations between the races, on July 5, 1963 takes the following actions:

A. The General Synod calls upon the members of the United Church of Christ to uproot intolerance, bigotry, and prejudice within our own lives and to replace them with good will and the determination to strike down immediately the barriers which divide men on account of race. The General Synod calls upon all members to make it plain to all the people with whom we live and work that the Church and the members thereof stand for brotherhood.

B. The General Synod believes that the United Church of Christ must free itself of segregation.

1. To this end, and understanding that the decision must be made for itself by each local congregation, the General Synod urges the churches to declare officially and publicly that their fellowship is open to all who qualify for membership without any restrictions as to race, class, or ethnic background The General Synod also urges the churches to declare officially and publicly a policy of calling pastors and employing church staff members without any restrictions as to race, class or ethnic background. When these actions are taken, the General Synod asks that a report be made to the Secretary of the Church.

2. The General Synod urges the conferences and the associations of the United Church of Christ to become fully integrated "with utmost dispatch."

3. The General Synod promises to utilize to the full the contribution that its Negro members and other racial and minority groups can make to the life and work of the United Church, giving these persons their share of leadership opportunities and responsibilities.

4. The General Synod calls upon institutions related to the Church to desegregate forthwith.

C. The General Synod proposes to mobilize the manpower and means of the Church for racial justice.

1. To this end, the General Synod requests the President of the Church, after consultation, to appoint a committee consisting of eleven non-national-staff persons, including in its membership both white and Negro persons who are trusted throughout the Church and have competence in the field of race relations. The life of this Committee shall extend until the next meeting of the General Synod.

2. The General Synod votes to give to that committee the power to decide how the resources of the Church contributed for this purpose will be used in the effort to secure racial equality and social justice both at home and abroad.

3. The General Synod accepts the offer of the Council for Christian Social Action and the Division of Church Extension of the Board for Homeland Ministries to provide the services of Dr. S. Garry Oniki; approves Dr. Oniki's appointment as executive coordinator of this effort; and suggests that the work and program of this committee normally be implemented by committing it to one of the existing agencies so that money can be conserved for actual program needs. In other cases, the committee would be authorized to borrow on a temporary basis experienced staff from the instrumentalities.

4. The program which this committee shall project could include but need not be limited to:

a. Mobilizing the whole membership of the Church, to join where possible with our Protestant, Roman Catholic and Jewish brethren, on a community basis, to meet the need of the situation on the local level;

b. Providing bail bonds for those who are arrested as they demand social justice;

c. Providing legal defense for such persons;

d. Providing economic aid to persons who lose their jobs because of their participation in activities in behalf of racial equality;

e. Providing financial aid for institutions whose support is threatened by those who oppose an "open policy" of service;

f. Mobilizing the United Church of Christ, its individual members, congregations, associations and conferences to press for the adoption of legislation to guarantee civil rights;

g. Supporting and commending those church members who successfully begin the integration of their own immediate neighborhoods;

h. Extending the program of voter registration;

i. Urging Christians to give all possible assistance to small businesses in making the transition to nonsegregation;

j. Providing other emergency or long-term help, the need for which only the future will reveal.

(NOTE: All this work, where at all possible, shall be undertaken in cooperation with the National Council of Churches, state and local councils of churches, the National Conference on Religion and Race, and other interreligious and community groups.)

D.

1. The General Synod challenges the people of the United Church of Christ to bring an emergency special offering of funds to cover the cost of this program. The General Synod votes that the first of these offerings will be received this fall. The setting of the date for the second offering is left to the Executive Council.

2. The General Synod commits the responsibility for raising these funds to each congregation and to each member of the Church, under the direction of the Stewardship Council.

3. The General Synod also authorizes the officers of the Church to borrow against these offerings to be received to the extent of $100,000 in order to begin the work immediately.

4. The General Synod votes to receive an offering at the coming Sunday night ecumenical service here at General Synod as the beginning of this fund, and suggests that congregations and individuals that wish to add to this fund before next fall will be able to do this by sending their contributions to the Treasurer of the United Church of Christ, 297 Park Avenue South, New York, New York (10010).

E. The General Synod calls upon the members of the United Church of Christ to pray that justice and good will shall prevail and then to work in order to make the fulfillment of that prayer possible.

Other Actions on Race Relations

Adopted by the General Synod of the United Church of Christ, July 10, 1963

A RESOLUTION ON FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES AND CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

The Fourth General Synod urges all instrumentalities, conferences, associations, churches and church-related institutions:

1. To review their current employment policies in respect to the calling of ministers, the employment of professional personnel and other staff, and to take affirmative steps to implement fair employment practices;

2. To further fair employment practices by including nondiscriminating provisions in all contracts and agreements;

3. To purchase services from and, in the investment of funds, to give preference to those firms which follow fair employment practices;

4. To advocate, demonstrate and involve themselves in support of the principles of the proposed Civil Rights Act of 1963 and the legislation providing for federal fair employment practices and to urge their Senators and Representatives to support such legislation on a nonpartisan basis in this session of Congress.

The Fourth General Synod approves the authorization of a committee by the Executive Council to evaluate the policies and practices in the United Church of Christ in respect to fair employment, to initiate procedures for prompt and effective achievement of fair employment policies and practices, to give attention to:

a. location of specific job opportunities,
b. use of personnel records with the churches,
c. special emphasis on locating qualified persons regardless of race in recruitment of personnel,
d. initiation of in-service training for purposes of promotion,
e. discovery of potential existing leadership,
f. development and training of leadership,
g. promotion and upgrading of personnel on the basis of ability, and
h. transmittal of information about nondiscriminatory practices and procedures to agencies used for recruitment of personnel, and expects the committee to report periodically to the Executive Council of the General Synod.

The Fourth General Synod instructs the Council for Christian Social Action to present testimony in support of Civil Rights and fair employment practices legislation before committees of Congress.

POLICY OF FINANCIAL SUPPORT

General Synod declares its policy to be to contribute funds only to institutions and churches which as of July 1, 1964, have a policy of openness without respect to race, national background or ethnic origin, and further urges the instrumentalities, conferences and churches to adopt and pursue such a policy in respect to contributions.

LOCAL STUDY AND ACTION

General Synod urges ministers and local churches to study the findings of the National Conference on Religion and Race and to cooperate in interfaith action on race in their communities.

racial justice now

THE UNMISTAKABLE CRISIS

THE MOUNTING TIDE of vigorous actions to secure full civil rights for all American citizens has at long last moved into the center of this nation's attention and has precipitated an unmistakable crisis.

The crisis must be seen as involving not only fundamental concepts of freedom, justice and compassion for our fellowmen, but also obedience of the Church to its Lord.

The Church of Christ can make no compromise with discrimination against or segregation of peoples on the basis of race, and still be faithful to her Master. God came to dwell among men in the person of a man. He died and rose again for every man.

It must be said that while many Christians have worked hard in this cause, the Church has not been free from sin in this serious issue.

Up to now there always has seemed to be time for gradual change. But now, in the providence of God, the issue is sharply focussed. The basic issue is unchanged but has become more obvious.

As the demands for equal treatment take shape in almost every city, the entire nation faces the threat of violence and a developing mood of frustration.

There is a growing consensus that the next months may be a decisive period in American history in dealing with this haunting sin. The world watches to see how we will act – whether with courage or fumbling expediency.

In such a time the Church of Jesus Christ is called upon to put aside every lesser engagement, to confess her sins of omission and delay, and to move forward to witness to her essential belief that every child of God is a brother to every other.

The United Church of Christ, by vote of its 1963 General Synod, is committed to move on all fronts of the struggle. It now calls upon every member-church and individual member to join forces in a concrete program for racial justice now.

We would respond to this call with our offerings of hand and heart as this day we lay them before God.

A LITANY OF GRACE AND RACE

ACT OF CONFESSION

Leader: Let us pray. O God who has made us one people, we have been slow to recognize that racial discrimination and segregation are an insult to thee, giver of human dignity and human rights.

We have participated in perpetuating racial discrimination and segregation in civil, political, industrial, social, and private life.

In our houses of worship, our religious schools, hospitals, welfare institutions, and fraternal organizations we have often failed our own religious commitments.

We have evaded the mandates and rejected the promises of our faith.

Unison: We repent our failures and ask thy forgiveness, even as we would ask the forgiveness of those whose rights have been withheld and whose dignity has been offended.

(Moment of Silence)

ACT OF SUPPLICATION

Leader: Let us pray.

Unison: While there is still time, O Lord, enable us to seek a reign of justice,

Leader: In which voting rights and equal protection of the law will everywhere be enjoyed;
public facilities and private ones serving a public purpose will be accessible to all;
equal educational and cultural opportunities, hiring and promotion, medical and hospital care, open occupancy in housing will be available to all.

Unison: While there is still time, O God, enable us to seek a reign of love,

Leader: In which the wounds of past injustices will not be used as excuses for new ones;
racial barriers will be eliminated;
the stranger will be sought and welcomed;
any man will be received as brother—his rights, our rights; his pain, our pain; his prison, our prison.

Unison: While there is still time, O God, enable us to seek a reign of courage,

Leader: in which as thy people, we shall make our faith our binding commitment; in which we shall willingly suffer for justice and love;
in which our churches shall lead, not follow.

Unison: While there is still time, O Lord, enable us to seek a reign of prayer,

Leader: in which thou art praised and worshipped as the Lord of the universe, before whom all racial idols fall, who makest us one family and to whom we are all responsible.

Unison: O God, give grace to us the living, and heal
the wounds of racial strife; that we may keep faith with thee, who lovest every man as if he were all, and all as if they were one.

Amen.

Doxology or "All Things Come of Thee"

PRAYER OF INTERCESSION

(To be read by minister, congregation seated)

O God, Father of all mankind, we bring before thee the burden of those who today struggle for human dignity and freedom, for the rights of every man.

We pray for all public servants who contend for social righteousness – the President of the United States, members of Congress, judges, city and state officials, journalists and commentators on the news, educators and social workers, employers and labor leaders, clergymen and others whose voices shape public opinion and the common life. Give them the decisiveness of a supreme ideal. Make them transparently sincere in all they profess to feel and do, and fearless before thee alone. Keep them resolute and faithful until their task is done and temper them always by the spirit of reconciliation.

We pray for those who so long have been humiliated and now seek redress of wrongs not with violence and vengeance but with the power of prayer and disciplined action in the spirit of Christ. Keep them in this way of the Cross, wherein is strength beyond their strength, victory after sacrifice and beneath whose shadow is ultimate healing and peace. This we dare pray only as we ourselves advance to walk with them the steep ascent.

We remember before thee also those who having been wronged would now fight evil with evil and deepen the social rift. Show them that to debase others is to debase themselves.

Have pity, Lord, on all who oppose the demands thou art making in this crisis, whether they do so by violence of hand or mouth or heart. Tear from them the pride, prejudice and fear in which they themselves are entrapped. O Spirit of God, enlighten and correct them – do even so to us where we fail thy will in ways we presently go.

We bear before thee all those who in this present hour of trial hesitate to answer the call of conscience. Make known to them that nothing is too early or too late which is in due time for thee. Though there appear a dark valley of misunderstanding and alienation, let none persuade himself he knows a way around. Let each put right before self-interest, others before self, principle before reputation and thee, O God, before everything else.

Until deliverance come, grant, O God, that all who suffer from unrighteousness and all who suffer for the sake of righteousness may possess their souls in the companionship of the suffering and over-coming Lord.

Thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory, forever and forever. Amen.

A Periodic News Bulletin Issued by the Department of Christian Social Relations, Division of Christian Citizenship, of which the Rev. Arthur E. Walmsley is Executive Secretary.

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL TAKES STEPS TO IMPROVE ITS RACIAL PRACTICES

For the past year, the National Council has been undertaking a rigorous program to improve racial equality and inclusiveness in its own life. The group charged with this effort is the Joint Staff Committee on Race Relations, authorized by the Presiding Bishop and Directors. It includes representatives of all Departments and the two General Divisions of Laymen's and Women's Work. The Committee undertook a thorough study of current practices and made several recommendations for change to the Joint Program Planning Committee. Each recommendation has been carefully considered. Many have been implemented by administrative action, or by National Council action where policy is involved.

Actions include the extension of staff (non-officer) recruitment to agencies drawing on non-white workers; re-statement of equal opportunity in the employment and promotion of staff; efforts to lessen social distance within the staff; and special efforts to assist non-white workers in qualifying for advancement. Various recommendations to effect the employment of more non-white officers were to be given further study and are reported here later. Special attention was also agreed upon for the seeking out of qualified non-whites for Advisory Committees and other such bodies. Unequivocal action-later endorsed by Council-was taken to assure that Council-sponsored meetings of any type would only be held in entirely open sites, with written advance assurance to be secured. Similar action was taken to assure that participation in all meetings would be open, including active and conscious efforts to encourage nominations of non-whites. In fact, the involvement of any Council officer in any segregated meeting was discouraged to the point of requiring written approval by the officers unit director before it could take place.

Because of recognition of race as a religious issue and one involving the attitudes and work of all staff, the Presiding Bishop's 1963 Holy Week Conference for all National Council officers was devoted to the subject. Since the purpose was to confront officers with a frank evaluation of the racial situation, and since there are only two members of minority groups among the officers, twenty Negro Churchmen were invited to participate. Half were clergy and half laymen from the human relations fields. Following major presentations on: "Race as a Religious Issue"; "Negroes and Whites in the United States Today"; "The Church and Race"; the officers met in small groups (with two guests to secure real exchange) to explore their own reactions and attitudes. During the second half of the Conference, officers met in task groups to develop recommendations on specific areas of National Church life where racial change is needed. These recommendations were referred to the Presiding Bishop's Joint Program Planning Committee for action.

The results of the Conference were more than the most hopeful had anticipated. Almost without exception, the officers were shaken by the experience and determined to work for integration and racial justice as an important part of their jobs, whatever their assignment. The whole officer corps of nearly 100 is now, in a sense, a part of our race relations personnel, working with the assurance that their actions will have the support of group conviction.

This month, the Joint Program Planning Committee acted on the recommendations of Officers' Conference, thereby taking several additional steps. It completely rejected the "freedom of movement" restriction on officer employment, making it necessary to secure special dispensation from the Presiding Bishop and Director's meeting to put restrictions on any officer job. It outlined concrete steps for recruitment of non-white officers including a letter from the Presiding Bishop to all bishops, deans, and others; solicitation of nominations from a variety of sources; sharing of job-openings and available personnel facts; and plans for in-service training to allow for development of skills after employment, rather than prehiring requirements. Scholarship assistance to non-whites will also be increased. Thorough dissemination of existing Council policy on non-discrimination was also planned for. The Committee even forbade the finalizing of Advisory Committee memberships until the possibilities of non-white personnel had been thoroughly explored.

We are well aware that there is much more to be done and that implementation will require perseverance and watchfulness. We are also convinced, however, that the National Council is now approaching the securing of racial justice and inclusiveness with solid conviction and a sense of direction.

DR. ROBERT SPIKE OUTLINES COMMISSION'S PROGRAM AT SEABURY HOUSE

The Rev. Dr. Robert Spike, Chief-of-Staff of the Commission on Religion and Race of the National Council of Churches, met at Seabury House on June 28th with the Advisory Committee on Intergroup Relations. He reported that the Commission will concentrate its efforts to eliminate racial discrimination as outlined below:

1. Legislation

Civil rights legislation now before Congress is a priority area. The Commission will in the near future direct a message to Congress, as well as, to individual Congressmen urging the passage of this legislation. Any partisan use of this legislation, including a filibuster, will be regarded "as an affront to the Christian conscience." The Commission is now in the process of setting up a staff in Washington to effect its aims. Every effort is being made to obtain tri-faith support for the passage of this legislation this summer. And the Commission's efforts will be coordinated with those of Roman Catholics and Jews.

Dr. Spike pointed out that "perhaps the key to Protestant bodies rests with their membership in the Middle West," for these are the areas where the Negro protest movement is weakest. The participation of church groups in these areas, therefore, becomes crucial.

2. Community Action and Demonstrations

Church officers and laymen are encouraged to take part in local direct-action demonstrations sponsored by responsible human rights organizations adhering to the principle of non-violence. It is absolutely essential that picket lines be integrated. White Christians are unequivocally urged to join Negroes on the picket line. Bishops, other Church officers, and laymen are urged to make this kind of Christian witness at this time. As a first step in involvement by Church officials in the protest movement, Dr. Eugene Carson Blake of the National Council of Churches and a member of the Commission will participate along with other clergy and laymen in a Maryland protest this week.

Dr. Spike noted that despite indisputable proof there has been a strange silence in the mass media about the brutality occurring in many of the jails where demonstrators have been held. See: IN SUPPORT OF PROTEST.

3. Desegregation in the Life of the Church

The Commission is requesting the National Council of Churches to include Negroes on its Executive Council immediately. Dr. Spike stated that the excuse for not having Negroes represented in various top bodies has been, "We can't find qualified Negroes." He said the Commission's answer to that is, "If you can't find them, then train them." Further, every denomination will be asked to frame and implement resolutions similar to the one passed by the Episcopal Diocese of Washington, D.C. See: WASHINGTON DIOCESE ELIMINATES INSTITUTION BARRIERS. The Commission has noted that one-and-a-half billion dollars are spent yearly for the construction of new church edifices. Each denomination is, therefore, being asked to write in a fair employment stipulation as a condition for letting of contracts to builders

THIRTY-TWO EPISCOPAL CLERGY IN WASHINGTON "MARCH"

Thirty-two Episcopal priests volunteered to participate in the June 14th protest against racial discrimination in Washington, D.C. Invited to historic St. John's Church by the Rector, the Rev. John Harper, the group was led in prayer by the Rev. Walter E. Fauntroy, a representative of the Southern Leadership Conference. Later the clergymen joined several thousand other participants in a silent "march" from the White House to the Justice Department. At the Justice Department they heard Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy tell of current efforts by the Justice Department to end racial discrimination in the United States.

ELIMINATES INSTITUTION BARRIERS

The following resolution was passed by the Diocesan Convention of Washington, D.C., on May 6, 1963. The Diocese of Washington is happy to report that the one agency holding out against desegregation has changed its policies.

Diocese of Washington

Whereas, the Church recognizes the human dignity of all men and the Episcopal Church as a strong policy against discrimination in any form when practiced against persons because of race, color, or national orgin, and

Whereas, discrimination is not in keeping with human dignity and decency and the democratic principles of equal rights and equal opportunity for all, and

Whereas, the Convention of the Diocese of Washington of 1960 accepted a statement of the Department of Social Relations of this Diocese to wit, "That in our diocesan-related institutions, the services offered will be offered to all people without regard for race or color," and

Whereas, such institutions are responsible to the Church as the expression of its social concern and its charity, and

Whereas, the social services that the Church desires to render through its diocesan-related institutions are human needs that are shared by all of its people alike, who are in need of the services rendered, and

Whereas, the urgent need of all of the Church's people for the services rendered by its diocesan-related institutions compel the Church to avoid procrastination, subterfuge, and hypocrisy, and

Whereas, the Bishop of the Diocese of Washington is the President of the Diocesan-related corporations, and

Whereas, some diocesan-related institutions have failed to offer their services equally to all people, without regard for race or color.

Therefore, be it resolved that the Bishop of the Diocese of Washington be requested and the Executive Council be directed to take steps to insure that all related schools and institutions now in existence and to be created in the future by the Diocese, its parishes, missions and separate congregations in communion therewith, be available to all people of the Diocese.

Be it further resolved that the Executive Council as its first order of business create a committee to re-emphasize to the diocesan-related institutions the Episcopal Church's strong policy against discrimination in any form when practiced against persons because of race, color, or national origin, and give them every possible assistance on steps to lead to the elimination of these practices within these institutions within six months.

Be it further resolved that in the event such racially discriminatory practices are not eliminated in the specified time that the Bishop be requested and the Executive Council be directed to take such action as may be necessary to disassociate such diocesan-related institutions from Diocesan and Parochial moral or financial support.

CLERGYMEN ATTEND
MEDGAR EVERS' FUNERAL

Ten Episcopal clergymen from across the nation attended the funeral of Medgar Evers in Jackson, Mississippi on June 15th. Among those in attendance was an officer of the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church, the Rev. Cornelius C. Tarplee, Associate Secretary of the Division of Christian Citizenship. The Rev. John B. Morris, Director of the Episcopal Society for Racial and Cultural Unity (ESCRU) was also among those present.

INCREASED SUPPORT URGED FOR RESPONSIBLE
HUMAN RIGHTS ORGANIZATIONS

Churchmen are urged to give their full moral and financial support to the human rights organizations listed below. Such support is in keeping with the spirit of the Presiding Bishop's Whitsuntide message in which he stated:

> ..."I would ask you to give money as an expression of our unity and as a sign of our support for the end of racial injustice in this land. The struggle of Negro Americans for their rights is costly, both in terms of personal sacrifice and of money, and they need help."

TRI-FAITH WASHINGTON
CLERGY UNITE TO ACT
AGAINST RACIAL INJUSTICES

Leaders of the Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish faiths met on June 5th and announced the formation of a permanent Interreligious Committee on Race Relations to "work for equality of opportunity for Negro citizens" in many fields. The forty-two member committee includes the Rt. Rev. William F. Creighton, Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Washington, D.C. The emphasis of the committee is on the need for citizens to show by action the beliefs they profess.

Though preaching will undoubtedly be a part of this moral drive, it certainly will not end there. Seven committees composed of clergy and prominent laymen have been formed to take action in such areas as housing, education, and employment. The new Washington Interreligious Committee on Race Relations is the outgrowth of the National Conference on Religion and Race held in Chicago last January and to date it is the most vigorous of several such groups organized throughout the country.

IN SUPPORT OF PROTEST

The Presiding Bishop's Whitsuntide message called upon Churchmen to "support and strengthen the protest (of Negro Americans for their rights) in every way possible." In similar terms, the action of the General Board of the National Council of Churches authorized its staff to encourage "negotiations, demonstrations and direct action in places of particular crisis." Members of the General Board committed themselves to engage personally in such action.

Events in the last few months make very clear that the crisis has reached a stage in which armchair exhortations no longer count (if they ever did). A mark of the latent moral authority of the Church is the degree to which Negro action leaders have called on Church offices, the clergy, and lay groups for assistance in the last month. The role of negotiation and of interpretation of need to the white community cannot be exercised from outside the struggle; it must be earned by involvement.

Contrary to the views of those who wish it were otherwise, there is no major disagreement among the responsible Negro action groups on objectives. The competition for leadership between these groups, suddenly thrust into the national limelight, is real, and in specific instances has blunted the effectiveness of their protest. But there is a closing of ranks, notably behind the legislative program, and the projected assembly in Washington set for August 28th. Use of legal process to win change is still the undergirding of the whole movement; use of demonstration, boycott, and other exertions of non-violent moral force is accepted by all the Negro groups as an important weapon in the campaign. There is a division in the Negro community--between the non-violent forces of NAACP, CORE, SCLC and SNCC on the one hand, and the anti-democratic, white-hating racists of the Muslims, Black Nationalists and others. If the American dilemma is to be solved peacefully, white Americans must recognize this fact and lend support to the legitimate social revolution being led by the non-violent forces.

That would seem to be the issue involved in the question of official support of the protests. The Presiding Bishop's message calls for such support, and it is being planned for and given. Several expressions of support now being undertaken will be reported in our next bulletin. One of the first, and perhaps symbolically one of the most meaningful, was a delegation on national Church leaders who represented American Protestantism at the Evers' funeral (in addition to the Episcopal clergy there).

One of the critics of this action has suggested that it represents a move from support of evolutionary to revolutionary means. The crisis today is a revolution, in our mores and in our national self-understanding. The direct involvement of the Church may help to insure that it is a non-violent revolution.

ACTION SUGGESTION:

In communities where the Church has not been involved in the terms suggested here, an essential first step is contact with local Negro leadership of the action organizations, to develop working relations, and to find out where and when the Church's presence may be helpful.

ACTION SUGGESTION FOR COMMUNITIES DEEPLY TORN BY PROTEST:

Documented evidence of police brutality against Negro and white demonstrators in jails in a number of communities makes it essential that 24 hour chaplaincy service be provided in all jails where demonstrators are being held to protect demonstrators against the possible excesses by the police. Preferably this should be done locally, with clergy taking turns. Humanitarian and pastoral concern should make this an absolute minimum of local involvement.

PRESIDING BISHOP APPOINTED CHAIRMAN OF COMMISSION ON RELIGION AND RACE

The Rt. Rev. Arthur Lichtenberger, Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was recently appointed Chairman of the new Commission on Religion and Race of the National Council of Churches of Christ in America. The Commission is organized to effect ways and means of applying the Christian Gospel to the whole area of race relations. Its immediate and continuing aims are:

1) The encouragement of negotiations, demonstrations, and direct action in places of particular crisis.

2) The mobilization of resources to encourage legislative and executive acts in order to bring dignity, equality, and justice to all Americans.

3) The mobilization of the resources of the Churches in order to put their own house in order by desegregating all of the institutions of the Church.

4) The development and implementation of long term plans and strategies so that a continuing design of action will move us steadily towards the goal of full human rights for all.

Among other clergymen serving on the Commission are: Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Dr. Buell Gallagher and Archbishop Iakovas. Episcopalians on the Commission include: Mr. Ralph MacGill, Dr. Kenneth Clark, and Mrs. Helen Peterson.

The Rev. Dr. Robert Spike of the United Church is the Commission's Chief-of-Staff. Dr. Daisuke Kitagawa, Executive Secretary, Division of Domestic Mission, Home Department, National Council of the Episcopal Church, on July 1st assumed full-time staff responsibilities in the National Council of Churches for work on the Commission. His services will be credited towards the support of the Commission in 1963 by the National Council of the Episcopal Church.

Other Episcopal National Council staff working in conjunction with the Commission are: The Rt. Rev. Daniel Corrigan, the Rev. Arthur E. Walmsley, the Rev. Cornelius C. Tarplee, and Mr. Douglas Bushy. A new staff member, not yet named, will also work in close harmony with the Commission and other Communions.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE
MEETS AT SEABURY HOUSE

The eighteen-member Advisory Committee on Intergroup Relations, appointed by the Home and Christian Social Relations Departments to assist National Council staff in their program, met at Seabury House on June 28th and 29th. Co-chaired by the Rt. Rev. Roger W. Blanchard of Southern Ohio, and the Rt. Rev. William H. Marmion of Southwestern Virginia, the group reviewed the current racial situation in detail, and focused its discussion on program plans in the areas of legislation, direct action, and a 'stepping-up' of desegregation of the Church's own life.

The Advisory Committee made the following recommendations to the Rt. Rev. John E. Hines and the Rt. Rev. Frederick J. Warnecke, as Chairmen of the Christian Social Relations and Home Departments to request the Presiding Bishop to:

1. Call a special meeting of American bishops in Toronto on the issue of race on the first available free evening during the Anglican Congress, or the day before. Adequate publicity to be given to the call. The Rt. Rev. Frederick J. Warnecke in a telephone conversation suggests that it might be a special meeting of bishops present though not a formal meeting of the House of Bishops. Mr. Warren Turner suggests that it could be done by writing all of the bishops coming or at least some in most critical areas, north and south.

2. Appoint a special committee of bishops to prepare a draft of a pastoral letter or statement for presentation to the House of Bishops at the August meeting. The pastoral or statement should back up what the Presiding Bishop said in his Whitsuntide message, with particular emphasis on legislation; a reference to direct action, with the possibility of support by name of the legitimate aims of the action organizations; and other practical action suggestions.

As part of the process, there should be a meeting of the committee with representatives of the action agencies in July.

3. As a part of the considerations of the committee and the statement, attention should be given to the Washington 'march' tentatively set for August 28th, concerning the possibility of direct involvement of bishops in this action. The Advisory Committee and staff recommend a call to Episcopalians at the time of such demonstrations to an assembly in the Washington Cathedral to decide the appropriate tactics of our participation. We must be in close contact with action groups in planning for such participation.

Members of the Advisory Committee, in addition to Bishops Blanchard and Marmion are:

The Rev. Theodore Gibson, Miami, Florida
The Rev. Duncan Gray, Oxford, Mississippi
The Rev. Richard Martin, Brooklyn, New York
The Rev. John B. Morris, Atlanta, Georgia
The Rev. John Teeter, Skaneateles, New York

BOSTON
EPISCOPAL
CLERGY TAKE LEAD IN SCHOOL INTEGRATION CRISIS

The fight against "de facto" school segregation in Boston is being led by Negro parents and a bi-racial group of clergy who, on June 17th organized several "Freedom Schools." The clergy leaders included the following Episcopal members: The Rt. Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes, Jr., Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Massachusetts, the Rev. Messrs. Gilbert S. Avery, III, James Breeden, Charles Buck, Hugh Findley, John J. Harmon, and C. DeWitt Hastie. One of the group's organizers, the Rev. James Breeden, stated that these schools were set up as a protest against "de facto" segregation in the public schools of Boston, Massachusetts and that the "Freedom Schools" are in effect dramatizing before the white community that Negroes believe an attitude of white superiority exists and that this attitude must change before racial progress can occur. Fr. Breeden added, however, "Everyone must deal with this problem in the best way he knows how."

On June 18th, Negro junior and senior high school students who volunteered to stay away from public schools during the one-day protest attended classes at one of the several centers organized throughout the city. Senior high students met at St. Mark's Social Center and junior high pupils attended classes at churches in the area of their regular schools. Students were only permitted to enroll with parental consent. At the end of the day students were given certificates for parents and teachers to certify that they attended the workshop all day.

Discussions in the "Freedom Schools" centered around Negro history, the philosophy and methods of non-violence, citizenship, and the patronage of businesses having fair employment practices. Also, discussed were the legal rights of citizens in relation to the United States Constitution, the police, housing, jobs, and education.

Determined to ward off even the possibility of violence, Fr. Breeden urged, "full respect to those who volunteer to support the 'stay-out' and to those who do not." In addition to the day sessions, an evening session was planned for students who elected to attend public school.

Speakers traveled from one center to another during the day. Films on the Negro freedom movement were shown at some centers, and booklets and pamphlets were distributed to participants.

Among those of the academic community who volunteered to form a "Freedom Faculty" were Dr. Thomas F. Pettigrew, professor of sociology at Harvard University, and Dr. Sumner Rosen of Simmons College.

In an opening talk Bishop Stokes told the students, "You represent a very powerful movement. You must see that this movement is used constructively for good. It must be carried out responsibly." Nearing the end of his talk, Bishop Stokes said, "I hope when you go back to school, you make the next two days the best days of the year and that your influence will help improve the whole school system.

At the end of the one-day protest a staff writer for "The Christian Science Monitor" reported: "Quiet and effective is about the only way to describe today's boycott by Negro pupils of the Boston junior and senior high schools." An estimated 3,000 of the approximately 5,000 students stayed away from classes and fears of violence proved unsubstantiated. Similar student meetings are planned throughout the summer months.

ACTION NOTE:

Those conducting daily vacation Bible schools and summer youth programs might well consider including some or all of the "Freedom Schools" approaches. Further details on this program as well as tips on local resources in your area are available from the Department of Christian Social Relations, Division of Christian Citizenship, The National Council, Episcopal Church Center, 815 Second Avenue, New York 17, New York.

CLERGYMEN TURNED AWAY AT RESTAURANT IN RALEIGH -ALL
RESTAURANTS NOW REPORTED OPEN

The Negroes of Raleigh, North Carolina intensified their efforts against racial discrimination in public accommodations during June. The height of their protest coincided with the Summer School of Religious Education at St. Augustine's College in that city.

A local newspaper, THE NEWS AND OBSERVER of June 13 reported the following incident:

"Six Episcopal clergymen-four Negroes and two whites-were turned away when they attempted to eat at the downtown S&W Cafeteria about 5:30 p.m. The ministers are attending a church conference at St. Augustine's College here.

"The two white ministers identified themselves as the Rev. Arthur E. Walmsley, Executive Secretary of the Division of Christian Citizenship of the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and the Rev. John B. Morris, Executive Director of the Episcopal Society for Racial and Cultural Unity.

"The Negro ministers were the Rev. Joseph N. Green, Pastor of St. Augustine's Chapel here; the Rev. Kenneth Hughes of St. Bartholomew's Church in Cambridge, Massachusetts; the Rev. Irving Mayson of St. Phillip's Church in Akron, Ohio; and the Rev. Tollie Caution of New York, who is Associate Secretary of the Division of Domestic Mission of the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

"Barred from entering the cafeteria by management personnel and a policeman who stood inside the door, the ministers said they had prayed and read the Bible aloud "for God to open the hearts and minds of those who will not see."

The Directors of the Raleigh Merchants Bureau issued the following statement to all of its members:

"God-fearing people, as responsible citizens, and all people of good will, must face the fact that peace in human relations is essential.

"Being charged with the responsibility of offering leadership in the community of Raleigh, we are convinced we should, without further delay, remove all policies in both government and business which deny rights and services because of race.

"The overriding challenge now confronting every Raleigh business person is to do these things that would further human relations and the continued growth of Raleigh."

ACTION NOTE:

People of good-will must take the leadership in the human relations field and must do it now. The transition from segregation to Christian inclusiveness is far easier when leadership is kept out of the hands of demagogues.

Pastor Halvorson

JUL 1 0 1963

LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA

231 MADISON AVENUE. NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

AREA CODE 212 LEXINGTON 2-3410

Office of the President

July 8, 1963

Dear fellow-pastor:

I am grateful to the Executive Council for permitting, and indeed encouraging, me to write a straightforward pastoral letter to you on the Christian attitude toward our neighbors of other races. The implications of the Gospel in this regard are so plain that, theologically, a letter like this is superfluous. I can hardly imagine that a single man in the ministry of our church is unclear on that score. If he is, I confess that I have grave doubts either about his perceptiveness as to what the Word of God teaches or about the state of his Christian obedience. The good that my words are intended to accomplish is to help us to strengthen and if necessary awaken, one another and, beyond that, to arouse each of us to action.

My colleagues on the Executive Council and I regret that its action and this letter will seem to have been prompted by the current racial crisis in the United States. That is true only on the surface. The position we are expressing now has not been wrung from us reluctantly by recent or impending events. We say what we say because it is intrinsically right. It represents the firm, and in my case intense, conviction of our minds and hearts.

No secular motivation, powerful as it is, accounts either for the fact of my writing or the substance of what I write. Not the devastating effect of racial inequality within the United States on its image abroad - which has made me cringe a thousand times as I have seen it in all parts of the world and which vitiates its aspiration to a role of moral leadership. Not the inconsistency of America's almost self-righteous support of national independence and full civil rights for colored peoples overseas at the same time that it flagrantly fails to see the beam in its own eye at home. Not even the "natural rights" on which the whole theory of democracy rests.

The position that Christians take on race has spiritual roots. It arises directly out of our view of God and of man; and belongs to the essence of our faith. It is accusingly simple and brooks no disagreement. Men, created by God and redeemed by Christ, are equals and are meant to be brothers. No man is a hair's breadth above or below another in God's affection nor can he be in a Christian's regard. Any disabilities on the basis of race within the Christian family are evil. They are an affront to the Lord and a sign of deviation from Him.

We all agree on this. The time has come to act.

What it means for the congregation of which you are a pastor or the institution in which you carry on your ministry is plain. The doors must be open to all. Everyone who is otherwise eligible, by faith or scholastic attainments or need, should be welcomed to full membership or enrollment as a student or admission as a patient or guest on an equal basis with the people of the majority race. Not only that, the church must be more than passively ready to receive those who come. It is bound in conscience, it is under the command of its Lord, to seek souls. Every congregation ought to do so without any discrimination because of the color of a man's skin. I believe this vigorously and practice it myself. I call on you to do so too.

Our obligation goes much further in civic affairs, as the Executive Council's statement points out emphatically in its fifth resolution. I commend it to you earnestly without attempting to elaborate it. The deficiency of which you and I have most frequently been guilty is not in the mind; we know what we ought to do. Nor in the heart; our sympathies are on the side of those who have too long been deprived of equality of treatment. Our fault, which we ought not tolerate in ourselves any longer, has been in the will. Under God, the time has come to act and to lead others by precept and example.

All of this is not very spectacular, measured in present-day terms. It will taste too much for some like staid Lutheran conservatism. But do not let anyone dismiss this charge to his soul as weak or having an uncertain sound.

I trust the power of Law and Gospel. The Lord trusts you.

Fraternally yours,

Franklin Clark Fry

WHEREAS the Church of Jesus Christ must heed God's call to practice love and justice in human relations; and

WHEREAS predecessor church bodies of the Lutheran Church in America have expressed themselves against the evils of segregation and discrimination on the basis of race (Augustana Lutheran Church - 1948, 1956; The United Lutheran Church in America - 1952, 1956, 1958); and

WHEREAS action compatible with the Christian responsibility for love and justice is necessary; Therefore be it

RESOLVED, That the Executive Council, acting in behalf of the Lutheran Church in America:

1. affirm the 1952 statement of The United Lutheran Church in America and the 1956 statement of the Augustana Lutheran Church, regarding race relations, pending a pronouncement by a convention of the church on this matter;

3. commit itself to work for eradication of such segregation and discrimination wherever they may exist;

4. call on the congregations, synods, institutions, boards, commissions and auxiliaries of the church to develop within their assigned areas of responsibility programs of self-examination and action leading to justice in race relations;

5. urge members of the congregations to initiate and support efforts at reconciliation between the races in their communities and to support proper legislation designed to assure equal opportunity for all citizens in housing, education, employment, voting, and access to all facilities serving the public; and

6. authorize and request the president of the church to send to all the ministers of the LCA and their congregations, a pastoral letter expressing the conviction and concern of the church on the fundamental moral issues of love and justice in race relations.

SPECIAL RELEASE - Lutheran Human Relations Association of America
Valparaiso University, Valparaiso, Indiana
Telephone 219 Howard 2-5111 Ext 69

Dated July 9th, 1963

This past week end Valparaiso University in Indiana, some sixty miles east of downtown Chicago, was the gathering place for people from twenty eight states of our country, concerned about human relations problems. The more than three hundred Lutherans and representatives from other communions attended three days of sessions in which they heard Dr. Richard R. Caemmerer, Head of the Department of Practical Theology Concordia Seminary, St. Louis; Dr. James Mc Bride Dabbs, President of the Southern Regional Council and resident of Sumter, South Carolina; and Dr. Stephen J. Wright, President of Fisk University in Nashville speak. Recognizing the problems facing church members and citizens of the United States in the matter of race relations, the Institute concerned itself with tracing the roots of the problem, and thus probing the history of the South, the history of the church, and the basic theological concerns involved.

The Reverend Ronald Goerss, student pastor at UCLA was re-elected Secretary, Miss Ellen Sweet, treasurer, and Dr. Clemonce Sabourin of Mount Zion Lutheran Church in Harlem to his sixth term as president of the national organization of Lutherans devoted to "help the church fill its role of leadership in the matter of human relations." The election took place in the annual meeting of the Lutheran Human Relations Association of America conducted in conjunction with the Institute. New officers of the organization named in this meeting are Richard K. Fox of Washington, D.C., attached to the United States Department of State, and H. Dixon Hemma, Assitant Executive Director of the Wheatridge Foundation in Chicago.

An outstanding feature of the Institute this year occurred Sunday afternoon when two pastors who have been very much in the forefront with concern for good racial relations in their home state of Alabama reported on conditions there. Their dialog was followed by a bi-racial panel of youth. These were nine southerners who had spent one week visiting in Chicago homes, discovering for themselves the North at its segregated worst and integrated best, and observing a variety of stances among the people of different racial roots, ranging from anxiety to resignation, from hate to apathy. Their report concluded that they had enjoyed a reassuring experiencing of new dimensions of the body of Christ. Plans are underway to extend this program so that opportunities will be provided for Northern youth to visit in Southern homes in the future.

A resolution sponsored by the Institute calls for alerting pastors to utilize their pulpits to point up sins of racial nature; for urging Christian citizens to give active support to the President of the United States and to Congress for prompt enactment of just civil rights legislation; for Christians to demonstrate their protest against unjust discrimination and degrading practices which would limit Negroes from reaching their maximum potential before God.

Actions of the Fourth General Synod of the United Church of Christ

A PRONOUNCEMENT ON

THE RELATION OF GOVERNMENT TO FREEDOM AND WELFARE

Adopted by the General Synod of the United Church of Christ, July 10, 1963

THEOLOGICAL FOUNDATIONS

Man owes his absolute allegiance to God who is revealed through Jesus Christ. He also owes a conditional loyalty to the state as a structure existing under the providence of God for the establishment of justice, security, order, and general welfare. Any discussion of Christian freedom as it relates to government must start with these premises. Freedom for Christians is not freedom from all restrictions but freedom to love God and our neighbors as ourselves. God has created us as members one of another, responsible to Him, and He calls us to mutual service. In our world today, we cannot adequately fulfill these Christian responsibilities without the use of government.

Our Christian understanding of freedom and government derives from the doctrines of God and man. The sovereignty of a just and loving God places upon all persons the responsibility of obeying Him and fulfilling His demands for justice and order; therefore, persons must be free to respond to Him according to their faith. God is sovereign over all life, including the state. No authority can rightfully exercise power in a way that is contrary to the will of God. Citizens responsible to God for the exercise of their freedom must support the rightful uses of power and oppose unlawful or unjust uses of power. We affirm that just governments do derive their powers from the consent of the governed, and that as Christians we have an obligation to be concerned about the very form and function of the governments which serve us. Christians, seeking to know and to do God's will, must act in the light of conscience even though this places them, from time to time, in tension and conflict not only with the state and other citizens, but even with other Christians. The Christian church, called to witness to God's will and to serve man in the light of the Gospel, has the right and duty to speak its judgment on the purposes, policies, and practicies of government.

The Christian doctrine of man asserts the worth of the person loved of God, created in His image, and called to sonship in His kingdom. This requires that man be free to develop his highest potential and that he fulfill his obligations to help build a just and orderly society. Government is one essential means by which this freedom is protected and enlarged and these obligations are met.

The Christian teaching that all men are sinners and that man's world is therefore imperfect provides a Christian imperative for freedom and a warrant for democratic government. Aware of his sinfulness, the Christian will never suppose that his own opinions are completely objective; he will understand that he needs the criticism of others as they need his criticism. As Reinhold Niebuhr has said, "Man's capacity for justice makes democracy possible; but man's inclination to injustice makes democracy necessary."

As Christians we recognize that human sinfulness can distort and corrupt any social institution including the state. Even democratic governments may act in a tyrannical or unjust manner. This may justify civil disobedience when government becomes tyrannical or oppressive. On the other hand, a Christian conception of freedom respects the maintenance of law and order as a proper and necessary function of government.

FUNCTION OF DEMOCRACY

A function of democracy is to provide a stable atmosphere for the maintenance of balance between social controls and individual initiative. The assumption that government is inevitably a threat to freedom is mistaken. Such a view results in hostility toward any measure, regardless of its merit, which increases the role of government. It often denotes a lack of faith in and understanding of the democratic process. In a responsible society, the democratic process provides every person the right to participate effectively in making the decisions which affect himself. Democratic government is thus the most representative agency through which the people can pool a portion of their power and other resources to make judgments as to public priorities in the accomplishment of some of their great purposes. Such purposes include the provision for the general welfare and common defense, the furtherance of justice and equity, the protection of freedom, and the enlargement of individual opportunity. For responsible government will seek to provide security at home and abroad in a way which enhances, not inhibits, freedom and also relates freedom to order, justice and welfare. It will provide a framework of law which enhances the capacity of man to use other agencies and instrumentalities, public and private, individual and corporate, charitable and profitable, in meeting the needs of man and community. It is a valid role of government to mediate when necessary among conflicting interests in society, especially when hostility to government reflects a preference for special interest over the general welfare.

Some form of government is essential since the only alternative would be anarchy. But the specific actions of any government stand under the judgment of God and man, depending in part upon the extent to which the action is conducive to, or destructive of, freedom and the public welfare.

THE NATURE OF MODERN AMERICA

We call attention to changes, both national and international, which have caused the structure and role of the government of the United States to expand far beyond the expectations of the framers of the Constitution. The nation has grown in area, population, power and responsibility. The rapid industrialization of the American econonmy with its attendant increasing concentration of economic power has in some respects increased freedom by giving the individual more choices of vocation and action. In other respects, as in its mechanization and automation, it has created conditions which have often left him less free to maintain his personal identity and to achieve and express his highest potentiality and creativity. To this should be added the growth and interdependence of gigantic organizations of business, labor, agriculture, and other special interests; urbanization with all the problems of urban living; the mobility of our population across state lines; the complexities of our economic order; the social and economic tensions created by racial discrimination; and the new problems presented by the nuclear age.

IMPLICATIONS FOR GOVERNMENT AND RESPONSIBLE CITIZENSHIP

All of these forces have placed great pressure upon agencies of government at all levels. The Christian has an obligation to re-examine and change as necessary the shape and action of his local and state governments so that these can better serve the needs of his fellowmen. The frequent failure of citizens to perform their civic duty through responsible local and state action has only added to the growing burden upon the federal government, which is already burdened with inescapable national and international problems. The need to give political attention to the nation does not absolve us from responsibility in our local communities and states.

The role and cost of all government has been most sharply increased by acceptance of new responsibilities both at home and in relation with the other nations of the world. The fulfillment of these responsibilities may well demand of the citizen more taxes and greater public service. Performance of our civic obligations is an essential part of our Christian stewardship.

Our position has been well expressed by the Evanston Assembly of the World Council of Churches:

"While the state [i.e. government] is sometimes the enemy of freedom, under many circumstances the state is the only instrument which can make freedom possible for large sectors of the population. The state is not the source of social justice, but it must be its guardian, ready if necessary to accept responsibility to counteract depression or inflation and to relieve the impact of unemployment, industrial injury, low wages, and unfavorable working conditions, sickness and old age. But in doing so the state remains the servant not the lord of social justice. Therefore we must warn against the danger that the union of political and economic power may result in an all controlling state. In contradistinction to actions of the state it is the task of the non-governmental sectors in economic life to be the guardian of responsible private action in society. But within the private sector, both employers and employees in all their varied organizations in their turn are the servant, and not the lord of freedom and welfare. When necessary in the public interest, the state must intervene to prevent any center of economic or social power which represents partial interest from becoming stronger than itself, for the state alone has the power and the authority under God to act as trustee for society as a whole."*

A CALL FOR CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP

THEREFORE, we call upon the members of our churches as Christians and citizens, in addition to individual and voluntary efforts, to recognize the rightful role of government in promoting freedom and welfare and to work through their governments at all levels:

1) to promote the general welfare, with particular concern for the protection of those with special needs, be it in education and health, work and leisure, housing and economic security;

2) to secure and defend equality of opportunity for all citizens in employment, housing, education, voting, the administration of justice, and access to public services and accommodations;

3) to safeguard the right of freedom of expression as guaranteed in the First Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, including the right within Constitutional limits to express opposition or commendation to our government or to advocate peaceful change to alternative political and economic systems without being intimidated or harassed;

4) to protect and respect freedom of religion for all;

5) to revise governmental policies and procedures which obstruct efficient and effective functioning of the democratic process;

6) to support through our foreign policy the freedom and welfare of other peoples and nations as well as our own.

The members of the United Church of Christ, the local churches, the associations, the conferences, the instrumentalities, and the General Synod have not only a right but a responsibility to express their views on governmental policies in the light of their Christian convictions. This involves evaluating policies that our local, state and federal governments have adopted or are considering, and advocating policies which these governments ought to adopt.

CONCLUSION

In summary, therefore, government must meet the changing needs of the people without being bound by the assumption that the growth of government is inherently a threat to freedom. If Christians work with others to preserve and strengthen the process of democracy, government can be an indispensable instrument for promoting the well-being of society without placing in jeopardy the freedom of the individual.

*Report of Section III: "Social Problems—The Responsible Society in a World Perspective," Second Assembly of the World Council of Churches, 1954.

Actions on the Report of the Council for Christian Social Action

In the face of the enormous and complex issues which mankind faces, an intensive and far-reaching program of social action was never so much needed as today. Endeavoring to be "servants in the service of men," Christians must seek and must do the will of God wherever the powers of evil, so flagrantly challenging in our time, must be met, in order that justice, peace and love may prevail.

It is to help the churches meet the issues of such a time that the Council for Christian Social Action exists, established by the United Church of Christ to make "the implications of the Gospel effective in society."

The Report Committee recognizes that there exists difference of opinion respecting the kind of program which the CCSA has developed. Since the CCSA functions in controversial areas of witness, such differences are inevitable. The committee has received three memoranda involving criticism: (1) from an unofficial group of laymen in Southern California, (2) from the deacons and trustees of a church in New Jersey, and (3) from one individual. The Report Committee has given attention to these criticisms, but feels that their point of view does not reflect the will of the United Church of Christ in these crucial testing times. It is the conviction of the Report Committee that the CCSA has competently and creatively served our churches.

We recognize that in developing and promoting "a program of social education and action," errors and mis-judgments may be made by the CCSA. The CCSA should not be held in its own mind or in the mind of its supporters as infallible. Criticisms are welcomed. We are confident that the CCSA gives respectful attention to such criticisms. The Report Committee expresses its confidence in the CCSA and its staff; believes that they serve our churches well; and thus we strongly encourage full support of the CCSA among our churches.

MISSION OF THE CHURCH

- General Synod commends the Council for Christian Social Action for the statement (in Advance Reports pp. 125-127) on the mission of the Church and the functions of the Council for Christian Social Action with respect to implementing this mission.

FIELD SERVICE

- General Synod, believing that the program of social action needs to be established primarily in the local church, encourages the Council for Christian Social Action to develop more extensive field services, as budget permits, and suggests that the Conferences endeaver to provide trained leadership in social action on their staffs as a service to their churches.

STUDY PAPERS

- General Synod approves the preparation of study papers by the Council for Christian Social Action in which varying points of view are presented and questions raised for study and discussion.

VALUE OF STATEMENTS

- General Synod recognizes validity and value in the issuance by the Council for Christian Social Action of statements as useful guidance to churches and individuals with respect to decisions on social issues. We believe that the expression of views by the Council for Christian Social Action on specific issues provides necessary leadership. We commend the procedures (outlined in Advance Reports, p. 127) which have been designed to assure competent judgments. These procedures should be conscientiously followed. We encourage even fuller consultation with local church groups and with authorities expert in particular fields to ensure the greatest possible care in preparing a final statement or a study paper.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

- General Synod commends the Council for Christian Social Action for its educational program with respect to the United Nations, and urges expansion of this program. It recommends that the Council for Christian Social Action explore ways of securing financial support through Conferences and Associations to send delegates to UN seminars, and suggests that individual Conferences explore the feasibility of sponsoring a UN seminar for their own churches. It makes appreciative note that the International Relations Office of the Council for Christian Social Action is now housed, for more effective service to the churches, in the new Church Center for the United Nations adjacent to the UN.

TAX EXEMPTION FOR CHURCHES

- General Synod commends the Council for Christian Social Action for its statement on Tax Exemption for Churches (Appendix B, pp. 142-143 of Advance Reports) and encourages further study of this question by the Council for Christian Social Action, instrumentalities, conferences, and churches.

ECONOMIC LIFE SECRETARY

- General Synod endorses the decision of the Council for Christian Social Action to appoint an Economic Life seretary when budget permits, to serve as a specialist in the relationship of the Gospel to such matters as automation, tax policy, poverty, labor-management problems, agriculture, and business and vocational ethics.

WASHINGTON OFFICE

- General Synod values the services performed by the Washington Office of the Council for Christian Social Action (as described in Advance Reports, pp. 138-139). This provision of a staff resource person in the area of governmental issues is deemed an appropriate church program.

INTERDENOMINATIONAL COOPERATION

- General Synod commends the staff of the Council for Christian Social Action for leadership given in cooperative programs on an interdenominational and national level (as noted in Advance Reports, pp. 133-135).

RAPIDLY CHANGING ECONOMY

- General Synod in connection with the emphasis on urbanization within the United Church of Christ requests the churches to consider the interdenominational emphasis for 1963-64 on "Christians in a Rapidly Changing Economy" as an integral part of the urban emphasis.

FUNDS COMMENSURATE WITH RESPONSIBILITIES

- General Synod notes the difficulty faced by the Council for Christian Social Action, due to financial limitations, in fulfilling the expectations of churches, and requests the Budget Committee in the next budget allocations to provide funds commensurate with the responsibilities and needs in this field.

A CALL FOR RACIAL JUSTICE NOW

Adopted by the General Synod of the United Church of Christ, July 5, 1963

WHEREAS, the racial crisis in this summer of 1963 is a sign of God's action in the history of the United States, the Church must now become radically committed at particular times and places to the struggle of our fellowman:

TO GET the best job for which he is qualified and not be told to "come back later;"
TO WORK at the top jobs and not just those in the lowest-paid categories;
TO ESTABLISH fair employment practices in Federal law and in all other levels of government, since discrimination in employment robs a man of daily bread for himself and his family;
TO EXPOSE the cant and hypocrisy which keep him down even among those supposed to be his friends, whether they be churches, labor unions, management or political organizations;
TO LIVE where he pleases without paying the double-standard dollar;
TO GET the best schooling possible even if desegregation upsets educational traditions;
TO GAIN acceptance as a person of worth who may marry whomever he loves and whoever loves him;
TO SECURE public accommodations freely and without insult;
TO EXERCISE his God-given rights to protest injustice without suffering the intolerable penalties that we regularly read of in the newspapers;
TO GAIN a larger share in the ownership and use of capital;
TO RECEIVE equal protection under the law and equal justice in the courts;
TO OBTAIN crash programs of special assistance in such critical areas as health, education, welfare, citizenship, housing, and employment to enable victims of racial discrimination to achieve equality-in-fact;
TO PUSH for all that is due here and now without heeding those who counsel patience, moderation, and gradualism;
TO REGISTER, VOTE, AND RUN FOR OFFICE without fear of retaliation, either overt or subtle;

THEREFORE, the General Synod, in session in Denver, Colorado, seeking to bring the light of the Christian gospel to bear on the present crisis in race relations confronting our country and the world, and thankfully recalling the long established positions of the Congregational Christian Churches and the Evangelical and Reformed Church and now the United Church of Christ in the field of relations between the races, on July 5, 1963 takes the following actions:

A. The General Synod calls upon the members of the United Church of Christ to uproot intolerance, bigotry, and prejudice within our own lives and to replace them with good will and the determination to strike down immediately the barriers which divide men on account of race. The General Synod calls upon all members to make it plain to all the people with whom we live and work that the Church and the members thereof stand for brotherhood.

B. The General Synod believes that the United Church of Christ must free itself of segregation.

1. To this end, and understanding that the decision must be made for itself by each local congregation, the General Synod urges the churches to declare officially and publicly that their fellowship is open to all who qualify for membership without any restrictions as to race, class, or ethnic background The General Synod also urges the churches to declare officially and publicly a policy of calling pastors and employing church staff members without any restrictions as to race, class or ethnic background. When these actions are taken, the General Synod asks that a report be made to the Secretary of the Church.

2. The General Synod urges the conferences and the associations of the United Church of Christ to become fully integrated "with utmost dispatch."

3. The General Synod promises to utilize to the full the contribution that its Negro members and other racial and minority groups can make to the life and work of the United Church, giving these persons their share of leadership opportunities and responsibilities.

4. The General Synod calls upon institutions related to the Church to desegregate forthwith.

C. The General Synod proposes to mobilize the manpower and means of the Church for racial justice.

1. To this end, the General Synod requests the President of the Church, after consultation, to appoint a committee consisting of eleven non-national-staff persons, including in its membership both white and Negro persons who are trusted throughout the Church and have competence in the field of race relations. The life of this Committee shall extend until the next meeting of the General Synod.

2. The General Synod votes to give to that committee the power to decide how the resources of the Church contributed for this purpose will be used in the effort to secure racial equality and social justice both at home and abroad.

3. The General Synod accepts the offer of the Council for Christian Social Action and the Division of Church Extension of the Board for Homeland Ministries to provide the services of Dr. S. Garry Oniki; approves Dr. Oniki's appointment as executive coordinator of this effort; and suggests that the work and program of this committee normally be implemented by committing it to one of the existing agencies so that money can be conserved for actual program needs. In other cases, the committee would be authorized to borrow on a temporary basis experienced staff from the instrumentalities.

4. The program which this committee shall project could include but need not be limited to:

a. Mobilizing the whole membership of the Church, to join where possible with our Protestant, Roman Catholic and Jewish brethren, on a community basis, to meet the need of the situation on the local level;

b. Providing bail bonds for those who are arrested as they demand social justice;

c. Providing legal defense for such persons;

d. Providing economic aid to persons who lose their jobs because of their participation in activities in behalf of racial equality;

e. Providing financial aid for institutions whose support is threatened by those who oppose an "open policy" of service;

f. Mobilizing the United Church of Christ, its individual members, congregations, associations and conferences to press for the adoption of legislation to guarantee civil rights;

g. Supporting and commending those church members who successfully begin the integration of their own immediate neighborhoods;

h. Extending the program of voter registration;

i. Urging Christians to give all possible assistance to small businesses in making the transition to nonsegregation;

j. Providing other emergency or long-term help, the need for which only the future will reveal.

(NOTE: All this work, where at all possible, shall be undertaken in cooperation with the National Council of Churches, state and local councils of churches, the National Conference on Religion and Race, and other interreligious and community groups.)

D.

1. The General Synod challenges the people of the United Church of Christ to bring an emergency special offering of funds to cover the cost of this program. The General Synod votes that the first of these offerings will be received this fall. The setting of the date for the second offering is left to the Executive Council.

2. The General Synod commits the responsibility for raising these funds to each congregation and to each member of the Church, under the direction of the Stewardship Council.

3. The General Synod also authorizes the officers of the Church to borrow against these offerings to be received to the extent of $100,000 in order to begin the work immediately.

4. The General Synod votes to receive an offering at the coming Sunday night ecumenical service here at General Synod as the beginning of this fund, and suggests that congregations and individuals that wish to add to this fund before next fall will be able to do this by sending their contributions to the Treasurer of the United Church of Christ, 297 Park Avenue South, New York, New York (10010).

E. The General Synod calls upon the members of the United Church of Christ to pray that justice and good will shall prevail and then to work in order to make the fulfillment of that prayer possible.

A Resolution on Fair Employment Practices and Civil Rights Legislation

Adopted by the General Synod of the United Church of Christ, July 10, 1963

General Synod, in line with its earlier actions on the issue of racial justice, supports the following resolution on "Fair Employment Practices and Civil Rights Legislation":

The Fourth General Synod urges all instrumentalities, conferences, associations, churches and church-related institutions:

1. To review their current employment policies in respect to the calling of ministers, the employment of professional personnel and other staff, and to take affirmative steps to implement fair employment practices;

2. To further fair employment practices by including nondiscriminating provisions in all contracts and agreements;

3. To purchase services from and, in the investment of funds, to give preference to those firms which follow fair employment practices;

4. To advocate, demonstrate and involve themselves in support of the principles of the proposed Civil Rights Act of 1963 and the legislation providing for federal fair employment practices and to urge their Senators and Representatives to support such legislation on a nonpartisan basis in this session of Congress.

The Fourth General Synod approves the authorization of a committee by the Executive Council to evaluate the policies and practices in the United Church of Christ in respect to fair employment, to initiate procedures for prompt and effective achievement of fair employment policies and practices, to give attention to:

a. location of specific job opportunities,
b. use of personnel records with the churches,
c. special emphasis on locating qualified persons regardless of race in recruitment of personnel,
d. initiation of in-service training for purposes of promotion,
e. discovery of potential existing leadership,
f. development and training of leadership,
g. promotion and upgrading of personnel on the basis of ability, and
h. transmittal of information about nondiscriminatory practices and procedures to agencies used for recruitment of personnel, and expects the committee to report periodically to the Executive Council of the General Synod.

The Fourth General Synod instructs the Council for Christian Social Action to present testimony in support of Civil Rights and fair employment practices legislation before committees of Congress.

Other Actions on Race Relations

POLICY OF FINANCIAL SUPPORT

General Synod declares its policy to be to contribute funds only to institutions and churches which as of July 1, 1964, have a policy of openness without respect to race, national background or ethnic origin, and further urges the instrumentalities, conferences and churches to adopt and pursue such a policy in respect to contributions.

LOCAL STUDY AND ACTION

General Synod urges ministers and local churches to study the findings of the National Conference on Religion and Race and to cooperate in interfaith action on race in their communities.

A RESOLUTION ON NUCLEAR TESTING

Adopted by the General Synod of the United Church of Christ, July 10, 1963

WHEREAS, the Second General Synod in its "Call to Christian Action in Society" said: "We therefore call upon our churches and their members to pray and work . . . for effective international control and reduction of all national armaments, including the testing of nuclear weapons;" and

WHEREAS, the Third General Synod in its Pronouncement on "National Responsibility and International Relations" said: "We welcome the increased attention now being given by both government and private organizations to plan for the reduction, control, and eventual elimination of national armaments. We also urge the United States to persist in the effort to reach multilateral agreement on the cessation of all kinds of nuclear weapons testing;" and

WHEREAS, the government of the United States is working toward this goal, as evidenced by repeated Presidential statements, by persistence in negotiations with other nuclear powers, by the announced intention to engage in new discussions in Moscow in July of this year, following the failure of the Geneva Conference to reach agreement, and by the decision to conduct no further tests in the atmosphere so long as other states do not do so; and

WHEREAS, by providing a first step in the reduction and control of armaments, by eliminating future fallout, and by helping to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons, a test-ban treaty is in the interests of American security, as well as in the interest of general human well-being;

BE IT RESOLVED that the Fourth General Synod of the United Church of Christ, meeting in Denver, Colorado, July 4-11, 1963, commend and support the continuous and now renewed effort by our government to reach agreement by the principal nuclear powers on the permanent cessation of nuclear weapons testing; and be it further

RESOLVED, that the General Synod, in pursuance of its previous pronouncements, urge all our churches and all their members to communicate to the President and to their United States Senators their support of this effort, and be it further

RESOLVED, that if a test-ban treaty is agreed upon by the negotiating powers, and assuming that such treaty will carry safeguards for the security of the United States and of the free world, the Council for Christian Social Action is authorized and requested, by communications to our churches and by testimony in the United States Senate, to work for its favorable consideration by the Senate.

IMPLEMENTATION

General Synod approves the "Resolution on Nuclear Testing," commending it to the churches for study and discussion and directing that the required actions be taken by the officers of the General Synod and the CCSA.

RESOLVED, that the General Synod, through the Secretary of the United Church of Christ, communicate the Resolution on Nuclear Testing to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and the chairmen of the appropriate committees of the Senate.

In an unprecedented unity of action in legislative advocacy, the National Catholic Welfare Conference (Social Action Department), the National Council of Churches and the Synagogue Council of America will present the enclosed testimony tomorrow to the House Judiciary Committee. Later there will be similar testimony before Senate committees.

We are pleased to distribute the text to you and earnestly request that you take whatever supporting actions are within your power at the earliest possible moment.

Suggestions of things you might do

---Study the President's Civil Rights proposals carefully so you are well informed. Herewith we are including an analysis which is the best presently available. It can be a very useful tool for individuals and groups. The bills themselves may be had by writing to your Senators or your Congressman: S. 1731 and H. R. 7152. Beyond the President's "package" are H. R. 405 and S. 773 that make strong identical proposals that would establish a federal fair employment practices procedure. This would go beyond Title VII of "Civil Rights Act of 1963".

---Visit, telegraph, telephone or write to your Senators and your Representatives strongly presenting your views on this legislation. The memorandum will give you help in deciding on whom to concentrate your efforts. "A letter a week" campaign by many individual citizens is a worthy idea.

---Enlist as many other voters as possible to do the above - by conversing with other citizens, by group meetings in your home, church or other organizations, by door to door solicitation. THIS is the summer - and fall, if it takes that long - to accomplish a too long delayed, broad federal attack on discrimination in the name of morality, religion and public order and welfare.

---Join with local civil rights groups in mounting an educational campaign via letters to the newspapers, display ads, radio and TV, speakers' panels, sermons, demonstrations, etc., etc.

---Go to Washington, preferably along with fellow church or synagogue members to make evident your positive support for this legislation - call on your Senators and Representatives - to encourage those who are favorable, persuade those who are "uncertain", and awaken those who are blind to the realities of today's world.

COMMITTEE ON JUDICIARY
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

BY

NATIONAL CATHOLIC WELFARE CONFERENCE
SYNAGOGUE COUNCIL OF AMERICA
NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST
IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

JULY 24, 1963

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, my name is Dr. Eugene C. Blake Accompanying me are Rabbi Irving Blank and Father John Cronin. It is an unprecedented and indeed historic event that I speak for the social action, and racial action departments of The National Council of Churches, The National Catholic Welfare Conference and The Synagogue Council of America. The following denominations and religious organizations join in presenting this statement and have representatives at the Hearing: (See Appendix for names of representatives and additional denominations) American Baptist Convention; Board of Social Concerns and the Department of Christian Social Relations of the Woman's Division of Christian Service of the Methodist Church; Church of the Brethren; Disciples of Christ; Moravian Church in America; The Rt. Rev. Arthur C. Lichtenberger, Presiding Bishop, Protestant Episcopal Church; United Church of Christ; United Presbyterian Church, U.S.A. The National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice; The National Council of Catholic Youth; The National Federation of Catholic College Students and The Newman Club Federation. Central Conference of American Rabbis; National Conference of Synagogue Youth, Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America; National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods, Union of American Hebrew Congregations; National Federation of Temple Brotherhoods, Union of American Hebrew Congregations; National Federation of Temple Youth, Union of American Hebrew Congregations; National Women's League, United Synagogue of America; Rabbinical Assembly; Rabbinical Council of America; Union of American Hebrew Congregations; Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America; United Synagogue of America; United Synagogue Youth, United Synagogue of America; and Women's Branch, Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America.

Racial discrimination and segregation still continue to deny persons basic human rights in this country one hundred years after the issuance of the Emancipation Proclamation. There is growing determination on the part of Negroes to achieve full rights and opportunities for all people regardless of color, race or national origin, now. Negro people, as well as the religious groups submitting this testimony, are clearly aware of the disabilities upon Spanish-speaking Americans, Indian Americans as well as upon people of Asian background. The Supreme Court has indicated that civil rights are "present rights". The actual opportunity to exercise these long overdue rights must be made available to all people now. There is growing dissatisfaction with gradualism and promises of future progress. The heroic courage and suffering involved in organized direct action in many parts of the country are indications of the firm resolve to achieve these goals now.

The Nation faces the challenge to make full justice and equal opportunity for all people regardless of color, race or national origin, a reality now. This is the basis of achieving full freedom for all people. There can be no further delay in keeping faith with the responsibility to put the principles we profess and the obligations that we acknowledge into action. Racial discrimination and segregation continue to dim the hopes and to negate the promises set forth in the Declaration of Independence that "all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights." Now is the time to realize these hopes. Now is the time to fulfill these promises. This requires the Nation to engage all of its resources, religious, educational, political, industrial, economic and social to deal creatively and constructively with the problem.

The religious conscience of America condemns racism as blasphemy against God. It recognizes that the racial segregation and discrimination that flow from it are a denial of the worth which God has given to all persons. We hold that God is the Creator of all men. "In the image of God created He them". Consequently in every person there is an innate dignity which is the basis of human rights. These rights constitute a moral claim which must be honored both by all persons and by the State. Denial of such rights is immoral.

These beliefs have been repeatedly expressed by the religious leadership of our Nation. Major religious bodies hold simply that God created all men regardless of color, race or national origin, with equal rights and dignity. They affirm that differences among individuals stemming from such factors as heredity, education, cultural background and opportunities do not in any way affect basic human rights. Thus they have specifically condemned racial discrimination, segregation and prejudice as incompatible with the principles of faith in God. As supporting documents to this statement, I am attaching copies of declarations of principle by the national conferences or councils of religious bodies as well as by the general assemblies or conventions of individual denominations.

I call the attention of this committee to the National Conference on Religion and Race held in January of this year. This conference has no precedent in American history. Nearly 700 delegates from 67 major religious bodies, Protestant, Roman Catholic, Orthodox and Jewish, united in endorsement of "An Appeal to the Conscience of the American People", which is also appended to this statement. These delegates left Chicago firm in the resolution that churches and synagogues stand as one in their determination to bring about full justice and equal opportunity for all people regardless of race in the United States of America. Since the conference, activities being carried on in more than 30 cities as well as expanded and intensified interracial programs being conducted by many church and synagogue organizations are indications that this determination is being implemented.

Those human rights which men look to government to protect are called civil rights. The churches and indeed our free society as a whole, look to the State to incorporate these rights into its legal system and to insure their observance in practice.

The Message of the President of the United States on Civil Rights delivered to the 88th Congress on June 19, 1963 recognized the necessity to protect certain civil rights by enacting legislation. This message clearly sets forth the need for legislation to guarantee the availability of voting rights; to assure equal accommodation in public facilities; to facilitate desegregation of schools; to achieve fair and full employment and to establish a community relations service. Also the President submitted to the Congress a proposed act "The Civil Rights Act of 1963". This is a bill "To enforce the constitutional right to vote, to confer jurisdiction upon the district courts of the United States to provide injunctive relief against discrimination in public accommodations, to authorize the Attorney General to institute suits to protect constitutional rights in education, to establish a Community Relations Service, to extend for four years the Commission on Civil Rights, to prevent discrimination in federally assisted programs, to establish a Commission on Equal Employment Opportunity, and for other purposes."

As churches, synagogues and religious leaders, our concern is with the purpose of civil rights legislation and with the moral principles that indicate the necessity of enacting such legislation. The knowledge and judgement of the Congress and particularly of the Committees that have heard extensive testimony, will enable them to work out the details of legislation which will ensure the civil rights of all people in the Nation. Therefore we shall discuss the purposes and principles which we believe should underlie the enactment of the legislation proposed by the President of the United States. Religious people are committed to the belief that in this Nation, local, state and national governments deriving "their just powers from the consent of the governed" are responsible to God and to the people to maintain the freedom of all men under their respective jurisdictions, to exercise human rights with due regard for the rights of others and for the public order.

The right to vote is a human right which is guaranteed by the basic law of the land. The Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States specifically provides that "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude". Yet it is a fact that on the basis of color or race hundreds of thousands of citizens are denied the opportunity to register and to exercise the right to vote. Therefore we welcome and support legislation which will provide realistic guarantees for all citizens regardless of race or color, the full opportunity to register and to exercise the right to vote. Moreover we believe that the proposals for legislation set forth by the President of the United States on this subject are an important step in this direction.

For many years most national religious bodies have by official action held their meetings only where all public accommodations and facilities in hotels or other places of meetings are open to all participants without regard to race or color. Specifically this means that room assignments, building or hotel entrances, meeting rooms, lobbies, elevators, dining rooms and all building or hotel facilities or services must be available to all people regardless of race or color. Therefore these church bodies have not been able to meet in places or localities which practice racial discrimination in public accommodations.

This experience along with concern about the immorality of racial segregation and discrimination stated above and the increasing mobility of the American people cause churches, synagogues and religious leaders to highlight the importance of equal access to facilities serving the general public. These include stores, restaurants, theaters, retail establishments, service shops, places for amusement and recreation as well as hotels, motels and lodging accommodations. In many states and cities, discrimination in such facilities is currently prohibited by law. The broadening of such prohibition by a federal law is not a drastic step. Nor is it an invasion of property rights as some have claimed. Neither law nor morality sanction the concept of the absolute right of property. Both insist that the property owner must use his property in a socially responsible fashion. We have zoning laws, traffic ordinances, license and inspection requirements as well as scores of other rules and regulations that currently enforce the concept of socially responsible ownership. If we can protect citizens against the injury caused by blaring television sets surely we can give equal protection against the deep affront and humiliation caused by racial discrimination in public accommodations.

The churches and synagogues have repeatedly affirmed the right to full and equal opportunity for all people to participate on a non-segregated basis in public schools and colleges.

Many religious bodies hailed the United States Supreme Court decision rendered in 1954, declaring racial segregation in public schools unconstitutional, as an important step in achieving fuller human rights for all people in our Nation. But they are dismayed at the slow pace of implementing the decision in the nine years since it was rendered. The proposals in the Civil Rights Act of 1963 for assistance to facilitate desegregation of public schools are positive, creative and constructive steps designed to aid school boards as well as other state and local governmental units concerned with public education to step up the pace of desegregation. Provisions of this type need to be enacted into law if the inequalities in educational opportunities based upon color or race as well as the resulting social, economic, psychological, cultural handicaps to the people discriminated against and to the Nation as a whole, are to be eliminated.

Moreover the continuance of racial segregation and discrimination in public schools cause religious bodies to be concerned over the fact that parents many of whom have meager financial resources at their disposal, must bear the costs of legal proceedings to obtain equality of educational opportunity for their children. The ability or inability to obtain the opportunity to exercise civil rights must not be made dependent upon the financial resources at a person's disposal. We believe that all persons unable to bear the costs of legal proceedings should be relieved of the financial burden of securing rights which are theirs by virtue of their citizenship but which are illegally and immorally denied. Therefore we support the proposal which authorizes the Attorney General of the United States to institute civil actions in the name of the United States in district courts upon receiving a signed complaint; upon the determination that the signer or signers of the complaint are unable to initiate and maintain appropriate legal proceedings for relief and upon determination that such action will materially further the orderly process of desegregation of public schools.

The goal of the Nation is clear. Every person must have the opportunity to exercise the civil rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. Agencies or instrumentalities are needed to carry on activities designed to implement the above stated goal in order to achieve progress in race relations. While there are many state and local organizations, both public and private, an agency at the Federal Government level is needed to cooperate with these state and local groups. Such an agency could render valuable services to state and local groups and would provide insights into the nature of the problems confronting the Nation which would stimulate these groups to coordinate voluntarily their efforts in order to deal more effectively with the problems of race relations. The proposed Community Relations Service can facilitate improved race relations through the services and aid it could render to state and local groups in improving cooperation, conciliation, mediation and communication among the races. It should be noted that one of the more successful agencies of the Federal Government over the years has been the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service. It has done much, along with state, local, and private groups to insure labor peace. In a similar fashion, staff skilled in the methods of inter-group relations can do much to insure creative and constructive adjustments among the races.

The Commission on Civil Rights has already rendered distinguished service in investigating and determining the facts about the denial of civil rights by reason or color, race, religion or national origin in such areas as voting, housing, employment, the use of public facilities, transportation and the administration of justice. The reports of the Commission are exceedingly valuable in informing both government and private agencies of the actual situation confronting the Nation regarding civil rights. Many of its recommendations have been guidelines for creative and meaningful action in the area of race relations. On the basis of its performance and of its potential service in the future, the life of the Commission on Civil Rights should be extended for four years.

In regard to non-discrimination in federally assisted programs we state a principle set forth by the President of the United States in his message to the 88th Congress, "Simple justice requires that public funds to which all taxpayers of all races contribute, not be spent in any fashion which encourages, entrenches, subsidizes or results in racial discrimination." We believe that this principle should be enacted into law.

The Federal Government has taken leadership in preventing discrimination against employees or applicants for employment because of race, color, religion or national origin by government contractors. Also it has assumed leadership in preventing the same type of discrimination in government employment. Many church bodies recognize the importance of this leadership because one of the rights connected with the dignity of the human person is the right to work. They acknowledge that this leadership is important if the nation is to make full use of all of its manpower resources to create a country in which all people may live best and serve most on a continuing and growing basis. Also many religious leaders are knowledgable about the valuable work of the Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity which was created by a Presidential Executive Order. They believe that this work should continue and be expanded on a permanent basis. Therefore they support the enactment of legislation which would give the Commission on Equal Employment Opportunity a statutory basis.

But many church and synagogue bodies go beyond this. They support the enactment of federal legislation covering both employers and labor unions which provides for employment on the basis of ability and qualifications without regard to race, color, religion or national origin. Some religious groups have given careful thought to many aspects of fair employment practices. Some of these groups believe that such legislation should cover upgrading or promotion on the basis of ability and apprenticeship training. They believe also that such legislation should provide counselling services and placement services as well as training and re-training in skills to people of minority racial and other economically deprived groups. This is necessary by virtue of long denial of such opportunity. Moreover the current critical situation indicates that such legislation must have adequate enforcement provisions if it is to be effective.

Gentlemen, we hope that this Committee will report favorably on the proposals for civil rights legislation which were made by the President of the United States. We hope also that Congress will enact them into legislation as a necessary step in the process of securing for all people the opportunity to exercise the rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

In conclusion we stress the urgency of legislative action now. It is both a moral and legal principle that once it is demonstrated that basic rights are being violated, the situation should be remedied at once. Equally clear is the demand that fundamental opportunities and privileges should be accorded to all without delay.

In spite of these principles, there have been times in history when even men of good will were compelled to move slowly in securing rights and privileges. No such attenuating circumstances exist today. We are in the midst of a social revolution. Please God it will remain a social revolution and not degenerate into civil chaos. But let us not underestimate the demand for justice regardless of color, race or national origin. What is right, both in terms of basic morality and in terms of our democratic ideals, must be granted without delay. The time is past for tokenism or demands for endless patience. We must move firmly, rapidly and courageously toward goals which our consciences assure us are right and necessary. We can do no less for God and country.

STATEMENTS BY RELIGIOUS BODIES

AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL
Council of Bishops
February 15-18, 1956

...In this struggle for universal acceptance of an integrated society, the Negro church plays an increasingly vital role. We have witnessed instance after instance of sacrifice, toil, and even bloodshed by ordained ministers of the Gospel determined to make a reality out of the professions of Democracy...

Our people must know that all men are created equal and that any divergence from this principle is hypocrisy, in fact, immoral. The people must likewise know that the law of the land is second only to the law of God and that to openly flout the dictates of the highest tribunal is flirting with tragedy...

AMERICAN BAPTIST CONVENTION
May 17, 1963

Recognizing that segregation and discrimination separate men, and aware that being reconciled to God we are brought close to all men in the fellowship of Jesus Christ, we urge local churches to attack all forms of alienation with courage and dispatch.

We reaffirm our stand that not only should all American Baptist churches be open to all followers of Jesus Christ regardless of their race but that we should earnestly and actively seek to win all unchurched persons within our community to Christ and to the fellowship of the church. We reaffirm our belief that all persons should be given the opportunity to develop the knowledge and skills needed for church leadership and that all positions of leadership within the local church and on area and national levels should be open on the basis of qualification without regard to race....

AMERICAN BAPTIST HOME MISSION SOCIETIES
March 23, 1960

In obedience to the imperative of the Gospel of Jesus Christ which recognizes no barriers to fellowship, we oppose racial segregation in all forms, and in all places. We affirm our opposition to the denial of the rights of Negroes or any minority group in matters of voting, housing, library privileges and the facilities of lunch counters. Wherever segregation appears, whether in the north or south, the east or the west, in a church or at a lunch counter, there is a denial of Christian love and justice and of the democratic rights of citizens. To affirm this is to presume to judge others but to acknowledge a moral principle rooted in our Biblical faith by which all are judged...

CHRISTIAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL
Annual Conference, 1958

...Commitment to the conviction that the best form of government is a government of the people, by the people and for the people and dedication to the determined effort to secure for every American citizen full political franchise and freedom from fear and want...

That every attempt be made to arouse the conscience of America to her responsibility of practicing at home the democracy she preaches abroad, of making possible and guaranteeing to all minority groups at home the freedom she offers the oppressed peoples of other lands, of assuring those victims of prejudices, discrimination and oppression within her own borders the same opportunities she affords the refugees from the lands of the Iron Curtain...

That we use techniques based solely on passive resistance such as work stoppage, economic boycotts, slow downs, sit-down strikes, picket lines, mass demonstrations and political unity wherever there is a threat or attempt to deprive our people of enjoying their full rights as citizens of our nation...

CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN
General Brotherhood Board, March 24, 1960

Therefore, we, the General Brotherhood Board, resolve:

1. That we believe discrimination against racial, cultural and religious minorities is morally wrong;

2. That action to remove this discrimination is imperative, both in the light of the Christian ethic and in the spirit of our democratic tradition;

3. That we see our first obligation to seek change through honest discussion and negotiation, but, such methods failing, we regard peaceful nonviolent direct action as an appropriate Christian witness for those whose consciences so lead them;...

FUNDAMENTAL JUSTICE VS. LEGALITY

The question is not one of mere legality, however. One must raise the question of the fundamental justice of the issue which lies beyond the sit-ins. Do not Negroes have the same right to be treated with the dignity and decency as whites? Are we not all, Negro and white, brothers and neighbors under God's creation and does not our master say to us: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself?" Are we not then, as Christians, committed to the principle of equitable treatment of all people regardless of race? Must we not therefore, not only admit, but insist upon and work toward the rapid removal of the patterns of segregation which deny fundamental dignity as human beings to certain persons because of accidents of birth. The plain fact is, however, that Christians on the whole have done almost nothing to alleviate the situations in which Negroes have found themselves. We have, furthermore, by our own acquiescence and silence supported those who by restrictive legislation and intimidation have stood in the way of Negroes achieving equality of opportunity. One night wish, as some have, that this whole issue had never arisen - that Negroes had been content to accept an inferior status in our society - that they had not upset the even tenor of our privileged white existence. One might wish that they had never heard of non-violent resistance to evil, but they have. Now Christians must face the issue where it is and decide whether the fundamental justice of their protest overrides possible questions of legality.

EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN
General Conference, Oct. 9-17, 1958

As Christians we are ashamed of the treatment accorded minority races in our nation. The New Testament teaches that God is no respector of persons, and men are to be treated with respect and dignity.

We, therefore, unalterably oppose all practices of racial segregation.

Christian love is more than sentiment. It is active good-will, redemptive kindness, patient goodness. We desperately need this Christian love in this present hour of friction and distrust among the races...

THE FIVE YEARS MEETING OF FRIENDS
July 14-21, 1960

We humbly recognize that our Society as a whole has not been true to this basic Christian belief. Too often pioneering in racial equality has been left to the few. But in this day of racial crisis every member of the Society of Friends should be concerned that all races have equal opportunity to participate with one another in worship, education, housing, employment and voting, and to join in our fellowship.

The Christian way to combat injustice is to act in the spirit of love and forgiveness which Christ both lived and taught, admonishing us "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use and persecute you."(Matt. 5:44) In recent months and years our Negro brothers in Christ have practiced to a remarkable degree these precepts of the Master as they have opposed injustice non-violently and in the spirit of Christian love. We are grateful to them for their leadership in demonstrating the relevance of Christ's teaching in our time and in our own communities.

Race prejudice and hatred are spiritual and moral diseases not confined to any one section of one country or to any one nation. In God's world there is no place for discrimination or prejudice because of racial or national origin, economic circumstance or religious belief. We believe that there is something in every man which can respond to the love of God, and that every man has the God given right to walk over the earth in dignity and self respect. We have the opportunity and the obligation to help secure this right for all.

The Church as a Brotherhood

The Church of Jesus Christ, despite all the distinctions between male and female, Jews and non-Jew, white and colored, poor and rich, is one in its Lord. The Unitas Fratrum recognizes no distinction between those who are in the Lord Jesus Christ. We are called to testify that God in Jesus Christ brings His people into being out of "every race, kindred and tongue", pardons sinners beneath the Cross and brings them into one body. We oppose any discrimination in our midst because of race or standing, and we regard it as a commandment of the Lord to bear public witness to this and to demonstrate by word and deed that we are brothers and sisters in Christ.

NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION, U.S.A., INC.

Almost any American tourist of Europe and other eastern countries meets with the question of the attitude of America toward the intermingling of the races composing the population of the United States.

Some of these peoples are quite "scathing" in their remarks concerning the American claim of Democracy and Christianity on the one hand and the treatment America permits to be accorded her minority peoples on the other.

For many years Negroes have been puzzled as to the attitude they should adopt regarding the sincerity of the American claim of the policy of "JUSTICE TO ALL AND SPECIAL PRIVILEGE TO NONE".

When, however, the Supreme Court issued her memorable decision outlawing segregation in the public schools, the race took heart and reorganized her thinking with regard to America being in truth "The Land of the Free and the Home of the Brave."

Negroes love America and entertain no bitterness toward her despite the vicious wrongs some commit against them in certain sections of the country. They have too long agonized in prayer for her security. They have given too freely of their blood to vouchsafe her institutions - not to love her with undying devotion. They believe the Supreme Court on May 17, 1954 justified the faith, the hope and the love they exercise toward this country.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF THE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, 1961

The Religious Society of Friends recognizes the Divine spark in every human being and we are deeply concerned with the racial and religious discrimination that exists in our local communities. We are equally concerned with the suffering, the waste of talents and the antagonisms which result from segregation and which block spiritual and cultural growth. Under these conditions, the majority group as well as the minority group suffers.

In our country today, individuals and groups are set apart from the main stream of American life on the basis of their religious background, the color of their skin, or the country of their birth. In large ways and small, such persons are denied full participation in our community life.

We believe that everyone should have real equality of opportunity in securing an education, in finding employment best suited to their abilities or in buying or renting a home. In all of these areas of life, minority groups now repeatedly experience frustration and humiliation. If American society is really motivated by religious and democratic ideals, there is no place for discrimination....

REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR
TO THE COMMISSION ON RELIGION AND RACE OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

July 26, 1963

A Night of Watching

Two weeks ago tonight I was in Egypt. Actually I was in Savannah, Georgia at the peak of the tension in that city. In the afternoon I had met with the leading white clergymen of the city along with Andrew Young and James Bevel of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. We had convinced them that the tension generated by the jailing of all the responsible Negro leadership in the protest movement, and the deadlock over further progress in desegregation in that city meant that grave disorder and violence was a real danger. That group, including the Catholic, and Episcopal bishops and later with the concurrence of the Methodist bishop, decided to issue a statement intended to break the deadlock and reopen negotiation. That was a tense enough situation.

But in the evening, at Andrew Young's invitation I went to the protest meeting held in the Flamingo nightclub, on the outskirts of the city. Mr. Young had come to Savannah to take up the leadership vaccum left by the irresponsible arresting of the local Negro leadership. The scene that evening was one I will never forget. As a white person coming to an illegally held meeting in the Negro ghetto, I was questioned closely and inspected thoroughly before I was allowed inside. Here was a group of about a hundred people - women with their dresses and persons burned by tear gas, young men bandaged and battered, and all in a near state of hysteria, as a result of the pressures they had been subjected to through the preceding days. They were singing the songs of freedom without pause, in a growing crescendo of desperation - "Before I'll be a slave, I'll be buried in my grave, and go home to my Lord and be free." "We shall overcome".

Everyone present knew that when they went back up the hill they would be met at the city limits by the armored National Guard and police. When I left the place, young men searched all the hills behind the row of houses through which I would have to drive, looking for snipers. In those days, irresponsible men, Negro and white, were shooting first and asking later.

One often uses a phrase, "an atmosphere filled with tension". This is the first time in my life that I experienced this to be a physical fact and not just a figure of speech. One knew that the lighting of a match in the room would have produced an explosion.

The leaders of these people were all in jail, their friends and relatives were in jail. They faced it on the homeward journey, or perhaps something worse. And in such a time of hopelessness, Andy Young spoke to the people of hope and victory and the need for responsible behavior. He asked me to speak to them about the concern that other Christians felt for them. It was a difficult thing to do. Words seem to come very cheap when you are only a visitor in Hell. But I could speak of this Commission and what it represents about the determination of American Christianity to end the evil of racial discrimination.

I had the strongest feeling that I was in Egypt on the night of Passover, just before the time of deliverance. "It was a night of watching by the Lord, to bring them out of the land of Egypt, so this same night is a night of watching kept to the Lord by all the people of Israel through their generations", the twelfth chapter of Exodus records.

Or it could have been in the catacombs of Rome in the first century, or in the Warsaw ghetto twenty five years ago, or in Sharpsville, South Africa, not so very long ago.

But it was really happening in my own, own land, not more than two miles from the home of white friends where I have spent many pleasant and serene times. It seemed a million miles away.

The reality of the chasm of color that separated white Savannah from Negro Savannah could not be evaded. And here was a grim portent of what actually could happen all over this land - not only the separation of white and Negro communities, but a separation marked by the necessity of a police wall between them. The nameless fears of this present crisis now had shape and substance - the possibility of a militant Negro community fighting for its rights, underground if necessary, and a white community so dominated by fear of losing its position and wealth that it could only react defensively.

There have been times in the past few weeks, when I have been so caught up in this struggle that I have questioned my own evaluation of its widespread seriousness. Perhaps, those of us who are so deeply committed in the struggle, might be guilty of over dramatization. Savannah taught me that the serious consequences of the events of the present and the next few months cannot be exaggerated.

But let me quickly go on to call to attention, the more positive aspects of mid summer.

The worst fears of many new outbreaks of violence have not yet materialized. This is largely due to the unbelieveably skilled leadership of the Negro protest movements, which has refrained from opening any new major points of protest despite much provocation, and the pressure from the masses of people to do so. Arrests still go on in every part of the nation.

Thousands have been arrested for participation in civil rights demonstrations since the beginning of the year. But the major attention of everyone is upon the passage of the legislation, upon Washington, the center of our national responsibility. This concentration upon redress of grievances through adequate legislation is very good, but it also puts a very heavy burden on the symbolism of what passage of that legislation can mean. If it does not get passed, substantially the way it has been proposed, then widespread disillusionment and reaction is inevitable.

Also it must be noted that large and powerful segments of the white population are now moving to the support of the civil rights movement in an unprecendented fashion. The Business Council under the chairmanship of Mr. Keppel, president of A.T. and T, and supported by the leading industrialists of the country is now moving to mobilize industry toward all out efforts to enlist Negroes in places of employment where they have never been welcome before, and also to make serious efforts for training programs. The lawyers are similarly organized, and these two groups are in constant touch with our Commission to see in what way we can work together in specific crisis situations and in longer range programs for the rebalancing of opportunity for Negro citizens.

It is difficult for me to assess the real weight of the effect of active religious participation in this struggle. Judging however by the comments of people in government, these professional groups and the civil rights groups themselves, it would seem that our activity, Protestant, Catholic and Jewish, is making some significant difference. In the light of it, one is chagrined by the rememberance of our hesitancy and expendiency in the years just past.

In general summary of where the nation stands in mid summer, and where we stand in relation to the battle, one must say, that we still watch in a night of uncertain end, but with a sense of gratitude to God that so many forces are now struggling to shake off their lethargy and move to battle against the accused sin of discrimination, not in general, but in particular forms - legislation, jobs, public accommodations and the rest.

Report of Progress

It is now my responsibility to report to you, what the staff of the commission has been about in these intervening weeks since the first meeting of the Commission.

Although I was elected at that first meeting, I did not officially take up my duties as executive director until July 15th. We all owe an enormous debt of gratitude to Dr. Jon Regier for his competent and aggressive leadership of the work of the commission in those days of formation. Although I did not come to sit at the desk until two weeks ago, I kept in constant touch with events while I was in attendance at the United Church of Christ General Synod in Denver, and then on a field trip home through the south, the trip that took me to Savannah.

Let me briefly record what we have been working at in the three major areas laid out at the last meeting of the Commission for prime concentration.

The desegregation of the churches

Dr. Colin Williams and Dr. Dai Kitagawa have been working on plans for several consultations across the country which will be actual workshops for churches who wish to have counsel in integrating their constituencies. Some of the brethren from overseas now attending the Montreal Faith and Order Conference may also participate in some preparatory meeting for those conferences.

Two pilot projects have been set up in local communities, one in Chatham, New Jersey, and another in Philadelphia and are already at work. These are groups of church people, drawn from many different churches and cooperating on an interfaith basis as well, whose major purpose is to try to achieve the goal of "an unsegregated church in an unsegragated community", so long marked as a pious goal.

Mr. Bryant George has begun collecting information on the methods and procedures which denominations can use in the desegregation of church institutions. The actions taken at General Synod by the United Church Board for Homeland Ministries in denying monies and aid to new church projects for building purposes, and also to schools and health and welfare institutions which discriminate, provides something of a pattern.

The staff of this work group, along with Mr. Moring of the general staff has called into being here in the building a task force of over 60 National Council employees who are enabled to meet for two hours a week on Council time to educate and train themselves for witness in the field of race relations, and to make themselves ready for direct demonstration if that be necessary. Both clerical and professional staff is involved.

Civil Rights Legislation

For the first time in the history of this country, as far as we know, Catholic, Protestant and Jewish forces joined together to prepare and present joint testimony before Congressional Committee on proposed legislation. Dr. Oscar Lee, carried our responsibility in this drafting.

On Wednesday, Dr. Blake, accompanied by Rabbi Irwin Blank, of the Synagogue Council of America, and Father John Cronin of the National Catholic welfare Conference, appeared before the House Committee on the Judiciary, and on Thursday, before the Senate Committee on Commerce, and the Sub-Committee on Employment and Manpower of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Under the leadership of James Hamilton, Harold Letts and Eleanor French we have been moving toward an extensive strategy of intepretation and solicitation for the support of this crucial legislation on Civil Rights.

We have joined with a large number of other national groups in the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights to set up a coordinated approach to the problem in Washington.

The denominational staff conference has met (these are the responsible social action staff people in the denominations) and have organized a widespread network of communication, centering on 14 key midwestern and western states, to get heavy mail and local support for the legislation with the key legislators.

One of the particular recommendations of this Commission at its last meeting was the possibility of organizing a broad, inclusive committee of distinguished citizens who might urge the passage of legislation at this time. Largely under Victor Reuther's guiding genius, such a committee is now being approached, on an interfaith, informal basis, and not under the sponsorship of any one body. This staff however is heavily involved in making preparations for it.

Community Action

And now one moves to the third area of our responsibility - the initiation of and participation in concrete instances of achieving justice for all citizens.

This is the area in which we have the least experience, where the risks are greatest, and where the possibility of misjudgment haunts us continually. We only know, that despite these incalcuables, unless we do play it straight here, all our other activity is jeopardized. We have been consulted and involved tangentially in many different situations across the country, but in certain places, most significantly.

The first of course was Baltimore, and the demonstrations at the Gwynn Oaks Amusement Park. We went into this with much trepidation. Was this a worthy target in the light of all the places where problems exist? Would this seem to be grandstanding? These were some of the questions that everyone had. The local community was in the main opposed to our participation, except of course for the action groups whose brave efforts we were joining. I will not dwell on this event, because it has been widely reported around the country. Our acting chairman may wish to speak of it in more detail. He was some what involved there. In summary however, the overwhelming evidence seems to be that it was a worthy target, and worthy results were achieved. The city of Baltimore moved to set up a bi-racial committee, and our last reports are that the Amusement Park, long a bastion of arrogant discrimination in the Baltimore area is now moving to end their practice of barring Negro patrons.

Far beyond the immediate effect however, was the significance that this deed had in dramatizing to the nation that the religious establishment meant business. The presence of these distinguished clergymen, and pre-eminently of course Dr. Blake and Bishop Daniel Corrigan, in a protest on the Fourth of July at an amusement park, said to the nation in a way that no pronouncement of this commission ever could, that every last vestige of public discrimination in this country had to fall before the weight of the Christian conscience.

The next week, a group of churchmen, some from this commission, went to Clarksdale, Miss, upon the urgent request of Mr. Aaron Henry, the local leader of the NAACP. Clarksdale, in the delta of Mississippi is one of the hard core cities, where Negroes have no privileges or opportunities to be first class citizens. The one modest goal of the Negro community is to have a bi-racial commission set up, to begin to deal with the situation, which is very desperate, as far as the Negro citizens are concerned. Almost as soon as they arrived in town, our delegation was served an injunction which forbade them to engage in any kind of activity which might seem to be a demonstration, including "kneeling in" in church - a rather strange prohibition to expect to be obeyed by a group of church leaders. Little head way was made with local white leadership, either church leaders or community leaders. The group withdrew from Clarksdale, committed to go back at a later time. That time seems to be approaching, and major discussion will go on today about appropriate action and procedure.

I have already mentioned my participation in Savannah. Here the approach was different. Knowing that the situation was about to explode, and having some contacts with both Negro and white ministers in the city, I invited local church leaders, through their national leaders in each denomination, to meet me at a certain time in that city to see what we could do.

The resulting statement on the part of these religious leaders when it was published in the papers caused some of these men to have real pressure put on them; but is credited by some as the event which really broke the log jam and encouraged a new negotiating committee to be established. There are many complicated problems in Savannah still, but the long range prognosis seems to be good.

Last week in Brooklyn, several of the leading ministers joined the demonstrations against the construction companies employed by the state to build a new medical center. They were arrested and others have repeatedly joined in the same kind of protest. Dr. Lee has been our liaison with this protest, and has participated in the demonstrations, thus joining the long line of jail birds associated with this commission.

We have also been involving in helping a contingent of Savannah protest people get accommodations and material in New York City while they brought their witness to the Chase Manhattan Bank in this city. This bank holds the latest bond issue of the city of Savannah. Similar spot service was rendered to a group of people from Danville, Virginia, who came to confront the Dan River Company home office. We have been asked by the group which negotiated the peace in Cambridge, Md. to help them establish it in fact by working with the white clergy in that city, encouraging them to support the implementation of the plan that has been worked out.

One of the major events that looms ahead of us is the March to Washington set for August 28th. We have a deep commitment to this event, because the general board mandate which set up this commission also called for such an assembly in Washington to dramatize the national nature of this great cause. A coordinating organization has been set up to handle this for the sponsoring organizations. We have joined with the Civil Rights organizations as joint sponsors of the March, although we will have a distinctive role as well. We will be hearing about this in greater detail later in the meeting.

Other Major Concerns

One of the heartening trends of the last few weeks has been the way in which the various communions have one after another begun to mobilize their resources in the field of achieving racial justice now. The Presbyterians (USA), Episcopalians, United Church, Disciples, Church of the Brethren, Baptists, have all set up special committees, and the other major denominations are gearing their regular channels, to cooperate with our Commission and to work within their own ranks toward specific action. This past Tuesday, we held the first of a series of meetings with denominational staff assigned to these special emphases. We intend to work with these people as a kind of cabinet, particularly during the next two months, when coordination of effort of support for the legislation and such events as the Washington March is so important.

Our cooperation with Jewish and Catholic groups continues to be one of the most deeply satisfying aspects of the battle. We all find it perfectly natural to call one another and ask for immediate help in any emergency or on any long range policy. Tomorrow I will address the National Council Inter-racial conference on the work of this Commission. We are indeed of one mind.

We have been endeavoring to keep in communication with the continuing committee of the National Conference on Religion and Race, and indeed, to participate in the decisions that will help it to be an effective instrument for interreligious action on this front in many local communities.

Mention must also be made of the unusual kind of cooperation we are receiving from the Federal Government. Responsible officials of the Justice Department are at our disposal day and night to make available any resources they may have which will help us in our struggle to effect changes for integration. There is in no way pressure or interference on the part of government in our plans and programs. But they are willing to be at our disposal in the same way they are acting for business and professional groups working to accomplish desegregation. The government is serious about this.

One of the most difficult tasks confronting me has been to try to create an organization and gather a staff at the same time we were obliged to carry a full program, often times composed of high pressure and emergency situations. We have had valiant temporary clerical help, but we must still beg your indulgence for sloppy minutes, erratic performance and just plain administrative oversights. I believe we are moving toward some order and procedure.

We are very fortunate to have the high quality staff now gathered. May I introduce them to you and indicate what areas of work they will work in.

Dr. Oscar Lee, was already presented to you at the first meeting of the commission. Dr. Lee will carry general responsibility as Associate Executive Director and undertake special areas of work that loom up with major need for concentration. He will make a brief report to you at the conclusion of my remarks.

The Rev. James Moore, has been loaned to the Commission by the Office of Information to act as Associate Director for oversight of the community action program. Mr. Moore has been deeply involved in the activities from the beginning. He has a rich background of experience here in the Council, and before that with the Voice of America and the United States Army.

Dr. Anna Arnold Hedgeman, one of the distinguished political leaders of the country has joined our staff as Coordinator of Special Events. It is her first immediate responsibility to mobolize our support of the Washington March. Dr. Hedgeman has had a long and distinguished career in federal and city government, and is one of the best known leaders of church women in the country.

Mr. James Hamilton will continue to act as Associate Director for Legislation. He will work with Dr. Harold Letts of the Division of Life and Work and Miss Eleanor French of the United Church Women.

Dr. Colin Williams, Dr. Dai Kitagawa, and Dr. Jon Regier will share responsibility for staffing the Commission's work in the desegregation of the life of the church.

Many other Council people will be adding their strength to various phases of the program, but these will carry the major responsibility.

We are still looking for other full time staff people. We are in particular need of a person to act as Associate Director for Intepretation. One of the greatest problems we face is that our involvement and our action has far outrun our lines of communication. We need a person and someone who will assist him or her to do a regular bulletin on the work of the commission, but beyond that to dig out the content material on what is happening on every front of the battle, for the widest possible desemination. We have excellent press relations personnel in the counsel. That is not what we are looking for, but rather someone who has a nose for content to feed to the press, and to work at the broad but desperately important job of interpretation of issue and fact. There is so much distorted and superficial knowledge abroad even now.

In addition we need two or three field staff people who can be Mr. Moore's eyes and ears in various parts of the country. It is just not physically possible for all the information that comes to us to flow across his desk and mine, and for us to have to check back all the sources for accuracy.

Another possible staff function that I am beginning to believe we need is someone who is specially adept at meeting and dealing with key Christian business leaders as they face their responsibilities, both in the employment question and at the point of their responsibility for the public policies of some of the towns where their plants are located. Increasingly knowledgeable Negro leaders in the south believe that the real key to action in many southern cities is through northern business leaders who have deep economic involvement in the south.

Issues To Be Faced

Let me now conclude, by raising to view some of the basic policy questions that seem to me should be discussed by the commission. This session is scheduled to be a work session, and the breakdown into groups is designed to facilitate more intense penetration of some of these issues.

There are some general questions however, that underlie decisions in all areas:

In the light of the overwhelming number of opportunities now coming before us which could demand our attention, what are our prime targets, and what is the best use of our limited resources?

How do we walk responsibly the narrow edge between identification and influence?

This question needs some interpretation. What is meant however, is that we are committed to identifying ourselves with Negroes in their struggle to get justice in specific situations. In the deep south, however, the moment we do this, in active demonstration, we cut off all effective channels of influence in the white community which we might initially possess.

We are beginning, I believe, to develop a process, a series of steps which have to be followed. These are in line with the Commission's insistence at our last meeting, that in so far as possible we work always through local church leaders. This must be our inflexible rule, that we always try to get them to act, first, and that second we try to get lay people to act for redressing grievance, either in the local community or through those who have some influence on that community. But always we must make perfectly clear that we are committed to the securing of justice and that if they do not act, we feel called and indeed are under mandate to participate in direct demonstration with the aggrieved for the securing of justice.

So the question, how to balance identification with influence?

And perhaps the most important issue facing us, our own peculiar responsibility, is how do we awaken our constituencies in the Mid West and Far West to the crucial role they play in getting civil rights legislation, and thus giving the whole nation a door through which to move toward health?

Mr. Chairman, and members of the Commission, we are still in the night of waiting, but I am grateful to God that we have the assurance of victory in Jesus Christ. Never has that knowledge meant more to me. It is not ministerial rhetoric. It is a living fact. When men begin to follow Christ, belatedly, stumblingly, but with some of the courage it always takes, the ultimate victory is never in doubt. And what is more unbelievable strength and wisdom is given in the midst of the risk taking that is never available in any other position.

Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk

D. R. C. NEWSLETTER

NO. 67 | 117, De Korte Street, Johannesburg, Republic of South Africa. | June/July 1963

UNITED BANTU CHURCH

The union of the Dutch Reformed Bantu (Mission) Churches in the four provinces of the Republic of South Africa took place in May, when the first General Synod was constituted at Kroonstad.

The formal union was entered into on 7th May when the delegates solemnly passed the following resolution: "With profound gratitude to the King of the church, Who has prayed for the unity of His church, this gathering now constitutes itself as the General Synod of the churches concerned, by which the union of these churches becomes an accomplished fact." The name of the church is "Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in Afrika" (Dutch Reformed Church in Africa). The name is therefore the same as that of the mother church except for the addition of the words "in Africa".

In an article in Die Voorligter, the Rev. A. A. Odendaal points out that the word "mission" no longer forms part of the name of the church and that the synod firmly rejected the idea of dropping or changing the words "Dutch Reformed". He quotes from a letter written by one of the non-white clergymen: "The name Dutch Reformed must never disappear, because the child inherits its father's name. Our church was born through and out of the mother church and should retain its identity with the mother church until the end of the world."

Mr. Odendaal continues: "The Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in Afrika stands on the threshold of great and important developments. From the mother church it has inherited its name and many outstanding characteristics, but in the new Africa of tomorrow it will have to find its own way and methods in many respects. May its ties with its mother (the Dutch Reformed Church among the whites) and its sister (the Dutch Reformed Church among the Coloureds) remain firm and may it always be surrounded by understanding love and many prayers."

The following clergymen were elected to form the first moderamen (executive committee): the Rev. C. J. J. van Rensburg (moderator), the Rev. Dr. M. L. Maile (assessor), the Rev. J. J. du Plessis (actuary) and the Rev. A. M. Scheffler (scribe). The church comprises 294 non-white congregations with 357,749 baptised members and 117,448 communicant members (see also Newsletter no. 63).

CENTRAL AFRICAN SYNOD

The Central African Synod of the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk met at Bothashof, near Salisbury, from 26th April to 3rd May.

The meeting was attended by 23 clergymen and 23 elders from the 28 congregations in Northern Rhodesia, Southern Rhodesia and Kenya.

The following delegates were elected to the moderamen (executive committee): the Rev. P. de Vos Grobbelaar (moderator), the Rev. A. F. Louw (assessor), the Rev. P. J. de Vos (actuary) and the Rev. L. F. van Niekerk (scribe).

One of the main problems faced by the synod was the uncertain future of the territories concerned. Especially in Kenya and Northern Rhodesia church membership has dropped in recent months because many members are moving to South Africa. Two congregations have already been dissolved, and some pastors are serving more than one congregation.

Nevertheless, the synod faced the future with courage and determination. A proposal to disband the Central African Synod and to place the area under the jurisdiction of the Northern Transvaal Synod was firmly rejected. The synod also decided to appoint a full-time official charged with the promotion and co-ordination of all synodical activities and interests.

The synod was informed that the Van Riebeeck School at Thomson's Falls, in Kenya, will probably be sold to the Kenya Christian Council. The school was closed at the end of last year as a result of dwindling enrolment (see Newsletter no. 64). The Bothashof church school and orphanage, now situated near Salisbury, will be moved to Marandellas, where new buildings will be erected. The church also has a school at Bulawayo, a home for the aged at Gwelo, and a girls hostel in Salisbury (the latter run by the women's organisation of the church). Another hostel is being planned for Lusaka.

The synod decided to continue its membership of the Christian Councils of Northern and Southern Rhodesia. Efforts will be made to conduct services on television. The responsible authorities will be requested to provide facilities for the broadcasting of services in Afrikaans and to recognise the Afrikaans language as a subject in primary schools.

Among the visitors who addressed the synod were the Rev. E. N. Ngara, moderator of the synod of the African Reformed Church of Southern Rhodesia, and the Rev. A. Hunt, on behalf of the Ministers' Fraternal of Salisbury.

MISSIONARY RETIRES

The Rev. T. C. Esterhuysen has retired as mission secretary of the Southern Transvaal Synod after serving as a missionary on the Witwatersrand for 42 years. He has also served as moderator of the Transvaal synod of the mission church and is chairman of the Johannesburg Hospital Board. The following extracts are quoted from an article in The Star:

"Recalling some of the events of his life, Mr. Esterhuysen said that what gave him the greatest satisfaction was that he had been able to serve all races here. Apart from serving on Coloured and Indian educational institutions, he has had many Indians and Coloureds come to his home during those 42 years to ask him advice. When he came to the Rand in 1921, straight from the Mission Institute at Wellington, his parish stretched from Randfontein to Springs and for eigth-and-a-half years he criss-crossed the Rand by bicycle. He has an outstanding memory and is considered to be a walking encyclopaedia about most of the older Dutch Reformed parsons in South Africa. He is also greatly beloved among the clergy, including parsons from English churches."

NEW BROCHURE

Instead of the ordinary June issue of this Newsletter, our latest English brochure was sent to all subscribers last month. That brochure is titled "What the Dutch Reformed Church stands for" and is based on an article by the well-known Professor G. B. A. Gerdener.

It is aimed at giving readers a general idea of the origin, creed, activities and characteristics of the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk. Additional copies are obtainable from the Church Information Offices in Cape Town and Johannesburg.

New subscribers are informed that two other brochures in English are also in supply, namely "Go Ye Therefore" (published in 1962) and "Statements on Race Relations" (published in 1960).

SYNOD RESOLUTIONS

The mission committee of the Southern Transvaal Synod reported that notwithstanding tension and disruptive circumstances, church members had not failed to support and sustain the missionary effort. The synod instructed the committee to strengthen its funds in order to carry out the work with even greater vigour, especially among the thousands of non-whites living in the urban areas. The synod decided not to assume responsibility for the mission station in the Lichtenburg Reserve, but voted a substantial subsidy for the work. Extension of the work among the Coloured people in the Transvaal is also under consideration.

A substantial increase in the mission budget was voted by the Northern Transvaal Synod. The synod expressed its appreciation for the interest shown by women and children in the missionary cause. Courses in the vernacular will be arranged and missionaries will be required to pass examinations in the vernacular. An organising mission secretary will be appointed in the Northern Transvaal.

The committee for the service of compassion recommended the establishment of an institution for alcoholics in Johannesburg. The committee expressed grave concern about alcoholism and advocated a determined and sustained effort to help the families affected. It recommended that not only religion be used in the campaign but also scientific, medical, phsychological and sociological knowledge. The appointment of a second pastoral pscychologist for that purpose was approved by the synods.

The Southern Transvaal Synod instructed a committee to study and define the task of the welfare services of the government and the church in their respective fields. It was stressed that service of mercy through personal, family, child, social and institutional work was an essential part of the ministry.

The Southern Transvaal Synod asked parish councils to appoint special committees to make contact with immigrants. The evangelisation committee was requested to appoint an authoritative committee which will suggest methods to win back former church members who have turned to various sects. Another committee was instructed to study the propagation of Roman Catholicism in the country and the duty of the state with regard to the preservation of the Protestant character of the nation.

The Southern Transvaal Synod stated that Sunday observance could best be promoted by preaching, by discipline, by protective laws, and by setting an example to others. A committee of the General Synod was asked to give an authoritative interpretation of last year's decisions regarding divorce and remarriage, for the guidance of ministers and parish councils.

Both synods accepted a report stating that spinning a racquet or tossing a coin at the beginning of a game was not sinful. The dangers of misuse of the lot should be guarded against, not by prohibiting it completely in the case of games, but rather by using it with respect and responsibility. The synods also wanted the General Synod to ask the government to change the preamble to the South African constitution in order to include a reference to the Bible.

The cross symbol and stained glass windows could be of great significance in a church, stated the Northern Transvaal Synod. Congregations were warned, however, against exaggerated use of symbols which could distract attention from the preaching of the Word.

BIBLE TRANSLATION

The report for 1962 of the Bible Society of South Africa makes impressive reading about people in Johannesburg, Cape Town and Durban working as a team to translate, produce and distribute the Bible throughout the country. Afrikaners, English-speaking South Africans, Coloureds, Indians, Zulus, Xhosas, Basutos, Bapedi and Batswana are among the workers.

During 1962 the local society became the Bible Society of South Africa, an auxiliary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the annual report contains the announcement that President Swart has bestowed his patronage on it. There are three main areas of work in the country — northern, south-eastern and south-western, each with an organising secretary and a Bible House.

During the three years 1960, 1961 and 1962 the total distribution of the Bible in South Africa was nearly 2,500,000 copies. In 1962 alone the total was nearly 627,000. The aim is to make the Scriptures available to everybody in the mother tongue at a price all can afford to pay. The translation and revision programme of the British and Foreign Bible Society contains 325 projects, of which more than half are in Africa. The society is supported by donors and congregations big and small. In the whole country a total of R26,916 was bequeathed in legacies during 1962.

POPE JOHN XXIII: "ONE OF THE RIGHTEOUS AMONG THE PEOPLES OF THE EARTH"

BY RABBI MARC H. TANENBAUM

SINCE biblical times, there has been a vital Jewish tradition which holds that the highest tribute the Jewish people can bestow on a non-Jew is to regard him as echod m'chasidei umot ha'olam, "one of the righteous among the peoples of the earth." Such "righteous" ones, according to The Ethics of the Fathers, are regarded as blessed and are "vouchsafed a portion in the world to come." Their lives of piety and righteousness are seen as crucial in helping "to sustain the world." For such noble spirits, the Talmud enjoined Jews to praise God and to thank Him: "He who sees the sages of the nations of the world says, 'Blessed be He who has given of wisdom to flesh and blood.' "

The religious practice is well known among Jews, dating back to the Pharasaic and Rabbinic period, who when they talked of a devout Christian, add, God be with him, God help him, may God prolong his life. When recalling deceased pious Christians, they add the words: Blessed be his memory, may his soul be received in the host of the blessed.

During the anxious weeks of illness preceding his death, the name of Pope John XXIII became synonymous with "hasid," the "righteous one," the "pious one" and on the lips of hosts of Jews were these traditional words of prayer and benediction. On May 28, when the newspapers grimly proclaimed, "Pope Worse," the New York Board of Rabbis — representing Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform rabbis serving the largest Jewish community in the world — made a public appeal to its members to offer prayers to God for the Pope's recovery. Similar appeals were made by major Jewish religious bodies, national Rabbinic and Synagogual, as well as civic and social action groups such as my own, the American Jewish Committee.

These were unprecedented expressions of concern and tribute from Jews in all walks of life, and from throughout the inhabited world, for a Pontiff of the Catholic Church. Jews have held a number of Popes in especial esteem, beginning with the great Pope Gregory I of the sixth century who inaugurated the far-reaching Papal Bull, Sicut Judeis, which guaranteed the Jewish people their right to unhindered worship and protection from forced conversion. But no Pope that I know of throughout the history of the Church has communicated such a clear and consistent attitude of friendship and profound understanding toward the Jewish people and Judaism as had John XXIII. To paraphrase a Presbyterian's comment, "He is the best Pope the Jews ever had!"

While they shared with many non-Catholics the general regard for Pope John's warm human qualities, Jews had additional reasons for their friendly attitudes.

ACTIONS and pronouncements of the Pope had impressed Jews with his serious desire to improve relations between Catholics and Jews. Many were deeply moved by reports that toward the end of World War II, the Pope, then serving as the apostolic delegate in the Middle East, made available baptismal certificates that enabled the rescue of thousands of Jewish men, women, and children from Nazi death camps. He had reacted to the appeal for aid spontaneously, and he had made no conditions.

Shortly after ascending the papal throne, the Pontiff ordered the removal from Catholic liturgy of several references regarded as offensive to the Jews. During this year's Good Friday worship services, when the celebrant of the Mass repeated the phrase "perfidious Jews" either out of habit or as a result of using a missal that had not been brought up to date, the Pope, according to newspaper reports, halted the Triduum rite and caused the passage to be repeated with the offensive phrase left out.

His reaffirmations of Christianity's rootedness in Judaism had also strengthened Jewry's positive feelings. The Pontiff's confirmations of this historic bond were repeated on a number of occasions, and perhaps nowhere more clearly than in his seventh encyclical, Paenitentiam Agere (To Do Penance) in which he appealed to Catholics throughout the world to fast and offer penance for the Second Vatican Council. He pointed out that the practices of fasting and penance are based on Jewish traditions, the teachings of the Old Testament, of Moses and the Prophets.

LITTLE wonder then that shortly after his election to the papacy in October 1958, the Chief Rabbi of Venice, Dr. Leone Leoni, flew to Rome to deliver a special greeting on behalf of the Jewish community in the city where the new Pontiff had spent five years as Patriarch. Or that in 1960, 102 Jewish leaders returning from a refugee mission in North Africa and Israel, made a special stopover in Rome for an audience with Pope John who received them with the now celebrated embrace, "I am Joseph, your brother!"

These sympathetic attitudes of Jews toward the Pope had been extended toward the Ecumenical Council which he had summoned. Jews generally recognized that the Council was a Christian meeting convoked to consider doctrinal and organizational problems confronting Regarded as an authority on Christian-Jewish relations, he helped arrange the agapé for Cardinal Bea on April 1 in New York. He helped organize and served as program chairman for the National Conference on Religion and Race.

the Church and also to explore questions of unity with the "separated brethren" of Protestantism and Eastern Orthodoxy. To the extent that the Council dealt with questions of theology and doctrine, of significance to the Catholic faithful and to other Christians, it was evident that Jews were not involved. This feeling for propriety explains why responsible Jewish groups, religious and lay, did not seek invitations to send observer delegates to the Council.

At the same time, Jews felt involved in the Council in fundamental ways. First, in exploring ecumenical relations with Protestants, it was theologically inevitable that consideration be given to the heritage of the Hebrew Bible which all branches of Christianity share in common. And significantly, Pope John's Council during its first session led to increased consultation and dialogue between Catholic and Jewish scholars on the continent and in America, recalling the fruitful exchanges between St. Jerome and Jewish Bible authorities in Palestine where the Church Father spent 40 years translating the Vulgate based on midrashic traditions.

Second, Jews had hoped that the Council's examinations of the relations between Catholics and other groups in a growing pluralist world would lead to a forthright clarification of the Church's position on religious liberty, the separation of church and state, and religious pluralism. Authoritative declarations on these issues would help Jews, as well as Protestants and Orthodox, to overcome lingering mistrust and suspicion.

Third, foremost among the steps which Jews had wished the Council to take to advance the specific end of Catholic-Jewish relationships was that of a re-examination of the sources of anti-Semitism which grew out of the polemical period of early Church and Synagogue history, "the themes of contempt and the system of degradation." Many Jews believed that the Council could literally start a new cycle in Christian-Jewish relationships by condemning vigorously all manifestations of anti-Semitism, as did the World Council of Churches in New Delhi in November 1961.

DESPITE the catechism of the Council of Trent which affirms the doctrine that Jesus died for all humanity and that all humanity shares the responsibility for his death, the concept of collective Jewish responsibility persists and finds expression and reinforcement in certain prayers, passages of the liturgy and in a great many Catholic textbooks. As already indicated, Pope John had demonstrated his personal aversion to the perpetuation of these distorted teachings about the Jews, and many had thought the Council might confront seriously the problem of anti-Semitism in this spirit and set into motion an effective program to combat this complex evil.

Catholic friends tell me that there is now some question as to whether the second session of the Ecumenical Council will be convened. While high hopes of as many non-Catholics as of Catholics have been pinned on the September 8th session, should it not come off, there is real comfort to be found in the tremendous and historic legacy that Pope John bequeathed to his Church and to "all men of good will," namely Pacem in Terris.

The chorus of enthusiastic praise from Jewish leaders, which formed but part of a vast symphonic endorsement of the encyclical on the part of Protestant, Orthodox, Oriental leaders, even Communists, were climactic testimonies as much to the universal esteem and trust that were lodged in the person of Pope John as in the fundamental propositions that he had set forth to promote "the universal common good."

For many Jews, as undoubtedly for other non-Catholics, a number of those basic questions which they had looked for resolution by the second session of the Vatican Council were answered by Pope John in Pacem in Terris. In moving accents of Christian humanism, Pope John established the commitment of the Church to uphold and to foster "the natural rights" of every human being, and what is of decisive importance, in those areas of human freedom and conscience in which the Church had heretofore appeared to non-Catholics to be ambiguous, if not a threat to a pluralistic, democratic society.

"By the Natural Law," Pope John declared with penetrating clarity and moral earnestness, "every human being has the right to respect for his person, to his good reputation; the right to freedom in searching for truth and in expressing and communicating his opinions . . . he has the right to be informed truthfully about public events. . . . Every human being has the right to honor God according to the dictates of an upright conscience, and therefore the right to worship God privately and publicly. . . . From the fact that human beings are by nature social, there arises the right of assembly and association. . . . Every human being has the right to freedom of movement and of residence within the confines of his own country; and when there are just reasons for it, the right to emigrate to other countries and take up residence there . . . racial discrimination can in no way be justified . . . injustice is even more serious if . . . sinful projects are aimed at the very extinction of these (minority) groups. . . . The doctrinal principles outlined in this Document . . . provide Catholics with a vast field in which they can meet and come to an understanding both with Christians . . . and also with human beings . . . who are endowed with the light of reason and with a natural and operative honesty. . . ."

OF such basic and radical importance are these declarations—which are the fruit of the five years of Pope John's papacy although prefigured by his predecessors—that I would presume to say that the Church will never be the same again. Nor will non-Catholics who have allowed themselves to be open to the extraordinary spiritual presence of this holy man. Perhaps his greatest gift to all of us has been his compelling us to confront the new realities of the world in which we live—a world in which we white Jews and Christians are already a minority; in which by the year 2,000 Catholics will be nine to 10% of the global population as contrasted with 18% today; in which the rising nations of Africa and Asia and the resurgent Oriental religions will force us to abandon our Western monopolies and hegemonies and accommodate ourselves to a genuine global pluralism, which is another way of speaking of the interdependent human family. Pacem in Terris is Pope John's gift that is both a curriculum and a Baedeker preparing us paternally for that world that is already upon us.

But the greatest service that Pope John has performed for all of us has been to thrust before the consciousness of the world the realization that it teeters on the brink of thermonuclear destruction, and that the only alternative to this apocalyptic horror — in which East and West can today "overkill" each other at least 125 times! — is the biblical alternative of Deuteronomy, to choose life, to love peace and to pursue it.

Among the earliest responses to Pacem in Terris were those of three Orthodox Chief Rabbis: Dr. Izhak Nissim, the Sephardi Chief Rabbi of Israel; Dr. Jacob Kaplan, Chief Rabbi of France; and Dr. Elio Toaff, Chief Rabbi of Rome, as well as those of Jewish religious and lay leaders in America and in other parts of the world. Dr. Nissim expressed the sense of all the Jewish responses in his statement, "Every man of faith and conscience who believes in divine justice and in freedom must endeavor to bring about the realization of the Pope's sublime words."

The fact that the Chief Rabbis publicly associated themselves with the appeal of Pope John is in itself an act of unprecedented and historic significance; I know of nothing similar to this occurrence in 1,900 years of relationships between Christians and Jews. Thus, I take this to be both a tribute to the spiritual greatness of the late Pontiff as well as a response to the frightful challenges of the nuclear-missile age which he sought so vigorously to bring before the human family.

In the middle of the 11th century, the Catholic Church sought to enforce a "Truce of God" which greatly restricted the time when it was permissible to carry on warfare. Through his brilliant and compassionate encyclicals and the Ecumenical Council, Pope John labored to help achieve a 20th-century "Truce of God" before the world destroys itself in a thermonuclear holocaust — and, almost tragicomically, either through mechanical error or human miscalculation.

PERHAPS the most significant memorial that we could erect to Pope John, and the most relevant instruction that we could take from his ministry on this earth, would be to undertake at once those steps which would help advance the goals of his latest encyclical which all of us share. To this end, I would propose that appropriate leaders of the three faith communities who share a consensus on world community and world peace take the initiative as early as possible to convene on the American scene a "National Conference on Religion and World Peace."

The recent conference on "Religion and Race" with which I was privileged to be associated as program chairman, is testimony to the great impact that such a combined religious witness can make. Based on the success of such an enterprise, one could then visualize the possibility of a world-wide meeting of a similar character. When leaders of the world's major faith communities will come together at one table to pursue justice, charity, liberty, and peace in freedom, we may well be witness to the beginning of the translation into reality of the prophetic vision of messianic peace for all mankind, Pacem in Terris. ●

THE EPISCOPAL SOCIETY FOR CULTURAL AND RACIAL UNITY

Feast of the Transfiguration NEWSLETTER August 6, 1963

MARCH TO WASHINGTON

Churchmen from all parts of the country will participate in this historic action intended to dramatize the need for still further steps in freeing America from the bonds of segregation. They will join with others from their respective states upon arrival in Washington as a united effort. In answer to many inquiries from ESCRU members: Participation by Episcopalians is being encouraged by our National Council, in cooperation with the National Council of Churches. It is anticipated that six bus loads of Churchmen will go from the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York and from other points around the country groups of Churchmen will make the trip together. In most instances, however, it is suggested that Churchmen join with and support the plans of their local council of churches, the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, SNCC, or the Urban League. Where local plans are not underway ESCRU Chapters might initiate something after consultation with Mrs. Anna Hedgeman of the National Council of Churches office in New York which is coordinating participation of church groups. Otherwise, support your local planning group and pray that the Spirit of Christ will move in and through the March. Joining other Churchmen and ESCRU members will be the Society's President and Executive Director. If you are going let the ESCRU office know your plans so that you can be advised if there is to be any special gathering of Churchmen in addition to the March

BISHOPS TO MEET

A special meeting of the House of Bishops will be held in Toronto just prior to the opening of the Anglican Congress. It is expected that they will consider issuance of a Pastoral Letter concerned with the issues covered by the Presiding Bishop's Whitsuntide Message which is carried in full elsewhere in this newsletter. Pray for them and for the Unity of Christ's Church.....Because of the press of duties ESCRU's Executive Director has cancelled plans to attend the Congress and, instead, sent a display of literature.

SINCE FIRE HOSES AND DOGS

"Birmingham" takes its place with Supreme Court decisions, the Montgomery bus boycott, Little Rock, the sit-in movement and other watershed experiences in the Civil Rights struggle as perhaps one of the most significant turning points. "Since Birmingham" is the dominant word about things now. Dr. King's letter from the Birmingham jail already is a classic. In this year when patience - and possibly time also - has about run out, a new look has arrived at the upper echelons in the churches with top priority being given to racial matters now. James Baldwin helps us to see the crisis that is deep down in the North as well. Russia's charges that China is caught up in reverse racism puts us in fear of an even more volatile line-up of power for some future global race war. We look back at the Jacksons and Chicagos where fuses are burning and wonder if there is time even with the new look. We are encouraged by the new spirit in ecumenical relations which is given some impetus at home in a common sharing of concern for racial matters, and which is reinforced abroad in the face of mutual crisis. And we look at a Lovett School situation (which is a Little Rock experience for the Episcopal Church) and pray that at least the Household of Faith might face the fire next time with some renewed integrity. And we are grateful for the increasing instances where this is so: for the Presiding Bishop's leadership in his Whitsuntide Message, for the increased involvement of Churchmen in the front lines of change..... All in all it is an exciting, but fearsome, time to be alive. "I know not where the road will lead, I follow day by day; Or where it ends: I only know, I walk the King's highway." But, thanks be to God Who giveth us the vistory through Our Lord Jesus Christ! - J.B.M.

ESCRU ANNUAL MEETING

Make your plans now to attend the Third Annual Meeting: Washington, D. C., Nov. 14-16, International Inn. Program details will be announced later. The Rev. Erville Maynard, Flint, Mich., Program Chairman.

USE THE ESCRU Statement of Purpose AS AN INTRODUCTION OF YOUR CONCERN TO SOME FRIEND

CHURCH AND RACE - A NEW ARRIVAL. The ESCRU NEWSLETTER is an occasional publication, appearing about five or six times a year and interspersed with other materials sent Society members from time to time. Its appearance bears some relationship to the travel or desk-work load of the Executive Director or, sometimes, is in spite of it. This present issue is about two months overdue because of accelerated activity since "Birmingham". It can never presume to fully inform Churchmen on what is happening in the area of Church and Race. The weekly Church Press must be read for a thorough coverage. We will continue to be a source of some information, and more particularly on the work of national ESCRU and its chapters, as well as an outlet for editorial opinion and perspective in the ESCRU tradition. But more is needed in these fast moving times, so that it is with distinct pleasure that we welcome the appearance of CHURCH AND RACE, a periodic news bulletin of the Church's Department of Christian Social Relations' Christian Citizenship Division. Two issues have appeared to date and another is appearing this week. With Carroll Greene, Jr., as Editor, and Douglas Bushy as Consultant, it promises to fill a definite need and we are happy to commend it to concerned Churchmen. The first edition was sent to all of the Church's clergy. Others may obtain a copy of that issue from the ESCRU office upon receipt of a stamped and self-addressed envelope.

WORSHIP AND RACIAL UNITY

ESCRU has prepared a packet of materials for Chapters and other groups including AN OFFICE FOR THE UNITY OF THE CHURCH prepared by the New York Chapter, A LITANY FOR RACIAL UNITY by Malcolm Boyd, and A SERVICE OF WITNESS prepared by the Michigan Chapter. Packets have been furnished Chapter Chairmen and may be obtained by others for 25¢. An order form is provided for securing additional copies of the OFFICE and LITANY in quantity, and there are suggestions of appropriate hymns and prayers. They are of a supplemental nature to be used in accordance with custom.

CHICAGO CONFERENCE BOOK

"CHALLENGE TO RELIGION - Original Essays and an Appeal to the Conscience from the National Conference on Religion and Race" may be obtained in paperback form from the national ESCRU office for $1.25 and in hardback form for $3.50.

MEMORIAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO ESCRU

From time to time persons make contributions to the Society in memory of someone whose life had been marked by a concern for the principles for which ESCRU stands. We now have an acknowledgement form sent to both donors and designated survivors.

"...THAT THEY MAY GO FORWARD WITH COURAGE, AND PERSEVERE UNTO THE END"

Not since the Prayer Pilgrimage have so many Episcopal clergy been arrested because of involvement in the Civil Rights struggle nor is the end in sight. Foremost among the prisoners for Christ's sake was The Rt. Rev. Daniel Corrigan of National Council who with others was arrested on July 4th when endeavoring to use recreational facilities which were segregated. Episcopal clergy have demonstrated in Brooklyn in concern for employment practices at a construction project. Included amongst the growing list of prisoner-priests are: Michael Allen, Roderick French, Daisuke Kitagawa, William Dwyer, Richard Gary, Thomas Pike. In Jersey City the Rev. Frs. John Luce and Robert Castle joined with other pickets from CORE in protest against hiring practices at a bank. In Raleigh these clergy stood outside a segregated cafeteria for two hours when refused admission because four were Negroes: Joseph Green, Kenneth Hughes, Arthur Walmsley, Tollie Caution, John Morris, and Irving Mayson. In Clarksdale, Mississippi, the Rev. Arthur Walmsley has several times joined with other clergy representing the National Council of Churches in a display of support for the local protest movement and as of this writing has returned for some further action. In Baltimore Episcopal clergy who picketed the segregated amusement park included: Jacob Berlin, Philip Robb, Van Bird, and Holland Clark. Undoubtedly others have been involved in demonstrations elsewhere but are unknown to us or overlooked inadvertently. Let us know..... Three Observations: 1. Thanks be!; 2. Almost all thus involved have been ESCRU members, but it doesn't matter for they walk, sit-in, and picket as priests of the Church which is more important than any internal label; and 3. It is in line with the Presiding Bishop's Statement that National Council personnel are involved, so that with word and deed from the top we are all very much strengthened!

JACKSON SUIT GOING TO 5TH CIRCUIT

The suit of four of the Prayer Pilgrimage clergy against police officials of Jackson, Mississippi, was heard in United States District Court in Jackson, May 13-16, before an all-white jury of Mississipians. It took them less than 15 minutes to find for the defendants. The case is now on appeal to the Circuit Court in New Orleans. It seeks to establish some legal precedent that will deter Southern police from using breach-of-the-peace ordinances to preserve segregation and could have far reaching implications if won on appeal.

Jackson newspaper headlines provide some idea of how the suit was viewed locally: PREACHERS LOSE MISTRIAL REQUEST, SEGREGATION KEEPS PEACE--THOMPSON, PASTOR TELLS U.S. COURT OF DAYS IN JACKSON JAIL, DAILY WORKER CLIPPING FIGURES IN DAMAGE SUIT, MINISTER CLAIMS ACTION WAS TO COMBAT DEVIL, PREACHER LAWSUIT NEARING U.S. JURY, POLICE SAY PRIESTS INVITED TROUBLE, PREACHERS LOSE DAMAGE SUIT.

The clergy who have brought the suit are: James Breeden, James Jones, Robert Pierson, and John Morris. The Rev. Layton Zimmer, who was also on the Pilgrimage, testified as a witness to the arrest. Attorneys for the plaintiffs are Carl Rachlin of New York and Leonard Rosenthal of Jackson. Included among the defendants is Judge James Spencer who is an Episcopalian. Amongst Courtroom visitors sympathetic to the four priest-plaintiffs were local Episcopal Laymen, Negro clergy of various Protestant churches, and several Roman Catholic clergy. Friends of the defendants included several White Citizens Council officials who had been stricken by the plaintiffs from the jury venire. Judge Sidney Mize of Gulfport, Miss., presided over the four day proceedings with a friendly and patient manner interrupted by his many rulings of "I'll o'errule that objection."

The Daily Worker clipping was an effort by the defense to associate the aims of the Prayer Pilgrimage with Communism. The headline reference to combatting the devil was due to one of the clergy reading portions of the Baptismal office into the record in responding to the defense counsel's harangue about the Prayer Pilgrimage sounding like a military operation with troops in combat.

The struggle "under his banner, against sin, the world, and the devil" was very visible at Jackson's Federal Bldg in May 1963.

JACKSON REVISITED A MONTH LATER

While in Jackson in May two of the priest plaintiffs called at Medgar Evers' home and met Mrs. Evers and their children. He was at his office but was reached by telephone. He said that things were about to begin in the way of local protests and that he might be calling on ESCRU for help.

The call came on June 12th from Mrs. Ruby Hurley, Southeastern NAACP Secretary who is based in Atlanta. She called from Jackson where Medgar Evers had been shot early that morning. Could we come...just to be there?

On Friday evening, June 14th, a group of Episcopal priests assembled at the Atlanta airport prior to going on to Jackson the next morning where they became ten strong and sat up front as Honorary Pallbearers at Medgar Evers' funeral. Designated as from the "National Episcopalian Church" on an Order of Service they were amongst other groups of Honorary Pallbearers from a veterans organization, a Jackson lodge, Jackson Negro ministerial associations, and National NAACP Board & Staff. A few seats away was Dr. Martin Luther King and others of his staff. It was terribly hot. Mrs. Evers and her children were fanned by attendants a few feet away. If they wept they were joined by others as the multitude thundered out Mr. Evers favorite song: "We Shall Overcome." No one wept for lack of confidence that these thousands of mourners would in fact overcome.

Then for as far as you could see a silent procession of mourners followed the body through the streets of Jackson. It was even hotter, but what was unbearable was something else. Soon the humming of "We Shall Overcome" spread through the line - softly and solemnly under the wary eyes of Jackson police who seemed to especially notice the small band of white clergy, or so they felt. There were not many whites.

The Episcopal clergy present were: John Snow, Rowland Cox, Warner White, David Gracie, Brian Kelley, Loren Mead, John Morris, Cornelius Tarplee, John W.B. Thompson, Wofford Smith, A. B. Keeling, and Malcolm Boyd. The first six named remained in Jackson for the balance of that day and the next, talking with Negro leaders and with local Episcopal clergy and laity. The suspect in the Evers murder had not yet been apprehended. He is an Episcopalian from Greenwood, Miss.

VOLUNTEERS FOR CRISIS NEEDS Clergy members of ESCRU were advised on April 10th of the opening of a register of Episcopal priests who, on short notice, could be available to go into crisis situations either in terms of lending support to some protest action already underway under the responsibility of other groups, or by way of initiating some action directed to a need within the Church. A second memorandum of May 3rd further presented the opportunity for participation. Volunteers were asked, where possible, to secure a vestryman or key layman who could go with them. To date about 40 clergy have responded, many of them with laity willing to consider direct involvement also. The clergy who attended the Evers funeral in Jackson in behalf of ESCRU were drawn from this list. With the new look at our National Council and the National Council of Churches it is likely that we will be asked to help supply volunteers for actions they will sponsor. Clergy members who have not signed up but plan to do so should act now. Those recently joining ESCRU who did not receive the above memoranda may request copies and consider the matter. Lay members who would like to be listed must secure a priest-companion willing to be listed. We especially need more Negro priests, for the register presently includes only two. Volunteers do not obligate themselves to any one action, but only indicate an interest in considering taking part as needs develop.

BOUQUETS & BRICKBATS ESCRU's Executive Director was invited to the White House on June 17th for a meeting of "religious leaders" with the President to discuss the Civil Rights problem. The Episcopal contingent included two other priests, a layman, and about nine bishops..... He has also been asked to serve on an 18-member Advisory Committee on Intergroup Relations which will "seek to advise...the Presiding Bishop....and National Council officers on direct action involvement in combatting racial discrimination". The reconstituted committee held its first meeting at Seabury House on June 28th. ..... In Atlanta a segregationist handbill protesting restaurant integration said ESCRU's Executive Director, "....a long-time member of the NAACP, who has seen the inside of numerous jails....", claimed that "commingling between the races had a tendency to cause familiarity." Of course, all the other more important groups in the local picture were mentioned and in about the same way.....And an article in a weekly Atlanta newspaper was headlined: "MYSTERY GROUP FIGHTING ORDERLY LOVETT SCHOOL IS LED BY MICHIGAN NEGRO". The final sentence said of ESCRU's Executive Director: "His priestly garb is faultlessly tailored to his trim young figure and he drives an impressive station wagon."

INTERMARRIAGE AGAIN! The rumor the Atlanta racists heard about ESCRU and intermarriage, presumably originating from our statement on the subject at Williamsburg, Virginia, at the First Annual Meeting, January, 1961, had gotten even further away from fact when it prompted the "Committee of Christian Laymen" of Savannah, Ga., to say in a letter: "In Virginia a year or two ago about a dozen Episcopal Bishops passed a resolution stating they saw no barrier to intermarriage between blacks and whites. Do you for one minute suppose any children of theirs intermarried?"

GROWING PAINS The Episcopal Radio-TV Foundation, a national unofficial agency of the Church headquartered in Atlanta, recently lodged its Board and consultants at a segregated hotel in Atlanta only a block from another hostelry which has been desegregated for over a year and patronized accordingly by Atlantans concerned to encourage its kind of policy. ESCRU has advised the Foundation that it will consider direct action protest if facilities not customarily open to all people are used in the future.....Consideration is being given to some form of protest at the meeting of the Episcopal School Association in Washington in November directed at member schools which are still segregated.....Since "the Lovett school situation" activity with regard to Church-related schools has picked up: Churchmen in North Carolina are asking questions of St. Mary's Junior College; Chatham Hall in Virginia is concerning some folks up there; an ESCRU Director is looking into the situation at St. Mary's Hall in San Antonio and elsewhere in Texas (where recently St. Andrew's, Austin, was recently desegregated....as was the Casady School in Oklahoma); The Diocese of Louisiana has acquired control of St. Martin's School so as to avoid any question of admissions policy; and Bishop Stuart of the Diocese of Georgia has declared that all Church-related schools must be open, whereupon one closed up shop.

THE LOVETT SCHOOL SITUATION If you haven't before, by now you're wondering just what has happened concerning Lovett School and the Church. It's a long story and has entailed many memoranda, letters, etc., copies of which have been sent ESCRU Chapter Chairmen and Directors, as well as all bishops. It's also a story with considerable dirty linen in high places, in my estimation, and many charges about the role of ESCRU. Because I had three children at Lovett and because this is home, it has been one of the more difficult confrontations we've had. I'll try to digest what has happened thus far and will be glad to provide more detail on request.

On a plane from Albany, Ga., last August Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr., and I talked about our children, their schools, and the effects of segregation. She asked about Lovett, whether it was segregated, etc. I knew of no policy, but promised to advise her about it later. In January the Bishop of Atlanta, in ruling out of order a resolution that would have clarified Lovett's situation, went on to say that segregation was not debatable and that no institutions in the diocese were segregated. Having delayed in responding to Mrs. King's interest in Lovett in hopes that Negro Churchmen might be the first to apply, I advised her that it appeared that Lovett apparently did not have a discriminatory policy. Some time previous I had expressed my hope to Lovett that they would accept applicants without regard to race. They never said they wouldn't. It looked like the Episcopal Church could be honored by having the children of Atlanta's most distinguished citizen in one of its schools. At the same time that I wrote Mrs. King, I let the Bishop and the Headmaster know that she might apply for one of her children.

The Bishop took no steps until well after Martin Luther King, III, was rejected by Lovett as "the first formal Negro application in the history of the Lovett School." His office was advised on the same day I learned of what had happened. When the story finally broke in the Church press (Obviously the Kings had a responsibility to tell of what had happened. I suggested that since it was chiefly the Church's concern it would be appropriate for one of the Church's publications to first report it.) the Bishop had this to say for publication: "The diocese of Atlanta has no official connection with Lovett School. I have no official connection with Lovett School. I am sure the racial policy at Lovett School must be satisfactory, since the children of the Rev. John Morris have been enrolled there for some time. If the family of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., do not find the admissions policy of Lovett School acceptable, and if they want their children to have an Episcopal educational background, they should apply to one of our parochial schools, where the Church is responsible - such as Holy Innocents' parish in Atlanta, where the Rev. John Morris and his family are affiliated." Elsewhere he said to the press: "I am interested to know that a Baptist minister has a desire for an education for his son where Episcopal services take place."

We kept quiet. Perhaps wondering what we would do, the Bishop's Canon to the Ordinary called me on March 20th to ask me to come see the Bishop. Among other statements of a threatening nature he said: "You are under license in the diocese...there is something in the Church known as discipline." I saw the Bishop and the Canon and was blessed out. Why didn't I let the Bishop know I wanted to get a Negro into Lovett? When I said I had advised him the Kings might apply, the reply was that it was only a carbon copy of a letter to the Headmaster. He indicated he hadn't known anything about the rejection until the story broke. This was not so. What were we going to do? I indicated that I was preparing a document detailing the many connections between the school and the Church. It was prepared, but only circulated in limited fashion within the Church on a non-public basis after ESCRU's President came to Atlanta and, after seeing the Bishop and others, took responsibility with me for whatever we did.

Ensuing weeks saw a further unhappy exchange of views between the Bishop's office and mine. In the meantime unbeknown to me or the Bishop several Negro Episcopal families applied to Lovett and were inadvertently assigned testing dates. They were asked by several representatives of the Bishop and Lovett not to go for the testing appointments for their children when it was learned they were Negroes. Finally, out of respect for the Bishop's office they agreed to wait upon his efforts in seeking a changed policy at the school.

We had still said nothing publicly, hoping that the Bishop and others could effect a change in Lovett's policy. Concerned parents were registering their willingness for Lovett to integrate. Atlantans, incredulous at the Bishop's only public comment because they knew the many long-standing connections between the Church and Lovett, watched and waited. Delay followed delay. Feedback began to come from the Church elsewhere as to what diocesan authorities here were saying about ESCRU's role. A clergy conference here heard a one-sided account of the situation. We tried to ignore these diversionary efforts. The issue was whether the school would desegregate. When it seemed that this was not being accomplished we indicated in late May that ESCRU's President would come to Atlanta again on June 7th and make some statement about the situation that pertained at that time.

On June 4th the Bishop made his second public statement on Lovett, saying, what should have been stated in the beginning, that "the implied moral support of the Episcopal Church" would be withdrawn from Lovett if they did not desegregate. He said that the Lovett Trustees were men of "integrity" and reported that they understood what the teaching of the Church was regarding race. (A Lovett letter to parents indicated only that the Trustees acknowledged what the Church teaches, but "reserved the right and responsibility to the trustees to use their own judgment in the admission of students." Rumors have had it that at most there were possibly seven trustees out of twenty-one who would consider desegregation.) ESCRU's President, then, on June 7th commended the Bishop for his stand on the desegregation of Lovett and went on to talk about other similiar situations and ESCRU's plan to do a survey of schools.

On June 14th the Lovett Trustees wrote parents, "to put (their) minds at rest", and said they had "unanimously adopted resolutions denying applications of Negro students." On July 1st the Bishop announced that the Church's "implied or official support" of the school had been withdrawn, but expressed the hope that it would be restored at such time as the school conformed to the teaching of the Church.

It was reported at a Lovett faculty meeting that the Bishop had said they could continue having services, including the Holy Communion each Wednesday. The Standing Committee has acted to make this permissable it is reported. The Charter of the school still provides that 2/3 of the Trustees are to be Episcopalians, with 1/3 approved by the Cathedral Chapter. "The Episcopal Faith as contained in the Book of Common Prayer" is to be taught. The Dean of the Cathedral remains as Chairman of the Board of Trustees and has said he fully agrees with their decisions. Graduation exercises were at the Cathedral, with an Episcopal priest as preacher.

On July 3rd ESCRU announced it would encourage direct action protest aimed at the school and at Trustees who are Episcopalians. On July 14th the Bishop issued a pastoral letter chiefly for the purpose of disassociating ESCRU from the Diocese, which it successfully did, although we had not in any public communications questioned his role. On July 19th the President of the Standing Committee advised me, in effect, that the continuation of my license to officiate in this diocese hinged on my cooperation with the Atlanta way for progress; and, at the same time, said that the "unhappy state of affairs" at Lovett was "directly attributable to (me) and the methods of ESCRU used throughout the entire controversy." On July 23rd I appeared before the Bishop and the Standing Committee and turned in my license if its continuation required some compromise in my responsibilities with ESCRU and the Lovett situation. It has not been restored. It was the same meeting of the Standing Committee which will make possible the Celebration of a Segregated Eucharist each Wednesday at Lovett.

One reason the Bishop is concerned to protect Lovett and its trustees from protest is that they are pretty important people in the community and in the Church, some holding diocesan responsibilities. It is also apparent that the Senior Warden of one of Atlanta's largest parishes, a man with tremendous economic power in the community, has been a chief force in Lovett's expansion and is himself known as a firm segregationist. While not on the Board, he appears to be the power behind it and has been responsible for several hundreds of thousands of dollars given to the school, some recently.

MORE ON THE MARCH!

All participants will meet at the Washington Monument after gathering at state assembly points not later than 10 A.M. The National Office for the March on Washington is at 170 West 130th St., New York 27, N. Y., FI 8-1900. In Washington, Episcopalians should call the Rev. Cornelius C. Tarplee at Diocesan House, KE 7-0920, where he is setting up some kind of hospitality committee and will be advised as to the latest details in plans. The telephone for the National Council of Churches office mentioned on page 1 is RI 9-2200, Ext. 2435, New York. Be sure to check on your local plans too.

SOME SCHOOLS NEED APPLICANTS

Two leading Episcopal Schools have indicated they need more Negro applicants. We'll be glad to advise interested parents on this....Remember that Sewanee is now desegregated and that ESCRU has a fund to assist qualified Negro students who apply to the college or academy. There are many persons at Sewanee who will help make the first Negroes welcomed there. Applicants are needed.

WHAT YOU CAN DO!

You may not be able to sit-in or carry a picket sign, and it may be difficult where you live to say a lot about your convictions; but someone you know - perhaps many - is undecided and depending on you to encourage them to take their stand. Telling them about ESCRU is one way of witnessing to your concerns. The ESCRU Statement of Purpose will help you and it contains an application form should they decide to join. Additional copies may be obtained from any ESCRU Chapter or from Atlanta, in sufficient quantities for a parish mailing if desired. The membership is over 3000 now. You can help!

CLERGY PLACEMENT SUGGESTIONS

We have been asked a number of times to suggest clergy for parishes wanting to break with tradition, as regards the color of their rector or assistant, and consider calling a Negro or white priest, as the case may be. Inquiries will be treated confidentially. We also are glad to have some word from clergy who feel called to some role in this kind of transition in the Church's life.

SEWANEE MOVES AHEAD

The Inn is now completely desegregated, it is reported; although Mrs. Shoemate now operates a private club just off the domain which will be segregated. This summer saw swimming classes desegregated, as well as the Vacation Church School again as a project of the parish which is integrated. Recently eight residents of Sewanee, including three college faculty members, filed suit for desegregation of the public schools of Franklin County with the NAACP Legal Aid Fund involved

ST. JOHN'S INTEGRATED

With complete integration now of St. John's Hospital, Brooklyn, the Long Island ESCRU Chapter again meets at the Cathedral and has sought to promote contributions to the Episcopal Charities Appeal effort which helps to support St. John's.

"FAITH USE URGED IN RIGHTS CAUSE" Excerpts from an article in THE NEW YORK TIMES, August 5, 1963: "Christian clergymen who are active in the civil rights movement were criticized here yesterday for "soft-pedaling" the theology behind their involvement. The critic, the Rev. Dr. Lawrence L. Durgin, suggested that many churchmen who join picket lines fear "antagonizing some person of Jewish or secular background by raising the scandal of the particularity of Christ." He urged that these ministers find some way to make their theology clear "as they gladly march in common cause with others of differing faiths and practices." Dr. Durgin spoke in a sermon at the Broadway Congregational Church...of which he is minister. He has taken part in the recent picketing of the Rochdale Village housing development in Queens and plans to join the march on Washington...."I am convinced that the church has an assigned and critical role in the current civil rights movement," Dr. Durgin declared. But he said that "for the time being it seems as though the race issue is more crucial than the Christ issue." ....he deplored "the tendency on the part of the clergy, both white and Negro, to be so pleased with their successful identification with the masses of the people - many of whom are no longer coming to church - that they are disinclined to say or do anything which might make them seen to stand out or to proclaim the unique reasons for their participation." In his sermon, the minister said he was "not asking that non-Christians be forced into a Christian posture or into using a Christian vocabulary."...."

ESCRU-POST BIRMINGHAM Now that a militant approach is the current position of the official agencies of the Church, more or less, ESCRU's task may be its continuing effort to sharpen the issues in Christian terms, as suggested by Dr. Durgin above; as well as to not let the Church forget needs within its own life as it goes forth to fight the battle in the community. It will always be harder to look at the Lovetts within than to confront the Little Rocks and Levittowns without. The integrity of the Church is on trial in what it does or doesn't do about segregation out in the world; but this is even more true as regards what it does in its own life. We could seek to save the world but remain lost ourselves. We seek: "That condition of harmony among peoples which is the benefit of a mutual recognition of the Lordship of Jesus Christ, so that brothers may dwell together in unity and see Him so lifted up that He will draw all men unto Him." We shall work with our brothers of all persuassions and backgrounds in common cause, humbled in seeing that often He appears to be using servants who do not call Him by Name more than ourselves, and knowing that once the goal is reached we will press on to ask: What think ye of Christ? - J. B. M.

NO STREET LIE-INS. Until we conclude that there is no hope in America for change, as is the case in South Africa short of revolution, non-directed obstructionist protest such as lying down in the middle of a city street seems uncalled for and destructive of support for the civil rights movement. If it is to protest the deep flaws in our history, perhaps prostration on the soil of the street has poetic meaning. It will not be seen by some who could be moved by non-violent sit-ins, pickets, mass marches, and the like. Where there is police protection for orderly protest, street lie-downs are ill-timed. Perhaps in Mississippi it will be necessary. Also, obstructionist protest such as locked arms before a doorway is similiarly non-directed in nature and will gain little. Blocking trucks on a contruction site, however, is directed protest for it involves the policies embodied in the truck drivers; but such protest should be done with great dignity and with full acceptance of the legal consequences. One of the beauties of the lunch counter sit-ins was that respect for due process was retained, for no one sought to elude the consequences of their action. Christian principles suggest that we respect the freedom of another to cross our picket line, so we don't lock arms, however much we reject his reasons. Christian protest is not coercive. It witnesses to the situation as it is, the remedies needed, and Christ through it all, but lets another continue in sin as long as the laws of the state are not violated. As we move into more dangerous days, Christians should abound on the picket lines, in the marches, and, if necessary, in the jails; but let them do it all in a manner whereby they can gladly profess to do it in His Name. - J. B. M.

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDING BISHOP OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH Religion

May 26, 1963

Recent events in a number of American communities---Birmingham, Chicago, Nashville, New York, and Raleigh, to mention only the most prominent--underscore the fact that countless citizens have lost patience with the slow pace of response to their legitimate cry for human rights. Pleas of moderation or caution about timing on the part of white leaders are seen increasingly as an unwillingness to face the truth about the appalling injustice which more than a tenth of our citizens suffer daily. While we are thankful for the progress that has been made, this is not enough.

Our Church's position on racial inclusiveness within its own body and its responsibility for racial justice in society has been made clear on many occasions by the General Convention. But there is urgent need to demonstrate by specific actions what God has laid on us. Such actions must move beyond expressions of corporate penitence for our failures to an unmistakable identification of the Church, at all levels of its life, with those who are victims of oppression.

I think of the words we sing as we hail the ascended Christ, "Lord and the ruler of all men", and of our prayers at Whitsuntide as we ask God to work His will in us through his Holy Spirit. And then in contrast to our praises and our prayers our failure to put ourselves at the disposal of the Holy Spirit becomes painfully clear. Only as we take every step possible to join with each other across lines of racial separation in a common struggle for justice will our unity in the Spirit become a present reality.

It is not enough for the Church to exhort men to be good. Men, women and children are today risking their livelihood and their lives in protesting for their rights. We must support and strengthen their protest in every way possible, rather than give support to the forces of resistance by our silence. It should be a cause of rejoicing to the Christian community that Negro Americans and oppressed peoples everywhere are displaying a heightened sense of human dignity in their refusal to accept second class citizenship any longer.

The right to vote, to eat a hamburger where you want, to have a decent job, to live in a house fit for habitation: these are not rights to be litigated or negotiated. It is our shame that demonstrations must be carried out to win them. These constitutional rights belong to the Negro as to the white, because we are all men and we are all citizens. The white man needs to recognize this if he is to preserve his own humanity. It is a mark of the inversion of values in our society that those who today struggle to make the American experiment a reality through their protest are accused of disturbing the peace--and that more often than not the Church remains silent on this, our greatest domestic moral crisis.

I commend these specific measures to your attention: 1) I would ask you to involve yourselves. The crisis in communities North and South in such matters as housing, employment, public accomodations, and schools is steadily mounting. It is the duty of every Christian citizen to know fully what is happening in his own community, and actively to support efforts to meet the problems he encounters.

2) I would also ask you to give money as an expression of our unity and as a sign of our support for the end of racial injustice in this land. The struggle of Negro Americans for their rights is costly, both in terms of personal sacrifice and of money, and they need help.

3) I would ask you to take action. Discrimination within the Body of the Church itself is an intolerable scandal. Every congregation has a continuing need to examine its own life and to renew those efforts necessary to insure its inclusiveness fully. Diocesan and church-related agencies, schools and other institutions also have a considerable distance to go in bringing their practices up to the standard of the clear position of the Church on race. I call attention to the firm action of the recent Convention of the Diocese of Washington which directed all diocesan-related institutions to eliminate any discriminatory practices within six months. It further requested the Bishop and Executive Council to take steps necessary to disassociate such diocesan and parish-related institutions from moral or financial support if these practices are not eliminated in the specified time. I believe we must make known where we stand unmistakably.

So I write with a deep sense of the urgency of the racial crisis in our country and the necessity for the Church to act. Present events reveal the possible imminence of catastrophe. The entire Christian community must pray and act.

MEMORANDUM

FROM: The Rev. John B. Morris, Executive Director, ESCRU

RE: Episcopal Services at the Lovett School.

This is to supplement references to the continuation of Episcopal services at the Lovett School contained in our newsletter of August 6th. Since issuance of the newsletter the cooperation of the Diocese of Atlanta in the perpetuation of the weekly Segregated Eucharist at Lovett has been substantiated from two sources.

On July 23rd the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Atlanta prepared this Statement: "In answer to the resolution presented to the Standing Committee by a Committee appointed at the meeting of the Clergy of the Metropolitan area of Atlanta, which was held at St. Luke's Church on July 21, 1963, it is the opinion of the Standing Committee that the participation of the Clergy in official worship and exercises at Lovett School would not be detrimental to the interest of the Church. However, the Standing Committee feels that the question should be left to the conscience of the individual clergyman as to whether he should accept or decline an invitation to participate."

In a letter dated August 8th and sent to Lovett parents, Mr. J. A. Rabbe, Director of Administration for Lovett (and also a Trustee of the Cathedral of St.Philip), said: "Since the Bishop has stated that "The Lovett School is not to be considered an Episcopal School" and that he "has withdrawn approval for any priest of the Episcopal Church to act as headmaster", the rumor is rife that there will be no more daily chapel, no Wednesday morning communion services, no teaching of religion and an abandonment of all religious emphasis. Nothing could be farther from the truth and all of these will be continued just as in the past and have the approval of the Bishop."

The assertion by the Bishop of Atlanta that there may be no "implied or official support for the Lovett School by the Episcopal Church" is threadbare when the background maneuvers designed to placate prominent Churchmen are brought to the surface. In addition, then, to the question of a segregated Church-related school (which Lovett has always been and remains), the issue of complicity in permitting and encouraging the holding of Episcopal services in such a setting rests clearly with diocesan authorities. Protest directed to the Diocese of Atlanta seems in order, especially during the time of each weekly Segregated Eucharist at the school.

Apart from the main issues it should be noted here that I asked of the Bishop and Standing Committee on July 23rd (at the same meeting mentioned above) an opportunity to fairly present our understanding of what has transpired with regard to the Lovett situation, to be compared with their account of the same proceedings. There has been no response to this nor reconsideration of the terms they had offered for the continuation of my license to officiate in this diocese. Others in the Church concerned for this situation should be advised that, while our primary interest is not in defending our role in the Lovett issue, we are quite prepared to spend as much time before any group in the Church to which Atlanta diocesan authorities have addressed themselves.

REPORT ON THE RELEASE OF 57 PRISONERS IN MISSISSIPPI

By John M. Pratt

SUMMARY:

On August 16, 1963, the National Council of Churches, using Appeal Bonds written by the X Insurance Company*, obtained the release of fifty-seven persons from the Mississippi State Penitentiary at Parchman and the LeFlore County Prison Farm at Greenwood, Mississippi. Most of these individuals had been arrested at Itta Bena, Mississippi, during a voter registration meeting on June 18, 1963, and had been sentenced the following day to serve six months in prison and fined $500. All the individuals had been put on work details at the LeFlore County Farm, but 13 of the young men and 4 young women had been transferred to the State Penitentiary after they refused to work or eat because of conditions at the Farm.

This report covers the events which culminated in the release of the prisoners on bail. It also includes (a) a description of the scenes at the State Penitentiary and at the County Farm during the actual release of the prisoners, (b) a description of some of the conditions at the State Penitentiary as reported to me, and (c) a report of a conversation I held with LeFlore County officials which vividly illustrates their attitudes toward the Federal government.

I. BACKGROUND

During the month of June, 1963, 78 persons were arrested, tried and convicted in Leflore County, Mississippi, for their participation in voter education and voter registration projects. Most of the persons were convicted of the charge of "disturbing the public peace or the peace of others," while some of them were convicted simply of "disorderly conduct." The majority of trials and convictions took place on June 19, 1963. Some persons, however, who demonstrated outside the court house in protest against these trials were arrested and tried and convicted on June 25th. Each of the men who were tried were fined $500 and sentenced to six months in jail; the women received fines of $200 and sentences of 4 months in jail.

Throughout the month of July, James Foreman, Executive Secretary of SNCC, tried to raise money to bail these people out. Bail had been set at $750 for each male and $500 for each female. Among the organizations Foreman contacted was the National Council of Churches's new Commission on Religion and Race. While the Commission tried to raise some of the $38,000 necessary to bail out the sixty individuals then remaining in prison, through the member denominations, at the same time it began to explore ways by which a national bonding company could be persuaded to aid in the effort. On July 29, 1963, I met for the first time with J. Robert Lunney of Sherman and Sterling and with Judge Bruce Bromley of Cravath, Swaine & Moore at the latter's office. This began the association between the National Council of Churches and the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, an association which is fast becomming one of the most dynamic and creative elements in the entire civil rights struggle. At this conference we discussed the possibilities of getting a bonding company to go into Mississippi, and the problems which would have to be overcome. Judge Bromley promised to look into the problem further and Bob Lunney said he would bring the matter to the attention of his senior partner Robert Knight.

On August 2, the National Council of Churches sent $1500 to Greenwood so that three girls then held at the Mississippi State Penitentiary at Parchman, Mississippi, could be released on bail. On August 9, the Reverend D. Bruce Hanson of Washington, D. C., Mr. Lunney and I drove to Greenwood, Mississippi, from Clarksdale, Mississippi, with the intention of releasing an additional number of individuals. The National Council of Churches had received $10,000 from one of its constituent members, the Board of Homeland Ministries of the United Church of Christ, to be used for bail purposes. In Greenwood, we were told to call Mr. Wiley Branton, of the Voter Education Project in Atlanta. Upon doing so, we learned that Mr. Branton had made arrangements, presumably with Mr. Knight, to have bail bonds written. Mr. Branton asked us to call upon the Sheriff of Leflore County in order to learn what particular papers , if any, would be required in order to make the bonds valid. Sheriff J. E. Cothron met with us, was most cordial, and, in response to our specific question, called the County Attorney who told him that a Certificate of Authority signed by the Mississippi Commissioner of Insurance would be required. We reported this information back to Mr. Branton, who then suggested we pick up some Leflore County Appeal Bond forms to take back to New York. Even though it was past five o'clock when we returned to the Court House, and the Sheriff's Office was closed, the Sheriff opened the office for me and gave me a pad of Appeal Bond forms. I had been informed, incidentally, by Carsie Hall of Jackson, the Negro Attorney of Record in the case, that his requests for bond forms had been refused by the Sheriff, and that I would not be able to get any.

After obtaining as much information as we could about the cases and the facts which would be used on the face of the bonds from the Voter Education Project office in Greenwood, and from Mr. Hall, we returned to New York, bringing the bond forms, the information and the $10,000 with us.

II. The Writing of the Bonds

Fifty-eight bonds were prepared under Mr. Lunney's supervision at the office of Sherman and Sterling on Monday, August 12. Unfortunately, in almost every respect, the information we had been given about the case proved to be inaccurate and the face of the bonds had to be changed in Greenwood later in the week.

On Tuesday, August 13, Mr. Carroll R. Young, Vice-President of the X Insurance Company, Mr. P. L. Douglass, an attorney for X, Mr. Knight and Mr. Lunney of Sherman and Sterling, and I met in the conference room at Shearman and Sterling where the bonds were signed by Mr. Young. In addition, a notarial acknowledgement, a general power of attorney, and a justification were attached to each bond. Late in the afternoon of August 13, I flew to Atlanta, Georgia, where I was joined by H. D. McLean, the Southern Regional Director of the X Insurance Company. Together we flew to Jackson where we were met by J. Jefferson Davis, the resident agent of X in Jackson.

On Wednesday, August 14, Mr. McClean and Mr. Davis spent most of the day finding a resident Mississippi agent who would countersign the bonds. I am under the impression that two or three individuals were approached before one finally consented. The bonds were signed by a John F. Anderson, Jr., of the Fox, Everett Agency in Jackson. Mr. McLean gave me copies of Mr. Anderson's certificate of authority and of a certification by the Mississippi Commissioner of Insurance that the X Insurance Company of New York was authorized to write surety bonds in the state of Mississippi.

III. Events in Greenwood

On Thursday, August 15, I proceeded to Greenwood, Mississippi, arriving there at approximately 10:30 in the morning. I went directly to the Sheriff's office, where I was told that the sheriff was visiting in Kentucky and would not return until Friday and that the Chief Deputy was not available. I then attempted to see a Mr. John Fraiser, the County Prosecuting Attorney, but was told that he was in Jackson for the day and not return until approximately five o'clock. I next attempted to meet with Mr. Aubrey Bell, the County Attorney, and was told that he too, was out of town for the day. I then proceeded to the office of Seth Wheatley, a member of the Mississippi Bar and a graduate of Harvard College and Harvard Law School. Mr. Wheatley told me that the Sheriff was actually out of town, but would return in the morning. He examined the Mississippi Code to determine when the appeal rights of the individuals concerned had lapsed, finding that there was a forty-five day limitation, and suggested that I be sure that appeals in forma pauperis had been filed. I asked him if he would consider taking a retainer from the National Council of Churches in the event I had further difficulty in presenting the bonds. He declined, stating that he had taken a civil rights case three or four years ago and as a result had lost a considerable amount of business and that he did not feel that in all honesty he could afford to lose more by taking an additional case. He seemed most desirous of helping but could not involve himself publicly. Since nothing more could be done until tomorrow, I went to the Voter Education Project Office in Greenwood, where I joined the young volunteer SNCC workers for dinner. Afterwards I attended a party being given for the group in one of the homes in Greenwood's Negro sections. The group, numbering about 16, had not been there more than 30 minutes when Greenwood police parked outside the home, took the license number of the cars parked outside, and prowled around with flashlights, thus making clear to the participants that the party was under surveillance.

The following morning, Friday, August 16, I again went to the Sheriff's office and was told by the Deputy that the Sheriff was out of town for the day and probably would not be back until Sunday. I knew this to be untrue because the Sheriff's car was parked outside the Court House. I made no protest, however, but went instead to Mr. Fraiser's office. He met me there, took me back to the court house, introduced me to Mr. Aubrey Bell, and then invited me to the courtroom where the Circuit Judge was presiding over an adoption proceeding. After the proceedings, Mr. Fraiser and I returned to his office and examined the Judgements on the Itta Bena prisoners. Mr. Fraiser pointed out the inaccuracies on the face of the bonds, which had been prepared in New York including the crime charged, the name of the Justice of the Peace, the date of the conviction and the fines and sentences. He gave me the correct information, and corrected the spelling of several of the defendants' names. Mr. Fraiser had no records on 10 of the individuals for whom I carried bonds.

I asked Mr. Fraiser if the bonds would be acceptable if I made the necessary changes. He answered indirectly, first stating that either Mr. Young or Mr. Anderson, both of whose signatures were on the bonds, should initial any corrections, and then saying that there was a statute in Mississippi against forgery and that in his opinion the X Company would have a cause of action against any unauthorized person who changed the bond faces.

Not wanting to waste the time which it would take to return to Jackson to have Mr. Anderson initial the changes, I proceeded to change the bonds myself after calling Mr. Young in New York. He sent me a telegram authorizing me to change anything on the face of the bond except the amount of the bond itself. I returned to the Court House and was again told that the Sheriff was out. Almost immediately, however, the Sheriff appeared, greeted me, and examined briefly the bonds which I presented. He called in Mr. Bell, the County Attorney, who also examined them and asked to see the Certificate of Authority for Mr. Anderson and the Statement of X Company's Qualification to write surety bonds in Mississippi. After I presented these documents to him, he approved the bonds and the Sheriff began signing them. I asked Mr. Bell where I could gain further information about the 10 persons for whom I had bonds but who were unknown to Mr. Fraiser, and Mr. Bell directed me to the clerk of one of the other J.P.'s of the County. There I obtained information on an additional five bonds. I changed the faces of these bonds in ink, and the Sheriff signed them. I still had five bonds outstanding, and Mr. Bell suggested that I check the records of the Police Court at City Hall. When the Sheriff had signed all the bonds (except the five which I had not corrected), he told me that I should go to Parchman first because its office closed at five o'clock. He said the prisoners at the County Farm wouldn't be back from their work gangs until after 6 P.M. I must point out that in all my dealings with Sheriff Cothron, Mr. Fraiser and Mr. Bell, I was always treated civilly. They answered every question which I asked them, and more than once volunteered information -- such as the best time to pick up the prisoners or where to find information on them -- which was accurate and helpful.

Before starting for Parchman, I went to the City Hall where I met the Chief of Police. In the temporary absence of the Police Court Clerk, he tried to find the information I needed with regard to the other five bonds. The clerk arrived while I was there and gave me information on one additional defendant. I thanked them both and returned to the Voter Education Project office to correct the one bond and to find additional cars for the trip to Parchman.

IV. AT THE MISSISSIPPI STATE PENITENTIARY AT PARCHMAN

Four cars made the hour's drive to Parchman, some 50 miles northwest of Greenwood. The Superintendent of the State Penitentiary, Mr. Breazelle, accepted the bonds and ordered the release of the 13 prisoners after calling Sheriff Cothron to verify his signature, which had not been notarized.

We drove about two miles into the middle of the prison, following a Mr. Rule in a prison stationwagon. The boys were being kept in the maximum security building -- also called the death house since it houses Mississippi's electric chair -- which was a single story cell block surrounded by electrified barbed wire and four guard towers. As I left my car, I overheard the following conversation between the guard in the tower nearest the gate and Mr. Rule:

The Guard: "I ain't going to put up again with the kind of thing I put up with last Wednesday. They're just not going to get away with it."

Mr. Rule: "Well, you have your shotgun, don't you?

Guard: "Yes."

Mr. Rule: "Okay, then, you use it if they give you any trouble."

I started to walk towards Mr. Rule's car, to ask what the procedure for releasing the prisoners would be, when the guard pointed the shotgun at me and shouted, "I ain't going to take any more trouble from you. Now you go back over there with your friends and you all behave yourselves." I started to protest, but he cut me off immediately with, "Now you get back, I told you--I don't want any of your smart lip." I asked the other three drivers if they knew of anything that had happened "last Wednesday" which might have given the guard cause for his concern, but they knew nothing.

During the next thirty minutes the 13 boys in the cell-block were brought out in groups of two or three and lined up in front of the cell house some 100 yards from the gate. When all had assembled, they began to march in single file towards the gate, watched over by four guards carrying shotguns.

Because of the tower guard's excitability and in order to avoid any possible demonstration of joy or even recognition as the thirteen came through the gate, I told the three drivers to get in their cars. As they started to move towards their cars, the guard in the tower picked up his shotgun, pointed it out the window and said, "I told you I didn't want any trouble; now you've asked for it." I took a step forward and said, "They're only going to their cars." He replied, "They're starting something." I stood where I was while the other three got in their cars. The guard started to raise the gun to his shoulder, hesitated, and then held it at waist level. The gate opened and as the thirteen filed out, I ordered the first four to go slowly to the first car and say absolutely nothing until we had left the prison grounds. I repeated these instructions to each of the prisoners. I stood where I was until everyone else was in the cars and then I turned and walked back to my car. I recall vividly feeling myself breathe easier as soon as we reached the main highway, and then marveled at the courage of these youngsters. Because the first word that any of them said was, "Man--now we can sing again." And they did. They sang "Oh, Freedom," "We Shall Overcome", and other freedom songs most of the way home.

CONVERSATIONS WITH THE PRISONERS

The only sustained conversation that I had with the 13 prisoners from Parchman was held during the drive back to Greenwood. The boys, who were in my car informed me that none of them had had any sleep during the last 48 hours because all thirteen of them had been forced into a single 6x8 cell. They said there were no mattresses on any of the cells that they used, but that they had to sleep on cold steel. Sometimes the guards turned on the blowers or air-conditioners at night so that the steel became so cold they were unable to sleep on it. They had been given a pair of short pants and a t-shirt when they came to the penitentary but in the last few days as the evenings got colder their t-shirts had been taken away from them. They informed me that they had been given sheep shears to clip themselves, and had been told that if any hairs were found either on their head, under their arms or in their pubic area, these hairs would be pulled out with tweezers. They informed me that some of them had been thrown into a "hot box" which apparently was an excessively heated cell so small that one could barely stretch out in it. I was unclear as to how many were in the hot box at one time, or for what reasons they were put in hot boxes, but I do recall one saying that he finally got out of the hot box after the others had convinced the guards that he was very sick. He was given a thermometer and reported having a temperature in excess of 104%. He was given two aspirins and put into a cold room. I was informed that they were not beaten at anytime while they were in the state penitentary. They also told me that they received a smaller quantity of food from that given the white prisoners in the maximum security cells. Often they were not given meat when the white prisoners got it. When they had meat, they were given about half the portion given to the other prisoners. They told me they were not allowed to sing at all or to talk above a whisper, while they were in the state penitentary and that if one violated this rule he was handcuffed to the cell bars and left there.

AT THE LEFLORE COUNTY PRISON FARM

We returned to Greenwood where the thirteen young men from Parchman were warmly greeted and fed at the Voter Education Project office. I had one corrected bond and I called Sheriff Cothran and asked him if he would sign the bond at his home so that I could release everyone at the county farm at the same time. He agreed and I drove to his home and obtained his signature on that bond. I then returned to the Voter Education Project office and waited until sufficient cars had been obtained so that transportation would be available for the 40 people at the farm.

We left for the farm, which was located about three miles outside Greenwood, in a cavalcade of about 30 cars and trucks shortly after nightfall. For some reason unknown to me we approached the Superintendant's office by two different roads, thus creating the impression of a "March" on the Farm coming from all directions. I suspect that is also the impression the Superintendant had, for he and three of his deputies stationed themselves outside the cellhouse armed with shotguns and wearing pistols and holding back barking dogs. Within two or three minutes after our arrival three Greenwood City Police cars roared up to the cellhouse, apparently alerted by the Superintendant.

While the other drivers waited at their cars I walked up the path to the cell-house, and met Superintendant Arterbery. I introduced myself and informed him that I had come for the release of 40 prisoners then under his supervision and that I carried bonds for their release signed by the sheriff of the county.

He went inside, examined the bonds, and then ordered the release of the prisoners.

Seventeen women and twenty-two men were released from the County Farm that Friday evening. Most of them were in their teens or early twenties, although two women were in their late seventies. The youngest was a girl of 15.

Superintendent Arterbery informed me that there were four boys in the cell block for whom no bonds had been produced. These were the four whose bonds the Sheriff had not signed because Mr. Fraser had no records on them. After the 40 prisoners had been taken back to Greenwood, I corrected the remaining four bonds and called the Sheriff at his home again and asked him if he would sign those. He consented and I drove out and he signed those four bonds. I should say that in all my dealings with the sheriff both on this visit and on my previous visit to Clarksdale a week earlier, he was most courteous and in no way attempted to hinder my efforts. I thanked the Sheriff for his cooperation and returned to Greenwood, where I went to the Elks Hall. Here a mass meeting was in progress at which a number of those who had just been released spoke. I spoke to the group, stressing the fact that I was in Greenwood as a living symbol of the fact that the civil rights struggle was not just the Negroes' struggle, not just a Southern struggle, but a national struggle involving all Americans. I said that these 57 prisoners had gained their freedom once again because many white persons in both the North and the South had not forgotten them and had worked with Negro leaders to bring about their release. I remember that there were many murmurs of approval when I said that I believed many Southern whites believed that Negroes had a right to equality of citizenship but that they were afraid to speak out publicly.

After the meeting I obtained the signatures of about 35 of the released individuals on an "Application for a Court Bond" form and gave the bonds for the unreleased prisoners to Mr. Block telling him that the Superintendent of the county farm had told me that they would be available for release at 9:00 o'clock the following day. Since it was after 11 p.m., I then prepared to leave Greenwood to return to Jackson. Before I left, I asked Mr. Dale Minor a broadcaster for radio station WBAI in New York to interview as many of the individuals both at Parchman and at the Greenwood county farm as he could, so that we could have some tape recordings of their stories. He told me he would do so. I was also informed that NBC-TV would be in Greenwood the following day and that some of the prisoners would talk with NBC newsmen.

I believe that more detailed statements of the conditions by the prisoners themselves both at the State Penitentary and the county farm can be obtained from Mr. Minor and from the NBC crew.

In all, 57 persons were released as a result of bonds written by the X Insurance Company. This included 13 at the state penitentary, 43 at the county farm and one who had been removed from the county farm to the county jail in the courthouse.

One of my conversations with Sheriff Cothran, might be of particular interest. During this conversation the Sheriff told me that on the day of the arrest of the individuals in Itta Bena tear gas or a bomb or some kind was allegedly thrown into a church were demonstrators had gathered in Itta Bena. The Sheriff told me that the local FBI agent went to Itta Bena along with an expert on noxious gases who had been trained by the Army Ordinance Department during the war, and that they arrived on the scene less than hour after the bomb had been thrown and that they both reported finding no sign of tear gas or any other noxious gases. He informed me that 6 automobiles driven by his deputies had been damaged by bricks and bottles in Itta Bena; that this had been witnessed by an attorney for the Justice Department, I believe a Mr. Rosenberg, but that Mr. Rosenberg had "lied" in saying that there was no violence. The sheriff informed me that he had asked Mr. Dorr to go to Itta Bena to see conditions for himself, but that Mr. Dorr had refused. The sheriff also told me that many Negroes had come to his office asking his permission to take care of the "agitators" (by which he meant the Negroes working inthe Voter Education Project), but that he had refused to allow them to take the law into their own hands.

Pledge taken by 200,000 people on August 29th in Washington:

> "I will work to make sure that my voice and those of my brothers ring clear and determined from every corner of our land."

Will yours "ring clear and determined from your part of our land"?

This is the critical moment so far as a strong civil rights law is concerned. WHY?

Because

1. Citizens must push for amendments to strengthen the President's excellent but still inadequate bill. President Kennedy feels that he cannot make additional proposals although he favors adding FEPC and a broadened Part III. It's really up to YOU and ME.

2. The Senate Majority Leader, Mr. Mansfield, says he will support the bill in whatever form it comes from the House.

3. House Speaker McCormack assured civil rights leaders that FEPC and an "across the board Part III" will pass the House "if" the House Judiciary Committees add these two provisions to the bill.

4. Chairman Celler of the House Judiciary Committee says he will accept these two additions but leaves the matter in the hands of the Sub-Committee (No. 5) of which he is also the chairman.

5. The Sub-Committee is taking a recess until Sept. 9. Soon after that it will report a bill to the full committee. That bill will not contain these critically important provisions UNLESS YOU AND THOUSANDS OF OTHERS WRITE, TELEGRAPH, OR OTHERWISE COMMUNICATE YOUR DESIRE THAT IT DO SO.

ACT NOW!!!! WON'T YOU?

A few pointers -

1. Write your own personal letter on your own stationery and base your appeal on reasoned religious, moral and patriotic grounds.
2. Be brief, courteous, concentrate on the issue of a strong 1963 civil rights act that includes FEPC and a broadened Part III.
3. Ask your Congressman's opinion and whether he is prepared to fight for a strong bill, all the way.
4. Commend him for some recent action he has taken if you can.

YOUR OPINION DOES COUNT!

CITIZENS' MARCH ON WASHINGTON FOR JOBS AND FREEDOM

On August 28 one of the greatest events in American history took place in the capital city when a crowd estimated to number between 210,000 and 250,000 participated in a dignified and orderly demonstration in behalf of a meaningful civil rights act in 1963.

There never was any danger that the marchers themselves would cause violence. Police surveillance assured that the peaceful demonstration should not be marred by fascist or other fanatical opponents of the Negro's struggle for first class citizenship.

Observers were impressed. These included some 30 or more members of the U.S. Senate and House who came to the exercises, scores of foreign and American news reporters and commentators, TV cameramen and hundreds of others who have since remarked on the decorum, the earnestness, manifest seriousness of the marchers and of their leaders who spoke from the steps of the Lincoln Memorial. At least twenty per cent of the marchers were non-Negroes, principally white people.

If you were privileged to be there, you know what a satisfying experience it was.

What next?

Read the two enclosures. They throw some light on this question.

Washington

The First Significant Test of the Freedom March

By JAMES RESTON

WASHINGTON, Aug. 29—The first significant test of the Negro march on Washington will come in the churches and synagogues of the country this weekend.

It is no good waiting for a political reaction in Congress, for if there is no effective moral reaction out in the country, there will be no effective political reaction here.

This whole movement for equality in American life will have to return to first principles before it will "overcome" anything. And as moral principles preceded and inspired political principles in this country, as the church preceded the Congress, so there will have to be a moral revulsion to the humiliation of the Negro before there can be significant political relief.

The TV Mentality

The preachers at the Lincoln Memorial here this week understood this better than anybody else, but they were not able to speak for the whole religious community of the nation.

"If," said the executive head of the United Presbyterian Church, Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, "all the members and all the ministers of the constituency I represent here today were ready to stand and march with you for jobs and freedom for the Negro people, together with all the Roman Catholic Church and all of the synagogues in America, the battle for full civil rights and dignity would be won."

The president of the American Jewish Congress, Rabbi Joachim Prinz, put the point another way. "When I was the rabbi of the Jewish community in Berlin under the Hitler regime, I learned many things. The most important thing I learned . . . under those tragic circumstances is that bigotry and hatred are not the most urgent problem. The most urgent, the most disgraceful, the most shameful and the most tragic problem is silence.

"A great people, which had created a great civilization, had become a nation of silent onlookers. . . . America must not remain silent. It must speak up and act . . . and not for the sake of the Negro, but for the sake of the image, the idea and the aspiration of America itself. . . ."

Few people would question the validity of these points, but two misfortunes have debased the power of the church and of church opinion. Too many preachers, like too many Congressmen, are not leading but following their flock, perpetuating rather than destroying illusion and prejudice. They are "passing by on the other side." And their parishioners, even when they want to be participants instead of spectators, have lost faith in their power to influence great events.

Nothing, however, is more fallacious in American political life than the popular idea that Congressmen pay no attention to letters from their constituents. Some of them are impervious to reason and others either won't or can't read, but all of them want to be re-elected, and all of them know the political power of the church, even if they never go there except for votes.

If the preachers said what they really thought about this racial crisis and even half of those who heard and believed them wrote their honest convictions for or against racial equality to Capitol Hill, the political balance on racial equality might easily be transformed.

If, however, the churches do not react and the march on Washington is regarded by the religious community as just another TV show, the political battle for civil rights could easily be worse off than before.

For while the politicians here are not saying much about the march, they are listening. And if such a mammoth demonstration, dramatizing the basic religious concept of equality, does not get an impressive response even from the churches, Congress could easily conclude that the nation was indifferent or worse.

'We Need Allies'

The Negro leaders were less exuberant here today than during the big demonstration yesterday. After the spree comes the hangover, and President Kennedy warned them before they left that only with strong bipartisan support could his civil rights bill be passed.

Asa Philip Randolph, who organized the march, admitted the obvious fact. "We need allies," he said. "People who are victims must take the leadership. No one but a Jew could lead the fight against anti-Semitism. No one but a man from the ranks of labor could lead the labor movement.

"But the Negro cannot win the fight alone, no more than the Jew or labor leader could win his fight alone. We need allies."

And if he cannot find them first in the churches, he's not likely to find them among the politicians.

OUT OF THE MOUNTAIN OF DESPAIR A STONE OF HOPE

Well, you have to admit it was unique.

The sudden deposit of 200,000 bodies into a hot legislative campaign is an objective historical fact the merits of which will be debated by wise gray heads on Capitol Hill, graduate students of political science, and citizens of both political parties long after the last bus pulled out of Washington.

On top of which, the precipitous projection of the Churches into a role of self-conscious identification this summer with Negro militancy was given an air of finality in the squads of bishops, clergy, and laity assembled. It was an involvement by no means agreed on by consensus in the churches.

For this has been a summer without time, time for discussion, or interpretation, or calculation about just which strategy is the more propitious or theologically "acceptable."

Time only to make choices in a timetable we did not draw up.

The March was an act of trust. Trust in the Negro action leaders and in the vitality of the democratic process.

It was an act of faith. Faith that through God and an active non-violent revolution, we will be able to "hew out of the mountain of despair a stone of hope."

What did it mean?

A jumble of impressions. Hot sun, bright sky, stunning white of federal marble, lines thirty abreast under a sea of placards, the throb of freedom chants, melting pot of color, black and white together, a whole nation on sore feet, the camaradarie of new found resolve, swirls of faces, fatigue, exhiliration, revolution remembered, revolution reborn, revolution invoked, God invoked, history invoked, God invoking history.

What does it mean?

This issue of CHURCH and RACE is an effort to capture some impressions of the March. A special staff of reporters covered the March from the inside out. They were in the streets themselves, and shared in its dynamics, its power, its pain, and its joy.

RELIGIOUS LEADERS HEARD AT MARCH ON WASHINGTON

The First Admendment to the Constitution was explicitly designed to protect the right of the American people to peacefully petition their government for a redress of their grievances. And this is what happened in Washington on August 28, 1963, when in excess of 200,000 Americans, Negroes and Caucasians petitioned their government to enact the President's current civil rights legislation, create more jobs and eliminate discrimination in employment. Despite widespread apprehension and fears of violence, the March came off eminently successful, orderly, and peaceful. Washington authorities have praised the March, not only as the largest demonstration in the city's history, but also the most disciplined and peaceful. By 10:00 A.M., the scheduled arrival time for participants, only a few marchers had arrived at the Monument grounds, but between 10:30 and 10:45, throngs by the thousands streamed in until by noon they formed a virtual sea of humanity in the area between the Lincoln Memorial and the Washington Monument. For a short time it appeared that there were more white marchers than Negro. Soon the Negroes became the predominant group at an approximate ratio of 3 to 1.

This massive demonstration was the largest in America's history. The marchers carrying banners and placards bearing such slogans as: 'WE DEMAND AN END TO JOB BIAS NOW' - 'WE MARCH TOGETHER - CATHOLIC, PROTESTANT, JEW' and 'FREEDOM NOW' typified the slogans. The marchers were good-humored and mannerly despite a marked air of seriousness of purpose which permeated the proceedings. The nearly 100 U.S. Congressmen and Senators who appeared at the Lincoln Memorial received a rousing demonstration from the marchers. The legislators appeared beside an impressive array of civil rights, labor and religious leaders, including at least ten Episcopal bishops, as well as entertainers and others representing many phases of American life. Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, vice chairman of the NCC's Commission on Religion and Race and Stated-Clerk of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S., in a forthright and moving message told the mammoth assembly:

"For many years now, the NCC and most of its constituent communions have said all the right things about civil rights. Our official pronouncements for years have clearly called for 'a non-segregated church in a non-segregated society.' But as of August 28, 1963, we have achieved neither a non-segregated church nor a non-segregated society. And it is partly because the churches of America have failed to put their house in order, that 100 years after the Emancipation Proclamation, 175 years after the adoption of the Bill of Rights, the United States of America still faces a racial crisis.

Subsequently pointing out the reasons for the churches' participation, he said:

"Yes, we come to march behind and with those amazingly able leaders of the Negro Americans who, to the shame of almost every white American, have alone and without us mirrored the suffering of the cross of Jesus Christ; they have offered their bodies to arrest and to violence, to the hurt and indignity of fire hoses and dogs, of derision and of poverty, and some to death for this just cause. We come --- late we come --- but we come to present ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be 'a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is our reasonable service,' in a kind of tangible and visible sacrament which alone in times like these can manifest to a troubled world the grace available at communion table or high altar.

"We come in prayer that we, in our time, may be more worthy to bear the name our tongues so fluently profess. We come in faith that the God who made us and gave his son for us and for our salvation will overrule the fears and hatreds that so far have prevented the establishment of full racial justice in our beloved country. We come in hope that those who have marched today are but a token of a new and massive high determination of all men of religion and patriotism to win in this 'nation under God ... liberty and justice for all.' We come in that love revealed in Jesus Christ, which reconciles into true community all men of every color, race and nation who respond in faith and obedience to Him."

Rabbi Joachim Prinz, who lived in Nazi Germany told the assembly: "When I lived under the Hitler regime I learned many things. The important was that bigotry and hatred are not the most urgent problem. The most urgent, the most disgraceful problem is silence. A great people had become a nation of silent onlookers. They remained silent in the face of hatred, brutality and murder." Continuing, Rabbi Prinz said, "America must not become a nation of onlookers. It must not be silent. Not merely Black America but all of America. It must speak up and act, from the President down to the humblest of us, and not for the sake of the Negro, but for the sake of America."

Mathew Ahmann, Executive Director of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice, told the assembly "that now is the time we respond to the demand of our conscience, now is the time we grasp the ideal our faiths and our constitution hold before us. There is no turning back. In a decade or less we will have done our utmost to have secured a community of justice and fraternity and love among us, or we will have laid the seeds of our own destruction."

All of the messages bore a strong sense of urgency and hope.

The stirring message delivered by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., became one of the highlights of the March. (See pages 10 and 11.)

Special services were held in churches throughout the city.

At 8:00 A.M., on the morning of the March, leaders from the religious community met for a NCC-sponsored breakfast at the Statler Hotel. Most of the leaders of the March appeared there prior to their meeting with legislators on Capitol Hill.

At 9:00 A.M., the Holy Eucharist was celebrated at the Church of St. Stephen and the Incarnation followed by a breakfast. The congregation led by their rector, the Rev. William Wendt, and a curate, the Rev. Tilden H. Edwards, Jr., then lined up two-by-two and quietly filed down 16th Street behind a vested crucifer, joining the several hundred churchmen from St. Luke's Church. The two lines totaling about 500 persons continued to Lafayette Square, where they joined the worshippers at St. John's Church and were led in a special prayer service by the Rt. Rev. William F. Creighton, Episcopal bishop of Washington. Following this service the bishops and worshippers at St. John's formed a procession of 1100 churchmen led by the St. Stephen and the Incarnation crucifer and proceeded to join the other marchers on Constitution Avenue.

The Lincoln Memorial program concluded about 4:20 P.M., a which time the leaders of the March committee met with the President at the White House. President Kennedy told the group that passage of his Civil Rights legislation depended on bipartisan Congressional support and 'that the Executive Branch of the Federal Government will continue its efforts to obtain increased employment and to eliminate discrimination in employment practices, two of the prime goals of the March.' Concluding his remarks, the President said:

> "The cause of 20 million Negroes has been advanced by the program conducted so appropriately before the Nation's shrine to the Great Emancipator, but even more significant is the contribution to all mankind."

SOME OF THE MORE THAN 2,000 'MARCH' BUSES

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE

It will be months, perhaps years, before anyone can evaluate objectively the results of the March on Washington. Pragmatic judgments are already being made, especially in terms of the civil rights legislation now before Congress. Will the corporate witness of 200,000 black and white people, acting in absolute concert, sway the balance of legislative power? Will the unblemished behavior and obvious good-will of the nation's most massive protest demonstration cut any ice with public opinion?

Answers here, in the area of exterior effect, remain to be seen. But looking inward, into the consciences and conscious thoughts of those who took part in the August 28th March, much can be said. Perhaps this is the most important effect of the March: for those who were there, it proved a great deal.

Over-riding the entire event and pulsing strongly among speakers, marchers and observers alike were several unmistakable themes which spoke the spirit of the March and the trend of our times:

A waking sense of the dignity of man -- expressed in countless, simple ways which (louder than theological phrases) vividly declared the invincible image of God among His creatures. An elderly Negro woman from the South said it plainly: "I am so proud of my people today."

The will to overcome -- asserted not in bloody, vituperative ways but in the throbbing power of essential right, welling up and spilling over out of the assembly into press reports and -- hopefully -- the consciences of apprehensive legislators.

Sharpening of responsibility -- No one came alone. No one came to stay. Each one of the 200,000 went home to a family to tell, friends to teach, a community to influence. Everyone there was talking about that. Take the dignified New England white woman, in the garden-party dress and sensible shoes. She was a convert that day, and was going home to spread the gospel out of a newly desegregated heart. Across the tea table, the back fence, the places CORE and SNCC never go, the word from Washington will be spread in unlikely accents and ever-widening ways.

These were the over-arching effects, and they were played out in myriad ways.

1. Everyone who marched seemed to know why he was there. There was joy and fervor, but it was deadly serious, too. The chants of "FREEDOM, NOW" never seemed frivolous -- no matter how jazzy the syncopation.

2. An uncommon atmosphere of camaraderie and consideration overtook all 200,000 from beginning to end. People from every conceivable background were jammed together, shoulder to shoulder, along the muggy pavements. People moved and drifted a great deal.

But there was no complaining, no self-centering. If you stepped on somebody or jostled him, you instinctively said, "I'm sorry." People who had never seen each other before suddenly fell into step, into conversation -- into each other's life.

3. There was no "label-hanging." Many groups carried identifying banners, or wore caps, armbands and the like. But name brand with a church group, labor union, or civic organization or the like seemed curiously unimportant. All that mattered was that human beings, were acting in unision for a great cause.

4. It was a deeply religious event. There were scads of clergy in their collars and Jews in skullcaps. Even skeptics were impressed at the sheer volume of organized Church participation. Prayers were said and hymns sung. But these were only external signs of the grace, power and faith running deep and sub-consciously throughout. A good many non-clergy types said it quite plainly: "the Holy Spirit is at work here today."

5. It was, in human terms, "nobody's show." About 75% of the people there were Negroes -- perhaps less. Theirs was the leadership: the key planners, the main speakers, etc. But if it was "their day" -- made sweet by 100 years of anticipation -- Negroes shared it unreservedly.

6. Dynamic and successful as the March itself became, there was deep-seated consciousness -- articulated by the man on the street as well as the ones on the rostrum -- that this was only the beginning. About this, a great deal needs to be said:

Most people we talked with admitted they had come to Washington with some reservations -- or at least a fuzziness of motive. But what they received was a strengthening of faith, purpose and resolve. A white college girl, veteran of a few academic excursions and one sit-in experience, put it this way: "I got a new feeling today. I've always known a lot of people must feel the same as I do. But this is the first time I could really be sure I wasn't just one of a few rattling around in a vacuum."

Was the tactic of the mass demonstration justified? Overwhelmingly, the answer was "yes." A transplanted Southern white man considered the question as we marched along Constitution Avenue: "This proves it can be done. We are strengthening the hand of every rights group in the South with every step we take. And even if not one Congressman changes his mind because of the March here, there are 200,000 people going back into their home-towns stronger and bolder than they came."

A Negro from Oklahoma echoed the same idea another way: "Only a few of us could come all the way from Tulsa. What we are doing, we are doing for them as well as for ourselves. They're waiting for us to come home and teach them what we learned."

What about the Church's part in all this? How is it received by those who are fighting for freedom on purely secular grounds? Generally, non-Church people seemed pleased and somewhat surprised to see so many Churchmen aligned with them. But there is still resentment and some scepticism. A Negro unionist from New Jersey, listening to Eugene Carson Blake, said: "The Church talks right. But 11:00 o'clock Sunday is still segregation hour too many places." His friends, all Church members, nodded. They seemed embarrassed.

For Churchmen who were in Washington and for those who were not, this is perhaps the most crucial issue. What the Church does as the local church will determine whether or not we can hope to have a part in the obtaining of human rights for all people. Momentum has been accelerated by the March. Every diocese, parish and baptised person must re-think their commitment and timetable in terms of issues sharpened by the big day in Washington. The challenges are many and urgent:

a) Full desegregation of parish life.
b) Avoidance of contracts with or employment of segregating firms, unions, etc.
c) Active effort to end discrimination in the secular community.
d) Support (money, manpower and prayers) for local, regional and national civil rights organizations.
e) Study programs to acquaint parishioners with civil rights issues, legislations and other remedies.

DR. M. L. KING'S ADDRESS PROVIDED WHAT MANY CONSIDER THE HIGHLIGHT OF THE 'MARCH'

FOR FREEDOM NOW!

Perhaps the most adequate way of summing up the March is through the words of the speakers at the rally. Martin Luther King caught the mood of the marchers well, and received a wild ovation. His address, printed almost in full,follows:

"Five score years ago, a great American, in whose symbolic shadow we stand today, signed the Emancipation Proclamation. This momentous decree came as a great beacon of light of hope to millions of Negro slaves who had been seared in the flames of withering injustice. It came as a joyous day-break to end the long night of captivity.

"But one hundred years later, we must face the tragic fact that the Negro still is not free. One hundred years later, the life of the Negro is still sadly crippled by the manacle of segregation and the chains of discrimination. One hundred years later, the Negro lives on a lonely island of poverty in the midst of a vast ocean of material prosperity. One hundred years later, the Negro is still languished in the corners of American society and finds himself an exile in his own land. So we have come here today to dramatize an appalling condition.

"In a sense we have come to our nation's Capitol to cash a check. When the architects of our republic wrote the magnificent words of the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, they were signing a promissory note to which every American was to fall heir. This note was a promise that all men would be granted the unalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

"It is obvious today that America has defaulted on this promissory note insofar as her citizens of color are concerned. Instead of honoring this sacred obligation, America has given the Negro people a bad check; a check which has come marked "insufficient funds." But we refuse to believe that the bank of justice is bankrupt. We refuse to believe that there are insufficient funds in the great vaults of opportunity of this nation. We we have come to cash this check - a check that will give up upon demand the riches of freedom and the security of justice.

"We have also come to this hallowed spot to remind America of the fierce urgency of now. This is no time to engage in the luxury of cooling off or to take the tranquilizing drug of gradualism. Now is the time to make real the promise of Democracy. Now is the time to rise from the dark and desolate valley of segregation to the sunlit path of racial justice. Now is the time to open the doors of opportunity to all God's children. Now is the time to lift our nation from the quick sands of racial injustice to the solid rock of brotherhood.

"It would be fatal for the nation to overlook the urgency of the moment and to underestimate the determination of the Negro. This sweltering summer of the Negro's legitimate discontent will not pass until there is an invigorating autumn of freedom and equality. 1963 is not an end, but a beginning. Those who hope that the Negro needed to blow off steam and will now be content will have a rude awakening if the Nation returns to business as usual. There will be neither rest nor tranquility in America until the Negro is granted his citizenship rights. The whirlwinds of revolt will continue to shake the foundations of our Nation until the bright day of justice emerges.

"But there is something that I must say to my people who stand on the warm threshold which leads into the palace of justice. In the process of gaining our rightful place we must not be guilty of wrongful deeds. Let us not seek to satisfy our thirst for freedom by drinking from the cup of bitterness and hatred. We must forever conduct our struggle on the high plane of dignity and discipline. We must not allow our creative protest to degenerate into physical violence. Again and again we must rise to the majestic heights of meeting physical force with soul force. The marvelous new militancy which has engulfed the Negro community must not lead us to a distrust of all white people, for many of our white brothers evidenced by their presence here today, have come to realize that their distiny is tied up with our destiny and their freedom is inextricably bound to our freedom. This offense we share mounted to storm the battlements of injustice must be carried forth by a bi-racial army. We cannot walk alone.

"And as we walk, we must make the pledge that we shall always march ahead. We cannot turn back. There are those who are asking the devotees of civil rights, "When will you be satisfied?" We can never be satisfied as long as the Negro is the victim of the unspeakable horrors of police brutality. We can never be satisfied as long as our bodies, heavy with the fatigue of travel, cannot gain lodging in the motels of the highways and the hotels of the cities. We cannot be satisfied as long as the Negro's basic mobility is from a smaller ghetto to a larger one. We can never be satisfied as long as our children are stripped of their selfhood and robbed of their dignity by signs stating "for whites only." We cannot be satisfied as long as a Negro in Mississippi cannot vote and a Negro in New York believes he has nothing for which to vote. We will not be satisfied until justice rolls down like waters and righteousness like a mighty stream

"I am not unmindful that some of you have come here out of excessive trials and tribulation. Some of you have come fresh from narrow jail cells. Some of you have come from areas where your quest for freedom left you battered by the storms of persecution and staggered by the winds of police brutality. You have been the veterans of creative suffering. Continue to work with the faith that unearned suffering is redemptive. With this faith we will be able to hew out of the mountain of despair a stone of hope. With this faith we will be able to transform the jangling discords of our nation into a beautiful symphony of brotherhood. Let us work and march and love and stand tall together until that day has come when we can join hands and sing, 'Free at last, free at last; thank God Almighty, we are free at last.'"

WASHINGTON,
D.C.

QUO VADIS

"The first significant test of the Negro march on Washington will come in the churches and synagogues of the country this weekend.

"It is no good waiting for a political reaction in Congress, for if there is no effective moral reaction out in the country, there will be no effective political reaction here.

"This whole movement for equality in American life will have to return to first principles before it will "overcome" anything. And as moral principles preceded and inspired political principles in this country, as the church preceded the Congress, as there will have to be a moral revulsion to the humiliation of the Negro before there can be significant political relief.

"The preachers at the Lincoln Memorial here this week understood this better than anybody else, but they were not able to speak for the whole religious community of the nation.

"'If,' said the executive head of the United Presbyterian Church, Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, 'all the members and all the ministers of the constituency I represent here today were ready to stand and march with you for jobs and freedom for the Negro people, together with all the Roman Catholic Church and all of the synagogues in America, the battle for civil rights and dignity would already be won."

"The president of the American Jewish Congress, Rabbi Joachim Prinz, put the point another way. 'When I was the rabbi of the Jewish community in Berlin under the Hitler regime, I learned many things. The most important thing I learned... under those tragic circumstances is that bigotry and hatred are not the most urgent problem. The most urgent, the most disgraceful, the most shameful and the most tragic problem is silence.

"'A great people, which had created a great civilization, had become a nation of silent onlookers... America must not remain silent. It must speak up and act ... and not for the sake of the Negro, but for the sake of the image, the idea and the aspiration of American itself....'

"Few people would question the validity of these points, but two misfortunes have debased the power of the church and of church opinion. Too many preachers, like too many Congressmen, are not leading but following their flock, perpetuating rather than destroying illusion and prejudice. They are 'passing by on the other side.' And their parishioners, even when they want to be participants instead of spectators, have lost faith in their power to influence great events.

"Nothing, however, is more fallacious in American political life than the popular idea that Congressmen pay no attention to letters from their constituents. Some of them are impervious to reason and others either won't or can't read, but all of them want to be re-elected, and all of them know the political power of the church, even if they never go there except for votes.

"If the preachers said what they really thought about this racial crisis and even half of those who heard and believed them wrote their honest convictions for or against racial equality to Capitol Hill, the political balance on racial equality might easily be transformed.

"If, however, the churches do not react and the march on Washington is regarded by the religious community as just another TV show, the political battle for civil rights could easily be worse off than before.

"For while the politicians here are not saying much about the march, they are listening. And if such a mammoth demonstration, dramatizing the basic religious concept of equality, does not get an impressive response even from the churches, Congress could easily conclude that the nation was indifferent or worse.

"The Negro leaders were less exuberant here today than during the big demonstration yesterday. After the spree comes the hangover, and President Kennedy warned them before they left that only with strong bipartisan support could his civil rights bill be passed.

"Asa Philip Randolph, who organized the march, admitted the obvious fact. 'We need allies,' he said. 'People who are victims must take the leadership. No one but a Jew could lead the fight against anti-Semitism. No one but a man from the ranks of labor could lead the labor movement.

"'But the Negro cannot win the fight alone, no more than the Jew or labor leader could win his fight alone. We need allies.'

And if he cannot find them first in the churches, he's not likely to find them among the politicians."

EDITOR'S NOTE:

The charge has been made that some of those persons who wore clerical collars during the March on Washington were not ordained ministers or priests. We cannot attest to the validity or invalidity of this charge and we cannot speak for any church except our own. We know that at least ten Episcopal bishops were in the March and at a conservative estimate there were at least 300 Episcopal priests. Mathew Ahmann, executive director of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice estimated that not fewer than 10,000 Roman Catholics took part. Included were seven members of the hierarchy, among them two archbishops and hundreds of priests. Other denominations are still trying to assess the extent of their lay and clergy participation.

BISHOP WARNECKE PRESENTS
REPORT TO HOUSE OF BISHOPS

The Rt. Rev. Frederick J. Warnecke, Chairman of a special Committee of the House of Bishops on Race and Religion, presented to the House of Bishops meeting in Toronto a report from which the following sections were excerpted. Single copies of the complete statement are available upon request from the Division of Christian Citizenship, Episcopal Church Center, 815 Second Avenue, New York 17, New York.

THE PRESENT SITUATION

What is the present situation? We are in the midst of a social revolution. This revolution is to preserve the American Constitution, not to overthrow it. The Negro citizens of our country are asking that they be treated as the American citizens which they are and not as second class inhabitants of the land. They are asking for rights not for social privileges. They are asking for an end to the injustice of discrimination based upon the color of a man's skin. These are moral and ethical values as well as constitutional ones.

The initiative in this movement is with the Negro community. The Negro needs the help of the white community but the determination of this struggle and its strategy is in Negro hands. Moreover, the vast majority of the Negroes are fully and sympathetically involved. This is not a matter of "outside agitators."

A basic factor is the impatience of the Negro at this moment in history. There is immediacy and urgency in his cry to receive the rights of an American citizen now. The time is now and there is no longer the possibility of gradualism.

A constructive part of the situation is the new leadership among the Negroes. This leadership is young, able, educated, articulate and avowedly militant. There is no psychology of inferiority or of subservience in this group. Many of them are church-oriented; and we may rejoice in the base that this movement has in the Negro Church. At the same time we must acknowledge that the Negro is divided in his opinion of the white Churches. Many Negroes feel that the white Churches have been passive at best and hostile in many cases. The issue is touch and go as to whether we will be trusted as Christian brothers and permitted to work with them or whether we will be seen as allied with the forces of discrimination.

This has been a movement in the life of our entire country and so there are obvious differences in tempo, in methods, in characteristics, in local leadership as well as in response and reaction in various parts of the nation. But we are all involved. This is a national question. Yet it seems fair to say that in the South generally the sharp points at issue relate to voting rights and to the desegregation of public facilities; whereas in the North the primary questions are jobs and housing. All over the nation, we are at different points in history not only in intergroup relations, but in community structures, in economic health, in responsible political leadership, in cultural patterns, in local mores and in religious understanding and commitment.

THREE SPECIFIC IMMEDIATE SITUATIONS

1) We feel that the Whitsuntide statement of the Presiding Bishop was appropriate and helpful. It was a rightful expression of concerned Christian leadership . It is suggested therefore that we associate ourselves with the Presiding Bishop in that statement.

2) On August 28, 1963, there will be a "March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom". To quote the sponsors of this March, "the purpose of the March is, by a massive, peaceful and democratic demonstration in the nation's capital, to provide evidence of the need for the Federal Government to take effective and immediate action to deal with the national crisis of civil rights and jobs that all of us, Negro and white, are facing." "Politically the March is non-partisan; that is, neither funds nor organized participation of totalitarian or subversive groups of all persuasions. Organizational participation is invited from only the established civil rights organizations, from major religious and fraternal groups, and from labor unions."

Specifically, the March is "To demand that Congress pass a civil rights bill that will restore the constitutional rights now denied the Negro people... To offer a great witness to the basic moral principle of human equality and brotherhood." "In their historic non-violent revolt for freedom the Negro people are demanding the right to decent jobs - recognizing that their struggle is inextricably linked with the struggle for decent jobs for all Americans. They know that in the long run there is no way for Negroes to win and hold jobs unless the problems of automation, a stagnant economy and discrimination are solved; therefore the Federal government must establish a massive works program to train and employ all Americans at decent wages and at meaningful and dignified labor."

The plans for the March are being carefully prepared in full cooperation with the Washington police and the Federal government. It will be a one-day gathering and those coming are emphatically asked not to come before that day nor to remain after it. At 10 a.m. people from each state will gather to meet with their congressional representatives. At noon there will be a gathering at the Washington Monument to be followed by a parade to the Lincoln Memorial where there will be commemoration of the 100th Anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. The March is planned to stay away from Capitol Hill. There will be no sit-ins in the halls of Congress. The leadership of the March asks for prayers in all Churches for the purposes and goals of the March on the preceding Sunday, August 25th; and for the cooperation and participation of the white community in the March that it may be seen not as a Negro demonstration but as the expression of the feelings of the total American community.

We suggest that there be prayers in every Church on Sunday, August 25, for freedom and for employment for all American citizens without respect to race. We also would hope that the Bishop of Washington might find it possible to arrange for a service in Washington on August 28 open to all men.

We think that each Bishop must personally decide whether and how he and his diocese will act directly in this matter. We hope there will be a large participation by white people and by the churches.

3) Civil Rights Legislation.

Every man must be interested in the status of civil rights for when the constitutional rights of one are abridged the rights of all are endangered. The present legislation before Congress is intended to implement the constitutional rights of all American citizens. It relates to voting privileges, fair employment practices, housing and access to places of public accommodation.

We are not competent to evaluate the precise proposals being offered. We do think that they should be carefully studied by all citizens. Within the church, Christian values should be pointed out in any analysis of the legislation. Church people should be encouraged to express their opinions to their representatives. When political leadership is responsible, progress is made in these affairs. When political leadership is irresponsible, disaster and violence are encouraged.

It is said that the legislation relation to free access to places of public accommodation curtails property rights. But dozens of laws curtail property rights. Every building code does so; every zoning law. It is a Christian principle that the people are more valuable than property.

We would point out that apart from discrimination and racial problems, this legislation, particularly in respect to jobs, open a whole range of problems in our economy. For part of the situation is that we have too few jobs. There is little sense in promising Negroes jobs that do not exist for either whites or Negroes. But there is not only unemployment, there are those who are unemployable. There is a need for 20,000 more jobs each week simply to care for the growing labor force. There is the corollary need for measures to care for the undue number of school drop-outs who are thus untrained for our increasingly sophisticated industry. There is the area of retraining men who have lost their jobs because of technological changes. There is the spectre of automation not only lessening the number of jobs, but eliminating the menial jobs hitherto filled by the one talent man. There is the question of the shorter work week and the use of greatly increased leisure time; and the need to think through our conventional Christian philosophy about man's inherent need to work.

Further, what does this legislation say directly to the church in its own employment practices, in the construction of buildings for church purposes and in its investments? Can we endorse legislation against job discrimination and then award a contract to build a church to a contractor who employs only whites; or who is tied to a lily-white labor union?

SOME THOUGHTS ON CHURCH STRATEGY RELATING TO THE BISHOP'S RESPONSIBILITY

1) Communication.

The Bishops should keep open channels of communication, first of all, within the church itself. The National Council should continue its policy of full information of its policies, plans, and pronouncements to the bishops and the dioceses. But the channels should flow on to the priests,the parishes and to the laity. This need for interpretation is constant.

One would speak here also of the need for communication between the bishops so that we may understand each other better, whether we agree or not in particular events or tactics.

Outside of the church as bishops we frequently can maintain liaison with the power structure of our states and communities. Sometimes a national situation may be constructively affected by a local contact when laity carry national weight economically, politically or socially. Frequently, when these men are Episcopalians the church has access to them.

Again, the bishop should maintain close communication with the Negro activist groups that are leading this movement. Nationally this possibly can best be done by the Presiding Bishop and the National Council, but in our states and communities we think this is a peculiar opportunity for a bishop. Dialogue is a necessity in the present.

There should certainly be liaison with other communions. The bishop is the one to further such inter-faith conversations that possibly may lead to concerted action.

When such channels of communication are open and available in advance, it is frequently possible to work out problems by negotiation without public demonstrations or violence. If these do occur, then there is a tool ready at hand to use in that situation without waste of time.

2) Local Witness.

In our estimation there have been enough resolutions and pronouncements, through we feel that the church needs to interpret again and again where it stands in its theology and faith in relation to these matters. There has been a deathly silence by the church in many dioceses and parishes.

Negotiation is an important part of local witness if it is used to block but to achieve solutions to the problems. In many cases unfortunately the climate is such locally that negotiation does not move constructively until there is the pressure of public demonstrations. This forces people to come to grips with the issue. We believe that such public demonstrations are a rightful American method of protest. It is well if the leadership of such demonstrations can be local people who will continue to live in the community and deal with the consequences. There should be responsible Negro and white participation. There are occasions when rightfully national organizations should enter the local scene. These can often be catalysts. They can provide professional experience and advice. They can help and guide a local group.

We are concerned to discuss one facet of demonstrations which peculiarly involves the church. What of the situation when a priest or a bishop or a National Council staff member enters a bishop's jurisdiction other than his own to participate in a demonstration.

The dilemma, we think, is obvious. We cannot limit the freedom of access or action of an American citizen as such. But we also cannot ignore the fact that a priest, a bishop, or a National Council officer, despite any disclaimers that he is simply acting in a personal sense is inevitably publicly symbolic of and representative of the church. He cannot divorce himself from his office.

He is not wholly a private person. Moreover, by his ordination vows he has placed himself under the discipline of the church.

Article 2, Section 3 of the Constitution states, "A Bishop shall confine the exercise of his office to his own Diocese or Missionary District, unless he shall have been requested to perform episcopal acts in another Diocese or Missionary District." Canon 45, Section 4 a, reads, "No Minister of this Church shall officiate, either by preaching, reading prayers in public worship, or performing any other priestly or ministerial function, in the Parish or within the Cure, of another Minister, without the consent of the Minister of that Parish or Cure;..." Canon 59 is forbodingly entitled, "Of a Minister in any Diocese or Missionary District Chargeable with Offense in Another". Section 1 reads, "If a Minister belonging to any Diocese or Missionary District shall have conducted himself in any other Diocese or Missionary District in such a way as to be liable to presentment under the provisions of Canon 53, the Ecclesiastical Authority thereof shall give notice of the same to the Ecclesiastical Authority where he is canonically resident,..."

Canon 53 relates to the offenses for which ministers may be tried. The only charge possibly related to our discussion is (8) "Conduct unbecoming a Clergyman."

Now these citations plainly relate to the ecclesiastical functioning of a bishop or priest. Is participation in public demonstrations relating to racial injustice a "ministerial function", or, "the exercise of his office" by a bishop? In some senses they can be so construed, and individual priests and bishops so participating have at times given their presence such an interpretation. At the oppostite pole, there have been those who have called such actions "Conduct unbecoming a Clergyman".

There is an interesting inter-diocesan possibility in Canon 8, relating to the provinces. Section 8 of this Canon gives the Provincial Synod, on which all the bishops sit, power "(4) to deal with all matters within the Province; Provided, however, that no Provincial Snyod shall have power to regulate or control the internal policy or affairs of any constituent Diocese or Missionary District;..."

To sum up, there is clearly canonical provision for jurisdiction by a bishop and a degree of local jurisdiction by a priest within his cure. These relate to ecclesiastical functioning.

There are also obligations of discipline accepted at ordination by the ministers of this Church.

Yet, matters of Christian conscience are not to be wholly resolved by canon law. Nor does ordination take from a bishop or priest the privileges and rights of an American citizen, though in some measure they are shaped by his allegiance to the Church and his ordination vows.

In true Anglican fashion, therefore, we would hope that there would be both freedom and discipline in these matters.

We would think that in all these situations Christian courtesy might be invoked. A priest might well speak with the rector of the parish church about his intentions, especially in smaller communities. A bishop would certainly want to consult his brother bishop. We are not prepared to say that a priest or a bishop may not participate in demonstrations if the rector or bishop with jurisdiction disapproves. We think the freedom of a Christian man and conscience is here involved.

The position of a National Council staff member is rather different because of his relationship to the whole Church. We believe he - or she - should always consult the bishop with jurisdiction and hopefully receive his consent. If the bishop strongly dissents, National Council officers would be well advised not to enter that jurisdiction for public demonstrations. For better or for worse, we are still an episcopal church. We add this comment to our episcopal brethren. When a bishop refuses leadership in these situations and simply attempts to block any positive action, then we ask whether the greater Church does not have a stake and an imperative to act in that situation.

3) Opportunities of Leadership.

The dilemma just discussed encourages us to emphasize and encourage the leadership of a bishop in this total situation. His active and wise participation is important to the Church and to the community. He is by office a leader. He generally has access to the power structure of the area; indeed, he is part of it. He best can encourage inter-faith and bi-racial groups. He can be open to those in the diocese who utterly disagree with him, for he is still recognized as the bishop of the whole flock of Christ. Altogether, let a bishop be a bishop.

In this role it is important that he let his clergy know his stance. A bishop should come to an understanding with his clergy about their attitudes in these matters and how he will or will not support them if they get into difficulties. If he believes that certain things should be done by the clergy and others not done, let him so inform them. This will not only be useful to the clergy but will enable them to support the bishop.

There is need for special pastoral support by the bishop for certain of the clergy and of the laity who are on the firing line in these matters. Many of our clergy feel alone in the position which because of conscience they have taken at this time. They need to know that they can come to their bishop and that he will listen to them. Indeed, the bishop needs to go to them.

Negro clergy and their families need special help, as do white activist clergy some of whom have been deeply and emotionally shaken by their experiences. Some of these may need relocation. Others may well need a period of extended rest.

The bishop also should minister to the laity of our Church and others who have taken activist positions that have been locally unpopular. The bishop should personally encourage men of good will in public office and those who with special responsibilities are working to find a solution to the problems. These people need to know the acceptance of the Christian Church even when there is difference in positions and practices.

There may well be need for national financial help in certain of the personal situations, especially among the clergy. We would suggest that this be channeled quietly through the Presiding Bishop's Discretionary Fund, and that consideration should be given to augmenting this Fund. Dioceses and the national Church may also shortly have to face greatly reduced giving to the program of the Church because of the position which the Church has taken.

The bishop bears special responsibility for diocesan institutions, many of which are only related organizationally to the Church through his person and office. Charters, trusts, endowments and other legal concerns enter into this, but the wise and firm guidance of a bishop may well lead to consistent witness in these affairs. In certain instances it may be for the good of the Church to withdraw from the life of an institution rather than to accept continued and obdurate discrimination. The administrative and employment policies of the diocese itself should be carefully examined that they are just and fair to all men.

Again we would emphasize the need to plan for the new future that is before us. This leadership can best be given by a bishop in a diocese. Out of such discussions might come a better strategy for the Church of tomorrow in all of its life.

Finally, we speak of a bishop's own personal need for fellowship, for someone to talk to on his own level of responsibility. We would not want to structure this, but we would hope that the ties of this House would make possible more deeply significant personal contacts among us.

ANGLICAN CONGRESS ISSUES STATEMENT ON RACE BIAS

Delegates at the final session of the Anglican Congress meeting in Toronto at the plea of a Nigerian churchman added the following statement to the original message:

"God has called us to affirm the unity of the human race. Segregation and other forms of discrimination are a sin. We voice our deep concern and compassion for all who suffer on account of race, color, or creed. We are ashamed that barriers of race should still persist in the life of the Church."

The plea for the Congress to express itself on the racial issue was made by Chancellor Adejemi Olusola Lawson of the Diocese of Lagos, Nigeria, who said the lack of such a statement would force him to tell people in his diocese that it was not made because of "sheer cowardice."

Archbishop Howard H. Clark of Rupert's Land, Canadian primate, assured the chancellor that mention of the racial issue was contained in a separate Congress document.

On the insistence of the African churchman, who asked whether the race statement should be "tucked away in the corner of a paper," the question of including it in the final Congress message was put to a vote.

Sustained applause greeted Archbishop Clark's call for those in favor of redrafting the final message. Only a few delegates were against including the race statement in the final document.

HOUSE OF BISHOPS MEETS

The House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States on August 12th placed themselves squarely behind the August 28th March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom, unequivocally supported Presiding Bishop Arthur Lichtenberger's strong stand against racial segregation, and urged the United States Congress to speedily enact civil rights legislation.

Meeting in executive session at the Royal York Hotel, the one hundred and sixteen American Bishops encouraged the Episcopal Church's 3,500,000 members to join in the Washington March by stating that participation in "a peaceful assemblage for the redress of grievances" is "a proper expression of Christian witness and obedience."

Here they added the prayer that citizens of all races would peacefully "bring before the government for appropriate and competent action the critical and agonizing problems" of America's racial crisis.

In a second resolution, the House of Bishops urged the United States Congress to "pass such civil rights legislation as shall fairly and effectively implement both the established rights and the needs of all minority groups in education, voting rights, housing, employment opportunities, and access to places of public accommodation."

They also voiced their support of Bishop Lichtenberger's Whitsuntide message in which he urged all Episcopalians to actively involve themselves in the Negro's struggle for full human equality.

Bishop Lichtenberger, on June 2, had stated in part:

"It is not enough for the Church to exhort men to be good. Men, women, and children are today risking their livelihood and their lives in protesting for their rights. We must support and strengthen them in every way possible, rather than give support to the forces of resistance by our silence. It should be a cause of rejoicing to the Christian community that Negro Americans and oppressed people everywhere are displaying a heightened sense of human dignity in their refusal to accept second-class citizenship any longer."

He also asked the church's 3,500,000 members to give money to support Negro action groups and to act to end any kind of discrimination in local parishes and diocesan institutions because "discrimination within the Body of the Church itself is an intolerable scandal."

Last night's special meeting was called three weeks ago by Bishop Lichtenberger at the request of the Church's Advisory Committee on Intergroup Relations.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE HOUSE OF BISHOPS

I

RESOLVED: That the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church urges the Congress of the United States to pass such civil rights legislation as shall fairly and effectively implement both the established rights and the needs of all minority groups in education, voting rights, housing, employment opportunities and access to places of public accommodation.

II

RESOLVED: That the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, mindful of the Church Assembly to be held in Washington, D.C., on August 28, 1963, in cooperation with the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom,

(a) recognizes not only the right of free citizens to peaceful assemblage for the redress of grievances, but also that participation in such an assemblage is a proper expression of Christian witness and obedience,

(b) welcomes the responsible discipleship which impels many of our bishops, clergy, and laity to take part in such an assemblage and supports them fully,

(c) prays that through such peaceful assemblage citizens of all races may bring before the government for appropriate and competent action the critical and agonizing problems posed to our nation by racial discrimination in employment, in access to places of public accommodation, in political rights, in education and housing.

III

RESOLVED: That the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church commends to all people the Presiding Bishop's letter dated Whitsunday 1963, as appropriate and helpful in the present racial crisis; and that we support the Presiding Bishop in this wise and timely expression of Christian leadership.

ERIE, PENNA.

CLERGYMEN MOVE TO END RACE BARRIERS

In June 101 clergy from the Erie area pledged themselves to actively work for equal rights, full opportunity and fellowship. The Christian and Jewish Clergy Committee composed of the Rt. Rev. William Crittenden, Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Erie, the Rev. Robert E. Grimm, Rabbi Aaron M. Landes, the Rev. Paul P. Martin, the Rev. Jesse McFarland, the Rev. Jay M. Reichenbach, and the Rev. E. James Caldwell.

The clergymen proposed and pledged:

"1 - To urge our City Council to pass the 'Fair Housing' Ordinance now before it and to staff our Community Relations Commission with enough personnel and budget to do an effective job;

"2 - To urge our City and County Governments to pledge openly to implement affirmatively Fair Employment practices within all their Departments, and through all companies holding contracts with city government;

"3 - To urge our business and industrial communities, through personal interviews with the Chamber of Commerce and Manufacturers Association, to take definite and positive steps to hire qualified Negroes. The urgency of the employment situation and the demands of justice require, in our considered judgement, that qualified Negroes be given priority consideration in hiring to eliminate the present lag in employment of Negroes and to bring their percentage of representation in Erie's work force at least to a point reflecting their percentage of the total population;

"4 - To urge all Real Estate Dealers and Financial Institutions, through personal interviews to open rental sale housing listings to all people regardless of race, and to offer our positive support to specific steps preparing the climate for the moving of Negro families into residential neighborhoods where they have not previously lived.

"5 - To urge the members and families of our religious institutions to take positive action toward friendships across racial lines, including personal acquaintance, shared fellowship meetings across church lines, and expression of positive welcome for any Negro people who may share in our daily work or our social and community endeavors, and live in our neighborhoods."

Since the original resolution was passed fourteen more clergy have joined the original 101. A freedom rally was addressed by a number of clergy including Archdeacon Schaffer of the Diocese of Erie and nearly forty clergy appeared at a public hearing before the City Council on a new Fair Housing Ordinance. Jewish and Christian clergy of both races spoke at this hearing. The Fair Housing Ordinance passed the City Council in the form asked by the Erie Human Relations Commission as endorsed by the clergy. The clergymen's next move is to follow up with area committees of clergy who will call on all people in the neighborhood when a Negro family moves in. This will be done to help the community to make an orderly and friendly transition. Early in the fall another meeting of the clergy is planned where efforts will be made to encourage business men to give publicity to their fair employment practices, where they exist. Subsequently, more help will be extended to the Negro population in arranging for job training and better employment placement.

A SOUTHERNER
WRITES TO AN EDITOR

"I have recently had a heart attack and I doubt if I will get to see you and talk to you in person. I am therefore writing to you on the subject of segregation.

"I do not wish to waste your valuable time by writing to you to 'brag' of my ancestors. Buy my people on both sides of my family, both father's and mother's side, have been Southerners for nearly 300 years. My father fought in the Confederate Army at the Battle of Gettysburg when he was a boy of 15½. My grandfather was wounded in the Battle of Gettysburg. My grandfather Early's brother was Confederate Gen. Jubal A. Early who attacked through the town of Gettysburg with his Confederate division the first day of the battle. I had five Cabell cousins killed in the one little Civil War battle of New Market where the V.M.I. cadet batallion won the victory for the South.

"My ancestors and kinsmen, Cabells and Earlys, have been governors of Southern states, including Gov. Peter Early of Georgia. John Cabell Breckinridge of Kentucky was the presidential candidate for the Southern Democrats in 1860. He was a near cousin of my mother's.

"So if I am not a Southerner and a son of the Confederacy, who is?

"Being a Southerner I do not wish to see the South do anything that degrades the South.

"The wrongs and injustices perpetrated by Southern whites on Negroes in the past have injured the white South even more than they injured the helpless Negroes. Mark Twain said that the worst thing that could be said about a being was the he belonged to the human race. The actions of Negro - haters confirm Mark Twain's dictum.

"I am now in my 81st year and have seen segregation longer and further back than you. As a native-born Southerner all my life I have heard the same thing from Southerners: 'We like the Negro but like him in his place.' That meant the white Southerner wished to see Negro slavery continued in a slightly different form. Instead of individual ownership of Negro slaves, which the end of the Civil War stopped, it was to be a community ownership of Negro slaves. Negroes were to serve in the lowest paid group of illiterate personal servants and nothing else.

"My mother was a deeply religious person who before our Civil War ended, taught the family slaves something about the Christian religion. She taught her father's slaves the alphabet so they could read the Bible. Under the Virginia laws of those days my mother could have been put in the penitentiary for five years for teaching Negroes the alphabet.

"I believe that segregation is morally indefensible.

"A Southerner who is proud to be on your team."

DIOCESE OF DELAWARE ACTS

Sparked by the leadership of the Rev. Albert R. Dreisbach, Jr., assistant at the Wilmington Cathedral, and consultant to the Diocese of Delaware, Department of Christian Social Relations on Interracial Relations, the Delaware Diocese and individual churchmen have acted on many levels to eliminate racial injustices and promote Christian inclusiveness.

The diocese has opened the lines of communication with all local civil rights groups and in January passed a resolution supporting the public accommodation bill then before the State Legislature.

Through the joint efforts of the Committee for Fair Practices (a local coordinating committee) the Diocese of Delaware sponsored a visit by Al Kramer of the National Council of Churches who helped to coordinate and increase the effectiveness of local groups.

For the past year and a half the Rev. Henry Herndon, rector of Calvary Church, Wilmington, has served with the State Human Relations Commission (a persuasive group newly created and composed of voluntary non-salaried commissioners.) The State Human Relations Commission has been effective in many ways, however, when it was unsuccessful in its negotiations to desegregate the last segregated theatre in Wilmington, an interfaith group called CONCERNED CITIZENS, composed of lay and clergy members, chaired by Father Dreisbach picketed this theatre from November 1962 to May 1963. This theatre now admits patrons irrespective of color.

CONCERNED CITIZENS in cooperation with other local groups is supporting the Delaware public accommodations bill which would make unlawful refusal of service in public accommodations because of race. CONCERNED CITIZENS has sponsored many activities for local citizens including a workshop for junior high students; a workshop for the study of the philosophy of non-violence; sessions in role playing. Also, it has sponsored picnics, folk dancing, and meetings in the homes of Negro and white members. A junior contingent of CONCERNED CITIZENS known as CONCERNED YOUTH has also been formed.

The diocese cooperating with other groups and CONCERNED CITIZENS has been effective in desegregating two local restaurants: "The Toddle House" and "The Surry Restaurant."

The Diocesan Youth have voted to study intergroup relations and will produce Father Malcolm Boyd's play, THEY AREN'T REAL TO ME at Christ Church, Greenville. James Leonard, head of the Playcrafters, will direct this production.

Edmund D. Curtis concerned that ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS be open to all persons on a non-racial basis requested and was granted permission by the Wilmington Cathedral to allow A.A. to meet on Saturdays in the Cathedral rather than in private homes.

The Rev. James Pritchard of Holy Trinity (Old Swedes') Church, Wilmington, located in a racially changing neighborhood, has instituted a program of remedial education.

Determined to avoid the calamitous events in nearby Cambridge, Maryland, local authorities have appointed the following Episcopal priests to form bi-racial committees in their respective towns: The Rev. Richard Bailey of Rehoboth Beach; the Rev. Pinckney Corsa of Middletown; and the Rev. Spencer Quick of Smyrna.

Among the active laity of the diocese are Dr. Muriel Crosby, Dr. Eugene McGowan, Leila 'Lee' Guyer of St. Barnabas, Marshalltown, and John Thomas of St. Andrews, Wilmington.

'FREEDOM SCHOOLS' CONTINUE

A Citizens for Human Rights Committee led by an Episcopal priest opened three FREEDOM SCHOOLS for some 1,000 Negro secondary school students and young adults.

The committee director is the Rev. James P. Breeden of St. Paul's Cathedral. Father Breeden indicated that the schools will offer extensive courses dealing with contemporary racial problems within the context of the Negro's historical and cultural background within the United States.

Classes are being held three nights weekly at the Eliot Congregational Church, St. Mark's Episcopal Church, and All Saints Lutheran Church.

Instructors for the FREEDOM SCHOOLS were recruited from the Boston public school roster and nearby colleges. Classes are held in government, Negro history, philosophy and practice of non-violence, civil rights, and voter registration. Special emphasis is being placed on lessening the 'drop-out' rate among Negro high school students.

All inquiries concerning FREEDOM SCHOOL materials should be addressed to: The Rev. James P. Breeden, 41 Winthrop Street, Roxbury 19, Massachusetts.

TODD BECOMES URBAN DEPARTMENT DIRECTOR

The Rev. George Todd became director of the Department of the Urban Church of the Board of National Missions, July 1.

Mr. Todd came to this post after four years in Taiwan under the denomination's Commission on Ecumenical Mission and Relations. His overseas assignment was to help the Presbyterian Church of Formosa recognize what all churches and nations must: that an industrial urban culture and economy are rapidly replacing a rural and agricultural way of life.

During his four years in Taiwan, Mr. Todd set up summer Church and Society seminars during which university and seminary students become workmen in order to be exposed to the problems of an industrial society. He also lectured in two theological seminaries, held seminars and discussions for ministers, laymen, women, and students, prepared special audio-visual and written materials on church and industry, supervised a number of pilot projects in evangelism, and trained other churchmen to do the same.

Before serving in Taiwan, Mr. Todd was on the staff of the East Harlem Protestant Parish in New York City from 1951-1959. For the last six of those years he was pastor of the Parish's Presbyterian Church of the Ascension, and also chairman of the East Harlem Council for Community Planning.

Along with his experience provided by former ministries, Mr. Todd brings firsthand knowledge of industry to his new post in the Board of National Missions. World War II was underway when he was graduated from high school in his hometown of Gary, Indiana. While he waited to be called for military service he combined work in a steel mill with night school and college. After three years in the Army, Mr. Todd returned to work in the mill and to attend Denison University in Ohio. He was graduated from Denison in 1948, and in 1951 received his B.D. from Yale Divinity School.

Present priorities in the Department of Urban Church are racial and cultural integration, community organization, and evan-

RAMAGE IS NEW DIVISION HEAD

The Rev. David Ramage, former director of the Department of Urban Church, Chicago Presbytery, assumed his new position on July 1 as chairman of the Division of Church Strategy and Development of the Board of National Missions.

In the strategy and development unit Mr. Ramage heads the Departments of Urban Church, New Church Development, Town and Country and Indian Work, Mobile Ministries, and Work with Spanish-speaking People in the United States and the West Indies. A major emphasis is upon ministries in areas of racial unrest.

Mr. Ramage was born in Cincinnati, Ohio. He holds a B.A. degree from Hanover College, Hanover, Indiana (1951), and a B.D. from McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago (1955), and has also studied at the University of Chicago and the School of Social Work of the University of Illinois.

Prior to serving on the Chicago Presbytery staff he served three years as pastor of the Emerald Avenue Presbyterian Church, which is located in a racially changing Chicago community. During this time he also was consultant to Chicago's West Side Christian Parish. Since 1960 Mr. Ramage has been lecturer in Church and Community at McCormick Theological Seminary; he has also served as youth worker at Howell Neighborhood House, Chicago, associate director of Camp Reinberg, Palatine, Illinois, and group worker and program coordinator at Christopher House, Chicago.

DIRECTOR'S COLUMN

After spending four years out of the United States in Asia, I find it has been a gratifying experience to work through several piles of speeches, reports, articles, and other "fugitive" urban church materials written by American churchmen while I have been gone.

It appears to me that several concepts, not very widely embraced several years ago, are now occupying a leading place in the thinking of urban church leaders:

1. The Whole Church in the Whole City. In contrast to a focus on work in deteriorated inner-city areas which suffer from the most acute problems of urbanization, the urban church job is now seen as a calling of ministry and witness in whole metropolitan areas. All the churches of a metropolitan presbytery, whether urban or suburban, self-supporting or aided, are understood to be bound in compelling inter-relationships for faithful response to God's will for the City.

2. Christian Focus on Society (Not Church). These writers are not beginning with the Church's interests, needs, nor even its potentialities for service. Instead they are thinking about what is happening in the world around the Church and how the Church might become involved in these events. Christian attention to the trends and crises of the community in which a church is set takes precedence over attention to the church itself.

3. The Church for the Sake of the World. An earlier emphasis on upbuilding of congregational life with development of programs and services offered by the church itself (usually on its own premises), gives way to a view of the Church as an instrument to be deployed for participation in and transformation of "secular" structures in the city.

With these trends there appears a theological shift which affirms the city, without glorifying it. The city is symbolically a figure, and historically a culminating action of God's redemptive activity to bring men of all sorts and conditions, all races and nations, into a loving and serving relationship. Beyond the proper attention to God's concern for the troubled and disadvantaged in the city, and recognition of the call to prophetic opposition against urban political and social evil, these new writings are declaring that Christ is Lord of the city, and that God is the ever-present, active creator, governor, and redeemer in all the events and occasions of city life.

I have not been long enough returned to feel confident that these impressions are correct. I hope they are. The biggest change for me is to find myself lifted out of the "Asian Industrial Revolution" among people suffering the impact of rapid shifts from rural agricultural life to urban industrial life, into this American "Revolution in Race Relations." I discover that the best place to meet old friends these days is on the picket lines. Within my acculturation to the changing U.S.A. I have found that reunions with former Presbytery fathers and brethren take place most conveniently nowadays at integration rallies.

I am hoping that all of us are becoming increasingly sensitive to the historical reality that these revolutions are one revolution. The fight for the right to have a job commensurate with ability, the fight for education, the fight for access to decent housing, the fight for the right to participate in the process of decision making in government and society are the same fights East and West.

Urbanization is a world phenomenon, too. Many of us limit ourselves to parochial thinking bounded by one urban community, or to one city, or to one metropolitan area, or to cities in North America. The action in which we are engaged is part of a worldwide action by God's church to discover and embody what God wants of us in His rapidly expanding and deepeningly complicated cities. The experiences we have, the church in the cities of Asia need. We need to know that we have brother workers in Tokyo, Osaka, Taipei, Hong Kong, Manila, Seoul, and dozens of other places where new forms are emerging by God's grace from the rapidly moving urbanizing forces. We need to know what they can tell us.

I hope all of us can increasingly know ourselves as partners with the men and women struggling and creating in these far-away places. I hope some of us will be increasingly willing to see ourselves as vocationally disposable, not only on the American scene as between New York, Chicago, San Francisco, or St. Louis, but also as participants who might be called as well to labor in Cairo, Saõ Paulo, Calcutta, Singapore, or Mombassa in obedience as witnesses to Christ's powerful redeeming presence in the cities of our world.

Housing Segregation in the North and West

BACKGROUND

In the urban North and West, the Negro and (to a lesser extent) other colored groups and Jews are excluded from the free housing market. By the connivance of certain real estate men, bankers, mortgage houses, and others, minority groups are artificially frozen out of the free housing market, forced to pile up in certain areas which become ghettoes for them and they then become a "kept economic threat" to the whole community. The knowledge that with a 'Black Ghetto' certain men have the ability to saturate any given community with a flood of a minority group makes housing in communities on the periphery of the ghetto in the urban complex an unsafe economic venture.

Prior to 1948 the courts upheld the legality and enforceability of "Restrictive Covenants." This was a covenant in your deed by which you and your assigns agreed not to sell to Negroes. It was legal, ergo it was moral. It was illegal, ergo immoral to sell to Negroes in such a community. Since 1948 the courts have held such covenants are unenforceable. It is now legal to sell your house to a Negro and by the same logic, morally acceptable.

Out in the wings a large group of potential buyers, who have both the money and the desire to buy are being held by the unscrupulous as a sort of Damoclean economic threat to every community. The unscrupulous always make use of the uninformed.

The segregated housing pattern of the urban North and West is one of the major problems facing the Church. The pattern at present is one of almost total segregation of Negroes. Holding back the 'Black Ghetto' is like holding back the sea with a wall of uneven strength. A crack develops and first a trickle comes through and then a flood until another area is annexed to the 'Black Ghetto.' The rule of life as it is lived in our communities is "Negroes in, whites out."

OPEN OCCUPANCY COVENANTS

The only action program of the Church, nationally, has been to circulate open occupancy covenants, in addition to making some excellent pronouncements on this subject.

It is unlikely that open occupancy covenants on a voluntary basis, involving primarily those in "active" Church membership, are functional in a large urban complex. The implementing value of such covenants is primarily for smaller villages, towns, and for educational purposes.

VIABLE ALTERNATIVES TO THE STATUS QUO

Let us examine six possible alternatives:

1. Integrate Church Properties

Open all buildings, apartments, houses, etc., that local churches, synods, presbyteries, and the General Assembly agencies own, for rent or sale on an unsegregated basis. Properties that have been given to the Church, properties that the Church has bought - all properties whatsoever should be open for rent or sale to persons on an unsegregated basis. (Housing owned by colleges and seminaries and rented for profit, if opened on an unsegregated basis, would make a nice little dent in the real estate market in a number of places.)

2. Volunteer Fair Housing Committees

Volunteer committees drawn from white communities can sometimes become effective if they are able to secure staff. Infrequently do volunteers do the leg work necessary to get the willing buyer in touch with the willing seller. Negroes have been systematically excluded from this housing for so long that it takes much intensive work to convince them that whites are ready to be "fair" in housing. The Church can and should be at work in this field and can do so by recruiting and financing the staff time of persons to work with Fair Housing committees in local communities.

3. Change the Balance of Economic Power

The Institutional Church; national Boards, national Church holding agencies, local church boards, church trustees, etc., should enter church funds from dead and living sources, in large housing developments (similar to Lake Meadows in Chicago or Morningside Gardens in New York.) The Church should invest funds presently invested in "sure fire stocks and bonds" in housing for people - any people. It should become at least as concerned about people and as willing to risk money on housing for people as the New York Life Insurance Company or the Ladies Garment Workers Union are. It should compete for land being reclaimed from slums for housing people on a non-segregated basis.

The Church here can show the way. This no doubt will not produce the starting dividends that aircraft or munitions stocks will, but it will be consecrated money well invested. As the Church is involved and demonstrates that it is willing to risk its money and its good name in what it has been preaching, some of the "other" money of the community may enter this field.

4. Planned Dispersion

Under this plan affirmative action would be taken by local communities to seek out minority group families who desire housing in integrated areas. These families would be assisted in every possible way (showing homes, legal assistance, mortgage financing from willing mortgage firms, or The Voluntary Home Mortgage Credit Program), and be given a welcome by neighbors when they move in. These minority families would be moved in under good, sound planning procedures designed to prevent blocks or neighborhoods from becoming racial ghettoes. This plan requires the active participation of church members and probably at least part-time staff help.

The Corrupt Society

John Kenneth Galbraith calls this "The Affluent Society." Fred J. Cook calls it "The Corrupt Society."

In the special June 1-8 issue of The Nation, Cook presents a well-documented case. Discussing in detail such highly publicized instances of corrupt and unethical practices as the quiz-show riggings, the price-fixing of major electrical companies, the organized burglaries of policemen in Denver, Chicago, and other cities, and the systematic frauds of Billie Sol Estes, reporter Cook takes a hard look at the ethics of today's society and concludes that almost anything goes, so long as there's profit in it. Or, as he says, "The ethic, as James Hagerty said about the U-2 incident, is 'don't get caught,' a noble and inspiring motto, certainly, on which to build the framework of society."

Most of the cases Cook discusses gained wide publicity, but they are not unique. Scarcely a day goes by without "All the News That's Fit to Print" including at least one story that adds more evidence that his thesis is correct.

Examples are rife: A high city official allows a real estate developer dealing with the city to redecorate his apartment; forced to resign when convicted of conflict of interest, the errant public servant is later added to the city payroll again in a minor capacity so that he may be eligible for a pension.

Policemen are accused by coffee house owners of demanding payoffs. Little restaurants, barber shops, and other small businesses conduct betting operations so openly as to be obvious to the casual visitor. Yet apparently alert police can find no evidence of wrong-doing.

Slumlords make vast profits. Welfare recipients frequently pay the same high rents paid by occupants of luxury apartment buildings, but their high-priced accommodations are often such that the building should be condemned.

For an appropriate sum, building inspectors carefully overlook use of shoddy materials and sloppy workmanship in new structures. After all, what does it matter if a school wall collapses?

As Cook points out, the highway construction boom has provided a particularly good source for ill-gotten gains. Poorly built roads, unneeded construction, extraordinarily high costs seem almost to be the norm. The July 14th New York Times reports on an investigation into highway building on Long Island and notes that although presently concentrating on highway construction, "the investigation will cover all phases of upward of $100,000,000 of public construction projects in the state." Uncovered by the investigators is evidence of payroll-padding, short weighting of delivered materials, political bribery, tax-evasion, and assorted other practices designed to get as much as possible from that giver of the good life for many - the taxpayer.

Congressional investigations regularly uncover substantial evidence of wrong-doing connected with governmental contracts. Yet talk to almost anyone who works in a plant filling such contracts; odds are that he can tell you of instances such as that reported by workers in a large aircraft plant. Asked to put in overtime work, they found that they had absolutely nothing to do. No secret was made of the fact that the unnecessary overtime was merely for the sake of protecting profits on defense contracts. It is cheaper to pay workers for doing nothing than to admit that the job is being done for far less than the government - and the public - is being charged.

Such evidence of unethical behavior is found everywhere. The housewife buys a large package of cereal and finds it little more than half-full. The smallest size of toothpaste is labeled "large."

Anyone can readily think of dozens of other examples of such practices. Often illegal, always unethical or immoral, they are so widespread that little attention is paid to new revelations.

Not always are such activities for monetary profit. Some are for political gain. A resident of Avenue B, on Manhattan's Lower East Side, noted with wry amusement what she called "the saga of the trash cans." Prior to the last mayoralty election, the heavily populated area was visited by the special complaint vehicle. Apparently residents complained about the paucity of sanitation services. Shortly thereafter, wire trash baskets appeared on every corner of the street; a street sweeper appeared every day to complete the job sketchily done by the big street-cleaning machine. For the first time the street was adequately cleaned and remained so. A few days after the incumbent party was returned to power, a truck collected all of the trash baskets and carried them away. Not one has been returned. The street sweeper ceased his duties. The street was returned to its normal state of litter.

And where is the church in all of this? In discussing the price-fixing case, Cook says, "One of the greatest ironies...may be found in the fact that even so great an exposure of the shallowness of our 'sea of ethics' has accomplished nothing. And one reason for this is that none of the leaders of our society dare to face up to its implications - not even our churchmen. The clergy, supposedly our most perceptive leaders in the field of ethics, were baffled at the spectacle of the bellwethers of their communities and churches suddenly shedding Brooks Brothers suits for prison stripes. What were they to think of these 'good guys' in 'bad guy' roles? Frankly, they didn't know."

He goes on to quote one pastor of a church in a community where many of the convicted lived: "Throughout the whole turmoil, the irrelevance of the churches to the situation was evident... Ministers confessed the sense of confusion they felt - now is the time when a cogent word on the whole problem of corporate moral responsibility needs to be spoken."

Yet, says Cook, "it is quite obvious that no one knows quite what to say." And in his concluding paragraphs, he says:

"There are those who argue that the racket society must remain invincible until man, as an individual, has a change of heart through religion. Yet we are today living in an age of what passes for religious revival; there are more churches, more congregants, more pastors pleading for the moral life than ever before. The result is a Billie Sol Estes, pillar of his

The Voluntary Home Mortgage Credit Program is a quasi-governmental agency which serves as a clearing house for bringing together the eligible borrower and the willing private lender. Loans may be secured in the local region or anywhere in the country. Eligible applicants are those who: (1) live in cities of less than 25,000 population, where long-term financing is not available, and (2) those who belong to a minority group regardless of the size of the city. To be eligible, minority group applicants must have had applications for mortgages rejected twice, and they must also state that they were rejected because they belong to a minority group.

5. Work to Change Laws

The Church must work for state laws coupled with city ordinances that will make illegal the refusal to sell or rent to a minority person capable and willing to buy. This only can be open occupancy. This would mean that a Negro or Puerto Rican with money could buy on exactly the same basis as a white person. He would select his community, school, house, and church as any other child of God in this country. This would mean dispersion of Negroes throughout the total metropolitan community on the basis of choice-plus-financial-ability. The end of the 'Black Ghetto' based on race. The end of the captive buyers who the unscrupulous can flood into your community anytime.

This is a problem that will not go away if we close our eyes. This is not a problem that will be solved for the Church by time; time is neutral. Creation of new unsegregated housing is the Church's task in this time. This is a problem that the Church will have to face squarely by using one of the above or some equally daring method, now!

The scars of segregated living would remain for sometime to come. This would be reflected in your schools, your church, the playmates your children make as they mingle with the children of the freedmen. The cost to all of us will be less now than ten years from now.

own church. Perhaps religion demands an austerity of spirit that does not comport with an age of abundance."

Does it? Or has the church simply too long shown tacit agreement with the prevailing notion that religion is strictly for Sundays and has nothing to do with activities that go on from Monday through Saturday?

His papers, entitled "Guidelines for the Evaluation of the Local Urban Church, Paper I and Paper II" were originally used at conferences sponsored by the Department of the Urban Church of the Board of National Missions. Dr. Barry is one of the world's foremost experts on urban church work.

The paper entitled "Some Reactions of a City Pastor to the Effective City Church Study" is by George Younger, pastor of the Mariners' Temple Baptist Church in New York City, and a well-known author. This paper reflects on material produced by the National Council of Churches' Department of Urban Church between April '55 -November '60, which dealt with a so-called "effective" city church.

The paper entitled "The Other America", by Michael Harrington, is reprinted from the Journal of Housing, December 27, 1962, by permission, and from Current, March 1963, by permission. Harrington speaks of poverty as a separate culture within America.

"Reorganization in the Casbah" was originally published in Social Progress, the publication of the Board of Christian Education, and is reprinted by permission. OUR RESPONSIBILITY IN THE SOCIAL REVOLUTION OF 1963

These are some steps we could take:

1. Involve yourself in the events of your home city. Demonstrate with your fellow ministers on this moral issue. Demonstrate with the civil rights organizations on those specific issues that do make sense.
2. Find out what your denomination is doing around the country. The cities are your field of interest and so you need to know some of the who, what, when, and where's.
3. Let the Board of National Missions Special Committee on Religion and Race know of who could be freed of other responsibilities to give full-time leadership to church involvement for three months for this work.
4. Seek out local support of these men and have it widely publicized.
5. Stimulate local thinking on the churches' redemptive role in this revolution.
6. Participate in the struggle for congressional passage of Civil Rights legislation. Write your friends and colleagues, especially from those states west of the Mississippi.
7. Write your own congressmen and senators supporting Civil Rights Bills H.R. 7152 and S. 1731.
8. Help local churches chart the internal steps necessary for the integration of the church, for the study of racial relations, for the fair employment practices in the construction and staffing of churches.
9. Participate in the August 28 demonstration in Washington at the Lincoln Memorial.
10. Involve yourself in study and action.

THE CREATIVE ROLE OF CONTROVERSY

*by Dan W. Dodson

Many Christians are baffled by the contradictions within their faith. Most of them consider it to be of supreme importance to go out and bear witness to the faith within them, thus changing the world. Our hymnals are filled with stirring songs which through the centuries have helped to buoy up Christian morale and reenergize the individual faith in final victory. This is the militant side of religion.

Conversely, but still characteristically Christian, is the great yearning for surcease from the conflict and travail which a world presents. The great vision of Micah, when the "swords would be beaten into plowshares and the spears into pruning hooks, and man would lay down his arms and study war no more," has persisted across the centuries. There is a notion that ultimately love will "cover the earth as the waters the seas," and all the differences and controversy will cease.

The history of each denomination among us is one of some great charmismic leader who established his sect. He started out, usually under persecution, to find a more creative outreach to God than was then current. His group was at war with "sin, the flesh, and the devil" and the dynamic of this ideological position attracted multitudes who institutionalized his movement into a church. Somehow, as the cause succeeded in attracting persons, it left off its controversial, militant aspect. The more popular the church became, the less its ideology counted, until many are, today, all things to all people.

Space does not permit an analysis of the origins of this yearning for "peace" and "brotherhood" which is devoid of controversy. Some believe it is a memory, imbedded deep in the unconscious, dating back to the period spent in the womb, when we had no conflict with our environment. Images of heaven almost unanimously include such concepts as a place where "the battle will be won," and where there will be no more conflict, either internal or external. No more growth-producing confrontations shall be necessary, for man will have achieved perfection.

Another contradiction in our faith is between authoritarian and democratic ideologies. Most religions are authoritarian, at least in their origins. Most believe theirs to be the finest creative expression of the relationship between God and Man. Some believe theirs to be the only such expression. The solution to controversy, under this kind of religious order, lies in the creation of prescribed standards to which the church membership must be rigidly faithful. The fight is for a uniformity which will resolve the differences which produce conflict. We may learn to respect the differences which others possess, but if we are devout in our faith, we really yearn for everyone else to be like us; then we can demonstrate Christian communion with one another, and differences will disappear. Most religious sects are nurtured by a dynamic which is a religious ideal of perfection. Such ideals are really authoritarian. Anything which brooks on challenge to these, dogmas, etc. becomes heresy, deviationism, or controversy.

In contrast to the above is the democratic ideology with its emphasis upon individual freedom and growth. It questions perfection and holds that man is capable of almost limitless growth. It emphasizes processes through which persons with differences are brought into confrontation with each other. In such human association, participants can not only achieve higher levels of consensus, but also discover more meaningful ways than were possible previously. The democratic ideology proposes that we all "see through a glass darkly," and that clearer vision is offered if we come together to test and validate our convictions against those of other persons with whom we are in "love and fellowship". These meaningful confrontations, however, are almost always conflict producing.

Between these two orientations we are understandably ambivalent. From our religious heritage we believe that there is "the truth." From our secular heritage we seek ever higher levels of understanding of man and his relationship to God. One set of convictions seeks, through controversy, witness, and evangelism, to advance "the kingdom" according to his image of it. The other is equally sincere as to the necessity for bringing people to significant encounters with those of differing opinions, in order that the beliefs and values of all be constantly in process of change, moving from limited to more universal levels.

Although the church has become popular, and the social, in contrast to the ideological attraction of the fellowship is more nearly the basis of membership, we still cling to the idea that those who are in "love and charity with their neighbors" must not be in controversy with each other. At the same time we cherish the idea of individual freedom and the right to differ. We feel hurt when people who are "so Christian" disagree so violently. The worst of our "falling outs" are those in which both protagonists contend that "The Lord" is on his side. There is no more dogmatic position than that of a man who can marshal his Lord to support him. Most wars don't become earnest ones until each contender is convinced that God is on his side, and it evolves into holy war. Truly a rethinking of the role of controversy is needed in modern churchmanship.

SOME FUNDAMENTAL PROPOSITIONS

With this background in mind, this writer would pose the following as fundamental propositions:

(1) One cannot have freedom without differences. One cannot have differences without ensuing conflicts and controversies. In fact, a case would be made that some controversy is the hall mark of a free society.

(2) The church without controversy is a conforming church. Either people feel it is not good manners to disagree, fear the social isolation which comes from being different, or else the homogeneity of the group is such that the congregation is not being led to significant encounters with the realities of a world of which they are a part.

(3) The "cutting edges" of a democratic society are at the points of tension and difference. They are not in the areas of life where consensus has been achieved. It is these differences, about which people care, that should be brought into the open and examined in the light of Christian commitment. When this is done, commitments become more than mere lip service. They have a deeper significance, because they have been tested against opposing beliefs. The fear of submitting one's differences of belief to this kind of test indicates concern, concern that the crucible of controversy may prove that there has been more slag than gold in previous beliefs. Growth is dependent upon significant confrontations where differences of viewpoint are ventilated.

* Dr. Dodson is Director for the Center of Human Relations and Community Studies, New York University. This article appeared first in the February 1963 issue of Social Action published by the United Church of Christ. It is reprinted here with permission of the author, and the editor of Social Action.

(4) Fear or failure to express doubt about what one's group believes, leads to conformity. Conformity leads to alienation. Honest doubt is a prerequisite to growth. The expression of doubt which may lead to controversy is essential, if there is to be growth. One cannot continue to psychologically identify with a group and doubt its myths, rituals and dogmas. Too many congregations are held together by social ties rather than spiritual ones. Too many go through the motions of subscribing to beliefs as well as values in which they do not believe, but dare not communicate their perplexities to others. Hence, they live alienated lives, in a social fellowship of conformity which is conflict free, but not truly Christian, in the best sense of the word.

(5) Few, if any, vested interests which this author can imagine will surrender their favored position without resistance and conflict. The church cannot remain dynamic without bringing the world to confrontation on significant social issues. The moral and ethical issues involved in modern problems of race relations, war and peace, the trend toward materialism in values, and the relation between the market place and human values, all attest to the need for the church to be a dynamic institution. In the swirling vortex of change, the church should stand ready to inject into the change process those attributes which are uniquely hers to give, so that the religious aspect of man's nature will be further enhanced. This cannot be done without controversy.

(6) It is illogical to expect that a congregation in the average modern church will endorse significant change through consensus. Interests are too varied. The most powerful people of the community, people who are most often identified with the status quo, are usually the most influential people in the leadership of the church. A group moves both through conflict and consensus. If the deviants are not of the leadership of the church, and generally speaking they are not, they must needs resort to controversy and conflict. The most that social action groups can hope for, in the average local congregation, is freedom enough within the fellowship to bring the whole congregation to significant confrontation. The mature congregation must reconcile itself to the fact that this autonomy, for those who differ, is something precious. It is a built-in guarantee that the congregation as a whole will not stop growing.

(7) Every group has a status ordering, with some leadership in positions of more power than others. This power structure in an average group tends to work through integrative processes and to avoid controversy. Those who are outside the power structure are obliged to work by means of controversy and conflict, if they are to successfully challenge what they consider to be undesirable. A power structure which was never challenged would soon lead a group out of the main stream and into the eddies of life, for its position is made secure because it represents the order that is. Henry D. Lloyd once said:

> "Seldom does the new conscience, when it seeks a teacher to declare to men what is wrong, find him in the dignitaries of the church, the state, the culture that is. The higher the rank, the closer the tie that binds those to what is, but ought not to be."

It has been this writer's experience that the pressure group in an average situation comes nearer to representing the voice of conscience than does the established institutions of a community. The climate within the fellowship through which these deviant and controversial groups can bring the congregation to confrontation, is an assurance that the group is mature.

THE ART OF MONITORING CONTROVERSY

Skill and discernment in monitoring controversies so that they neither become stultifying nor destructive are prerequisites for able institutional leadership. The general field of group dynamics has provided much insight into this field within the last few years.

A few suggestions will indicate the range of skills involved:

(1) Creating a climate conducive to freedom of expression. All fear of recrimination must be removed. There should be emphasis on respect for the dignity and worth of personality of those who most vigorously and adamantly espouse a position. There must be encouragement of expression. (Many employers have thought they had consensus with their employees and were disappointed, simply because they assumed that because there was no dissent there was agreement.) It does not help to maneuver a proponent of a position into a role which he is obliged to defend. It makes for more productive airing of differences if the group climate can be that of "thinking through" a problem rather than that of two adversaries, with polarized position, jousting in a test of strength. There should be the spirit of Christian love and forebearance, but this should not be used as a pressure to secure conformity, thereby coercing adversaries into positions in which they are not really comfortable.

(2) Strengthen group cohesiveness even amid controversy. In any group each person plays many roles. It is a rare thing when controversies involve individuals in more than a few of these roles. It helps tremendously if those who are opposed on one issue can be persuaded to work together on some common issue in which they are in agreement. For instance, if there is disunity over some issue, such as the church's responsibility in the economic order, it helps if the adversaries are at the same time working on other committees or actions, such as the church budget, or its educational program. The genius of American life is in no small measure that few if any issues completely divide us. There are usually more things we share in common than there are things which set us apart. A good case could be made for the proposition that we feel free to differ only about in proportion as we feel secure in the things we share in common.

(3) Keep the communication process going. If there is anything more disastrous than rudeness and bad manners, it is to withdraw from controversy and not participate. This has been a great shortcoming of the middle class Protestant leadership. It has been easier to try to escape from the inner cities to the suburbs, in effect withdrawing from the great confrontations which are taking place in the former, than it has been to stay and make one's influence felt in the decision making processes. Too many homogeneous suburban communities, and homogeneous social class churches have become respectable places to hide from difference and controversy. Rather than dedicated institutions where committed people meet to deepen commitment and move out to meet life, they have become retreats where people seek sanctuary from life.

Anthropologists know that the most sensitive areas in a culture are often the least discussed. The real art of dealing with controversy is knowing how to keep the discussion alive.

One technique which is proving of use in interfaith relations today is called the dialogue. Here persons who disagree come together to discuss the areas of their differences. Such a technique is predicated on the belief that people of integrity differ, that they admit they differ, and that the differences count. They then discuss the metes and bounds of their agreements and disagreements, and learn how to disagree as agreeably as possible.

(4) Encourage collection of facts and other information in order to provide more light and less heat.

This search for and evaluation of data on issues of controversy is a built-in, growth-producing process. It means an increasingly enlightened fellowship. It means a vital and vigorous involvement of all concerned.

(5) Try to understand the "threat fields" of those in controversy, and deal with them sensitively.

Almost every person has areas of life in which he feels vulnerable. Most of us build strong emotional barricades to these vulnerable spots. Recognition of these help to explain what might otherwise be termed irrational behavior. In Western Texas, where this writer grew up, the men who fought the saloons hardest were frequently those who practically had to run past them to keep from the temptation of going inside! St. Paul's persecution of the Christians becomes meaningful only when seen in context of his later conversion. Only a man who was threatened in an area of vulnerability could have behaved so inhumanly. It is probable that those who are most rabidly resisting opportunities for minority groups today are at the same time most vulnerable to the appeal. The most rabid anti-Communist among the industrial group, one could hypothesize, is he who feels least secure in his belief in the private enterprise system. If he were as sure as he contends, "Why doth he protest so much?" Does not this also explain the fierce identity with social class? Does this not also explain much of the intense sectarian bigotry? If one feels secure in his faith, why does he have to marshal as much emotion to defend it as some do?

Are not these, or comparable ones, fields of threat to the personality of us all? It would help, if sometimes when there is controversy, we could comprehend some of this dynamic, using this comprehension to remove these threat fields, thus reversing resistance to possible acceptance. This requires thoughtful assessment of the alternate routes to change, so that "emotional corns" are not stepped on too hard.

THE DYNAMIC CHURCH

Today, our institutions of religion are under attack. The Black Muslims are saying, for instance, that the Christian religion has provided the ideology which makes servility for Negroes bearable for them and profitable for us. Love, patience, forbearance, "turn the other cheek", "Blessed are Ye, when man shall despise Ye, and hatefully use you", are Christian virtues they contend, which make it poossible for Negroes to continue to be exploited.

We are accused of becoming a middle class country club with a steeple on it. We are accused of trying to hide from life in these modern church buildings in homogeneous suburbs. Sunday morning is said to be the most racially segregated hour in America.

There is enough truth in these statements to make us uncomfortable and defensive. The very genius of Protestantism was that each man should become a priest unto himself; that there are no men among us who know better what is good for us than we know for ourselves. If we are to be our own priests, we should feel compelled to validate our position in as many contexts as possible. What assurance have we that our most basic commitments can stand the test of differences in the crosswinds of community life unless we are prepared to "lay them on the line"? Unless there is a constant "feedback" to assure us, how can we be sure that there is growth in Christian churchmanship commensurate with the era of which we are a part?

Growth is promoted by involvement in significant encounters, in which each makes his contribution to the directions of change. Of equal importance, each is changed himself, because of such participation. A non-controversial congregation is a dead one. A graveyard is the only known place where there is no controversy. There is no growth there. If, in this era, the church is to be worthy of the responsibilities laid upon her by Our Lord, there can be no place for conformity, provincialism, or other shielding devices. If that to which we are committed won't stand up in this modern world, we had better know now what is wrong with it. If it will stand up, this is no time to hide our witness to it. A wholesome amount of controversy is our surest way of answering that question for ourselves and for our congregations.

A RESOLUTION*
THE USE OF ECONOMIC PRESSURES IN RACIAL TENSIONS

approved by the General Board of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America, June 8, 1963

The Church affirms that the demands of the Gospel transcend barriers of race, class and nation. In regard to specific ways of combatting discrimination the Church's voice and position are often much less clear. This is particularly true in regard to the use of economic pressures, such as the "sit-in," the "freedom ride," the "stand-in," the "kneel-in," and selective buying or selective patronage.

The National Council of Churches has taken a clear position on a) the Christian responsibility to work against those special forms of economic injustice that are expressed through racial discrimination; b) the right of all persons to equal opportunity for employment and the full use of occupational skills; c) the validity of "orderly non-violent demonstrations as expressions of just and righteous indignation against laws, customs and traditions which violate human personality (and as) efforts to bring these laws, customs and traditions into conformity with the law of God," expressed in the case of sit-in demonstrations and reiterated at the time of, though not with specific reference to, the freedom rides; d) efforts to eliminate racial segregation in education; and e) discrimination in housing.

In view of the increasing significance of, and frequently mounting bitterness and tension in, the use of economic pressures in racial situation, the National Council of Churches recognizes that economic pressure is not simply good or evil in itself but must be judged in terms of the ethical ends it serves and the restraint and discipline with which it is used.

THEREFORE, THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES HERE FURTHER RESOLVES:

A. That, we believe it is the resposibility of Christians:

First, to understand the extent, manner and significance in human terms of the ways in which economic pressures have been and are still being used to deprive persons of the right to train for and pursue their choice of livelihood and to prevent them from the exercise of their human and civil rights;

Second, to refrain from any action that uses economic pressure or sanction to deprive persons of these rights because of race, creed, or national origin;

Third, to give voice, both personally and through church and other groups, in opposition to such practices where they appear in one's occupation, economic group, local community or our own church-related institutions;

Fourth, to seek ways, individually or through group action, to relieve or resolve tension situations involving economic discrimination based on race, to support voluntary mutual agreements, to initiate and support legislation aimed at preventing such discrimination in private as well as public segments of the economy, and also to support candidates for public office at local, county, state and Federal levels in advocacy of such legislation;

Fifth, when other efforts to secure these rights do not avail, to support and participate in economic pressures where used in a responsible and disciplined manner to eliminate economic injustice and to end discrimination against any of God's people based on race, creed or national origin.

B. That, we urge all churches and their members to undertake repentantly, prayerfully and concretely to fulfill these basic responsibilities toward all people.

BACKGROUND PAPER OF INFORMATION
THE USE OF ECONOMIC PRESSURES IN RACIAL TENSIONS

For many years economic pressures have been employed in this country either to maintain or to seek to eliminate discrimination based on race, creed or national origin. Today members of racial minorities are increasingly making more effective use of such measures. Christian concern for justice leads us to welcome measures that promise to right the wrongs from which many people of minority groups have long suffered. At the same time many church people are perplexed as to the possible consequences of such measures upon the fabric of community life. It is to this question that this resolution is addressed.

today it is necessary to view the developments from the perspective of a long and tortured economic history, during which the white population of the nation has for many years engaged in a gigantic "shut-out" operation against the non-white population. This has been directed primarily against the Negro, although in many communities Puerto Ricans, Spanish-Americans, Indian-Americans, and others have also been victims of severe economic discrimination.

Though all people are, in varying degrees, involved in some forms of discriminatory action in day-to-day and face-to-face economic pursuits, it is quite possible to remain unaware of their full scope and significance. Buyers and sellers of houses, employers, members of labor unions, members of civic organizations or boards of lending institutions, residents of segregated communities and worshippers in segregated churches, knowingly or unknowingly, directly or indirectly, contribute to and suffer from the evil of discrimination.

We believe it is of primary importance that Christian people everywhere recognize that what may be called bread-and-butter injustice can be equally as devastating to human life and well-being as civil injustice, if not more so, largely because bread-and-butter pursuits are so necessary to the maintenance of life. Because these forms of injustice are so closely related to habit, local mores, and man-to-man relationships, they can only partially be opposed or regulated by law or civil authority.

Economic Pressures that Perpetuate Inequality

One of the major handicaps imposed on the basis of race is inferior employment opportunity. From this handicap, resulting in permanently depressed income status, comes a large share of the social and psychological handicaps. Both a cause as well as a result of low employment potential, and hence of economic pressure, is also inferior educational opportunity. Segregation in housing, produced by both economic and social factors, is a fundamental cause of segregation in education, and the factor which makes it most difficult at present to create integrated educational facilities in many communities.

In effect, the history of the use of economic pressures in racial tensions shows that the white population has not only sought to compel non-white persons to remain on the lowest rungs of the economic ladder through restricted opportunity for gainful employment, but has also subjected them to further forms of economic retaliation when they have attempted to exercise other rights normally available to citizens of the community.

Economic Pressures and the Law

a) In Regard to Public Facilities

By the time of the Supreme Court decision in 1954 relating to desegregation of the public schools, prior decisions of the same Court had begun to secure for non-white Americans, under law, a number of substantial rights. The primary economic ones were the voiding of racial segregation in interstate transportation and the negating of enforcement by the courts of racially restrictive covenants in housing.

b) In Private Sectors of the Economy

In terms of the private sectors of the economy it may be said that, until the era of the first fair employment legislation began in 1945, there was little obstruction on any statute books to prevent most of the traditional uses or abuses of economic power for discrimination due to race, creed or national origin. Obviously one reason economic pressure has been so widely used as an instrument of discrimination over the years is the fact that it could be applied largely "within the law."

Use of Economic Pressures to End Discrimination

Whereas in the past economic suppression of practically every known form has been practiced in seeking to maintain the secondary status of Negroes and other non-whites, today the tables are being turned and a new spirit of economic aggressiveness is emerging on the part of those previously suppressed.

Some Complicating Factors

One complicating factor in evaluating the ethical significance of economic pressures lies in the fact that most of them are of the two-edged variety in that they can be used by either side in the tension situation against the other. They raise the question, therefore, of the purpose for which they are being used. From an ethical standpoint the existence of power, even of apparently "legal" power, is not the warrant for its exercise. The proper warrant for the exercise of any power is the necessary accomplishment of an ethically valid purpose, such as, in this case, the Christian concept of justice for all.

Some of the pressures raise questions of law and thus involve the problems of resistance to unjust laws and pressure for their interpretation at higher jurisdictional levels . . .

Commission on Religion and Race
National Council of Churches

Report of the Executive Director

Lincoln, Nebraska
September 5, 1963

The long hot summer is over, the fall of uncertainty begins.

At the end of three months, the Commission on Religion and Race finds itself deeply involved in the struggle for racial justice in this country. We can claim no spectacular victories, but we are providentially placed in positions of strength where the battle is heaviest.

I wish to make a report in three parts, first a review of the major activities of the Commission in the month since the last meeting; second, the ongoing involvements and investigations in which we are presently engaged; and finally a look at the issues confronting us for the months directly ahead.

I.

Those of us on the staff and those from cooperating denominations feel as if we had lived through a year of history in the past month.

On the day following the last Commission meeting several members of the staff left for Memphis, to begin a follow-up to our earlier visit to Clarksdale, Mississippi. The first task force visiting there in early July at the invitation of the Negro community had been served an injunction and had departed. We were committed to follow up our earlier visit and to try to establish some communication between the Negro and white communities if at all possible. There followed an agonizing week of attempts to meet with and talk with white clergy and lay leaders in Clarksdale. Most of this was done from Memphis on the belief that it would be easier if people came out of the Clarksdale situation to confer. All lines of communication seemed broken, even though we were able to tell the white community that a major demonstration was going to take place. We had extensive discussion with the president of the National Council and the acting chairman of the Commission about the appropriate position of the Commission in the demonstration. We finally decided that all future effectiveness with the white community would be broken if we did break the anti-parading ordinance. We did not join the NAACP-led demonstration, but instead decided to sponsor an event of our own which might carry its own unique power. So on August 8th we accepted the invitation of a Negro Baptist Church to hold an interracial ecumenical service of worship at noon. Over thirty clergymen from many denominations, including Dr. Fiers and Dr. Ward of this Commission, processed through the streets of Clarksdale to the church. Following a moving service of worship, members of the group went out two by two, Negro and white, to call on white clergymen in the city to try to move them to action and reconciliation. There was constant police surveillance, all the members of the group were served with the same injunction the first group had received, and a young white student was seized by the police in retaliation against us. The emotion and tension of the occasion are hard to describe. We did bail the student out. We did succeed in making a powerful witness in hard core northern Mississippi that shook many people. We are not through in Clarksdale. It has become a test case of Mississippi intransigence versus the power of the Christian gospel and the church which seeks to serve that gospel.

Clarksdale is significant also because it was the first place that the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law participated with us. Mr. J. Robert Lunney of Sherman and Sterling was appointed by them (this is the continuation of the White House Lawyers' Committee) to be our counsel in this event and in succeeding ones.

While in Mississippi, Mr. Lunney and Mr. John Pratt of our staff made some field investigations of the desperate legal situation which many Negro demonstrators faced when arrested in that state. Up to that time, no national bonding company had been willing to furnish bail for civil rights cases in Mississippi because local outlets immediately lost their licenses. There were many grim situations in Mississippi this summer, but one of the worst centered around some arrests in Itta Bena, a small hamlet just outside Greenwood. Here dozens of people, ranging from seventy year old ladies to young teenagers had been arrested unexpectedly following a mass meeting and had been incarcerated for over two months under inhuman conditions. After extensive negotiation, and with the good offices of the Lawyers' Committee, we succeeded in getting a national bonding company to make an attempt to furnish bail in that hardship situation. With a $10,000 bail grant from the United Church Board for Homeland Ministries, and using bail bonds underwritten by this company, Mr. Pratt secured the release of 57 prisoners from Parchman State Penitentiary and the County Jail on August 16th. It was a very dramatic and moving occasion which has been written up in a separate report by Mr. Pratt. The Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee provided invaluable field assistance in this project.

We were still focusing on Mississippi when we were obliged to give attention to Wilmington, North Carolina. Here, David Jones, a McCormick Seminary student, a summer volunteer with the Student Interracial Ministry, had figured as a central person in the freedom movement there. He had served 30 days in jail for contempt of court. Since the Student Interracial Ministry was a project of the National Council of Churches (related to the Department of Race and Cultural Relations) although not specifically of this Commission, we felt obligated to be involved there. Mr. Jones' witness had sparked the protest movement. We were invited to participate as a Commission in a demonstration during the week following his release. Mr. Moore and a representative group of clergymen did share in the leadership of a rally and prayer meeting on the steps of the courthouse in Wilmington. Dr. Roger L. Shinn of Union Seminary and the Rev. John Collins, chairman of the Student Interracial Ministry, were arrested during a test sit-in at local restaurants.

No

These particular situations caused us to engage in considerable self-searching about the economy of our efforts. We obviously could not afford to tie up our resources in one community after another, simply by responding to cries for help. We received dozens of such appeals over the summer and continue to receive them. Nonetheless, these concrete activities provided us with invaluable experience in the very heat of the battle. We had to face all the ambiguities of choice and decision that never invade a purely speculative or secondary line of involvement in the civil rights struggle.

At the same time we were thus engaged, we were also deep in the preparations for the Washington March. We helped to shape its character and to recruit thousands of people for it. We accepted the responsibility of providing emergency feeding for the March. Operation Sandwich was brilliantly planned and expedited by Church World Service. Over 400 volunteers prepared 80,000 lunches at the Riverside Church on the day before the March and the food was then delivered to Washington by refrigerated trucks. Fortunately, the March was of such a nature that emergency feeding was little needed. Only about one-tenth of the lunches were needed and the rest of the food had to be given away.

In addition to the infinite detailed planning for the March, largely under Mrs. Hedgeman's dedicated and brilliant direction, we had the job of trying to prepare the church constituency for the kind of event the March was to be, and also to try to interpret to the nation at large its deep moral significance. The Commission and the Council were bitterly attacked for our co-sponsorship. One communion officially repudiated its relationship to the March. We held a press conference at the World Council of Churches pre-meetings in Rochester to try to make the proper interpretation. We also co-sponsored with Freedom House a full page New York Times ad, which all of you have seen, to try to interpret as clearly as possible the issues as we saw them in the third week in August and to put the March in perspective.

What shall we say of the March itself? I could fill several reports about that day in Washington, both in its public and "behind-the-scenes" dimensions. However, few Americans have escaped its impact whether they were there or not. It was an event of titanic proportions -- an event of solidarity and mass conviction, as we had all longed for it to be, but also it was a day deeply personal in its own way as well. When the National Council of Churches delegation, over 100 strong, moved into the stream of marchers, the banner high and proud and we began to sing the song of victory, one of the deepest longings of my ministry was for a moment fulfilled -- the longing that the Church of Jesus Christ be in the midst of the human struggle, not on the sidelines. And we were there -- in an act so full of symbolism that no one could escape it, and with the satisfaction that we were no longer token representatives. The power of Protestantism was marching with us, and we had a right to be there at long last, because we were bearing some of the far reaching burdens of the struggle.

weren't they?

One of the bishops of the Episcopal Church who marched with us, said it accurately, when at the end of our long barricaded time in the Lincoln Memorial, he remarked, "The Holy Ghost was at work today."

A French reporter embraced me in the shadow of Lincoln, at the end of the day, and said with tears in his eyes, "To have seen the Church here, what a dream come true." I will not go on, for each of you who was there has his own memories. John Updike, one of our leading novelists said last year, "We have a desperate need for ceremonies." By that he did not mean empty game playing, but rather ways of expressing the real, deeply passionate commitments of our common life. We did on August 28th, God be praised.

On August 29th we had arranged in conjunction with the National Conference on Religion and Race a consultation on the crisis in Danville, Virginia. Many organizations sent representatives to a meeting at the National Catholic Welfare Conference building in Washington to begin to exert a coordinated strategy in helping the bitter impasse in Danville to come to some resolution. This approach is the one we wish to use in the future. A continuing committee is at work to attempt to move through the right channels to affect the intransigient business and social forces blocking interpretation in Danville.

Last week also the Justice Department asked us to help in averting tragedy in the eight or nine major cities in the south where school segregation is taking place for the first time this week. We immediately dispatched a staff member south to try to rally local forces in those communities like Birmingham, Huntsville, Mobile, Tuskegee and Baton Rouge to give support to those children and their families who will be moving into white school situations. We undoubtedly will have to do more in this case.

This is the briefest and most sparse summary of the projects brought to some kind of completion.

II.

Now let me mention, also briefly, ongoing enterprises and interests.

Perhaps the most pressing is the continuing effort to get bail for the scores of students who were arrested during the summer because of their leadership in demonstrations in the South. In a real sense the freedom movement has rested on the students even though their elders sometimes despair of their impetuous and ill considered action. In the same way that our students involved us in the Gwyn Oaks desegregation effort, so thousands of students have led the movements in the south. Upwards of 100 of their leaders are still in jail and school is beginning.

Mr. Pratt is now engaged in the intricate business of trying to free them on bail, particularly in Savannah and Americus.

I have mentioned the Danville consultation. It is our hope that this pattern can be followed with several other hard core cities.

The legislative support program of the Commission is perhaps our most heavy immediate responsibility. This Lincoln conference has been designed to awaken interest throughout key midwestern states of their important role in getting this legislation passed. Beyond this event, we plan to continue regional conferences to do this job in greater detail.

Another program that may also help in arousing support through the midwest had its origins last week in Washington. Many diverse groups came to Washington to commit themselves to all-out participation in the current struggle, among them an impressive delegation from the theatre. They have asked if they might join with us in helping to interpret the importance of passing the current legislation. Working with Paul Newman, we are planning to develop teams of actors, churchmen and freedom fighters from the south who will be available to local councils of churches for civil rights rallies in the midwest.

The staff working with the issues of the desegregation of the life of the church continue to develop their plans in the field of pilot local situations, the integrating of church institutions and colleges, and in the investment policies of church boards. They will tentially unhealthy position of having to fight always for his rights alone.

I will not even voice any pious hopes about better internal organization. Such would be very desirable. Careful staff organization with thorough planning and administration of detail, is something I long for, but this summer has taught me that this is illusory in such an operation. We cannot be deeply engaged, sensitive to the moment, and at the same time maintain trim administrative order. We will do our best to prevent chaos and wasteful expenditure of energy, but I promise you we will never have a smooth running bureaucratic machine. Fortunately, we do have a superb staff, with high morale, committed wholeheartedly to the task. We could not have operated through this hectic summer without this indispensable ingredient. We live daily by the grace of God, with the sense that we have been given a unique opportunity in His service. I do covet some time to think about what we are doing and to have more time for staff reflection about our common problems. On the night of the Washington March in the Statler Hotel, we spent about four hours doing just this, and we must do it again. I do wish to pay tribute to the whole staff of the National Council of Churches for their gallant support and patient backstopping of the Commission during this summer. From the General Secretary to the bookkeeper, they have been with us, stretching and sometimes breaking the necessary red tape that keeps the Council running smoothly on its normal routine. During Operation Sandwich and all the preparation for the March, the business administration operations of the Council were completely at our disposal. Our thanks to LeRoy Brininger are particularly due.

In conclusion, let me raise three major issues beyond the ongoing concerns that I see as paramount, soliciting your comment and discussion.

The first is how we seize the enormous opportunity opened to us by the Washington March. I do not mean in this instance, opportunities within our own constituency but in the whole public domain. The March provided a great release this summer for the concerned to express their commitment. Millions of others sat up and watched, many predicting and more fearing violence and disorder. Among these were some of the great industrial leaders of this country. These men, by and large, are convinced that massive efforts must now be made to assist Negro Americans to achieve their rightful place in this society. They watched the March uneasily but now that it is over, and turned out so successfully, they are open to approaches. We must not fail this rare opening. I have been consulting with Whitney Young of the Urban League, our staff, government people and the President of the National Council of Churches to the end that we might propose the establishment of a really ambitious fund under a name like the Human Resources Development Corporation, into which really large sums of money could be given, in the tens of millions of dollars, and then turned to priority needs in education, job and professional training, community redevelopment and the like. Various agancies would participate in formulating the program to be supported. The Corporation would support existing enterprises, but also seek to encourage coalitions between the many fragmented agencies at work in the field. It is my hope that the National Council of Churches Division of Home Missions might, for example, develop a comprehensive program of rehabilitation in the Delta area of Mississippi, working closely with Voter Registration groups and other action agencies in the field. It is very important that the financial resources of this country be challenged at this time to undergird the work of training and healing that lies just ahead of us. These forces are now awake to the absolute need. We must not furnish them too small, or too divided a channel.

The development of this idea would seem to be a role this Commission and its staff can now play. We stand in open relationship to all parties, but no longer neutral. We are informed and committed. Business, action groups and government will listen if we come up with something sound.

The second major problem is the development of a creative and helpful relationship between the Commission and the member communions of the Council.

Frankly, under the mandate of the General Board we have moved swiftly to action, and the denominations have been left behind. I do not mean that they have not been moving. Most of the major groups have established special commissions and employed staff designated for this particular assignment. They have responded to our calls for help. They have done an excellent job of alerting people this summer to the urgency of the hour. But there is still a wide gap between our active intervention in particular situations and their largely educative, supportive role.

We have not done a good job of keeping them informed, or more important, of bringing them into decision-making consultation. Somehow we need to do this -- not just for our own public relations, but because the long term, nation-wide job will only be accomplished, if the communions can mobilize for action.

It has been my feeling that we could stimulate the communions to a more drastic kind of action by our pursuing it rather than developing a theoretical scheme of action for Protestantism and then seeking its adoption. I still believe this, but now we do need to work out more effective channels of communication and better cooperative ways of working with the denominations. What are your ideas on this?

The third major concern I wish to bring is about the future of the 11. Commission. None of us believes that we ought to try to maintain indefinitely the present form of the Commission. On the other hand, the present crisis shows no sign of early abatement. We have begun the process of building a 1964 budget on an expanded basis. The Council, however, is in the process of restructuring its program divisions. We ought to be thinking, therefore, about long range program responsibilities in the field and where they will be lodged. We need to ask what is the distinctive task of the Commission and what its future should be. We can only make a beginning at this task, but we must be aware that January 1, 1964 calls for some re-evaluation of our direction and emphases.

These concerns will be added to the ones brought by the work groups and other members of the staff.

My last comment must be one of deep appreciation for the support and sense of common task which we share in the staff and membership of the Commission. The overwhelming feeling of inadequacy, of dipping the ocean with a bucket that surrounds so much of what we do, is transformed into a ministry of faithfulness and obedience, by the steady comradeship of fellow workers, and by the promises of God.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 -- The Negro struggle for civil rights has given America's three great religious faiths -- "for the first time in our nation's history -- a common task and a common goal," the president of the American Jewish Congress declared here today.

Rabbi Joachim Prinz of Newark, N.J., told a meeting of the American Jewish Congress National Governing Council at the International Inn:

"By joining in the battle of the American Negro for dignity and freedom, organized religion has both found itself and vindicated its existence in our century."

But he warned that a "profound gap" must be closed "between the religious leader who preaches civil rights and the congregation that does not follow.

"It is the man in the pew -- not the man in the pulpit -- who must be made to recognize that his religion carries with it a moral responsibility and a moral commitment to the great struggle for full equality," Rabbi Prinz declared.

"In this great task lies the supreme challenge to the ministers of the three major religious faiths in America."

Spoke at March on Washington

Rabbi Prinz, one of three religious leaders who spoke at the March on Washington and later met with President Kennedy, said that "at a time when theological differences matter but little and an ecumenical spirit embraces clergymen of all faiths, the goals of racial equality and social justice for all citizens have become the new religious battle cry."

The leaders of American Protestantism, Catholicism and Judaism have recognized, Rabbi Prinz continued, that "if the churches and synagogues were to play a significant role in our time, they had no choice but to join the great moral struggle for racial equality.

"If they had not," he added, "they would have forfeited religion's greatest opportunity to become a potent force in American life.

"Having done so, however, they must now impress upon the ordinary churchgoer and synagogue member that the moral mainspring of the civil rights struggle lies in the ethical and prophetic concepts which form the basis of Christian and Jewish belief."

Turning to the role of the Jewish community in the civil rights struggle, Rabbi Prinz declared:

"The Jew brings to the civil rights struggle a three-fold experience. We, too, have a memory of slavery. We, too, lived -- for a thousand years and more during the Middle Ages and again under the Hitler regime —in the ghettoes of segregation. We, too, have been given a proclamation of emancipation, and -- in the death of six million Jews -- we, too, know the failure of such proclamations to guarantee real freedom.

"The American Jew, like his Christian neighbor, must act -- where he lives, where he works, where he sends his children to school -- to demand an end to segregation and the beginning of a decent chance in life for his Negro fellow-American."

Struggle for Equality Held Crucial Test for Organized Religion

Rabbi Prinz concluded:

"To win freedom, the Negro must free himself. But in that struggle we who claim to speak the word of God to man -- we ministers, priests and rabbis -- must win our own congregations.

"However united, however eloquent, however dedicated the clergy of America may be on this issue, the real task consists in winning the minds and hearts of their parishiners to the cause of racial equality.

"In the success or failure of this effort, the success or failure of the Negro's struggle for equal rights and equal opportunity will be largely determined.

"Here, then, lies the crucial test of organized religion's significance for this day and this age."

N.C.C. Visits Clarksdale

Religion

✦ THE COMPLEX QUESTION of official Protestantism's role in the current racial struggle was raised with particular urgency when a delegation of 36 church leaders visited Clarksdale, Miss., on Aug. 8 to hold a service of worship in a Negro Baptist church and to pay calls on the white clergymen of that troubled delta city, a majority of whose 20,000 residents are Negro. They came in response to a call issued by the National Council of Churches' recently established Commission on Religion and Race.

Among the visitors were representatives of eight denominations: American Baptist, Christian Methodist Episcopal, Church of the Brethren, Disciples of Christ, Methodist, Protestant Episcopal, United Church of Christ, United Presbyterian.

The purpose of the delegation's visit, according to Robert Spike, executive director of the N.C.C. commission, was "to symbolize concern for the breaking down of the wall which separates us as Christians in Clarksdale." Dr. Spike, who was present with the delegation during the service of worship and the subsequent visitation program, characterized the National Council's involvement in Clarksdale as a "test case," a means of exploring the council's role not only in that community but in other areas of the nation where racial problems exist. In a memorandum issued Aug. 5 to member churches of the National Council Dr. Spike had set forth the background of the Clarksdale visit:

> Why Clarksdale? . . . Like many southern cities, it is a community cut in two by racial conflict. Negro citizens are denied the simplest amenities in public accommodation. . . . Their leaders in the struggle for justice have been bombed, harassed, thrown in jail. . . . At the Medgar Evers funeral, one of the leaders of the Negro community [Dr. Aaron Henry, a Clarksdale druggist and chairman of the Mississippi chapter of the N.A.A.C.P.] talked to representatives of the newly formed Council of Churches' Commission on Religion and Race. This commission was designed to be an action agency for Protestantism's concern for the growing crisis in race relations. This Clarksdale citizen invited the commission to send representatives to Clarksdale to see if anything could be done there. On July 8, a group including Dr. Dale Fiers, the Rev. Arthur Walmsley, Dr. Dudley Ward and others went to Clarksdale hoping to talk with both white and Negro leaders to avert trouble and begin a process of reconciliation. The local N.A.A.C.P. was planning a demonstration and hoped that the N.C.C. people might participate. The delegation met with almost total rebuff. The mayor would not see them and what is more they were all served with an injunction forbidding them from demonstrating. . . . The delegation left with a great sense of frustration. The Negro community did not demonstrate. During the week of July 21 word was received that the situation seemed almost intolerable in Clarksdale. A new delegation, with some of the same members but also some new personnel including Dr. Robert Dodds, Dr. Harold Row and Dr. Barton Hunter went to Memphis, Tenn., the nearest large city, to try again to build some channels of communication between Negro and white people in Clarksdale, particularly Negro and white clergymen. National heads of denominations were asked to go through their appropriate channels and request local ministers and heads of judicatories to meet with the group in Memphis. . . . No local Clarksdale churchmen would respond.

Dr. Spike went on to report that the N.C.C. representatives went to Clarksdale and were present when the impatient Negro community finally held a demonstration which resulted in 32 arrests. While they were able to establish contact with Negro leaders, they remained "always without success in communicating with white churchmen."

I

The decision that the observances on Aug. 8 should take the form of a worship service followed by visits to local white clergymen actually represented a middle road between two alternatives. The N.C.C. commission, which is authorized to participate in direct action campaigns, could have cast its lot with the Negro community, placing delegation members at the disposal of local civil rights leaders. Or it could have declared a policy of "persuasion" aimed exclusively at the white community and based on the theory that the council's primary approach should be to "influence the power structures"—in particular the white churches.

The "middle road" consisted in tacit identification with the Negro community, achieved by the mere presence of a predominantly white delegation at a service of worship in a Negro church but lacking commitment to direct action, i.e., participation in Clarksdale's nonviolent movement, which is led by Dr. Henry and a small group of field workers for the Congress of Racial Equality and the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee.

Most of the members of the delegation assembled in Memphis on Aug. 7 for a briefing session and a nonviolent workshop led by the Rev. James Lawson, a veteran of numerous direct action campaigns. The ambiguity of the council's proposed action was recognized by several members of the delegation. This was particularly so during the nonviolent workshop, a session which implicitly suggested the possibility that the proposed service of worship and visitation might, in the eyes of Clarksdale officials, constitute a breach of the peace. While some maintained that a definite commitment to direct action should be made, others explained that they had agreed to participate with the understanding that the group's action would be solely "religious" in nature and not designed to provoke Clarksdale's civil authorities.

There was general consensus on one point, however: the delegation should make its concern for justice known to the Negro community of Clarksdale. One means of expressing such concern was to accept the hospitality of Negro Christians in Clarksdale and spend the night of Aug. 7 as their house guests. Most of the delegation did so, and many of them regarded this experience as the most meaningful of their whole trip.

II

The Aug. 8 worship service, scheduled for noon, was preceded by a briefing session at the Haven Methodist Church in Clarksdale. There it was discovered that the local Negro clergymen, who had been asked to join in team visitations to white clergy following the service, were reluctant to participate, largely through fear of reprisals.

The delegation formed a procession which left the Haven Methodist Church and walked to the First Baptist Church, slightly more than a block away on the same street. Local police were on hand to witness the procession. I spoke with one officer who observed that the procession did not amount to a "demonstration" since it was held in the "nigger" section of Clarksdale.

The worship service was attended by some 250 Clarksdale Negroes. The city's white clergymen had been invited to attend by special delivery letter but none of them showed up. The small band of CORE and "Snick" workers, who had expressed hope that the visitors might "go to jail" in the cause of freedom, were sprinkled throughout the congregation. Perhaps the greatest response from the Negro worshipers came during the intercessory prayer when guidance and blessing was sought for Dr. Aaron Henry, who has been a victim of assassination threats and whose home has been bombed, and for Martin Luther King, Jr., who had spoken recently to a mass meeting in Clarksdale. There were murmurs of "Yes, yes," from the congregation. But the overwhelming impression which the service engendered was one of pathos; one sensed a lack of clarity in regard to the N.C.C.'s purpose in Clarksdale, coupled with awareness by both white and Negro worshipers that Clarksdale is a city prepared to resist all but the most dramatic and potentially violent expressions of opposition to segregation. (Negroes have boycotted downtown stores since 1960, but the whites, it is reported, would rather go bankrupt than negotiate.)

Immediately following the worship service a county official strode into the church armed with an injunction which enjoined members of the delegation from any acts that could be interpreted as disturbing the peace of Clarksdale. Robert Lunney, an attorney who accompanied the delegation at the N.C.C.'s request and a member of an informal lawyers' group set up at the suggestion of Pres. Kennedy, advised the delegation that the postservice visitations did not, in his opinion, violate the terms of the injunction. Apparently local officials agreed, since the visitations to the white clergymen took place as scheduled and without incident.

In a follow-up evaluation of the visitations, most of which were made by teams of white clergymen because of lack of local Negro participation, the general feeling was that those local white pastors who could be reached were either directly opposed to the N.C.C.'s presence in Clarksdale or genuinely convinced that racial accord in the community is impossible. Even if the clergy were to act on the race question—which would surely cost them their jobs—the city administration and local business leaders seem completely dedicated to the policies of segregation. A Clarksdale Presbyterian, U.S., pastor was dismissed as chaplain to the city council after he was observed shaking hands with Negro leader Aaron Henry. (The same clergyman condemned the presence of the N.C.C. in Clarksdale.)

Most of the delegation left Clarksdale after the visitations, although a few members remained to spend the night with their Negro hosts and to explore further the depressing racial climate of the community. It seemed obvious that the burden of fighting for the Negro cause in Clarksdale had been left squarely on the shoulders of the local Negro leadership and the small complement of CORE and Snick workers. In what may have been a reprisal aimed at the N.C.C. delegation, the city police arrested one CORE worker immediately following the prayer service, and three more student workers on the following day.

III

What did the visit to Clarksdale mean? The general feeling among the Negroes with whom I talked was that it could mean nothing unless the visitors were prepared to make long-term commitments to direct action. And it seemed clear to me that the racial dilemma of Clarksdale will not reach its crisis point until Negro "provocations" reach the point where they inspire enough violent white resistance to mobilize fully the Negro community. Such is the complex strategy of freedom movements in the south.

I asked members of the delegation to write a brief answer to the question: "Why are you here?" Following is a cross-section of the 20 responses received:

> "I'm here because I'm a fellow American and Christian interested in freedom and civil rights being available to all Americans."
>
> "For years I have preached about Christian brotherhood from the pulpit. Somehow I feel that it is time for preachers to dispel the impression of their hollowness and glibness by stepping down into the vital fields of concern where the great issues of our time are being decided."
> "I am disappointed . . . in the approach used this time, and earnestly hope we can break the stereotype in the near future, participating with the local leaders in their efforts rather than simply worshiping and appearing on the scene. This activity, unless followed soon by more serious efforts, will only reaffirm the image of the church as irrelevant."
>
> "I don't want to be here. I pray for the time when such demonstrations will not be necessary. But as matters now stand I feel compelled to witness to the fact that God is not segregated . . ."
>
> "I must identify with the cause of freedom and justice. I respect the call of the National Council."
>
> "I am concerned as a southerner over the attempt to portray the struggle for human rights as a battle along racial lines. The issues go to the heart of Christianity. If we are not renewed and made one body in Christ, our faith is in vain."
> ". . . because the church must take its place in the life and crucifixions of this world."
> "I accepted an invitation by the National Council to visit Clarksdale because I am baptized. My commitment to Jesus Christ commits me to any person and group which is seeking to become free from controls and bonds which inhibit their already saved lives. A Christian does not take part in such a witness to justify his long-stagnant church. He does so only because there is a need—and his vocation is to meet needs, because his own need has been met by God himself."

Only one response made direct reference to the plight of white persons in Clarksdale—a plight particularly acute in the case of those white clergymen who may be in need of a supportive ministry as they seek to come to terms with the meaning of the gospel in the racial struggle. A number of responses cited the call of the National Council as a primary reason for coming.

IV

The National Council staff members returned to New York to consider the possibilities of future involvement in Clarksdale. A week after the visitation no decision had been reached as to future strategy. But it seems plain that a definite decision must be made. The National Council will have to subscribe to a program of direct action—either through support of already established direct action groups or through the dispatch of delegations prepared for civil disobedience and arrest—or it will have to abandon the notion that it can be effective, in purely social terms, in Clarksdale. An alternative strategy would be for the council to attempt to work for the "conversion" of white Christians from adherence to a traditional gospel which accepts segregation to acceptance of a gospel that has no room for the segregationist stance. Perhaps such a strategy could be effective only if carried out by indigenous southern leadership—clergymen and laymen who believe that traditional, "white" religion in the south constitutes a misinterpretation of God's act of reconciliation in Christ. One southern clergyman, sympathetic to the cause of integration, asked when told of the N.C.C.'s intention to visit Clarksdale, "What are they trying to do, show them [the local white Christians] up?"

If the visit to Clarksdale raised the complex question of organized Protestantism's role in the racial crisis, it did not answer it. If reconciliation with white as well as Negro clergymen and laymen was intended, it did not occur. The tragic fact seems to be that no clear theology of involvement in the current struggle has been propounded or adopted. The reasons for involvement are varied indeed, as the above quotations reveal.

Perhaps we have come to a tragic impasse for the Christian who would be obedient to God's command that his church be one and that man love his neighbor, a tragedy in the sense that Hegel used the term: the irreconcilable conflict and sinful involvement in obviously complete abandonment to the aims of the oppressed, recognizing that conflict and sinful involvement in finite judgments are inevitable. This is essentially the decision that Bonhoeffer made in Hitler's Germany. And it would appear that there is indeed such entrenched evil in the civil order of the state of Mississippi that involvement on this basis is called for. Another, and opposite, good is adoption of a form of action based on the theological premise that the white man and the Negro are equal, not because they are good in a humanistic sense but because they are evil in a biblical sense. Acceptance of this position, supplemented by the additional conviction that the proclamation of the gospel is itself an antidote to racism, implies an entirely different and largely unexplored strategy for the church.

Such a strategy is being developed by Will D. Campbell, who recently resigned as head of the southern office of the National Council's Commission on Racial and Cultural Relations. A native Mississippian and a Southern Baptist minister, Campbell believes that the basic involvement of Christians in the current crisis should take the form of confronting the traditional "folk religion" of the south with a radical understanding of the Christian gospel. With this in mind he has helped organize a group of southern clergymen who will work to create dialogue with southern Christians on a primarily theological level. Such a program does not preclude courageous involvement in crisis situations, but it does reject purely humanistic approaches to racial problems.

There is much to be said for both approaches. The lesson of the inconclusive events in Clarksdale is perhaps that Christians are being forced to decide which of these two approaches is legitimate, or whether both can be combined in a general Protestant strategy. It seems certain that there is no middle way in 1963. One needs only to walk the streets of Clarksdale to discover that this is so. STEPHEN C. ROSE.

Letters to the Editor

Turn in Turnipseed Story

SIR: Re your editorial wrist slap ("Churchmen Defend Sit-in Student," June 26) at Birmingham-Southern College, Birmingham, Ala., over the alleged dismissal of Miss Martha Turnipseed: According to Dr. Howard Phillips, president of Birmingham-Southern, the Century's report of the incident is totally inaccurate. Apparently Miss Turnipseed withdrew of her own volition from the college, is now under no disciplinary action whatever, and can be readmitted at any time. What prompts my particular concern is the following statement by Dr. Phillips, made in a personal letter to an alumnus of Birmingham-Southern, the dean of Stetson University here in DeLand:

> Neither The Christian Century nor the Genesee Methodist conference in Rochester attempted to obtain correct information from any official at Birmingham-Southern College. Since the source of their information was not identified, I can only assume that the statements represent the usual distorted versions that occur when spread by word of mouth through several hundred people.

Dr. Phillips asserts that at no time did the Birmingham-Southern administration even consider the arbitrary dismissal of Miss Turnipseed reported in the Century. . . . Misrepresentations of this sort in the press do not help those of us in the south who are conscientiously and even fervently working to accomplish the very ends desired in this matter by the Century's editors. . . .

JOHN E. HOWELL.

SIR: . . . Your editorial "Churchmen Defend Sit-in Student" (June 26) has deeply disturbed me. . . . We in the south would like for you to examine your own spiritual position in this area of Christian social action. What sacrifices, what crosses, are churchmen in the north bearing when they pronounce judgment on the "small gains" which we are making in our beloved southland? The Genesee Methodist annual conference [in censuring Birmingham-Southern College] probably soothed guilt feelings for its indifference toward the injustices within its own boundaries. We have read no editorial commending the Alabama-West Florida Methodist conference for the report on Christian social concerns which it adopted in its annual session in May. . . . This report is more in keeping with Christian brotherhood than the resolution unanimously passed in Rochester. Nevertheless you and the Genesee conference harshly criticize one of the liberal institutions of Alabama by calling on "the educational authorities of the Methodist Church to discipline the college."

Your editorial is unfair and unjust because its author did not know the facts of the case. I am greatly surprised that an annual conference of the Methodist Church would attempt to harm the reputation of one of our outstanding Methodist colleges without first studying the situation. We admire the courage and conviction of Miss Martha Turnipseed, but she voluntarily left Birmingham-Southern, and can enroll again whenever she chooses.

As one liberal to another: come live among us, learn the facts, and then sound a liberal voice through your editorials. H. STANLEY MULLINS.

The following are remarks of Senator Jacob K. Javits prepared for delivery at ceremonies marking the 200th anniversary of the dedication of the Touro Synagogue, the oldest synagogue in the nation, in Newport, Rhode Island, Sunday afternoon, September 15, 1963, 2:30 PM

THE FIGHT TO FREE OURSELVES

When this small synagogue was dedicated in Newport 200 years ago, liberty was the theme of our age. This temple was born and nurtured in a setting that was as inspirational as it was historic.

This site in the colony of Rhode Island -- which Roger Williams founded as a citadel of religious liberty, opening its arms to the oppressed from across the seas -- is as symbolic of the heritage of our nation as any piece of earth could be.

The letter to this congregation from George Washington, with the immortal words that the United States "gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance" -- words that were written before even the Bill of Rights in the Constitution was adopted -- is as symbolic of the soul of our nation as any document could be.

Thus, on this bicentennial celebration, we can look at this splendid temple with passion and with pride; and with the knowledge that in places such as this, the human spirit was first ennobled in the United States; and the American Dream was first articulated.

We also cannot help but be reminded of a tableau three weeks ago at another shrine, in Washington, D.C., when liberty was again the theme. There, the spiritual leader of the current civil rights "revolution" cried to us that the American Dream was too long forgotten by too many and too long denied to those so ardently reaching for its realization.

And so, the fight for liberty continues; the crusade for human dignity goes on; the struggle to bring meaning to the American promise is still far from won.

This is a struggle which we must face in the communities no less than in the Congress, in our synagogues and churches no less than in our business establishments and recreational facilities. And as Jews we have a special responsibility to set forth by example and in highly positive deeds the great religious and prophetic tradition to which we are the heirs.

The extent to which this crusade is the major unfinished business of our society was never more dramatized than by published polls this past week which declared that 50% of our nation believes that integration is moving "too fast."

Just think of it -- if these polls really reflect deep convictions, it means that half of our nation may not yet have freed itself of this sorrowful irrationality.

The synagogues and churches of our land will not be persuaded by such polls; and I hope politicians will not either. For I believe that while the 50% of those questioned may have said "too fast," the consciences, when properly appealed to, of those same Americans will give a different answer.

This is the most powerful force in this current struggle -- that the deeply-held conscience of the white American is on the side of the Negro, whatever may appear to be his off-the-cuff emotions.

This is why every level of our society must be enlisted to bring about a moral awakening among the American people -- or to put it more bluntly, to stir the uneasy consciences of every white American so he may free himself of bias.

- more -

This fight to free ourselves is the great, unwritten struggle being waged today in the depths of each individual soul. It is a battle for survival of the American dream, and of the human spirit.

Our minds hear the message: When freedom is denied to one man, it is denied to all; for freedom is noble and indivisible. If we want to enjoy it, it must be extended to everyone; if we want to maintain it, we must fight for it.

These simple truths are enshrined in this synagogue, as they are enshrined in the hearts of every Jew. The accumulated experience of centuries of persecution have equipped the Jewish community -- perhaps more than most -- with the ability to understand that the security of one minority is no greater than the security of any other minority, just as the denial of liberty to one American threatens the liberty of every American.

It is this identity of interest between the Negro minority and other minorities in the United States which gives this 1963 civil rights "revolution" strength and effectiveness. It is this identity of interest which should make possible joint and inter-dependent action to eliminate these injustices from American society.

We cannot allow ourselves to be barred from this struggle, as some misguided Negroes suggest, for an American struggle for the soul of our nation is neither for whites only nor for Negroes only.

The rabbis and priests and ministers who joined the freedom marchers in Birmingham; in Gwynne Oaks, Maryland; in Albany, Georgia; in Jackson, Mississippi; and in the other towns and cities -- they gave substance to this truth. The 200,000 men and women of all faiths and color who participated in the August 28 march on Washington -- a demonstration which enriched our democracy as few events ever have -- they recognized this, too.

But not everyone has to march or to picket or to demonstrate in order to make an effective contribution to this fight. But neither can anyone remain aloof -- every American must speak his conscience and act its dictates on this racial crisis. Silence has been the greatest weapon for the demagogues. It has caused mankind's darkest hours -- as no Jew of modern times can ever forget.

The problem is not confined to the South, as we all know. In the North and among all groups, there are problems of "silence", too -- of an unwillingness to implement convictions, a reluctance to be the first to tread on unwalked paths.

A Negro leader once confessed to me, "In the South, we know our enemy; in the North, we don't always know -- and that is sometimes more difficult."

This struggle is more than just the number of votes that are needed in the Congress to pass civil rights legislation; and that it is more than the dramatic confrontations between state and Federal power which we have seen in Mississippi and Alabama.

It is, above all, an enormous battle of conscience -- which will not be resolved until each individual is willing to take inventory, to realize that the resolution cannot be put off for another day or for another generation; and that now is the time to commit our hearts as well as our minds.

I feel the stirrings of this battle of conscience.

I see it in the letter a woman wrote to the New York Times, telling of her search for a way to implement her convictions. She wrote that she went "rather impulsively, to the evening service at a local Negro church....I was welcomed...and I recommend such activities to friendly white Americans. Do not be afraid to go it alone at first.

Others will follow. And if enough of us show our spirit in some such way, no longer can our Negro leaders feel that there has been no moral awakening or conversion among the American people."

I feel this stirring, too, in the mail coming into my office. Few people realize that even a Senator from New York -- for six years until this year -- had received more mail opposed to civil rights than mail favoring it. But this summer, that trend has sharply reversed. The "good people" are beginning to write, to speak out on what bothers their consciences and what they know is right.

I feel these stirrings, too, on the floor of the Senate. There have been days in my 15 years in Congress when to plead for civil rights was a lonely battle, irritating to the establishment; and the coldness of the reception would hang icily in the air. Today, there is warmth and great understanding that this battle has to be waged now for it relates to the very destiny of our nation.

It is the stirring of conscience, too, on equal opportunity which is forcing businessmen to review their hiring and promotion practices; which is forcing labor unions to review their admission and apprenticeship policy; which is forcing others to examine their reasons for patronizing particular stores, hotels or restaurants, or for deciding in what community they will live; and what schools they want their children to attend. It is this stirring of conscience which is awakening Americans to their personal opportunities to afford equal opportunity to our fellow Negro Americans in myriad ways not affected by laws.

The battle will be won when this conscience can be translated into action. If we can succeed in doing this now, our nation will be nourished and enriched; our society will be fuller and stronger.

- more -

And we will free ourselves at last.

The founders of the Touro Synagogue 200 years ago helped launch our nation upon the noble principle of religious liberty and brotherly understanding. Today, as we honor their memories, let us take a solemn pledge to emulate their courage and their convictions by pushing toward a goal of equal opportunity for all Americans with our personal as well as public commitments - clear and unequivocal.

To recapture their vision of America, we must speak out and act as plainly as did our forefathers here.

STATEMENT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE
EPISCOPAL SOCIETY FOR CULTURAL AND RACIAL UNITY
ON THE LOVETT SCHOOL SITUATION

On June 14, 1963, the Board of Trustees of the Lovett School, Atlanta, Georgia, "unanimously adopted resolutions denying applications of Negro students for admission." This fact was the major concern of a meeting of the Executive Committee and Chapter representatives of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, held in Atlanta, Georgia September 15-17, 1963. The Society consists of persons who have committed themselves to establish total participation in the Church of all persons without regard to race, class or national origin, and to express this concern at parish levels and in a more creative witness throughout the community at large.

As a result of the decision of the Board of Trustees, the Bishop of Atlanta announced during the past summer that he had severed all official or implied ties with the Lovett School. The Society commends the Bishop of Atlanta for his efforts and actions in this matter. However, in light of the following facts, it is an inescapable conclusion that the Episcopal Church is still an integral part of the school's life. The charter of the school requires: 1) That seven members of the Lovett School's Board of Trustees be communicants of and approved by the Episcopal Cathedral of St. Philip; 2) That seven other members of the Board of Trustees be Episcopal residents of the state of Georgia; 3) That the Dean of the Episcopal Cathedral of St. Philip shall always be a member of the Board of Trustees; and 4) That the Lovett School is committed to furthering the "Episcopal faith as contained in the Book of Common Prayer."

At present, with the full knowledge of the Standing Committee of the Diocese, worship services of the Church continue at the Lovett School, including a weekly celebration of the Holy Communion. The Society is shocked that the Dean of the Episcopal Cathedral of St. Philip continues to serve as Chairman of the Board of Trustees. This fact and his present involvement at the Lovett School worship services clearly identifies the Episcopal Church with the school's segregationist policy.

Lovett's Director of Administration, J. A. Rabbe, obviously does not consider the school as presently outside the orbit of the Episcopal Church. This is evidenced by Mr. Rabbe's letter to parents on August 8, 1963. At that time he reassured them that daily chapel, Wednesday morning communion services, the teaching of religion, and all other religious emphases "will be continued just as in the past and have the approval of the Bishop."

Following a thorough and prayerful consideration of the facts of the Lovett School situation, the Society feels constrained to protest in the following manner: 1) sustained inter-racial participation in the school's services of worship; 2) sustained picketing of the school by concerned Churchmen; 3) expressing our common guilt in the sin of segregation through the recitation of the Penitential Office at the Cathedral of St. Philip; and 4) regularly offering prayers throughout the whole Church in order to help heal the deep wounds, both personal and social, which the Lovett School has created.

(OVER)

The Lovett School situation is all the more grievous because it is symptomatic of the widespread compromise of the Church's teaching. The Society commends those people at Lovett School and in this community who recognize the injustice of segregation and who continue to suffer and labor in obedience to Jesus Christ.

SOME GUIDELINES FOR THE FUTURE
OF THE
COMMISSION ON RELIGION AND RACE OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

September 23, 1963

The struggle for racial justice becomes increasingly a vast network of problems and issues that invades every area of American life. It is political. It is economic. It is psychological. It is theological. It is an axis on which balances the validity of our professions as a nation, and surely as Christians. What once seemed to most people to be "an" issue in a whole catalog of perplexing social problems now blends endlessly into a configuration of radical social change, like a gigantic storm system coming up from the horizon and filling the sky. We do not have any neat labels to identify and thus dismiss this new mood, this new sense of urgency and desperation, having its strongest anchorage in the Negro community and yet taking shape in the rest of America as well. It is a fight to finish - a showdown with some of the most deeply established hypocrises of our common life. And since human beings are involved, there will be resistance and hatred, weakness and treachery, on both sides. There is a right side in the struggle for civil rights, let there be no mistake about that. But this is not a fight between angels and devils. There will be contending and struggle. There must also be thought and careful planning. The moment must be addressed, without waiting to take soundings in the boondocks. And the long, painful process of changing institutions and their habits (sometimes garbed as traditions) must be worked at with great skill and political ingenuity.

In the midst of such a vast turning of events (1963 will surely be remembered as a calendar axis), the establishment of the Commission by the General Board is important most of all as a sign of the turning.

It has flown headlong into the eye of the storm, sometimes foolishly, but I am proud to feel, gallantly.

But in the face of the magnitude of the problem, a person standing off a bit from its operation must surely feel that it seems a bit Don Quixote.

The time has come to narrow the attack of the Commission and also to look at alliances that can strengthen the whole line of battle.

That is why I proposed at the Lincoln meeting of the Commission that the central focus of the Commission be upon community action, and that as quickly as possible, the urgent concerns of the desegregation of the life of the church and legislative action be returned to the appropriate program agencies. Commission discussion dissented from this proposal to the effect that these concerns could not be turned back without some reshaping of those agencies so that they were at least as action-oriented as the Commission has been. What is more, it was pointed out that the community action activities of the Commission inform and energize the other aspects of the work of the Commission. These arguments are well taken. We must not allow the Commission to lose the sense of urgency and commitment in matters of the internal life of the church and the more customary forms of social action.

On the other hand, the Commission cannot begin to plan or direct the broad scope of action in these fields without the widest kind of coordination with the instrumentalities set up to do the job in the National Council and in the denominations. How can this be achieved, without a cumbersome process of consultation, interlocking and overlapping responsibility?

The candid answer to the last question is probably that it cannot. It must be kept to a minimun, and the end purpose be continually reflected in specific targets and programs.

What then, are some of the possible divisions of labor, between the Commission, the divisions of the National Council and the denominations?

The Commission

The most important thing for all of us in the church to remember is that we are not scheduling the pace of the revolution. Events call the tune for us. The timing of the struggle is not geared to the timing of our institutions or our schedules. The Commission must be free to meet the timing of the needs of the struggle. It must be a fast moving, light on its feet, organization with a mobile staff ready to undertake assignments and carry through specific short term acts of witness. These projects may be in the field of direct community action as Gwyn Oaks, Clarksdale, Wilmington, in a consultative action impinging on a single community as Danville, Malverne, Bel Air, and in a special way, Greenwood, Savannah and Americus; the field of legislative action as at Lincoln, Washington in the week of September 15; or in a special event like the Washington March or being the presence of the church as at the funerals in Jackson and Birmingham. While we have tried to have staff assigned to specific areas, whenever a special campaign emerged, it has taken the combined strength and ingenuity of all our staff. Job descriptions have meant little and perhaps need re-evaluating in the light of experience.

Concerns in community action and legislation have dominated the major time of the full-time staff of the Commission. Jon Regier, Colin Williams and Dai Kitagawa have given thoughtful leadership in the whole area of the desegregation of the church, but the area has not been moved into a central position on the Commission's agenda. This does not mean that nothing has been going on. The department of Evangelism and the Division of Home Missions have geared large parts of their program to this concern -- with the pilot projects in Chatham and Germantown, and the consultations arranged on desegregation of local churches and also on financial policies of church boards.

I sense some hesitancy about how far these concerns should continue without vigorous direction from the Commission itself. It is probably not possible and perhaps not desirable for this to be done. The concerns, however, are of central importance and the ongoing units of the Council must be deeply involved, as well as the denominations in order to work at it effectively. It is also essential to keep a close liaison with the Commission.

How can this be accomplished? To begin, working committees made up of staff of other units and denominational staff people must be set up — called into being by Commission action and reporting to the Commission, but largely self-generating and self-propelled. The standing committees of the Commission would then receive the reports of these ad hoc working committees. It is important that the membership of these committees cross divisional lines.

It is proposed that the Associate Executive Director, Dr. Lee, take responsibility for conducting this program within the council and with denominational staffs.

Mr. Moore, the other Associate Director, would be responsible for the direct operational aspects of the Council.

A. Program Priorities

While it is necessary for us to keep close to direct action and specific community projects like Danville and the bailing operation, our major emphasis in operational program in the months ahead should be geared to support of the legislation. Mr Hamilton and Mr. Ketcham should be responsible for content and scheduling but with the overall direction of Mr. Moore in deploying other staff.

This means interpretative work in the midwest and also in Washington. In addition to direct lobbying there, the Consultation and Hearings on Police Brutality will receive priority attention.

B. Committees Needed

1. An advisory Committee on Interpretation and Public Relations to work with the Associate Director for Community Action.

2. A Finance Committee made up of Commission members.

Other units of the Council

Three working committees need to be set up.

1. A Committee on the Desegregation of the Church. This should include representatives from all the major units -- Home Missions, Life and Work, Evangelism, Foreign Missions, Christian Education, United Church Men and United Church Women. These should be both National Council staff and denominational people on the boards of the units.
   An early consultation should be held to review what is now in process and what major programs should be instituted. Hopefully, certain units would take responsibility for specific areas of work.

2. A Committee on the Mississippi Delta. Growing out of concerns in the Commission and certain of the Negro action groups, this project should be reserched and explored immediately. This committee should be composed mainly of Home Missions, Life and Work, Christian Education, and Church World Service interests.

3. A liaison committee with members of the General Secretary's Staff Council.

Denominational Race Committees and Staff

It is imperative that we maintain close and effective working relationships with these new or renewed areas of work in the various commissions.

It is difficult to know how to structure this. To be really integrated, denominational staff people in race relations should all be represented on the aforementioned committees. Their work cuts across the gamut of the Commission's work. In addition, there are peculiar tasks that each communion must do for itself that must be carried on separately.

The larger community action projects, however, can only be carried on effectively interdenominationally and therefore need the direction of the Commission. It is not desirable that everything should be so coordinated that a single program of action in race relations be achieved. At some points, individual denominations must take the lead and at others, combined action is necessary.

The channels of communication and consultation are the most important thing.

To this end, a mineographed information sheet, published bi-weekly should be established, to which denominations and Commission should report and which could be circulated.

Specially called informational meetings of race relations people do not seem particularly effective. However, meetings on specific issues, where genuine consultation is needed, should be called.

Denominational staff should be invited to Commission meetings as observers and should have a meeting of their own with Commission staff at each meeting of the Commission.

Denominational religion and race units should take it as a responsibility to recommend action to the Commission. The Commission should be free to request specific acts of cooperation from the denominations.

CHURCH CONTROL OF THE STATE?

BY DAVID LAWRENCE

THE PURPOSE of the recent "March on Washington" was to influence public opinion and especially to persuade the Congress of the United States to pass certain legislation covered in the so-called "civil rights" program recommended by the President.

Never before in the history of the United States have the national organizations of the Protestant, Catholic and Jewish churches, respectively, joined together to secure the passage of a particular set of laws. A spokesman for one of these organizations said the other day that, "for the first time in our nation's history, America's three great religious faiths have a common task and a common goal."

Yet only three years ago, even before the national political conventions, fears were being expressed concerning possible church influence in government. This writer said on this page on May 9, 1960:

"We are confronted today with the so-called 'religious issue' in American politics.

"Presumably this means that some citizens believe the Church could unduly influence the policies or decisions of any Roman Catholic if he were elected President of the United States.

"But what shall we say of the attempt by various churchmen of all faiths to use their positions and, indeed, their national church organizations as a means of engaging in the controversies of American politics?

"Before we are ready to decide just how much influence the Catholic Church may exert on a man elected President, we must examine some of the pronouncements from Protestant churchmen who vigorously defend the right to issue through their national organizations statements on every conceivable question of governmental policy. These range from public comments on 'integration' or 'segregation,' to denunciations of the Government of South Africa and proposals for diplomatic recognition of the Red China regime despite its record of inhumanity and aggression. Many churchmen justify their course by arguing that these are 'moral' questions—a definition broad enough to include everything political."

It was hardly foreseen three years ago that all three national church organizations would unite to participate in an organized drive, including street "demonstrations," to secure the passage of a program of legislation. The same editorial of May 1960 made this observation:

"There can be no quarrel with the right of any preacher as an individual to speak out on any question—political, legislative, moral, social or economic. But may he presume to speak for the members of his congregation? Or, in the case of a national church organization, does he speak even for all the clergymen in such an organization? And if there is to be an advisory council of laymen who are to serve as 'competent advisers' in the matter of farm legislation or any other governmental problem, are we to assume that they, too, speak 'in the name of God'?"

Not long before the above was printed, it was disclosed that the National Council of Churches, in order to be guided on national legislation, sought "competent advice and advisers—whether on a farm problem, or on international affairs, or housing, or public education, or race relations, or religious liberty."

This process, when carried on by other organizations, is called "lobbying." But, while the practice has its abuses, it is within the bounds of the Constitution. All citizens have the right to petition Congress, but, under a Constitution which provides for the separation of church and state, is it the function of the church to use its organizations to obtain the passage or defeat of laws that have no direct bearing on the operations of the churches?

The American people have a right to know the inside story of the "March on Washington," and especially what occurred in any consultations between Government officials and the leaders of national church organizations or their representatives—white or Negro—in making the arrangements for the "demonstration." Even assuming the very best of motives, the facts about any collaboration between church and state are of vital interest to the public.

Churchmen who engage in political debate take a big risk. If they consider it a "moral" obligation to participate in a "March on Washington" or to urge the passage of certain laws, they logically may find themselves endorsing publicly, not only as individuals but through their organizations, a particular candidate for the Presidency because he espouses their "moral" point of view. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People—with which the three national church organizations collaborated in the "March" of August 28—has already announced that it will participate actively in political campaigns and work for the defeat of those members of Congress who do not vote for "a strong civil-rights bill."

The subject of "segregation" or "integration" has become a political issue. All the President's proposals in his "civil rights" program are being pressed for passage in response to what is believed by its sponsors to be "public opinion." But back of it all, to no small extent, is the Administration's drive for the Negro vote —especially in the big Northern States where Republican and Democratic Party candidates vie with one another in trying to capture that bloc of votes.

Churchmen as individuals have every right to speak for or against any legislation and to endorse and campaign for any political candidate for office. But a national organization of churches in any denomination should not become involved in politics. It should not lend its prestige and influence, or participate in an organized lobby, to secure the passage of particular laws.

Many preachers, moreover, have been inclined every now and then to give priority in their sermons to discussion of specific pieces of legislation currently before Congress, though in recent years many laymen have begun to feel that the pastors are unwisely spending their time giving lectures on national issues instead of helping their parishioners to understand the difference between right and wrong in their daily lives.

One of the national church organizations—the National Council of Churches—claims to represent denominations which have 40,000,000 church members. Have these individuals been consulted about the recent activities of this national body, or is it assumed that the pastor of a church is the chosen representative of the congregation and can speak authoritatively on behalf of all his parishioners? The national spokesman of one of the three denominational groups openly declared the other day that "public opinion" on questions of governmental policy must be formed "in the pews."

Recently, clergymen not only have taken part in street "demonstrations," but some have been arrested for engaging in disorder. This participation has not been frowned upon by the national church organizations.

Discord is already appearing in some of the churches. News dispatches last week reported that the governing board of a Methodist Church in Danville, Va., censured its minister and ordered him to refrain from making remarks on racial matters from the pulpit.

Not all clergymen agree that the power to conduct a lobby has been delegated to these national church organizations by the member churches. The Reverend C. Lewis Irwin, pastor of the Covenant Presbyterian Church in Indianapolis, sent a letter to this magazine in May 1960 in which he said:

"By no stretch of the imagination can I see Christ or the apostles placing the emphasis of the Gospel on social and political agitation. It is but a step from social and political agitation to legal action, and legal action must be backed by force and police action to be legal. Here is the trouble with present 'integration agitation'—it looks to agitation rather than a change of heart. Are we seeking to run the business of the Church without the inspiration and power of the Holy Spirit? The central truth of the Gospel is its power to transform human hearts by what Jesus did through His Cross, Resurrection, and outpouring of His Spirit at Pentecost. . . .

"Communism is essentially 'man's mind in control' —and relying on force because it has not the secret of changing human nature. Social and political agitation tend to veer in this same direction because it no longer trusts in God's power to change the heart—and so it plays into the hands of Communism."

On the same point, Billy Graham, a Protestant evangelist, in an Easter message in April 1960 said:

"The Bible also recognizes that each individual has the right to choose his own friendships and social relationships. I am convinced that forced integration will never work. You cannot make two races love each other and accept each other at the point of bayonets. It must come from the heart if it is to be successful. Otherwise, we can build walls of hatred and prejudice that will take generations to overcome.

"Christ said that our problems came from within: 'Out of the heart are the issues of life.' The Supreme Court can make all the decisions it feels are necessary; but, unless they are implemented by good will, love and understanding, great harm will be done."

This writer concluded the editorial of May 9, 1960, on church and state relationships as follows:

"May a layman write an addendum? Churchmen who engage in politics lose the confidence of laymen and tend to become partisans rather than objective instrumentalities of spiritual help. Unquestionably, God's guidance to the individual is the inspiration we must depend upon for a solution to human problems. Guidance comes as we seek it, and the stimulus to individual communion with God is available to all of us through our respective faiths.

"Church and state are separated by mandate of our Constitution. The co-operation, however, of churchmen and other citizens in a community to improve the social welfare of the people is, of course, desirable and proper. But let us remember from the Book of Mark the advice that Jesus gave to the Pharisees:

" 'Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's.' "

SOCIAL MINISTRY

The Lutheran Church in America is a new church body which came into existence in July, 1962. There has not been opportunity, therefore, for this church to issue convention approved statements on race relations. Predecessor church bodies have spoken forthrightly on this matter. Moreover, in the midst of the present crisis in race relations, the Executive Council, the president and many of the synods of the Lutheran Church in America have set forth their testimony. In addition, through its representatives to the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., the Lutheran Church in America has participated in the actions of that common agency of the churches. The staff of the Board of Social Ministry has compiled the following statements as a representative sampling of the church's convictions. It should be emphasized that the church must act as well as speak if what has been said is to be an encouragement in the struggle for justice. Additional copies of this study report are available from the Board of Social Ministry. Please address requests to the Rev. L. William Youngdahl, Secretary for Community and Cultural Affairs.

STATEMENTS ON RACE RELATIONS

Statement Adopted by the Executive Council, Lutheran Church in America, June 28, 1963

WHEREAS the Church of Jesus Christ must heed God's call to practice love and justice in human relations; and

WHEREAS predecessor church bodies of the Lutheran Church in America have expressed themselves against the evils of segregation and discrimination on the basis of race (Augustana Lutheran Church — 1948, 1956; The United Lutheran Church in America — 1952, 1956, 1958); and

WHEREAS action compatible with the Christian responsibility for love and justice is necessary; Therefore be it

RESOLVED, That the Executive Council, acting in behalf of the Lutheran Church in America:

1. affirm the 1952 statement of The United Lutheran Church in America and the 1956 statement of the Augustana Lutheran Church, regarding race relations, pending a pronouncement by a convention of the church on this matter;
2. declare its conviction that any segregation or discrimination on the basis of race in the congregations, agencies and institutions of the church is in violation of God's will;
3. commit itself to work for eradication of such segregation and discrimination wherever they may exist;
4. call on the congregations, synods, institutions, boards, commissions and auxiliaries of the church to develop within their assigned areas of responsibility programs of self-examination and action leading to justice in race relations;
5. urge members of the congregations to initiate and support efforts at reconciliation between the races in their communities and to support proper legislation designed to assure equal opportunity for all citizens in housing, education, employment, voting, and access to all facilities serving the public; and
6. authorize and request the president of the church to send to all the ministers of the LCA and their congregations, a pastoral letter expressing the conviction and concern of the church on the fundamental moral issues of love and justice in race relations.

A STUDY REPORT ISSUED BY THE STAFF OF THE BOARD OF SOCIAL MINISTRY
LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA
231 MADISON AVENUE,
NEW YORK 16, NEW YORK

STUDY REPORT, NUMBER 2, SEPTEMBER, 1963

Letter from the President of the Lutheran Church in America

July 8, 1963

Dear fellow-pastor:

I am grateful to the Executive Council for permitting, and indeed encouraging me to write a straightforward pastoral letter to you on the Christian attitude toward our neighbors of other races. The implications of the Gospel in this regard are so plain that, theologically, a letter like this is superfluous. I can hardly imagine that a single man in the ministry of our church is unclear on that score. If he is, I confess that I have grave doubts either about his perceptiveness as to what the Word of God teaches or about the state of his Christian obedience. The good that my words are intended to accomplish is to help us to strengthen and if necessary awaken, one another and, beyond that, to arouse each of us to action.

My colleagues on the Executive Council and I regret that its action and this letter will seem to have been prompted by the current racial crisis in the United States. That is true only on the surface. The position we are expressing now has not been wrung from us reluctantly by recent or impending events. We say what we say because it is intrinsically right. It represents the firm, and in my case intense, conviction of our minds and hearts.

No secular motivation powerful as it is, accounts either for the fact of my writing or the substance of what I write. Not the devastating effect of racial inequality within the United States on its image abroad — which has made me cringe a thousand times as I have seen it in all parts of the world and which vitiates its aspiration to a role of moral leadership. Not the inconsistency of America's almost self-righteous support of national independence and full civil rights for colored peoples overseas at the same time that it flagrantly fails to see the beam in its own eye at home. Not even the "natural rights" on which the whole theory of democracy rests.

The position that Christians take on race has spiritual roots. It arises directly out of our view of God and of man; and belongs to the essence of our faith. It is accusingly simple and brooks no disagreement. Men, created by God and redeemed by Christ, are equals and are meant to be brothers. No man is a hair's breadth above or below another in God's affection nor can he be in a Christian's regard. Any disabilities on the basis of race within the Christian family are evil. They are an affront to the Lord and a sign of deviation from Him.

We all agree on this. The time has come to act.

What it means for the congregation of which you are a pastor or the institution in which you carry on your ministry is plain. The doors must be open to all. Everyone who is otherwise eligible, by faith or scholastic attainments or need, should be welcomed to full membership or enrollment as a student or admission as a patient or guest on an equal basis with the people of the majority race. Not only that, the church must be more than passively ready to receive those who come. It is bound in conscience, it is under the command of its Lord, to seek souls. Every congregation ought to do so without any discrimination because of the color of a man's skin. I believe this vigorously and practice it myself. I call on you to do so too.

Our obligation goes much further in civic affairs, as the Executive Council's statement points out emphatically in its fifth resolution. I commend it to you earnestly without attempting to elaborate it. The deficiency of which you and I have most frequently been guilty is not in the mind; we know what we ought to do. Nor in the heart; our sympathies are on the side of those who have too long been deprived of equality of treatment. Our fault, which we ought not tolerate in ourselves any longer, has been in the will. Under God, the time has come to act and to lead others by precept and example.

All of this is not very spectacular, measured in present-day terms. It will taste too much for some like staid Lutheran conservatism. But do not let anyone dismiss this charge to his soul as weak or having an uncertain sound.

I trust the power of Law and Gospel. The Lord trusts you.

Fraternally yours,

/s/ Franklin Clark Fry

Excerpts of a Statement by the Augustana Lutheran Church, 1958, p. 387

"a. We reaffirm the position of our Church, that all people have equal rights before God, and are entitled to equal opportunities.

"b. We counsel our members to exercise love and understanding in all their dealings with persons of minority groups.

"c. We urge our members to use their influence in the securing of full rights of citizenship for all, and in discouraging any activity in their communities which would seek to circumvent orderly judicial procedure in the implementation of the Supreme Court decisions of segregation.

"d. We commend those who have sought to oppose wrong by non-violent means.

"e. We recognize that the evils of racial discrimination are not restricted to any one section of the nation, and we encourage our people to oppose all forms of racial discrimination whether they be found in the North or in the South.

"f. We point out to our members, especially those in the northern states, that discrimination in housing, real estate transactions, and employment is just as much a violation of Christian principles as discrimination in places of public assembly, public transportation or schools.

"g. We again encourage our congregations to include all unchurched persons in their communities in their programs of evangelism without distinction as to race, color, or national origin.

"h. We particularly commend those congregations who have refused to abandon communities where major population shifts have brought large numbers of non-white persons into the vicinity of their churches."

Excerpts of a Statement by The United Lutheran Church in America, 1952, pp. 790-92

"Consistent Christian living requires that men shall seek to accord to each other the observance of the following rights and their matching responsibilities:

"1. To possess and to respect the life and dignity of the human person as a child of God for whom Christ died.

"2. To worship God without human distinctions in the Church, the Body of Christ.

"3. To develop his God-given talents through education and cultural pursuits in order to use these talents in answer to God's call.

"4. To establish a home in living space and housing conducive to a wholesome family life.

"5. To occupy the place in economic life for which he is individually fitted, being free to advance therein on the basis of character and ability.

"6. To share the privileges and obligations of community life, having equal access to all public services, including those related to health, education, recreation, social welfare, and transportation, and receiving equal consideration from persons and institutions serving the public.

"7. To exercise one's citizenship in elections and all the other processes of government, having freedom for inquiry, discussion and peaceful assembly, and receiving police protection and equal consideration and justice in the courts."

Excerpts of Actions by Synods of the Lutheran Church in America

Central Pennsylvania Synod, June 5, 1963

Meeting on this historic and hallowed ground on the eve of the observance of the centennial of a battle in which brother fought against brother involving the issue of human rights; and

WHEREAS, in the light of the Christian Faith, the Church ought to help its people by offering a common witness to guide the individual conscience; we, the representatives of the Central Pennsylvania Synod of the Lutheran Church in America, assembled in our Second Annual Convention, do hereby solemnly affirm and commend the following principles for a policy of social action to the pastors and members of all congregations within the territory of the synod.

Be it resolved that we:

1. Confess before God those multiple prejudices and sinful attitudes that block the way to the Christian establishment of harmony among the people of our communities and assume our personal and corporate responsibility for our actions toward those persons who differ from us;
2. Welcome persons, without regard to heredity or environment, to the services of worship, to participate in activities of the congregation, and to membership in the Church;
3. Promote residential opportunities which will demonstrate our ethical responsibility to insure that men actually enjoy the right freely to establish their homes;
4. Encourage the employment, by our several constituencies: namely, our boards, agencies, congregations and our members in their daily lives, of qualified persons regardless of their race or national origin;
5. Encourage all institutions within our society to remove those membership restrictions that derive from sinful motives;
6. Encourage the integration of all recreational facilities within our communities;

7. Exercise our privilege of citizenship in a free society to insure justice for all men, and to move personally beyond the realm of justice to permit the love of God to recreate our relationships with Him and all persons;
8. Give support and encouragement to those in positions, and to those with opportunities, to act responsibly in the implementation of civil rights in all areas of our common life.

And, be it further resolved, that the Board of Social Ministry, cooperating with other boards and agencies of the synod, assist and counsel the pastors, the church councils, and members of congregations in their efforts to improve human relationships in their local situations.

Illinois Synod, May 22, 1963

RESOLVED, that the Illinois Synod in convention assembled adopt the social action statement* of the Executive Board dated April 17, 1963, on open occupancy as reflecting the conviction of this Synod, and be it further resolved, that the Secretary of the Synod be instructed to communicate to our legislators that portion of the statement which reads "encourage our members to take specific steps to help end segregation in housing as well as other areas by doing the following: to work for such constructive changes and for public support of democratically enacted laws which conform to Christian standards," and further, be it resolved that the actual count of those for and those against this action of Synod be recorded. The motion was carried by a vote of 361 to 0.

*The Executive Board statement reads as follows:

Lutherans view the issue of human relations in the light of Christian faith which declares that Christ came to give His life for the sin of the world and to help all men live new lives in conformity with the will of God.

Lutherans further believe that God created one human family and that all men, regardless of their race, color, culture, class or regional background, are thus inseparably related and bound together.

In light of these truths, Christian faith requires that men shall seek to accord to each other the observance of the following mutual rights and their corresponding responsibilities:

To alert all members to the political and spiritual dangers involved in racial prejudice, especially in the areas of housing, employment, education, recreation and access to social welfare services:

To remind our people that open occupancy describes a community climate of opinion which permits people to buy and rent housing freely in any areas where their means will permit without regard to race, religion, or national origin:

To encourage our members to take specific steps to help end segregation in housing as well as other areas by doing the following:

1. Organize discussion and study groups to examine facts, review policies, and take action.
2. Declare themselves as individuals and as parishes to take a stand against segregation.
3. Declare their position to public school administrators, political leaders, newspapers, real estate operators, etc.
4. To work for such constructive changes and for public support of democratically enacted laws which conform to Christian standards.

Maryland Synod, May 27, 1963

WHEREAS the voice of the Church should be heard and the moral force of the Church should be directed to effective action in the present state of critical development in the establishment of civil rights, and;

WHEREAS constitutional guarantees of civil rights must be supported by moral conviction and personal acceptance in order that such guarantees may be effective in providing a favorable climate for the development of a true community of justice and love, and

WHEREAS the ultimate basis of right human relations is inherent in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man as revealed in the love of God in Christ, therefore

Be it resolved:

That this Convention urge the pastors and members of congregations of the Synod to provide a Christian witness;

1. By proclaiming within our congregations and in our communities the moral imperatives of the Christian faith in matters of civil rights, and
2. By giving all possible encouragement and support to those in positions of importance and opportunity for the implementation of civil rights, such as employers, members of policy-making boards and committees in business and in community affairs; personnel in critical positions in determining practice concerning housing accommodations, educational facilities, and employment and service in restaurants, hotels, and motels, and

3. By clear public declaration of the basis of membership in congregations of the Maryland Synod as nondiscriminatory with respect to race, and
4. By calling upon Christian people especially within our congregations to pray for God's help and guidance in fulfilling the purpose set forth in this resolution.
5. By including this statement of Christian witness in the minutes of this Convention, in published reports and news releases of the Convention, and in the materials provided to delegates for reports on this Convention to congregations.

Michigan Synod, May 5, 1963

"We deplore the conditions existing in these United States which deny some of God's children equality and a sense of personal dignity and again urge the church to again witness to its concern."

Minnesota Synod, June 5, 1963

Resolved, That the President of Synod convey to the President of the United States the well wishes of this assembly for efforts made to raise the status of American Negroes and other minority groups to that of first class citizens;

Be it further resolved that the President of Synod convey to the President of the United States the hopes of this assembly that he will use the powers and influences of his high office to assure every American citizen that his rights under the Constitution will be guaranteed.

New England Synod, May 26, 1963

"Recognizing the deep involvement of the United States in the current controversy over segregation which is at its root a moral crisis, we call upon all congregations and Christian people to exercise the fullness of our Christian concern to expedite its resolution. Therefore, at this time we wish to restate and reaffirm the resolutions accepted by predecessor synods in 1948, 1951, and 1956."

New Jersey Synod, May 27, 1963

God's creative deed, Christ's redeeming life and cross, Scripture's declarative witness and our basic theological affirmations testify that all men bear the image of God. This implies a sacred pricelessness to individual worth and an equality of status before God which must be expressed in all human relationships.

To deny to any man because of his color, culture, or class the endowments which are his by divine activity—worth and equality—is to offend God. Yet white American Christians have been guilty of that offense because of their open support, or apathy toward, racial prejudice.

Therefore, the New Jersey Synod in convention assembled calls upon its member congregations:

1. To confess their sin and guilt before God and to accept his forgiveness;
2. To work in their corporate lives to establish inclusive fellowship in their memberships, and so in their worship, study, and social activities;
3. To work in their communities to accomplish:
   a. Equal job opportunities;
   b. Inclusive schools;
   c. Open occupancy in all communities.

Ohio Synod, May 22, 1963

Resolution on Housing: The following resolution on housing was adopted and forwarded to Governor James A. Rhodes: "The Ohio Synod of the Lutheran Church in America in annual convention, May 22, at Springfield, voted to urge the legislature of the State of Ohio to enact into law legislation which shall make discrimination in housing illegal."

Pacific Southwest Synod, May 8, 1963

The most critical issue in our nation today is the struggle for justice and equal opportunities for all persons. Manifestations of segregation exist in the communities of our Synod. For these we are deeply penitent and must seek justice in our communities, showing forth the fruits of repentance.

A particular form of this struggle is now taking place in Birmingham under the leadership of Dr. Martin Luther King.

THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED

1. That the Pacific Southwest Synod in this Convention observe a period of prayers for those who seek justice and those who still withhold it.

2. That a telegram be sent to Dr. King expressing our Christian concern and asking if Synod can be of specific assistance to the movement he represents.
3. That the President of Synod, in consultation with the Synodical Board of Social Ministry, be empowered to take appropriate action following receipt of Dr. King's reply.

Southeastern Synod, April 30, 1963

That inasmuch as:

The church is the Body of Christ;

The church is a universal fellowship;

Its mission is not to reflect the cultural values of society but to make manifest the mind of Christ;

It is the Holy Spirit who creates the church and determines who shall be a part of it; and

Our church buildings are not our possession but houses of God;

We can rightly make no restrictions on the basis of race in the membership, the worship, and the outreach of service of our congregations. We ought to be repentantly aware that inconsistencies existing between our faith and our practice deny the very nature of the church and give moral sanction to a pattern of racial discrimination in society. We must strive to remove these inconsistencies for our own sakes and for the honor of Christ's name.

We recommend to our congregations that they do now what is possible for them to eliminate discrimination in their own life by developing an inclusive ministry and striving for racial justice in the communities where they witness.

Western Pennsylvania/West Virginia Synod, June 12, 1963

"Be it hereby resolved that the pastors and councils of the member churches of the Western Pennsylvania-West Virginia Synod make their congregations centers of positive action in the local community:

"1. To confess our failure and ask God's forgiveness.

"2. To recognize in the local church that the essential dignity and equality of all men are the same — determined by God's creative act — and not by the color of a man's skin or his social position.

"3. To bring this Christian witness to bear in all areas of the local community."

Excerpts of an Action Taken by the General Board of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. on June 7, 1963 Leading to the Establishment of the Commission on Religion and Race

The mounting tide of vigorous action to secure full civil rights for all American citizens has at long last moved into the center of this nation's attention and has precipitated an unmistakable crisis.

The crisis must be seen as having three aspects which are distinguishable but intertwined:

— a crisis involving the entire nation and the fundamental concepts of freedom and justice that are integral to American democracy;

— a crisis involving the entire religious community of the nation and the deepest convictions concerning our common humanity and the inescapable obligation to act always out of respect and compassion for our fellowmen;

— a crisis involving the obedience of the Church to its Lord Jesus Christ, and therefore involving the integrity of the Church as the agent of God's reconciling purpose in his world.

The Church of Jesus Christ can make no compromise with discrimination against or segregation of peoples on the basis of race, and still be faithful to her Master. God came to make his dwelling among men in the person of a man. He went to his death and rose again for every man.

It must also be said that while many Christians have worked hard in this cause, the Church has not been free from sin in this serious issue. Many churches are closed to Negroes and other ethnic minorities; church institutions discriminate, and we have not taken vigorous enough action in the public domain.

Up to now there always has seemed to be time for gradual change, and modest tokens of progress in racial justice were accepted as the best we could do.

But now, in the providence of God, the issue is being sharply focused in every corner of the nation. Negro citizens, in action groups, and spontaneously, aided by some white fellow citizens, are moving quickly and with great commitment to action that often means suffering, harassment and sometimes death.

The basic issue has not changed, but it is becoming more obvious to the nation as a whole. It is one issue which the conscience of America must face as a moral challenge.

As the demands for equal treatment take shape in the struggles in Oxford and Birmingham and Huntsville, Chicago, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, and New York and in almost every city in the country, the entire nation is faced with the threat of violence and a developing mood of frustration.

Negro citizens begin to suspect that they will have to bear the brunt of pain alone. Many white citizens feel that there is no way in which they can be effective in changing their own communities quickly enough to meet the rightful demands of Negroes for full citizenship.

There is a growing consensus that this summer may be a decisive period in American history for beginning to deal with this haunting sin. The world watches to see how we will act — whether with courage or with fumbling expediency.

In such a time the Church of Jesus Christ is called upon to put aside every lesser engagement, to confess her sins of omission and delay, and to move forward to witness to her essential belief that every child of God is a brother to every other.

Now is the time for action — even costly action that may jeopardize the organizational goals, and institutional structures of the Church, and may disrupt any fellowship that is less than fully obedient to the Lord of the Church. Increasing numbers of Christians who are moved to witness to their convictions in this crisis may suffer personal indignities, alienation and physical suffering. But this may be the price required for the tardy obedience of Christ's people.

Words and declarations are no longer useful in this struggle unless accompanied by sacrifice and commitment.

Therefore we recommend that the General Board authorize four specific actions as implementation of this intention on the part of Protestant and Orthodox Christians in this hour of decision:

1. To invite Roman Catholic and Jewish ecumenical leadership to share with us in action to aid in desegregation of American life, where possible in association with the Continuing Committee on Religion and Race.

2. To urge every member communion to impress upon its people the serious nature of the present hour, and to press vigorously for their involvement in every phase of the struggle for justice including negotiation and demonstration. In order to do this in good faith, we call every communion and all units of the National Council of Churches to examine their structures and practices in order to eliminate discrimination and injustice within the church.

3. As the first actions of a continuing strategy of corporate witness:

   A. To commit ourselves, as members of the General Board, to engage personally in negotiations, demonstrations, and other direct action in particular situations of racial tension.

   B. To invite Roman Catholic and Jewish leadership to join us in making a united presentation before congressional committees on the subject of civil rights legislation.

   C. To issue a call to Protestant and Orthodox church leaders and an invitation to religious leaders of all faiths to assemble in Washington as soon as is strategic. The purposes of this assembly shall be:

      (1) To demonstrate our solidarity in support of racial justice implemented through civil rights legislation;

      (2) To witness to the fact that this is a national moral issue and not a regional problem.

Each communion would devise the matter of communicating this invitation and making arrangements in Washington for its own constituency.

4. In order to insure appropriate attention to the immediate and long-term aspects of the crisis, the General Board requests the President of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America, immediately to appoint a Commission on Religion and Race. This Commission shall have the following purposes:

   To focus the concern, the conviction, the resources and the action of the member communions in issues of religion and race;

   To provide a national interdenominational liaison with interfaith and other concerted efforts;

   To focus and mobilize the resources of the units of the National Council of Churches;

   To assist the nation to see this crisis in its moral dimension.

In order to begin to fulfill these purposes, the Commission shall call on the councils of churches and councils of church women and of church men in every state and major city in the United States to arrange as soon as possible a consultation and demonstration in that state or city designed to develop the next steps in establishing racial justice and to witness to our determination that the church shall be fully involved in a continuing effort to change the segregated pattern of American life. When possible, the council of churches should arrange with the Roman Catholic and Jewish leadership to be full participants in the consultation and demonstrations. All communions are urged to facilitate full cooperation of their judicatories in the city or state. In cities where there is no council willing or able to give leadership to this effort, the Commission shall work with such religious leaders of these communities as will accept this responsibility.

The General Board authorizes this Commission to make commitments, call for actions, take risks in behalf of the National Council of Churches which are required by the situation and are consistent both with the substance and the implications of the actions and decisions of the National Council of Churches in the area of religion and race. The authorization to the Commission includes:

1. The encouragement of negotiations, demonstrations and direct action in places of particular crisis.
2. The mobilization of resources to encourage legislative and executive acts in order to bring dignity, equality, and justice to all Americans.
3. The mobilization of the resources of the churches in order to put their own house in order by desegregating all of the institutions of the church.
4. The development and implementation of long-term plans and strategies so that a continuing design of action will move us steadily towards the moral goal of full human rights for all.
5. The formation of a call to state and local councils of churches to take such immediate action to aid in the expediting of the spirit of this paper as seems best at this time.

Atlanta Exploratory Ministry

Interracial Christian Fellowship

Rel-Sou

Foreword and Minutes

First Meeting - Atlanta, Georgia - October 2, 1963

Convener - Rev. Richard S. McCarroll

Foreword

The advance planning for the project is indicated on the headquarters contacts and communications of Rev. G. Daniel Little, Associate Director of the Department of Urban Church, for UPUSA Board of National Missions. He referred in his letter of July 25, 1963 to Rev. Charles W. Talley, Executive of the UPUSA Synod of Atlantic, to a tentative project description written earlier in Charlotte, while both were together there. Copies of the typed draft were enclosed, but Mr. Little emphasized that the project should be "the result of thinking in the local judicatory.... The Presbytery [Knox-Hodge] committee should develop its own proposal making use of this as a basis, if it is useful." (A copy is attached.)

At the National Staff meeting of the UPUSA Board of National Missions in Chicago on September 16-18, 1963, it was agreed by the staff of the Department of Urban Church (George Todd, Director, and G. Daniel Little, Associate Director) and the Department of New Church Development (Harold F. Fredsell, Director and Richard S. McCarroll, Associate Director) that Richard S. McCarroll should convene the first meeting of the proposed inter-racial fellowship in Atlanta on October 2, 1963, at 4:00 P.M. in the Covenant (UPUSA) Church. In the capacity he was authorized to substitute on this occasion for G. Daniel Little and this was endorsed by David Ramage as the Chairman of the Division of Church Strategy and Development. Upon Mr. McCarroll's suggestion, representatives of the Synod of Mid-South and of the Presbytery of Chattanooga were asked to participate in the meeting and project. Subsequently, in Atlanta, Richard S. McCarroll invited both headquarters and Presbytery of Atlanta staff personnel of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.

A field tour and study of new church possibilities in white, Negro, and bi-racial areas of Atlanta were also scheduled for Mr. McCarroll. October 1-2 were reserved for working with Synod of Mid-South and Presbytery of Chattanooga representatives, and October 3-4 for Synod of Atlantic and Presbytery of Knox-Hodge representatives. All persons to be involved in these two surveys were requested to share in the inter-racial meeting. The arrangements for the meeting and tours were outlined in Mr. McCarroll's letter of September 26, 1963 (attached).

Minutes

The meeting was convened at the Covenant Church in Atlanta, on October 2, 1963, somewhat after 4:00 P.M. The representatives of the Presbyterian US-UPUSA denominations considering comity relationships in the Atlanta area adjourned and reconvened with the Synod of Atlantic group for consideration of an inter-racial Christian fellowship.

Those present comprised the following:

Board of Church Extension, Pr. U.S.

Rev. John R. Smith, Director of Urban Church
Rev. Lawrence W. Bottoms, Director for Negro Work
(Excused - Mr. Hal Hyde, Director for Survey and New Church)

The background for the calling of this meeting was presented by Mr. McCarroll. Quotations were given from G. Daniel Little's project description and letters. The discussion covered, as was intended, a wide range of subject matter regarding purposes, procedures, representation, staff, budget, and future dates. The following plans were agreed upon unanimously:

1. The basic and initial representation for planning should include at least the National Board, Synod, and Presbytery representatives of the UPUSA and Presbyterian U.S. denominations, and the UPUSA pastors of Atlanta.

2. The next meeting, with the above representation, should be scheduled for October 18, October 26, November 1, or November 7, at the Covenant Church in Atlanta, at 1:00 P.M. (Thursday, November 7, was the date approved by G. Daniel Little).

3. A broader meeting to invite all Presbyterian pastors of Atlanta to come if interested, in addition to the official group listed above, would presumably be the next step.

4. A larger meeting to include 1-2 laymen and pastors from all interested U.S. and UPUSA churches in addition to the official group listed above, would probably be the succeeding step.

Project Description for Atlanta Exploratory Ministry

G. Daniel Little

Background: Atlanta is the fastest growing city in the South, the center of transportation, culture and commerce. It has achieved some progress in race relations. It is a center for many civil rights groups. The United Presbyterian Church has three churches in Atlanta: one large white church (Covenant); one thriving Negro church in a fast-growing middle to upper income housing area; and one very small and weak church in a low income area.

These three churches do not constitute in amount of ministry or in kind the full responsibility or opportunity for United Presbyterian mission in Atlanta, in this time of rapid growth and social crisis.

The 1960 census reports that 487,455 people live in Atlanta.

Project Purpose: To explore the possible directions of an inclusive Christian community in the Atlanta area. As with a traditional congregation, the community would provide nurture for its members and would engage in mission to individuals, groups and corporate structures.

The community would not necessarily develop into a traditional new church development project, though that would be one of the possible directions to be explored.

Project Committee: As a first step a committee would be appointed by the Knox-Hodge Presbytery to undertake the early stages of the ministry, and to guide it through its exploratory period.

This committee would work with and supervise the full-time staff of the project. Until displaced by a permanent integrated Christian community, it would conduct the project in its policy and development.

This committee would be composed of a representative or representatives of the Presbytery National Missions Committee, laymen and/or ministers of the Covenant and Radcliffe Churches, the Atlantic Synod Field Representative, and a staff member of the Board of National Missions, ex officio.

This committee would recommend to the Presbytery through its Ministerial Relations Committee a candidate to become the full-time ministerial staff of the project.

Staff: An ordained minister would be called as Director of the Exploratory ministry. He must be aware of the social crisis of our time, be able to articulate the Christian Gospel, and be able to communicate with a wide variety of persons and groups. He must have a zeal for renewal in the Church, in all parts of its life. He must have the ability to be secure in an initially unstructured and experimental project.

Terms of Call: The minister would be responsible to the Project Committee, which will be responsible to the Presbytery National Missions Committee.

Salary.....($5,200)

Housing Allowance...($1,200)

Travel Allowance....($ 250)

Project program
expenses.....($ 750)

Terminal date and Review: The project will have an exploratory period of at least two years. It will begin October 1, 1963 and end September 30, 1965. There will be a formal evaluation and review after the first four months, and each six months thereafter. This review will be conducted with the project committee, by the Presbytery National Missions Committee or its representatives and by persons from BNM-DUC and/or personnel from the Special Committee on Religion and Race.

Schedule:

1. Explore possible committee members--appointment by Presbytery.

2. Committee meets--specifies general approaches--first steps.

3. Project description--agreed upon by Presbytery, Synod, Board of National Missions.

4. Establishment of financial arrangements.

5. Hire staff.

6. Full scale operation.

Fredsell, Little, Ramage

To: ATLANTIC SYNOD
Talley, Mercer, Ellis, Henderson
Fredsell, Little, Ramage

This letter is being dictated over the telephone in my absence from the office, because of a cold, but I wanted arrangements to be clarified for all concerned in ample time. Meanwhile, Harold Fredsell has telephoned Atlanta so that Messrs. Brand and Lindsay will know about arrangements; and he learned that Marion Mansell had thoughtfully made contact already.

The purpose and schedule for the trip are basically as follows:

Oct. 1-2, Tues.-Wed. Tour of possible New Church fields for Chattanooga Presbytery, Mid-South Synod.

Oct. 2, Wed., 4 PM Meeting at Northminster UPUSA for representatives of both Mid-South and Atlantic Synods to discuss informally the promotion of an Inter-racial Christian Fellowship, as outlined previously by Daniel Little of the Department of Urban Church. Those to attend should include all involved in the two respective New Church Development field tours.

Oct. 3-4, Thurs,-Fri. Tour of possible New Church fields for Knox-Hodge Presbytery, Atlantic Synod.

(Travel details omitted from mimeographed copies.) If there are laymen or other committee members who are involved at some time, then we leave this to those of you in Atlanta to make arrangements. Also, there should be some plan for conferring with the U.S. Presbytery executive (Dr. Bonneau H. Dickson).

To Atlantic Synod: Kindly note the arrangements for meeting Wed., Oct. 2, at 4 PM, at Northminster Church re the inter-racial program. We should start our field tour on Thursday morning at whatever time you set. We will rely largely on Mr. Mercer for guidance on the tour, but we do want the National Missions Chairman and all the Presbytery and Synod men present if at all possible.

Sincerely,

Richard S. McCarroll
Associate Director, New Church Development

5. Two financial measures were listed. First, the budget and staff allowances outlined previously should be viewed as open to further consideration. Second, an appropriation should be assured to provide for travel and incidental expenses for meetings and committees and other costs, to be available to both field staff and others as supplementary allowances beyond their own expense budgeting.

New Church Development

Synod of Atlantic

Atlanta Metropolitan Area

October 2-3, 1963

Following the first meeting for projecting an interracial Christian fellowship, held in Atlanta on October 2, 1963, a conference was held on October 3 in the interests of new church development. This was in accordance with the plans outlined in a September 26, 1963 letter of Rev. Richard S. McCarroll, Associate Director of the Department of New Church Development of the UPUSA Board of National Missions. The communication was addressed jointly to the Synod of Atlantic and the Synod of Mid-South.

The October 3 conference included the following: Rev. Charles W. Talley, Executive Synod of Atlantic, Rev. William Henderson, Synod N.M. chairman, (Excused - Rev. John M. Ellis, Knox-Hodge Presbytery N.M. Chairman), Rev. William S. Mercer, Radcliffe Memorial, Atlanta, and Rev. Richard S. McCarroll, Associate Director, Department New Church Development.

The field tour of the west side of Atlanta on October 3 was made by only Mr. Mercer and Mr. McCarroll, after the others left Atlanta.

The basic material for use in surveying new church opportunities was the four page paper, by Rev. J. Oscar McCloud of Raleigh, North Carolina, entitled "The Atlanta Area as a Place for a United Presbyterian Work" (attached). This was supplemented by the July 25, 1963 memo of Rev. G. Daniel Little, Associate Director of the Department of Urban Church, addressed to Rev. Harold F. Fredsell, Director of the Department of New Church Development and Building Aid on "New Church Opportunities in Atlanta" (attached). (Correspondence about the availability of the Woodlawn Presbyterian Church (U.S.) was reviewed, but Mr. McCarroll ascertained that it had been sold in September 1963 to a Baptist group.)

The staff of the Presbyterian Church, U.S., were contacted and kept informed of our thinking. They indicated that their work on Negro areas was limited to three churches, one on the west side and two on the east side. They also affirmed their involvement with their three churches serving the Negro people and therefore that they were not now prepared to undertake new church work in similar areas. As the UPUSA representative for staff, Mr. McCarroll responded that we were not ready to begin a new field in the immediate future but would want to start such as soon as a suitable opportunity could be found and financial underwriting assured within the denomination. It was agreed among the representatives of the two Presbyterian denominations that the unusual challenges and problems of this type of field would necessitate a very mutual exchange of data on survey and specific planning. Inasmuch as the Presbytery of Atlanta staff covers all Presbyterian U.S. work within its borders, the UPUSA synods and presbyteries serving the area were urged to maintain direct contacts with that judicatory.

The more promising areas are those Southwest and Northwest of the Radcliffe Memorial Church. A good future area and one with the best demarcation from Radcliffe Church would be that to the Southwest, where north-south and east-west limited access and other major roads could provide a non-competitive parish of new homes.

The specific steps putlined by Mr. McCarroll to Mr. Mercer (and also to survey personnel of the Presbytery of Chattanooga) are as follows:

(1) Spot maps of the membership of the Radcliffe Memorial and the nearest Presbyterian, U.S., congregation should be secured and studied by the two denominational representatives. Later this could be done for the two east side Presbyterian, U.S., Churches. See item "3" below for guidance on preparing maps.

(2) Zone or parish circle groups should be established or strengthened for greater outreach and visitation intensified in the outlying areas. At least in the case of Radcliffe Memorial, the intimation could be made that new families from outlying areas might join there with the understanding that they would be encouraged to transfer their membership if and when a new Presbyterian church is started.

(3) A house-to-house census should be made from time to time of growing or changing areas. Volunteers could be enlisted for spare time service or a massive effort on a selected day. If 30 teams or individuals make 20 or more calls on a Sunday afternoon they will reach 600 homes. Students might be available from sociological or survey or other classes in Morehouse College, or Clark College, or Columbia Seminary, or the Interdenominational Theological Center. Or a delegation of ministers, laymen, or older young people from other Presbyterian Churches in Atlanta (US-UPUSA) or in Knox-Hodge Presbytery could do much in a day or on varied dates. Personnel should not have to be paid but this might prove to be the only alternative provided the scope and follow-up were clearly defined. Consult "A Guide for the Development of a New Church," chapter IV and the "Field Survey" supplement for guidance. The proper cards and instruction are necessary to secure data that will be valid and helpful.

(4) General survey study, assembling of population and housing data, and map work will be necessary to reach a decision locally about the need for a new church. This is vital to make a sound presentation for approval by the Presbytery, Synod and Board of National Missions. Comity consideration must be effected with the Presbyterian Church, U.S. Mr. McCarroll's suggestion is that any Synod or National staff personnel that can be enlisted should be used whenever able to get to Atlanta for follow-up. Also, Rev. Carroll D. Payne, who is now studying the north and northwestern edges of Atlanta for the Synod of Mid-South, can be utilized to give some guidance and a limited amount of time. Rev. Robert Muir of the Synod of Mid-South might be asked to offer some guidance on survey methods.

(5) Financial requirements to underwrite such a new project would involve site, manse, and building loans or special financing, plus probably long-term personnel and program aid.

TO: Dr. Charles W. Talley, Field Representative, Synod of Atlantic
Reverend John M. Ellis, Chairman, National Missions, Knox-Hodge Presbytery

FROM: J. Oscar McCloud, Raleigh, North Carolina

SUBJECT: The Atlanta Area As a Place For a United Presbyterian Work

On July 3, 1963, the writer went to Atlanta, Georgia to observe the factors in that community which would influence any new work which the United Presbyterian Church might initiate in that area. This writer's visit to Atlanta followed a meeting with the following persons: Dr. C. W. Talley, and the Rev. J. M. Ellis, on the afternoon of July 2. At this meeting the concerns of the National Missions Committee of Knox-Hodge Presbytery and the Field Representative with regard to the Atlanta area was made known and discussed.

In Atlanta, the writer and the Chairman of National Missions, Knox-Hodge Presbytery, were graciously received by representatives of the Radcliffe United Presbyterian Church. The two persons who proved most helpful during this visit to Atlanta were the Reverend and Mrs. W. S. Mercer. Both shared with the writer most willingly their knowledge of Atlanta and concern for the ministry of the United Presbyterian Church in that community.

The areas covered by this brief visit were: sections of the NORTHWEST, SOUTHWEST, SOUTHEAST and NORTHEAST. The main concern of this writer was then turned upon areas of the Northwest and Southwest reasons which I trust will become obvious. Briefly, what do the areas covered look like:

THE NORTHWEST: It is the southern portion of the area in which Radcliffe Church is located. This is an extremely large, and good residential neighborhood in the sense that this area is made-up largely of owner-occupied dwelling units. This area also has some of the newer housing for Negroes, it is represented by racial change in the "southeast corner" (see location of the Woodlawn Presbyterian Church (U.S.), a white congregation.)

The Northwest is being extended now some 10 miles from the Radcliffe Church by a new sub-division for Negroes. In between this sub-division and Radcliffe Church is a small settlement of whites, who show signs of uneasiness ("for sale" signs are prevalent.)

THE SOUTHWEST: This area is directly South of the Radcliffe Church, yet in many ways it is quite different. Less than three miles from Radcliffe, reached by Peyton Road, is an area of the City which is populated by some upper middle class whites (judging from the houses which are estimated to cost from $25,000-$40,000.) This is also the area of the recent and short-lived "Atlanta's Berlin Wall." This area is separated from Negro residents (Middle class) by approximately two blocks of vacant wooded land. There are few churches in the area of the SW covered by this observer. However, in the NW churches are more prevalent.

THE SOUTHEAST: To be identified by Pryor Avenue and Main Street is an area which might be characterized as a low socio-economic area. It is presently undergoing change from white to Negro. Churchwise, the area is dominated by Baptists and Pentecostal groups. In this same area are several low income housing projects for Negroes. Not too far from the Negro housing project is a white low income housing project. Judging from rental signs, this observer concluded that most of the housing in this immediate area is rental property.

THE NORTHEAST: This area can be described as a rental property area awaiting urban renewal. Although, it is in somewhat better condition than much of the housing in the Southeast.

The success of a United Presbyterian Church ministry in either of the two areas mentioned just above would depend largely upon the image the National Church has exemplified regarding such areas of our cities. However, if funds are available for the type ministry which is needed in the SOUTHEAST and NORTHEAST, the United Presbyterian Church could and should offer a real and relevant challenge to the Baptists and Pentecostal groups which have a monopoly on these areas now, especially that of the Southeast. But will the United Presbyterian Church offer such a challenge to such an area? Not if such an area is expected to support its own ministry in three, five or even 10 years.

This observer believes that the NORTHWEST and SOUTHWEST offer some of the best possibilities and potential for developing a new Presbyterian Ministry in the City of Atlanta.

The area of the NW which is identified by the Woodlawn Church can be characterized as a changing neighborhood. It is the home-owner type, presently and more recently occupied by lower middle income whites. The homes are mostly frame, consisting of five and six rooms. However, they show signs of having been well-kept and would sell for approximately $10,000-$15,000. Few churches are observed in this area. One white Presbyterian Church U.S. is located in the midst of a mixed neighborhood, which is changing, of course. Nevertheless, the information available to this writer indicated that this particular church is not seeking to minister to the Negroes in this area. The presence of a huge tent and a revival meeting sign on the church lawn indicated to this observer that this congregation may well lean toward a conservative theological "pole", which might also contribute to a "social order" conservativeness as well.

CONCLUSION: This area might be a likely one for a new United Presbyterian ministry. REASON: New people (Negroes) are coming into a good, but modest residential section, while many of the whites are still there. A Church with a good program, a multi-racial staff, and an aggressive approach might very well become the stabilizer needed here in order that this community might not go the way of all such communities -- all Negro.

The Southwest might very well be the best area to attempt to develop an inclusive ministry and congregation mainly because it is not an area undergoing any drastic change from white to Negro, or the like. Also because the people in this area are more apt to have similar educational and economic backgrounds, etc., than the people in the southeastern part of the Northwest. One thing which would need to be given serious thought regarding this area of the Southwest is that it was here that only a short time ago the "Atlanta Wall" was built. The extent to which racial tensions or fear still exist in this section needs to be considered. If such tension is still prevalent, a new United Presbyterian Project which seeks to be an inclusive fellowship might have some difficulty overcoming it, as compared to an area where tension at least has not been expressed in so obvious a way. However, this may be all the more reason why the church needs to be the church in just such places as this.

Another factor to be considered in favor of locating a new work in this area, however, is that Radcliffe might very well be cut off geographically from this area by Interstate 20 which is already under construction. (See map of lower Northwest Atlanta.)

TWO INDIVIDUALS REACT:

Mrs. W. S. Mercer believes additional United Presbyterian work in Atlanta could proper under good leadership.

She also indicated that she thought an interracial project would stand a good chance in Atlanta, and that such work might well find a "core" of interested white persons among the many organizations in the City working toward integration and civil rights: Southern Regional Council, Southern Leadership (Christian) Conference, Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, National Student Association, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (SCLC, SNCC, NSA, NAACP). This observer concurs with this observation and believes that any "special project" attempted in Atlanta should begin with the above mentioned organizations and their connected persons as prospects to be called on first.

The Reverend W. S. Mercer believes that additional United Presbyterian work in Atlanta is needed, that such could eventually be supported by the community, and that such would help the United Presbyterian image. Bill further believes that additional United Presbyterian work would eventually enhance the present United Presbyterian ministry in Atlanta.

The Reverend Mercer is willing to lend to the Presbytery National Missions Committee members of his staff who might assist the Committee by means of a "spot survey" in some of the areas of potential concern.

This writer is of the opinion that such a poll by members of the Reverend Mercer's staff could prove to be of invaluable help in this whole matter in the coming months. However, the final decision should in no case rest upon what such a poll or limited survey says.

ATLANTA is bursting at the seams in growth. Everywhere one sees concrete and bricks, and people on the move, from the City's State Capital Area to the farthest region of the City's suburbs. Signs of continued growth are everywhere present in Atlanta.

Even many of the churches in Atlanta are showing unusual concern for the above mentioned changes by seeking to provide a relevant ministry to people in a changing society. The United Presbyterian Church should not be caught sleeping in this matter.

I am of the candid opinion that Atlanta offers very good potential for a new United Presbyterian work at this time. I am further of the opinion that the United Presbyterian Church would be negligent if it does not meet this challenging opportunity with an appropriate response. This observer believes that either a special project which would attempt to make an inclusive ministry and witness or one which is directed specifically toward a particular racial group (Negro) would stand a good chance of becoming a most significant witness on the part of the United Presbyterian Church in that community.

Whatever the United Presbyterian Church attempts to do in Atlanta, one prior decision will have to be made, namely, What group or groups of people in the Atlanta area would be most amenable to the type of ministry the United Presbyterian Church wishes to provide at this time? With the proper authorities discussing and answering this question, this observer would then suggest that the following be given serious thought immediately:

A. That a more thorough survey be made immediately of two area:

1) The area disected by North Avenue, N.W. and served in part by the Woodlawn Presbyterian Church, U.S. and identified on the City map as "D".
To determine whether the area is adequately churched, and the feasibility of locating a new United Presbyterian work in the area.

2) The area West of Radcliffe reached by Gordon Road, identified on the City Map by "B". In this area a new church might well be a real service to these newcomers who are approximately 8-10 miles from the traditional Negro section and churches.
Depending on how far West such a project would be located, there is not too much "to pull on" in this area for developing an inclusive fellowship.

B. That consideration be given to the possibility of a multi-racial staff for any special project or new work which might be an attempt to develop an inclusive fellowship.

C. Because of the factors observed by this writer and discussed briefly above, this observer believes that the ADAMSVILLE AREA and the WOODLAWN AREA offer the best potential for new United Presbyterian work in Atlanta.
1) The Adamsville Area might very well serve the area of the Southwest to which our Church might wish to attempt to minister at this time.

D. That in addition to serious consideration and analysis of Mrs. Mercer's idea as to who might be the most likely immediate prospects for a special project, that COVENANT and RADCLIFFE CHURCHES be invited to lend to this effort two or three families of the respective congregations, who would be interested in venturing in this type "pioneering witness". Note: The observer has not discussed this idea with either of the two pastors who would be involved.

INTER-OFFICE CORRESPONDENCE

TO Harold Fredsell July 25, 1963
FROM G. Daniel Little
RE: New Church Development Opportunities in Atlanta

I was in Atlanta, Georgia on the weekend of July 13-14. I got fairly acquainted with the Radcliffe Memorial Presbyterian Church, our only Negro Presbyterian church in that city. Oh yes, there is one other but it is almost ready to pass out of existence. Then, of course, there is the Covenant U.P. Church, a white congregation. The Atlantic Synod and Presbytery have been increasingly concerned about meeting the opportunities for new church development in that fast growing city. There are an amazing number of middle and upper-middle class Negro communities being built today on the west and north-west side of Atlanta. It is these particularly which occupied our interest.

We ought to think through a possible approach so as to move the Presbyterian synod planning along with a view to getting a church started in that area. From my two day visit and tour, I would say that the opportunities are ripe.

New Church Development

Synod of Mid-South

Presbytery of Chattanooga

Atlanta and Outstate Georgia

October 1-4, 1963

A growing interest about additional new church opportunities in the Metropolitan Atlanta area began to find expression near the middle of 1963. Dr. Harold F. Fredsell visited Atlanta briefly and talked with representatives of the Synod and the Atlanta pastors about engaging someone for survey work. At the 1963 National Staff meeting in Chicago, agreement was reached that Rev. Richard S. McCarroll should visit the area because of his earlier contacts with both the area and the survey work of the Presbyterian Church, U.S.

In a September 26, 1963 letter (attached), Rev. McCarroll confirmed arrangements. October 1-2 were scheduled for a tour of possible new church fields in the Atlanta area for the Presbytery of Chattanooga, Synod of Mid-South; October 2, at 4 P.M., for discussion of an inter-racial Christian fellowship; and October 3-4 for a tour of possible new church fields in the Atlanta area for the Presbytery of Knox-Hodge, Synod of Atlantic.

A brief outline of the subsequent contacts follows:

1. On October 1, a field tour was made of the areas above and below the northern arc of the new Circumferential Highway on the north side of Atlanta, but primarily within DeKalb County.

2. Also on October 1, a preliminary discussion of comity considerations was held with the representatives of the national and Atlanta Presbytery staff of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. (See 6 below.)

3. On October 2, a tour was made of Cobb County, covering the areas east of Marietta and Smyrna, comprising the northwestern outlying area of Atlanta across the Chattahoochee River.

4. On October 3, Mr. McCarroll flew to Warner Robins, Georgia, to meet with a local committee desirous of developing a UPUSA congregation. (This project was validated on October 24, 1963 attached.)

5. On October 4, UPUSA and Presbyterian, U.S., representatives met at the Presbytery of Atlanta office to discuss comity considerations. (The revised minutes of this meeting are attached.)

6. Also, on October 4, 1963, our UPUSA representatives convened to review proceedings and outline further steps. A job description was prepared for the survey work of Rev. Carroll D. Payne (rev. ed. attached).

The personnel participating in part or all of the above were:

Synod: Marion E. Mansell, Robert M. Muir - staff;
James E. Krahenbill, N.M. Chairman

Presbytery: Charles C. Lindsay, Daniel D. Brand,
John N. Gregg, Carroll D. Payne

Board: Richard S. McCarroll - Dept. NCD & BA

Signed,
R. S. McCarroll

Pan-Presbyterian Comity Meeting

On Friday, October 4, 1963, a consultation was held with the following persons present:

Charles C. Lindsay, 30 Terrace Drive, Atlanta, Georgia - 30305
(Pastor, Covenant Presbyterian Church, Atlanta)

Robert M. Muir, 3012 Crescent Circle, Huntsville, Alabama
(National Missions Assistant, Synod of Mid-South Staff)

Richard S. McCarroll, Room 1151, 475 Riverside Drive, New York, N.Y.
(Associate Director of New Church Development, Board of National Missions)

Daniel D. Brand, 4270 Chatworth Court, N.E., Atlanta 5, Georgia
(Pastor, Northminster Presbyterian Church, Atlanta)

George H. Smith, 341-F Ponce de Leon Avenue, N.E., Atlanta 8, Georgia
(Associate Secretary in the Area of Church Extension - Atlanta Presbytery)

Bonneau H. Dickson, 341-F. Ponce de Leon Avenue, N.E., Atlanta 8, Ga.
(Executive Secretary, Stated Clerk, and Treasurer of Atlanta Presbytery)

The above parties were drawn together with a view to maintaining the fullest measure of harmony between the UPUSA and U.S. Churches in the establishing of new churches and any relocations which might be planned for within the geographical bounds of Atlanta Presbytery.

(1) Re: "Ground Rules":

It was proposed by Rev. Charles C. Lindsay and agreed to by the group that normally Atlanta Presbytery, having the major responsibility for ministering to the area, would proceed with its own program of establishing new churches and relocating its congregations without need for consultation with representatives of the UPUSA Church; but the agents of the UPUSA would accept the responsibility for initiating consultations with responsible officials of Atlanta Presbytery when it proposes to explore the possibility of establishing a new work or the relocating of an existing congregation. These officials, having no power to speak for the Presbytery, will convey information or requests received to the Church Extension Committee of Atlanta Presbytery.

It was further agreed that in these consultations the "ground rules" set forth in a paper drawn up by denominational leaders, February 12, 1959, would be accepted as a basis for mutual guidance and for recommendation to our responsible agencies.

These "ground rules" specify:

(1) Ordinarily no new church will be started within less than two miles of an existing Presbyterian church. In every case, the nearest Presbyterian church will be notified in writing of the proposed new church and will be given an opportunity to appear before the comity committees*, if it so desires. (*Instead of setting up the "comity committees" alluded to here, it was agreed that consultations would take place between representatives of the UPUSA Church and responsible officials of Atlanta Presbytery.)

(2) Ordinarily neither communion will enter a community of less than 10,000 inhabitants where the other church is already established.

It was still further agreed that in areas where the overlapping affects churches of the A.R.P. and Cumberland denominations that the same procedure would be followed.

(2) Re: Relocation of Northminster Church:

It was reported that the Northminster Church presently located on Roswell Road, had purchased property on Forest Lake Drive. This was received as information. In the future it is anticipated that consultations on locations or relocations will be in advance of purchase.

(3) Re: Proposed UPUSA Work in Dunwoody Area:

It was reported that the UPUSA was interested in a site for a future church in the areas of Chamblee-Dunwoody and Mt. Vernon Road. Mr. Smith provided the information that this area had been prospected by Atlanta Presbytery with a view to acquiring property and opening a church at the appropriate time. Thus far, Atlanta Presbytery has not purchased a site in the area.

Mr. McCarroll presented the plans of the UPUSA Church to survey this area and to take an option on a site, but said that the development of work and actual purchase of a site were to be conditioned upon agreement on UPUSA proceeding. Mr. McCarroll explained (in a note suggesting modification to first draft of this summary), "Our site funds require starting of work within twenty-four months to be eligible for our national funds. It was agreed that unwarranted stalling was not in order and a project should be subject to review."

It was further agreed that if and when the UPUSA becomes interested in the purchasing of a particular site in this general area, further consultation with representatives of Atlanta Presbytery will be held before entering into commitment to buy.

(4) Re: Negro Work in Atlanta Area:

The UPUSA Church does not propose to begin any new church in a Negro residential area in the Atlanta area in the immediate, foreseeable future. It was suggested by Mr. McCarroll that consideration might be given in our long-range planning to cooperate in establishing a new Negro church in the general vicinity of where the new "West By-Pass" intersects the Circumferential Highway. This is a matter for further exploration, both as to location and cooperation across denominational lines.

On the part of Atlanta Presbytery, no expression of opinion was given except to say that the Presbytery has no plans for additional Negro churches in the Northwest area until it has succeeded in bringing West Hills to a more healthy condition.

THE CHURCH and the RACIAL CRISIS adopted by

THE BISHOP AND CHAPTER

of the

Diocese of Southern Ohio

October 12, 1963

and issued by

THE BISHOP

To be read in all Churches on

Sunday, October 27, 1963

The Summer of 1963 will long be remembered as one of the most decisive moments in the history of our country. Rarely, since the Civil War, have so many sections of the country been so convulsed by civil disorder and conflict. The historic March on Washington constituted the largest civil gathering of private citizens in one place in the nation's history. We are still too close to the events of the summer to offer any meaningful appraisal of their significance for the future, but all Americans are aware that the nation has entered a new and eventful era of social change. Indeed the word "revolution" is not too strong to use in the present context. The great issue which confronts us as a people is whether that revolution will be marked by increasingly tragic violence, or whether the institutions and laws of our heritage will be adequate to lead us to peaceful solutions.

One of the most important factors in the revolution up to this point has been the decisive role which religious bodies have played in the struggle. The Negro Church has been the source of greatest leadership and the source of greatest momentum, not only in the South, but in all sections of the country. All churches, with a few notable exceptions, have become involved in the struggle. To anyone at all acquainted with the facts of Christian history, such widespread and dedicated involvement in this kind of witness will come as no surprise. Indeed, we recall that the first Council of the Church, the Council of Jerusalem, was convened primarily in order to deal with the question of racial discrimination in the Christian community. It is of surpassing importance for all Christians to realize that the first heresy officially recognized by the Church was precisely a heresy having to do — not with matters of abstract theological doctrine — but precisely with the question of racial discrimination. This earliest recorded conflict in the Church's life — the conflict between those who maintained the old Jewish law of racial segregation and those who argued with St. Paul that all men are now one in Christ — reminds us that from the very first the Church has taken a stand on this issue.

In that earliest position taken by the Church, one answer only could be given if Christians were to be true to themselves and to their Lord. In Christ we are no more Jew or Gentile, but a new creation: we are all alike members of the Body of Christ and all together joint-heirs with Christ of the Kingdom. We pray "Almighty God who has created man in thine own image, and hast made of one blood all nations for to dwell on the face of the whole earth . . ." We affirm: "There is but one Body and one Spirit, and one hope of our calling . . . for as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek. There is neither slave nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus."

Therefore, there can be no possible doubt about the position of the Church on racial equality. Our faith is such that by our very existence as Christian people we are propelled into the struggle for the realization of the unity of all men, whatever their color or station.

Our own Church's contemporary statement of policy in the struggle has been clear and unambiguous. Only the willfully ignorant can be unaware of our Church's teaching in this matter.

*"WHEREAS, we believe in the natural dignity and value of every man, of whatever color or race, as created in the image of God and as one for whom Christ died; that discrimination by reason of color or race between men has as its root human sin; that the Church must confess its own sin in this area; and

"WHEREAS, We acknowledge that there are no easy answers to the problems created by the effort to apply these convictions to special and local situations, particularly in times of cultural and social change, and that the composite thoughts of Churchmen in conference or convention may or may not be the will of God because we all stand under the judgment of God and not finally under the judgments of fallible men; and also that, despite honest differences of opinion, we are bound together, through our union in Christ and His fellowship of love, to seek God's will; therefore be it

"RESOLVED, The House of Deputies concurring, that we call first upon our fellow Churchmen by God's grace to cleanse themselves of all spirit of racial discrimination; and then upon all persons, especially the members of our Church, to work together, in charity and forbearance, towards the establishment, without racial discrimination, of full opportunities in fields such as education, housing, employment and public accommodations."

We have proclaimed again and again that racial discrimination and segregation is sinful. Racial segregation in schools, in housing, in employment, in public services — indeed wherever it occurs, is a sinful action.

The struggle for racial justice and integration has now moved into an era where deeds, not words become decisive, when public action rather than public resolution, when direct action, rather than merely indirect persuasion become appropriate instrumentalities. Many of our Bishops and Priests, as well as our lay people, have entered this phase of the struggle with determination and courage. They have marched in the streets of our cities; they have given direct and public witness to the Church's teaching on the picket lines and in the prisons of some of our communities.

This involvement, and its attendant publicity in the mass media of communication, have done much to redeem the Church's public image in the eyes of many of those who had begun to doubt the relevancy of the Church's life to the complex problems of the social order. One encounters, not infrequently, the suspicion among the ablest and most gifted representatives of modern culture, that the Church has lost its vital power to bring its message to bear upon the social order because of its fatal preoccupation with itself and its own domestic concerns. The responsible participation of the Church in the struggle for racial justice has been a sign of encouragement to those whose minds were troubled by this growing conviction.

There are others, however, in this Diocese, and throughout the Church, whose minds, far from being encouraged by this involvement, have become troubled and bewildered. It is to these people and to their legitimate questions that we wish to address a message of pastoral and affectionate concern.

Those within the Church who find our position problematic must be distinguished in two groups. In the first group are those who object in principle to the Church's teaching about the unity of all men in Christ. These persons believe that the Negro (or some other group) is by nature (biologically) inferior in some significant respect to his white brother, and, therefore, is not properly entitled to share the same status in society which the "white man" occupies. Mercifully, those who hold this racist view are few in number at the present time in this country. The memory of the atrocities committed in the name of this philosophy in Germany, however, are fresh enough to remind us that here is a position which must be seriously acknowledged and dealt with. To those who espouse such a philosophy of race, it must simply be said, clearly and openly, that this opinion is fundamentally incompatible with the belief which we affirm as members of Christ's Church. We affirm that all men are made in the image of God and that all men are redeemed and made heirs of the Kingdom of God in the work of Jesus Christ. The advocates of racial philosophies which directly contradict this fundamental belief must be challenged to face the self-evident contradiction involved in their continuing involvement in the Church whose basic creed they deny and oppose.

The second group must be carefully distinguished from the first. In this second group are those who do not disagree with the Church's teaching about racial equality, but who disagree with the form of involvement which the Church has taken in the present social struggle. It is to this group of persons and to the nature of their discontent that we wish to speak particularly. Here we wish to consider some of the specific arguments which many of these people advance against the church's participation in the present struggle.

I. THE CHURCH AND "BIG GOVERNMENT"

It is said by some that the Church is aligning itself in the present conflict with those who support "Big Government," with those who favor federal, rather than local solutions to the racial problems of the nation. Those who argue this point suggest that it is improper for the Church to endorse any particular political solution to the problem which confronts us. They would maintain that while the Church may have the responsibility to urge that prompt redress be given to those who suffer injustice, it ought not to involve itself in supporting one political approach over other possible alternatives. "Men of good will," they say, "may legitimately disagree over the most appropriate means of solution, and the church is ill-advised to lend its moral support to any partisan political instrumentality."

In general, it must be said that this is a point well made. However, it is not accurate to say that the church has favored the Federal approach to the exclusion of all others. Indeed, time and again in official pronouncements and elsewhere, the church has maintained that the final solution to the problem of racial discrimination and prejudice must be a local and a personal solution. The customs and laws of local communities must be altered and redeemed. However, given the nature of complex, industrial, interdependent national life at this particular moment in the country's life, it is unrealistic to suggest that all social problems must be dealt with exclusively by local instrumentalities.

We readily acknowledge that the principle of local management of local social problems is the most desirable solution, whenever this can be done. The painful fact, is, however, that some localities either cannot or will not act to assure the just order of society. In such cases we must be prepared to balance our traditional preference for local government against the demands of moral justice and the requirements of our national civil principles. Wherever local governments rob persons of their human dignity or of their civil rights, then it becomes entirely appropriate for us to seek assistance from the only adequate civil authority and this means Federal law.

Here we have ventured into an area of political theory which some may say should be left to those more technically informed. We have attempted to do this only in order to lay to rest the fears of those who believe that the Church has associated itself exclusively with the advocates of "Big Government" as distinguished from those who favor purely local legislation. Our real interest does not lie with the advocates of either theory. Our real concern is with the prompt correction of a notorious social evil, and wherever local government is either unwilling or unable to address itself to a problem of this magnitude, then we think it altogether reasonable and just to call for other actions which can bring to pass the desired results.

II. THE CHURCH AND "POLITICS"

It is said by some that the Church should not become involved "in politics"; that her ministry to the world may become compromised by unwise involvement in matters of "partisan controversy". "The Church exists in order to perform 'spiritual' rather than 'temporal' or 'secular' functions within society". We must answer this argument with some care. It is true that every social involvement is by nature a risk, for it is quite impossible to know in advance whether the social decision will result in the end which is desired. Therefore, it is unquestionably true that the church's participation in matters of social concern must always be guided by the most thoughtful and thorough study and prayer. However, the distinction which is drawn in this case between secular and sacred concerns is theologically unacceptable from the Christian point of view. For the Christian man, all things in the life of man are his sacred concern. Jesus did not die in order to save religion, but in order to save the world. The Church abandons her calling whenever she succumbs to the temptation to withdraw from meaningful contact with the society in which she lives. Meaningful contact with society, saving relationship with and within all human society, is the divinely appointed task for which the Church exists. This means that the Christian as an individual is called upon to participate to the fullest extent of his personal ability in political activity and life. As an institution, the Church is likewise called upon from time to time to involve itself in social action and witness. The Church in Hitler's Germany was called upon to do this. The Church in America has been called upon to do this on many occasions.

Always the Church's entrance into the arena of social action must be guided by the wisest decision of its leadership and by the persuasion that failure to become involved in social witness would be tantamount to the betrayal of the Lord or of those whom the Lord loves. Those who mistakenly teach that the Church must as a matter of principle avoid all social action are misled for they fail to appreciate that authentic Christian witness may on occasion call for risks and for involvement in the admittedly ambiguous relationships of the so-called (and falsely designated) "secular" order of man's life.

Here a word of caution would seem to be in order. It seems to us that members of the Church who oppose certain types of political involvement by the Church make an entirely valid objection. In this country at least, the Church is ill-advised to align itself with any particular or partisan legislative program or action. Certainly it is unnecessary for the Church, in its social witness to endorse legislative programs which are specifically "Democratic" or "Republican" in sponsorship. Thus, while the Church makes its social witness in favor of adequate housing for all human beings, this does not mean that the Church should advocate or support officially any particular partisan measure intended to secure this end. The reasons for this avoidance of partisan identification should be obvious to everyone. It seems clear that only in the most extraordinary circumstances should the Church officially involve itself in matters of strictly partisan conflict. Every rule finds its exceptions. Obviously there are occasions when specific legislative endorsement may become appropriate, as, for example in the case of a child labor law, or some equally non-partisan legislation. In most cases, however, the caution given here applies, and the church should avoid unwise political identifications. Least of all should individual clergymen become involved in purely partisan controversies, for the simple reason that clergymen are not, generally, acquainted with the full implications of any given set of political exigencies, nor are they especially equipped to engage in the professional activities properly associated with partisan legislative tactics.

The Church cannot rest until it has made known, clearly and unambiguously, the moral dimension involved in any given social act of the state. However, we do not think, in this country at least, that it is generally desirable for the Church to enter the arena of partisan political pressure, either by means of official resolution or by means of political endorsement from the pulpit. It would be our earnest request that any clergyman who feels bound by conscience to engage in partisan action might consult first with the Bishop about his prospective action.

Nevertheless, even though proper caution be taken to avoid partisan identification, it must be acknowledged that the Church's enunciation of its moral position in regard to certain social issues will still result in controversy. There will be many within our community who will disagree with the position which we take. Even though we attempt to reassure such persons that our position does not arise from partisan sympathies, but entirely from our conscientious understanding of the Word of God, we shall still experience tension and conflict. This eventuality must be acknowledged and accepted, with the prayer and with the confident hope that the reconciling love of God will enable those of us who disagree to resolve our differences, or at least agree to disagree as brothers within the household of God. We are not persuaded that peace at any cost is a high value for the Christian. Certainly we can entertain no cowardly motions to retreat from our considered moral teaching merely because we face the possibility of imminent conflict, or because to persist in the path dictated by conscience will result in some loss to the material wealth of the Church.

We should not be naive in the expectation that our commitment will save us from conflict. Indeed we are explicitly prepared by Christ to live in continual expectation of tribulation and distress. Social witness, therefore, has resulted and will continue to result in profound conflict with the church's life. The alternative to conflict, in this case, is death. Our persistent effort must be to keep open the avenues of communication among all our people, so that when conflict does arise, as arise it must, we shall all be prepared to offer our suffering to Him who only is able to heal our divisions and to overcome our estrangements.

III. THE ROLE OF THE CLERGY IN CIVIL RIGHTS DEMONSTRATIONS QUESTIONED

It is said by some that the clergy should not be permitted to participate in public civil rights demonstrations. It is said that the clergy, by virtue of their ordination and function in the Church, seem to be representing in these demonstrations not just their own personal opinions, but the opinions of their local parishes as well. Thus, goes this argument, sometimes the priest misrepresents the actual opinions of the membership of his church. One person has put it this way: "The clergy have no right to act and speak unilaterally in these matters, for they do not represent me, and appear to do so."

This opinion is based upon a profound misunderstanding of the relationship of the clergy to the laity in matters of theological teaching or moral witness. It is not possible here to give this question the thorough attention which it deserves. Suffice it to say that the priests of the church are not ordained in order to represent the opinions of local congregations: they are ordained in order to represent and to proclaim the Gospel of Christ. This Vocation is not to be qualified by the local opinions of any particular congregation, and the argument advanced here really cannot be accepted as valid for this reason.

Of course if in the judgment of any member of the Church a Priest or Bishop is misrepresenting the Gospel of Christ by false teaching, or by immoral conduct, ample opportunity is given to that person to present his complaint to the proper authority and the well-established procedures for dealing with such matters can then be properly implemented. But it should be clearly understood that the priest is not ordained in order to represent the private opinions of any man — including his own.

Something further should be said, however, concerning this argument, since it will be heard with increasing frequency as more and more clergy participate in public demonstrations for civil rights. In our judgment, such participation is itself not only permissible but highly desirable at the present moment. By means of such public witness, the church's teaching in the present conflict becomes utterly clear and open for all men to see. The compassionate demonstration of concern for those who suffer injustice is not merely to be condoned; it is to be applauded and encouraged. It is our fervent prayer that not only the clergy, but all our people endeavor to participate responsibly in such public demonstrations of concern for justice. It goes without saying, of course, that involvement in public witness must be responsible and informed. As in the case of all great public movements, there are always those who seek private gain and who would, if given the opportunity, corrupt even the most admirable actions to further wicked ends. Therefore, those who participate in public demonstrations have the clear responsibility to act only when fully informed about the nature and purpose, as well as the immediate desirability, of the particular action in question.

Here, however, we wish to add a word of special concern for the spiritual welfare of those who engage themselves in public demonstrations of the kind we are considering. The nature of this concern is briefly stated by a priest of this Diocese who observed: "It is an exhilarating experience to demonstrate for social justice, and sometimes the greater the peril involved the greater the sense of excitement in being enrolled in the 'cause of the righteous'. While perhaps it is not altogether helpful to be too scrupulous in the examination of this sense of exhilaration, a few remarks about this may be in order. Our clergy, especially, need to reflect upon the fact that, with rare exceptions in this Diocese, their own property, their own livelihood, their own 'social investment' is not threatened by the social change for which they demonstrate. It has already been noted carefully by our critics that many clergy — sometimes those most vociferous in the campaign for desegregated schools — send their own children to schools which are not only racially segregated, but which are, as well, segregated according to the most rigid social and class distinctions. It has been noted carefully that most clergy live comfortably in carefully segregated neighborhoods. It has been noted carefully that until very recently, when at last the cause of racial justice has become a popular activity, our clergy were, with few exceptions entirely silent, or at least inoffensively vocal, on the subject of racial injustice. It has been noted carefully that while many of our clergy seem to advocate racial equality in the public affairs of the society, they find it entirely acceptable to belong, in private, to rigidly segregated country clubs, fraternities, professional and service organizations. It seems to many of our people, our friends as well as our adversaries in this conflict, that the public protestations of righteousness ill accord with the private practices of the members of the clerical order.

Therefore, the clergy do well to examine with some care their sudden involvement in public demonstrations for racial justice. We must be aware that much of our concern in the present situation arises from a very guilty conscience on our own part. We must understand that much of the exhilaration which we experience arises from our own sense of relief from the burden of guilt which we have borne for our prior silence and for our own careless avoidance of decisions in our private lives which might bring to bear the kinds of moral demands which we now cheerfully would impose upon others. Surely any involvement in public protests must be preceded by an honest and thorough examination of consciences."

We acknowledge that it is all too possible to be over-scrupulous in this self-examination. All persons must be clear about themselves as they enter into what will be an increasingly tense conflict. We must make every godly effort to set our own house in order. Chaucer's words about the Poor Parson seem very much to the point: "Christ's lore he taught, and His Apostles twelve, But first he practiced it himself." Certainly, all of us must enter these demonstrations humbly and penitently, avoiding all semblance of Pharisaic innocence. Our enthusiasm for justice will surely be no less if we begin with the sobering acknowledgment of our own responsibility for the injustice which now exists.

IV. THE CHURCH'S MINISTRY AND THE ROLE OF THE LAW

It is said by some that the function of the church is to "change attitudes and not to support legislation." Legislation, so runs this argument, cannot change attitudes and the racial problem is primarily a problem of individual attitude. Therefore, the Church must address itself only to the task of altering undesirable attitudes.

Of course, it must be admitted that the practice of racial discrimination often does proceed from the psychological and moral attitudes of those who engage in it. But then, that observation might be made with regard to all immoral and unhealthy behavior. The mere fact that attitudes influence actions hardly alters the fact that law is necessary in order to curb unjust actions. If this argument were followed to its ultimate conclusion, we might be led to suggest that there should be no laws against theft, for theft proceeds from an anti-social attitude, and therefore we should only address ourselves to the attitude itself. Of course it is true that we should seek to alter the attitudes which give rise to unjust and immoral behavior, but the law must seek to deal with the behavior itself, for the protection of others, as well for the good order of society at large.

Therefore we face no question of either/or. Justice requires that social rights be protected by social structures (laws, enforcement agencies, courts, etc.), and justice requires also that those who share unjust attitudes should be converted and shown a better way of living. Both must be done, and they must be done in the present situation with equal seriousness and dedication.

Behind the argument we are considering here, there is often a further premise which must be questioned, viz., the assumption that minority groups should receive protection from the majority only when the majority itself is prepared to extend that protection. This point of view may be answered at one level merely by reference to the civil constitution of the nation. It is precisely to avoid such caprice on the part of the majority that the Bill of Rights was written into our Constitution. The rights of the minority in the United States, at least, need not wait upon the whim of the majority for their realization. The extension of those rights to the minority is wisely and permanently taken out of the hands of the majority and guaranteed by the Constitution itself. This is a point which seems to be forgotten by too many in the present controversies. Justice for the minority is not a privilege to be meted out by the gradually more beneficent majority. Therefore, justice for the minority does not depend upon the successful alteration of majority attitudes: it is already guaranteed by the highest law of the nation. It is the direct implementation of that guarantee which is at issue in the present strife.

In conclusion it must be said that even if there were no National Constitution embodying such guarantees of justice for all men, the Christian would be committed to that principle. Our own constitution as the Body of Christ lays upon us the permanent commitment to equal justice for men of all races and classes and nations. Canon Max Warren has stated our universal commitment clearly and helpfully:

"The Church cannot rest until the partnership of all mankind is realized in that city which hath foundations whose maker and builder is God and into which all the nations of the world without exception bring their treasure. This is the eternal end which the Church exists to serve. Inasmuch as it is faithful to that end, it will be able within the local context of time and place to show a particular society of men how to live in the partnership of a true multi-racial society." (Partnership, SCM Edition, 1956, page 127)

Here we have made no effort to give an exhaustive statement of the Church's position on the matter of racial justice. Full and ample publication of the Church's official position in this matter, as declared in numerous formal statements, has already been made. Nor have we attempted to answer all of the objections which have been made concerning the involvement of our Church in the present struggle for the realization of racial justice in America. It has been possible to consider only a very limited area of disagreement over the Church's present and prospective action. We have dealt with certain particular questions because we have been confronted by many members of the Diocese with the request that the Church's understanding of these specific issues be clarified and elaborated. Having done that, however, we further suggest that all areas of conflict and action in this matter should receive the continuing and careful study and response of the Diocese. Therefore, the Bishop and Chapter of the Diocese has created a permanent Standing Commission on Race Relations. This new Commission will be given several important responsibilities.

The Commission will:

1. Seek by various means to further understanding between Negro and White Christians within the Church. The Commission will encourage the creation throughout all parishes of the Diocese of local study groups involving both White and Negro persons, to deepen understanding of the present social revolution and to provide an opportunity for meaningful contact between people of different races. The Commission will seek to establish teams of competent laity and clergy who will be prepared to interpret the Church's position throughout the Diocese. The Commission will provide lists of useful study material for those who become involved in the study of this matter, making available to each parish valuable publications received from various national and church organizations.

2. Seek to encourage the participation of clergy and laity in bi-racial civil action and study groups in local communities, wherever such groups exist. The Commission will also encourage the members of the Church to take the initiative in establishing such bodies where none presently exist.

3. Seek to establish guide-lines for the clergy and laity of the Diocese as they seek to witness or demonstrate for civil rights in public activity not directly under the authority of the Diocese.

4. Seek to provide moral and financial support for clergy and laity who encounter problems in their witness.

5. Seek, in cooperation with the Department of Social Relations, to present to the Convention of the Diocese such requests for official action as may seem appropriate and necessary.

O God, who has made man in thine own likeness and who dost love all whom thou hast made, suffer us not because of difference in race or color or condition to separate ourselves from others, and thereby from thee; but teach us the unity of thy family and the universality of thy love. As thy Son, our Saviour, was born of a Hebrew mother and ministered first to his brethren of the House of Israel, but rejoiced in the faith of a Syro-Phoenician woman and the faith of a Roman soldier, and suffered his cross to be carried by a man of Africa, teach us also, while loving and serving our own, to enter into the communion of the whole human family. And forbid that from pride of birth or hardness of heart we should despise any for whom Christ died or injure any in whom Christ lives. Amen.

EPISCOPAL CLERGY JOIN PICKET LINE AT GEORGIA CHURCH-RELATED SCHOOL

Two Episcopal priests from Michigan will join the picket line in front of the Lovett School in Atlanta, Ga., on Tuesday, October 22nd, in protest of its policy of segregation. The Episcopal Church-related facility earlier this year rejected the application of Martin Luther King, III, and has subsequently turned down Negro Episcopal applicants. The protest is being sponsored by the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, a national organization within the Episcopal Church with headquarters in Atlanta.

The Rev. Henri Stines, Rector of Grace Episcopal Church in Detroit, will be accompanied by a clergyman sometimes called "the espresso priest" because of his ministry to college students in coffee houses. The Rev. Malcolm Boyd, author and playwright, serves on the staff of Grace Church, a predominantly Negro parish, as well as in the capacity of Chaplain to Episcopal students at Wayne State University in Detroit. Fr. Stines, who is from Haiti originally, is a Negro. Chaplain Boyd, who is white, is the author of several religious books and a series of plays, entitled STUDY IN COLOR, which were selected by Dodd, Mead and Co. for inclusion in BEST PLAYS OF 1962-63. Fr. Hines and Chaplain Boyd will begin picketing at the Lovett School on Tuesday afternoon, October 22nd.

Picketing at the Lovett School, located in fashionable Northwest Atlanta on the banks of the Chattahoochee River, began last Tuesday, October 15th, and was continued for three days by Atlanta Episcopalians. ESCRU has announced that Churchmen from all parts of the country will assist in the protest action to symbolize the concern of the entire Episcopal Church for the Lovett situation which has been called "the Little Rock of the Episcopal Church." The protest will be continued indefinitely and periodically so long as the institution remains a Church-related facility that segregates.

The week of October 27th will see still more clergy at the gates to the Lovett School, joining in with Atlanta churchmen in sustaining the protest. The Pennsylvania-Delaware Chapter of ESCRU will send three Negro priests to assist for the greater part of the week. They include the Rev. Jesse Anderson, Rector of Saint Thomas' Church, Philadelphia; the Rev. Robert Chapman, Chaplain to Episcopal students at the University of Pennsylvania and Curate at St. Mary's Church, Hamilton Village; and the Rev. Thomas Logan, Rector of Calvary Church, Philadelphia.

On Tuesday, October 29th, the Rev. C. Kilmer Myers of the Urban Training Center for Christian Mission in Chicago will walk before Lovett School. Author of LIGHT THE DARK STREETS, Fr. Myers is well-known throughout the Episcopal Church for his work in the Lower East Side Missions of Trinity Parish, New York City. He has only recently gone to his new position in Chicago from the Chapel of the Intercession located in New York City's upper west side area chiefly populated by Negroes and Puerto Ricans.

The week of November 3rd will see the Rev. William B. Gray, Rector of St. Luke's Church in Cedar Falls, Iowa, returning to his native state to assist in the Lovett Protest. It is expected that others will be on hand from still additional parts of the country, along with other Atlantans who will be picketing for the first time.

A spokesman for ESCRU has emphasized that the picketing is not intended to discourage Lovett students and faculty to stay out. Rather, as the attached statement suggests, those who walk in protest before the school recognize that many within "suffer and labor in obedience to Jesus Christ" and are as opposed to the decision of the Lovett Board of Trustees to bar Negroes as Churchmen who are able to demonstrate outside the school. The sign carried by the pickets simply shows a Crucifixion scene where Christ's Body is pierced by the words "Segregation" and "Separation" emblazoned on a barbed wire fence that bisects His Body and separates two kneeling figures of different color. The placard was originally placed on the grounds of St. George's Anglican Cathedral in Capetown, South Africa, and carried the single word "Apartheid" on the concentration-camp type fence.

STATEMENT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE
EPISCOPAL SOCIETY FOR CULTURAL AND RACIAL UNITY
ON THE LOVETT SCHOOL SITUATION

On June 14, 1963, the Board of Trustees of the Lovett School, Atlanta, Georgia, "unanimously adopted resolutions denying applications of Negro students for admission." This fact was the major concern of a meeting of the Executive Committee and Chapter representatives of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, held in Atlanta, Georgia, September 15-17, 1963. The Society consists of persons who have committed themselves to establish total participation in the Church of all persons without regard to race, class or national origin, and to express this concern at parish levels and in a more creative witness throughout the community at large.

As a result of the decision of the Board of Trustees, the Bishop of Atlanta announced during the past summer that he had severed all official or implied ties with the Lovett School. The Society commends the Bishop of Atlanta for his efforts and actions in this matter. However, in light of the following facts, it is an inescapable conclusion that the Episcopal Church is still an integral part of the school's life. The charter of the school requires: 1) That seven members of the Lovett School's Board of Trustees be communicants of and approved by the Episcopal Cathedral of St. Philip; 2) That seven other members of the Board of Trustees be Episcopal residents of the State of Georgia; 3) That the Dean of the Episcopal Cathedral of St. Philip shall always be a member of the Board of Trustees; and 4) That the Lovett School is committed to furthering the "Episcopal faith as contained in the Book of Common Prayer."

At present, with the full knowledge of the Standing Committee of the Diocese, worship services of the Church continue at the Lovett School, including a weekly celebration of the Holy Communion. The Society is shocked that the Dean of the Episcopal Cathedral of St. Philip continues to serve as Chairman of the Board of Trustees. This fact and his present involvement at the Lovett School worship services clearly identifies the Episcopal Church with the school's segregationist policy.

Lovett's Director of Administration, J. A. Rabbe, obviously does not consider the school as presently outside the orbit of the Episcopal Church. This is evidenced by Mr. Rabbe's letter to parents on August 8, 1963. At that time he reassured them that daily chapel, Wednesday morning Communion services, the teaching of religion, and all other religious emphases "will be continued just as in the past and have the approval of the Bishop."

Following a thorough and prayerful consideration of the facts of the Lovett School situation, the Society feels constrained to protest in the following manner: 1) sustained inter-racial participation in the school's services of worship; 2) sustained picketing of the school by concerned Churchmen; 3) expressing our common guilt in the sin of segregation through the recitation of the Penitential Office at the Cathedral of St. Philip; and 4) regularly offering prayers throughout the whole Church in order to help heal the deep wounds, both personal and social, which the Lovett School has created.

The Lovett School situation is all the more grievous because it is symptomatic of the widespread compromise of the Church's teaching. The Society commends those people at Lovett School and in this community who recognize the injustice of segregation and who continue to suffer and labor in obedience to Jesus Christ.

RE: REV. ASHTON JONES, IN FULTON COUNTY JAIL, ATLANTA, GEORGIA

Article I, Section I, Paragraph IX, Constitution of the State of Georgia:

"Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted; nor shall any person be abused in being arrested while under arrest, or in prison."

Amendment VIII to the Constitution of the United States:

"Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted..."

The following information on the case of Rev. Ashton Jones was compiled from public records and information furnished by Mr. Howard Moore, Attorney for Rev. Jones.

On August 28, 1963, a Fulton Superior Court jury found Rev. Ashton Jones guilty of disturbing divine service and Judge Durwood Pye imposed the maximum misdemeanor sentence of 12 months on public works, 6 months in jail and $1,000.00 fine. As a first step in the appellate process, a motion for new trial was immediately filed, and the Court stayed the sentence and set bail for $20,000.00. Since Rev. Jones has been unable to make bail in this amount, he is still confined to Fulton County jail.

Rev. Jones, a 67 year old white minister, was arrested and charged after he attempted to worship with 2 teenage Negroes and a white teenager at the First Baptist Church in Atlanta on Sunday, June 30, 1963. They were refused admission and the church doors were closed. Rev. Jones was pushed and dragged about the church grounds by members of the church. In much pain, he sat on the church steps. He exclaimed, "Oh, Lord, Help them! Does mankind have to reach this low?" Testimony at the trial showed that the Negro girl had been pushed backwards out of the church and been shoved by the church pastor, Rev. Roy McClain, and that Rev. Jones remarked "A segregated church worships a segregated God."

On July 16, Rev. Jones was indicted by a Fulton County Grand Jury for allegedly having interrupted and disturbed the congregation of the First Baptist Church while lawfully assembled for divine service by loud talking, shouting, and by sitting on the floor of the church and "by otherwise indecently acting."

Rev. Jones' only source of income is Social Security payments and old age assistance from the state of Aclifornia.

Since being confined to jail, Rev. Jones was beaten by an unknown prisoner and later placed ostensibly for his own protection in a solitary cell. In protest, Rev. Jones went on a fast, and has been taken to Grady Hospital for intravaneous feeding from time to time.

After the beating, the Judge ordered the Sheriff to make an investigation and report relative to claim that Rev. Jones had been beaten while in jail; ordered the Solicitor General to report on allegations of Rev. Jones' ordination as a congregational minister; the alleged beating and the person or organization paying his attorney's fees, ordered Rev. Jones to submit an affidavit in his own handwriting detailing circumstances of the alleged beating, and that Rev. Jones could submit any other affidavits he thought advisable.

On August 29 and on September 26, Judge Pye refused motions for reduction of bail. Judge Pye stated that Rev. Jones had been arrested in 12 different cities in the U. S., but failed to mention that Rev. Jones had never wilfully failed to appear in any Court. At the time of sentencing, Judge Pye asked, "He has unlimited money behin him, doesn't he?" and "Doesn't the defendant have an unlimited organization of people supporting him?" A motion for reduction of bail is now pending in the Supreme Court of Georgia.

On October 8 Judge Pye was again requested to reduce the amount of bail, and at that time said that he would consider bail in amount less than $20,000.00, though he did not mention any other figure.

Efforts are being made both (1) to have the amount of the bail reduced and (2) to secure funds necessary (estimated at $1,500) to secure the release of Rev. Jones under the present bail. None of the eight (8) weeks he has been in jail will be counted on his sentence of 18 months, should the motion for a new trial fail and he be required to serve the sentence.

Mr. Howard Moore and Mr. Donald Hollowell, Attorneys for Rev. Jones and his associates, are under order to appear before Judge Pye on November 22 to show cause why they should not be cited for contempt of court, as a result of their motion at the beginning of the trial that Judge Pye disqualify himself because of racial prejudice.

According to the attorney for Rev. Ashton Jones, Mr. Howard Moore, Jr., motion for a new trial for Rev. Jones is scheduled to be heard by Judge Pye on November 22, 10:00 a.m., in Room 804 of the Fulton County Court House, and a petition for a writ of habeas corpus (concerning the detention of the defendant due to excessive bail) was filed with the Georgia Supreme Court on November 4 and will be heard in January, 1964.

Meanwhile, Rev. Jones is still in Fulton County jail, as a result of conviction of disturbing public worship at First Baptist Church, which he attempted to enter in the company of Negro friends, as described in the attached summary of the case. The sentence was stayed when the appeal for new trial was filed immediately after the first trial, so that the time spent in jail (4 months thus far) would not count on his sentence should his conviction ultimately be upheld. There will undoubtedly be more litigation following the Friday hearing either another trial or an appeal from a refusal for another trial.

There is real community concern over the matter of an individual having to stay in jail while his conviction is being appealed to higher courts, and being subjected to the same conditions and treatment given to prisoners who are serving s entences, regardless of the question of the policies of the church or of Rev. Jones' previous activities.

In an effort to coordinate activities in behalf of Rev. Jones' release and to channel the increasing expressions of concern from individuals and groups in the community, a few individuals met last Sunday and decided to invite some 30 other individuals to form an Ashton Jones Defense Committee, for the purposes of receiving contributions towards the cost of bond and court costs and advising about alternative courses of action. The Rev. Ed Lantz, regional representative of the National Council of Churches of Christ, Inc., has agreed to the use of his office for the receipt of funds and Dr. H. C. Steinmetz of Morehouse College, has agreed to act as treasurer of the Ashton Jones Defense Committee.

On October 8, Judge Pye did say that he would consider bond less than $20,000. Two unsuccessful attempts have been made to post bond, one by the National Council of Churches and one by Rev. Jones' sister who resides in Atlanta. It seems that the only way to find out what the Judge would consider is to make specific efforts to post bond, and this is a matter with which the Committee hopefully would deal.

CONVENTION - National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice
November 14-17, 1963

POVERTY, RACE AND RELIGION:
CHALLENGE TO A CATHOLIC COMMUNITY

(details, p.3)

Member councils, parish and other Catholic organizations joined with other religious groups and civil rights organizations in the MARCH ON WASHINGTON FOR JOBS AND FREEDOM on August 28. Some forty councils were directly involved and provided the stimulus and organization for many other Catholic groups which attended.

The Washington CIC, in particular, did first rate service in helping to set up sleeping and feeding accommodations for several thousands of the marchers.

On the March day, hundreds of Masses were offered in Washington and across the country for the intention of interracial justice and harmony in our country. The Miami Valley CIC sponsored three such Masses on August 27, 28 and 29.

Seven bishops participated, and Archbishop O'Boyle offered the invocation before the March program. Numerous priests and seminarians joined the throngs that day, and though not present, many nuns had indicated that they wanted to join the marchers.

The Chicago CIC contributed highly to the March by donating full-time services of their office manager, Marion Andert, for the preceding weeks.

The March marked a tremendous joining of hands of tens of thousands of Christians and Jews who hunger after justice for all men, and dramatized the needs of Negroes for millions of Americans in an unforgettable way.

July 27 Special Emergency Meeting — At a special emergency meeting of 225 national Catholic interracial leaders in Chicago, resolutions were adopted in favor of civil rights legislation, urging that all Catholics actively work in their parishes and civil organizations for justice. The meeting helped move the Catholic community abreast of the fast-breaking developments in this summer of crisis. The meeting also laid plans for support of direct action projects, under certain conditions, when negotiation and other preliminary means to secure rights have failed. The consensus also encouraged interreligious cooperation by the establishment of interfaith, biracial organizations - local Conferences on Religion and Race. The resolutions of the meeting were adopted by the board of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice. (resolutions are available upon request - price 15¢.)

legislation

Archbishop Karl Alter of Cincinnati led the way for Catholic support in the legislative drive by stating in his recent Pastoral that "the first remedy .... is the passage by Congress of the Civil Rights Bill which will grant all citizens, irrespective of race and color, equal rights in voting, in admission to schools on all levels, in employment, in housing, public facilities and in recreation... Our Christian duty at present is to support in an articulate fashion the proposed legislation which is now before Congress.... We should urge favorable action on the part of our representatives in enacting this legislative program."

The San Francisco CIC reports a fair housing victory after a long fight by civil rights groups for a state law. The Rumford bill was passed during the last hours of the legislature's 1963 regular session. The Citizens League for Individual Freedom is now circulating a petition, however, to force a referendum on the new Rumford Fair Housing Act - the group is seeking 292,662 signatures to place the referendum measure on the ballot.

.....more on legislation

Officers and members of the Miami Valley CIC recently participated in a state rally and demonstration in support of fair housing law proposal.

Washington CIC's President, Dr. Nuesse, together with other religious leaders met with Senators Dirksen, Humphrey, Kuchel and Mansfield, and Congressmen McCormick and Celler, to urge support, strengthening, and speedy passage of the administration's civil rights bill; the group later met with Attorney General Robert Kennedy to urge full use of existing federal authority.

At the leadership training institute of the National Council of Catholic Women held recently in Highland Park, Matt Ahmann described the very dangerous tendency developing in the country for popular referendums on civil rights issues. Peggy Roach of the NCCW staff in Washington said that NCCW has offered race relations material to the social action committees of Catholic diocesan and parish women's groups for several years and that race relations has been adopted as an official part of the program of women's groups in nearly half of the churches in the U.S.

The murders in Birmingham and other violence against Negroes has underscored the need for strong civil rights legislation... and soon. Now is the time to encourage your congressmen to vote for the rights of all men by their support of the legislation now undergoing hearings. For those attending the national convention of the National Conference, there will be a legislative briefing at the International Inn at 2 PM on Thursday, November 14. Each visitor to Washington should make his own appointment to see his congressman that afternoon. The convention work sessions on Friday and Saturday preclude calls on congressmen on those days. Come early to the convention and visit your congressman.

Housing

The goal of the Detroit CIC this year is open occupancy. The group endorsed the Patric-Ravitz Ordinance and attended public hearings in September. They indicated that many Catholics have already signed opposing petitions circulated by home owners association ... "some out of bigotry, and many out of ignorance." The council indicated that most Catholics don't know that open occupancy has been endorsed by the Metropolitan Conference on Religion and Race, of which the Archdiocese of Detroit is part. The council urged all members to work hard in getting petitions, attending public hearings and sending personal letters and wires to their councilmen. Anne Holden of Ann Arbor CORE attended their recent board meeting and outlined other direct action techniques.

The Brooklyn CIC is co-sponsoring with the NAACP and Urban League a workshop in Urban Renewal and Housing to be presented by the New York City Commission on Human Rights for five Tuesdays in October.

September 1963 saw the excellent first edition of the Archbishop's Committee on Human Relations of Detroit newsletter. The new 4-page issue carried up-to-the-minute, comprehensive coverage of the most urgent problems in race relations ... Detroit's open occupancy ordinance ... Kennedy's civil rights proposal ... home visits ... coming programs of Michigan Civil Rights Commission ... as well as current events and a listing of informative books.

Please make sure your Newsletter mailing list includes all the CIC's. You'll want to know all the goings on - and in this way can maintain a "mutual profit" pool of program suggestions, procedures, resources, evaluation of direct action techniques, etc.

The Catholic Human Relations Council of Union County (New Jersey) recently heard Rev. Eugene P. McManus, S.S.J., author of "Studies in Race Relations", and chairman of the Negro voter registration drive.

Rev. Richard Eisler, executive secretary of the Cincinnati Council of Churches was guest speaker for the Cincinnati CIC's September meeting. Eisler pointed up the deep spiritual impact of the March on Washington and expressed the need to join with other groups and churches in actively seeking solutions to the racial problems existing in Cincinnati.

Friendship House Home Visit Program

The Long Island CIC is planning home visits on a regular on-going basis and announced five planned visits per month; Davenport CIC reports visits a part of their continuing program; Miami Valley CIC carried the program through the summer and is currently carrying on visits with high school seniors and foreign students .. their local high school made home visiting a part of the preparation for broad student participation in coming programs. The CIC of Stark County (Canton, O.) is planning a city-wide Home Visit Day, along with others, on October 27; and Cincinnati CIC is working intensively with other organizations on the program. There are now approximately twenty CIC's carrying on Friendship House Home Visit Program.

Every CIC should be a subscriber to the INTERRACIAL REVIEW. Contact the New York CIC office, 233 Broadway, and request back issues to July, 1963.

Interreligious Efforts

The San Francisco Conference on Religion and Race held last month resulted in commitment to sponsor an on-going Conference on Religion and Race program and employ professional staff to coordinate its efforts. The Rev. Hamilton T. Boswell of the Jones Methodist Church was general chairman for the conference.

John T. Kenna of Washington (National Conference board member) has been named special assistant for program and public relations of the Family Life Bureau of the National Catholic Welfare Conference. Kenna was formerly public information officer for the President's Committee on Youth Employment.

Cardinal Ritter of St. Louis summoned together all the clergy of the diocese for a Pastoral Institute on race relations last month. Among the main speakers of the 3-day session were Monsignor Daniel M. Cantwell; Rev. Rollins Lambert of Chicago; and Matt Ahmann.

Education

The CIC of St. Paul-Minneapolis recently embarked on an ambitious program to place minority group students in Catholic high schools. The council feels that by increasing its membership to 500, there should be little difficulty in accomplishing this program and others.

An Educator's Workshop is being planned by the Stark County CIC. All priests, nuns, brothers, lay teachers, public school teachers and parents will be invited. Father Philip F. Berrigan, S.S.J. will be the guest speaker, and John P. Sisson of the National Conference staff will give the keynote address.

The Chicago CIC publicly announced their opposition to policies of Benjamin Willis, Chicago Superintendent of Schools, who has consistently ignored race relation issues in the public school system.

The South Bend CIC, together with the National Conference of Christians and Jews sponsored a meeting on race, with 180 teachers of Catholic elementary and high schools. The program included a lecture on "The Nature of Prejudice" together with talks on techniques to promote intergroup relations, and small discussion groups.

The National Federation of Sodalities celebrated 400 years of Sodality history at a 4-day leadership training conference culminating in a national convention in Cleveland. One of the three main topics of the October conference was "Christian Responsibility in Effecting Racial Justice."

Membership Drives

The San Francisco CIC membership has topped 200; an encouraging increase for them. The Brooklyn CIC hopes to have at least one member from each of 129 parishes, while at present 52 parishes are represented.

Lawrence W. Pierce, president of the New York CIC, has been appointed by Governor Rockefeller Director of the State Division of Youth. The appointment of Mr. Pierce is one of several appointments of Negroes that the Governor has made to important state positions.

direct action

The Providence CIC voted to picket Alabama Governor Wallace when he speaks at Brown University in November, and at the University of Rhode Island, if he accepts an invitation to speak there.

A group of 400 Catholics, organized by the CIC of Davenport, and representing most of the parishes in town, marched to a civil rights rally in which 3,000 people participated. 30 priests and seminarians, including Monsignor Dingman, Chancellor of the Davenport Diocese marched. Results of the rally were encouraging - several employers called and offered to hire Negroes in good positions. The Action for Civil Rights, sponsor of the rally will become a permanent federation of some twenty organizations which will join efforts to remove racism from Quad Cities.

The swift action of the Chicago CIC in one of the worst racial disturbances in the city helped to avert major violence and restore peace to a "white pocket" community following move-in by two Negro families. CIC priest-members, as part of an interreligious team of ministers and priests which grew out of the Chicago Conference on Religion and Race, patrolled the troubled area nightly, talked with thousands of angry residents, dispelled rumors, counselled, and preached from both pulpit and street the need for peaceful acceptance of the new neighbors.

Employment

The non-discriminatory clause in church building contracts of the type emphasized in the July 27 emergency meeting of the National Conference has been ordered by Bishop Helmsing, of the Kansas City-St. Joseph, Mo. Diocese. His order covers all building projects of the diocese and Catholic institutions of the diocese.

In his July, 1963 address on discrimination, Cardinal Spellman of New York calls the denial of Negro rights an outrage which Americans cannot tolerate. He emphasized the ideals of equality could be reached if employers would drop the barriers of discrimination, if schools can be honestly integrated, if housing laws are better enforced and if civil rights measures are enacted into law. The Cardinal repeated the message he sent in 1949 to the NAACP on its 40th anniversary .. "The Catholic Church repudiates as abhorrent to her very nature the pernicious doctrine that men are born with the stamp upon them of essential racial superiority or inferiority. She recognizes no master race, but proclaims the God-given equality before God of all souls, for whose salvation our Blessed Redeemer suffered and sacrificed."

The Birmingham Tragedy

The Birmingham bombing touched the consciences of most of the nation. The National Conference solicited funds from its member and non-member councils, and has sent to Birmingham, in the councils' name, about $1,000 to the families and for the repair of the church. The Washington CIC contributed $1,500 through the National Conference on Religion and Race. Masses were offered across the land for the victims' families, and several priests from outside the diocese joined some fifteen priests from the Birmingham area to attend the memorial services.

Medicine

Real progress has been made in hospital desegregation in Detroit, as indicated by the employment of some Negro CIC members in previously segregated hospitals.

Bishop Helmsing's (Kansas City-St. Joseph, Mo.) new program to foster interracial justice calls for a clergy conference on race; a review of employment policies of Catholic institutions; a series of sermons in all parishes setting forth and applying the Church's doctrine; and "Racial Peace" as the special intention in Sunday Masses in all parishes of the diocese through July and August.

A fifteen minute tape will be available in November for $2.50 through the National Conference office. It tells the story of discrimination against a Negro Catholic in the North, and will make an excellent discussion piece for all CIC's for use in parish meetings, at retreat houses, etc.

New Materials Available

The Bishops' Statement on Racial Harmony of August 25, 1963 is now available. (5¢, 10 or more; 4¢, 500 or more; 3¢, 1,000 or more.)

Cardinal Ritter forcefully expresses his views about what we must do about Negroes' civil rights in the October issue of MARRIAGE (St. Meinrad, Ind.) He states the need for interfaith cooperation and the desirability of direct action even on the part of the clergy. He goes on to say that the Church should utilize her buying power, and he reflects on much more.

The events of the summer have heightened Catholic consciousness that more needs to be done. This has tripled the requests for information from the National office, and increased demand for printed material many times above anything ever seen before. For example, one small notice in a high school sodality magazine has elicited more than 40 requests for information. This increased interest is indeed gratifying.

CHURCHMEN VISIT CONGRESSMEN

SECOND LEGISLATIVE CONFERENCE HELD

Fifty churchmen from key Congressional areas met in Washington during the week of October 21-25 to express church concern for the passage of effective civil rights legislation. The clergy and laity were briefed by persons representing various positions on the thorny political questions being debated by Congress before visiting their congressmen. Their action is an implementation of the resolution adopted by the House of Bishops on August 12th:

"RESOLVED: That the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, urges the Congress of the United States to pass such civil rights legislation as shall fairly and effectively implement both the established rights and needs of all minority groups in education, voting rights, housing, employment opportunities and access to places of public accommodation." The first legislative conference was held in Washington during the week of August 12-16.

DISCUSSION, STUDY AND ACTION

One of the really constructive things happening in America today is that increasingly more Churchmen are sitting down together to discuss, study and take action in promoting racial justice. The subject of race heretofore only dealt with haphazardly is now being brought out into the 'open' and examined in the light of Christian commitment and democratic principles. This is beginning to happen in many places all across America. Hopefully it will continue to occur in even more places, and, hopefully, even larger numbers of Christians will see the necessity to act and act now. Action now by committed churchmen will help to steer this revolution along constructive, peaceful lines avoiding holocaust of racism, bloodshed, and violence.

Fear, silence, and indifference have been the notorious triumvirate in American race relations. This problem was graphically pinpointed by Rabbi Jaochim Prinz, recalling his experiences in Nazi Germany, who said: "When I lived under the Hitler regime, I learned many things. The most important thing was that bigotry and hatred are not the most urgent problem. The most urgent, the most disgraceful problem is silence. A great people had become a nation of onlookers. They remained silent in the face of hatred, brutality and murder." Here is where one of the major problems has been and remains - the problem of silence and inaction - the great majority of citizens being neither hate-filled nor bigoted. Silence gives assent to suspicion, prejudice, and demagoguery. Often the individual fails to speak up, for fear that his views do not conform to those of the vast majority around him (as if Christian commitment depended upon local custom). Such lack of communication and sharing of points of view often prevents an honest examination of one's conscience from a Christian standpoint. Sometimes one is amazed to discover that when there is open discussion the silent ones have been merely waiting for leadership.

An Episcopal priest, the Rev. Jack Woodard, rector of All Saints Church, Galena Park, Texas, is one of the many clergy who has had the courage and seen the necessity to speak directly to this problem. Mr. Woodard, after delivering a thoughtfully, moving sermon on the recent Birmingham church bombing and the general American racial crisis, closed his sermon by making the following points for his own personal action in this crisis. Stating that, "I am by birth and pride a Southerner," Mr. Woodard sees the racial crisis as a national problem, not merely a localized one, and yet he clearly sees the need for personal commitment. Said, Mr. Woodard, concluding his sermon:

"I am convinced that the racial problem in our day is not just a matter of complying with court orders and living orderly lives as obedient citizens. It is clearly God's Word that hatred between races and discrimination because of the color of men's skins who bleed the same red blood is morally wrong and is against the core of meaning for which Christ's Church stands.

"I do not condemn anyone or love them one bit less who disagrees with one or any of this or all of it. I have said I am a Southerner and I know first-hand how deeply these things run in us. I also know Jesus loves all of us as much as He loves any of us.

"I intend to do these things:

(1) Pray daily for the realization of the brotherhood of men in Christ and for the victims and the criminals.

(2) Ask God to wash me clean of hate and prejudice and cowardice and the immaturity that fosters all this.

(3) I shall never again laugh at or tell a "nigger" joke or any other story which laughs at ignorance or misfortune or prejudice.

(4) I have already written Senators Tower and Yarborough and Congressman Thomas in support of civil rights legislation including the section on public accommodations. I tell you this simply as what I as one citizen have done. You must do what your conscience requires of you.

(5) Unless love should require it, I will not again by keeping quiet let someone think I agree with him when I do not.

(6) As I try to exercise the best judgment and wisdom of which I am capable, I shall work openly to make this parish and this diocese more effective forces in removing the practice of prejudice and injustice from this community."

Closing his remarks, Mr. Woodard told his congregation: "I pray your love and understanding as together we try to be faithful in all we we do to the God who loves all men in the world enough to give up His Son on the Cross that together we might have the victory."

Upon completing his sermon Mr. Woodard asked his congregation to register their opinions with him by voluntarily filling out a questionnaire which was provided for their use. Said, Mr. Woodard, to his congregation, "Usually you have no real chance to reply to my sermons. But this time you do. The ushers will now pass out a voluntary questionnaire which will give you a chance to let me know what you think. Please do not sign it unless you want to and, if you should not for any reason want to fill one out, then I suggest you join me in silent prayer for the next five minutes while those who do want to reply work on their paper. Just leave the questionnaires in the pews when you leave church and I will appreciate it very much."

TABULATION OF QUESTIONNAIRE RESULTS AND COMMENTS

Note: Approximately 65% of the adults present at both services replied.

1. 95% agreed with the 'substance of today's sermon'; 2% disagreed; 3% not sure.

2. 35% indicated they would like 'to have Mr. Woodard come by and discuss it with me.' 65% indicated that they did not need to have further discussion.

3. 3% indicated that they thought 'our parish and diocese' is doing enough work for racial understanding and justice; 74% indicated that they did not think enough was being done; 3% thought that too much was already being done.

4. 72% indicated that they wanted their senators and congressmen to vote for the civil rights bill with the exception of the section on public accommodations; 7% favored the civil rights bill with the section on public accommodations remaining.

5. 56% favored the public accommodations section of the civil rights bill;11% did not favor this section of the bill.

COMMENTS BY PARISHIONERS

"I take the 5th."
"I feel strongly that no individual should be persecuted for his beliefs. Religious tolerance is the basis for true understanding between people."
"I think your sermon deserves an answer beyond this form."
"Human beings are human beings regardless of skin color or race and it is morally wrong to make a difference. In God's eyes we are all the same."
"How appalling that you should have been asked to make explanation of the differences between these crimes!"
"I admire and respect the position you have taken on this matter. I feel like I have not searched my heart and mind enough to answer all the above questions. I have habits and reservations concerning the matter that may be right or wrong, but I have faith in prayer and I will pray for understanding and guidance. I would like to hear more of your viewpoints as I know you based all of them on the desire to carry out God's will."
"I don't understand 3 and 4 well enough to answer them."
"A most moving and thought provoking sermon. A very meaty sermon. I believe we all need soul searching on this subject. Civil rights must be won by love, respect, and not regulated."
"I think the Negro is trying to bypass the white people. I do not believe in firing a white person to give a position to anybody. To me the situation is in reverse."
"I don't hate Negroes half as much as I did this morning. I would like to commend you on the sermon, not the substance, but the sermon. I think it deepened if possible my feeling of respect for you."
"I would like very much to talk to you on this and other topics."
"Wonderful sermon."
"I do not want to be personally involved. I would, however, prefer that this problem be solved without bloodshed and such intense displays as we have had heretofore. My attitude is "Let George do it" -- not me."
"A wonderful sermon -- may we have more."
"What can I do as an individual except teach my children understanding and practice of fairness?"
"The section on public accommodations tends to disrupt the concept of private property rights. This right must be retained. God bless you."
"My prayers join yours."
"I enjoyed your sermon and admire you for having the courage to stand up for what you believe."
"I think this should be discussed on a parish wide round table discussion."
"I am not so sure that the Birmingham incident was necessarily perpetrated by our 'white brethren.' It is, I think, extremely unfortunate that such organizations as CORE and NAACP have to exist. They too can fall into hands and they influence minds which may not be guided by the devine inspiration."

"Isn't it sad that people are so bound by tradition and prejudice that they are unable to grasp, or they purposely reject in toto, even the very basic principles underlying our racial problems. What can I do to help?"

"I am concerned with what seems to be blame upon the segregationist for this bombing. We do not know yet who did it. There are many groups wishing to stir these issues up. More sermons like this would help."

"We fought a war almost a hundred years ago for the rights for the Negroes and slavery. The Negroes got their rights. Now they don't have them. They should be given them without any question."

"I agree fully with Mr. Woodard's sermon in answer to all these questions. I am quite sure there are many in this parish who are not doing enough for this cause, myself included."

"I welcome you and your comments in my home at any time."

"You voiced many thoughts that I had last week, especially the 'nigger' jokes and not speaking up.

"I would strongly suggest your text be copyrighted and published."

The Rev. Mr. Woodard and his congregation have gone on record, so has General Convention, the Presiding Bishop, the House of Bishops and many thousands of other Churchmen, but what about you? What are you doing to bring about justice and equality for all men?

CUPS OF COFFEE

WHAT DOES IT MEAN

The issues of freedom and equality for all men cannot be reduced to a "package." No master plan for action can fit every situation. Parishes, deaneries and other groups all over the church are wrestling with these problems in different ways. The "sermon census" described in these pages is only one of the many fresh, new approaches to group study and action. CHURCH and RACE would be glad to hear what your parish is doing.

COMMISSION ON RELIGION AND RACE
ISSUES FIRST REPORT

Words have not been matched by deeds in the civil rights struggle. There has been more talk about racial justice than actual achievement, the policy-making General Board of the National Council of Churches was told recently.

In its first report to the church body which created it last June, the Council's emergency Commission on Religion and Race warned that unless "we begin to make some changes in the structure of our common social practices, we are inviting disaster."

Declaring that little progress has been recorded in public accommodations, voting rights or housing, the Commission report called for "the wisest Christian counsel and most generous churchly resources for the healing of our social ills."

"We have been long on the pronouncement of moral ideals and very short on experimentation and risk," it said.

The report was presented at this afternoon's session of the two-day special fall session of the General Board at The Riverside Church. The Board is reviewing the activities of the Commission on Religion and Race. Thirty-two distinguished men and women, including editors, union and business leaders, educators, attorneys and churchmen comprise the Commission whose chairman is the Rt. Rev. Arthur C. Lichtenberger, Presiding Bishop, Protestant Episcopal Church.

Warren H. Turner, Jr., second vice president, National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church, presented the Commission's report to the Board for Bishop Lichtenberger.

Among its accomplishments during its four months of existence, the Commission cited that its leaders have participated in anti-segregation demonstrations and interracial services of worship in the Deep South. It has sent teams of trouble shooters to many specific areas of tension where invited, and it has been instrumental in the release of more than 90 persons on bail from "arduous and severe prison situations," the youngest in his teens and the oldest over 70.

Further, the Commission helped induce a national bonding company for the first time to provide bond for civil rights cases in Mississippi.

It jointly sponsored the Washington March with nine other groups, recruited nearly 40,000 church members and prepared some 80,000 lunches for the march.

It sent 25 distinguished church leaders to Washington to discuss civil rights legislation with Congressional leaders and with Attorney General Robert Kennedy and arranged for other churchmen to consult with their representatives in Congress.

It sent delegations to Medgar Evers' funeral in Jackson, Miss., and to the memorial service for school children murdered by a bomb thrown into their church in Birmingham, Ala. Delegations of church leaders led the demonstrations to bring about the desegregation of the Gwyn Oaks Park, Baltimore, Md. early last summer.

The Commission shared with Catholic and Jewish bodies in joint testimony supporting immediate civil rights legislation before Senate and House Committees and sponsored a consultation of 125 Midwest church leaders in Lincoln, Neb., to acquaint them with the issues at stake on pending legislation.

Currently, teams of civil rights and religious leaders, in cooperation with local and state councils of churches are touring six midwestern states, carrying out interpretation similar to that of the Lincoln meeting.

The report pointed out that future tasks of the Commission must take into account the gravity of the civil rights crisis.

"In certain parts of the country white supremacists have stepped up their hard-core resistance to Negro civil rights," the report warned and compared "this situation with conditions which prevailed in Germany when the Nazis took over."

"What is more shocking, in some cities (white supremacists) are able to compel churches and ministers to preach an heretical doctrine of man, which condones segregation and distorts the Christian faith," the Commission reported.

The report labelled the situation "frightening" for "both Negroes and whites who do not submit to this view are subject to harassment and threats to their lives."

The Commission report predicted that the intensity and frequency of local conflict will increase. It called on the member communions to see the racial crisis as a priority concern and to support the Commission's work so that it may move swiftly to areas of crisis and tension.

It declared that the Commission must do a more effective job of interpreting the grievances which the Negro bears to the white community and must prepare the churches, with the help of member communions, for "the fullest confrontation with the consequences of the sin of racial hatred."

The Commission will invite a panel of distinguished Americans to meet in Washington, D.C., next month to hear testimony on police brutality in civil rights cases. There has been ample documentation of this brutality this summer and of the use of local ordinances to deny Negroes their constitutional rights, the report stated.

Ministries of gospel interpretation must also be developed for those who hold erroneous views of biblically-blessed segregation, the Commission pointed out. "The church's faithfulness to the Word and its servant ministry in the racial struggle are inextricably bound."

Attention should also be given to other long-range programs. The Commission cited as example a "massive home-mission-based kind of operation" in the Mississippi Delta, the hard-core area of racial discrimination. Details of such a program have yet to be spelled out, the report indicated.

"The future of our evangical mission in the American scene rests on the clarity of our word and deed -- the measure of our faithfulness to Christ," it said.

A CHRISTIAN VIEW OF RACE

The Rt. Rev. Richard S. Emrich of the Episcopal Diocese of Michigan delivered this statement at the Anglican Congress in Toronto on August 17, 1963:

"Our thoughts on race as Christians should be determined by theology and not by the innumerable, varying, confusing views of the world. Since Jesus Christ is Lord, King of Kings, The Head of the Church, we are people under authority, not tossed about by every wind of doctrine. We are free to leave the Church, but we are not free to try to change Christ's will.

"Our thought is determined by great facts. Religion is, first of all, concerned with Isness and secondarily with Oughtness. Christ in our faith is the head of the human race. All of us have been baptized in his name and incorporated in his Body. That fact means that we are brothers in Christ. That is a greater fact than any differences. We are one in the Apostolic Succession, my hands, for example, having been laid on the people of many races in confirmation and ordination. We are one. The church is Catholic, and all we have to do here at the Congress is to look and listen to see what the Church is. A fundamental teaching of the faith is that there is one human race and that the purpose of all history is a fellowship of all men around the throne of God.

"As soon as we see this, we know that harsh division, segregation, wherever it appears is sin. It is intolerable that I may not be able to eat with, or pray with, or have the deepest fellowship with my brother in Christ. Am I to be separated from my brother in Christ who is closer to me than some of the members of my own family? Does not fellowship always mean equality? Does love have limits? Must we not as one man said, as Christians make our decision for the world to which we are going rather than for the world from which we come?

"There is no place where human sin reveals itself more virulently than in the subject of race. Every dominant group justifies its discrimination by claiming moral or intellectual superiority over the other group. Analyze all cruel jokes, and you will see that the dominant group is saying that the group discriminated against is either crafty or stupid. We segregate other men into a ghetto, and then call them clannish. We deny a group the opportunity for an education, and then call them stupid. We are a sinful race of men and we need Christ, the Redeemer.

"Because the histories of our nation are different, because all men are the same (barring circumstances), we must be careful not to judge lest we be judged. Since I know the sin of my own area, the different circumstances of other men, I will not say, I must not say, that we in our area are higher in the eyes of God than other men in their areas. We must, rather, face our own sin, and resolve to be the conscience of the world in our own areas with our own problems. Some of us have inherited far deeper problems than others. Some of us will bear our witness in relatively easy ways and others will be called upon to die for Christ's will. For, as over against all class, racial, or national divisions, we proclaim the oneness of mankind in Christ in the Holy Catholic Church. To fail in our witness in this regard is treason to Christ."

PRESBYTERIANS LAUNCH $500,000 FUND
TO PROMOTE RACIAL JUSTICE

United Presbyterians will be asked to contribute a special fund to aid the victims of the nation's struggle for racial justice.

A minimum of $500,000 will be sought through a special offering in the denomination's 9,200 churches on Race Relations Sunday, next February 9.

Adoption of the proposal came this week at a meeting of the United Presbyterian General Council, permanent advisory body of the 3.2 million member denomination.

The funds will be used to provide bail for those arrested in civil rights demonstrations and to meet the costs of legal aid for such persons. They will also be used to relieve the financial distress of the families of those arrested.

The offering will also make it possible to supplement the salaries of United Presbyterian ministers so that they may remain in troubled areas when their congregations will no longer adequately support them.

Since the mailing of this letter by a member of the House of Representatives to all clergymen in his district, only a mere handful of letters in response have been received by his office. At a time when there has been widespread executive and legislative manuevering, it is a scandal that the religious community has responded so poorly. How can we expect legislative bodies to show more concern for this moral issue than the Church itself?

Congress of the United States
House of Representatives
Washington, D. C.

September 24, 1963

Dear Pastor:

I have been impressed this year with the emphasis which has been placed upon the moral issues confronting the country and upon which the Congress is being asked to work its will. It appears to me that there are moral implications in most legislation. However these implications become the heart of the question when we are asked to stand and be counted on issues which affect the basic rights and dignity of man.

The church surely has a part to play in these matters. In a democracy such as ours that part is made more meaningful not because of the church's influence upon the state but because of the close relationship to the people, the electorate, those who do govern.

As your congressman it is my responsibility to tell you how I feel about the issues confronting us. I shall be voting for civil rights legislation. As a Christian I cannot deny the brotherhood of man nor the concepts of love and charity, nor the precept of equality in the eyes of God.

As a lawyer trained to respect the Constitution and duly-designated authority, I would find it difficult to deny an individual his guarantee of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, his right of free speech, his right to peaceful assembly, his right to vote, and his right of equal opportunity.

As a legislator with grave and far-reaching responsibilities I cannot ignore the need for fair and just laws designed to protect the rights of another.

Yes, I have the responsibility of telling you how I feel. May I venture the suggestion that my responsibility is no less than your responsibility. How do you feel about civil rights? How do your people feel?

This letter is prompted by the fact I have had less than 100 letters from constituents on this great moral issue. I am hoping that we might together stimulate the thinking of our people; that we might touch their conscience; that as your representative I might have the benefit of your counsel and wisdom.

Sincerely yours,

YOUR LETTERS DO COUNT

AND THEY ARE NEEDED NOW.

Says the noted NEW YORK TIMES writer and churchman James Reston, "...parishioners, even when they want to be participants instead of spectators, have lost faith in their power to influence great events."

Continuing, Mr. Reston adds, "Nothing, however, is more fallacious in American political life than the popular idea that Congressmen pay no attention to letters from their consultants. Some of them are impervious to reason and others won't or can't read, but all of them want to be re-elected, and all of them know the political power of the church, even if they never go there except for votes." It is of the utmost importance, therefore, that we as Christians and citizens register our opinions concerning the passage of adequate civil rights legislation now. The July 20th issue of CHURCH AND RACE was largely devoted to an explanation of the contents of the current legislation and also carried tips on letter writing. Copies of this issue are available upon request.

ST. MARK'S RECTOR, VESTRY AND WARDENS REGISTER OPINION

"We who are members of St. Mark's In-the-Bouwerie, a parish in the Episcopal Diocese of New York, are writing this letter to our state's Representatives and Senators and to our fellow Episcopalians in the Congress because of the seriousness and the danger of the crisis our nation is now facing. We write with a living memory of the draft riots that happened just a century ago, when our city, corrupted and divided by racial hatred, endured four days of rapine and slaughter, and we pray that such may never happen again. The seeds that produced these days of horror had been sowed long before by the segregation of our Negro brothers in separate areas and by unjustifiable discriminatory practices that kept them out of places of public accommodation and confined their employment to the most servile of occupations.

"The badge of inferiority had been placed upon them in contradiction to all that our nation and church affirmed, and when in the war against human slavery, a conscription act was passed, then some of the whites in our city, turned in their anger, against this segregated and separated group. The issue then as now was between two sorts of freedom: one concerned with the rights of property, the other with the rights of man. Both must be honored equally so long as they do not conflict, but then, as we have been taught by our church and nation, and by history, the rights of property must give way or we will pay a bitter price. The God whom we worship still rules the world and He is a just but jealous ruler who punishes us when we betray. Many in this generation may think this an ancient superstition that can be disregarded but so did our ancestors a century ago, and half a million men died because of their mistake.

"You, our brothers in the Congress, are the ones now in a position to do that which may spare us from the just vengeance of the living God, to prevent a repetition of the tragic events of a hundred years ago. We do not need to remind you of the founding documents of this nation, the repeated judgments of its churches: all we pray in this crisis is that you be empowered to act in their spirit, to prove worthy of the task to which you have been called, and to be true servants of the nation, its whole people, and the God who rules the world."

Dawson P. Adams
Clerk of the Vestry

The above letter, dated August 21, 1963, was sent to their State's Representatives and Senators in Congress and to all Episcopal members of that body. Replies have been received from all of the legislators irrespective of their agreement or disagreement and are displayed on the bulletin board of St. Mark's Parish House.

SPARE THESE CHILDREN?

"There are those who have raised questions about children participating in public demonstrations and picket lines for civil rights. They look with seeming horror upon little boys and girls, neatly brushed and dressed, walking bravely to school while adult women scream unspeakable oaths at them, and men and boys taunt them with vulgarities, and endanger their lives with stones and bricks. These critics say "spare these children from the sight of their elders being rushed by dogs, pummelled by hoodlums and swept aside by firehoses." Yet I say that these critics are as ignorant of the lives of Negro children as they are of life on Mars. They do not know that millions of children of this vast minority group in generation after generation have been born and reared in an environment entirely contrary to all that is just and right. Have these people who cry "horror" ever looked into their child's eyes when he asks, "Why?" Do they know what goes on in the heart of a child, and his parent, when the child says, "Why can't I go into the library and get a book?" "Why do we have to stand in the bus when these other people who have just got on can sit down?" "Why can't I go to a pretty school?" "Why doesn't the school bus stop for me?" "Why can't I go to the amusement park and the playground across the street?" "Why do we have to live in this nasty neighborhood?" "Why don't you vote?" And on and on. And each question tears further into his parent's heart and molds that child's life into something less than a man's. To those of you who are shocked at children in demonstrations, who are afraid of what might happen to their innocent lives, I ask, "Where have your voices been all these years? Where,your concern? Where,,your words?" Black parents in their love and simplicity have tried to give answers. Some have replied that "God made you the wrong color." Is it any wonder that some children have grown up to blaspheme the Holy Name?" Some have said, "Well, it's the law around here." Are we surprised that some children have grown up fighting the society and its laws that have treated them so? Most have said, "I don't know. I don't know why men treat their brothers this way, but don't let it destroy you. You are a child of God and they can't steal your birthright no matter what they do, what you are denied." And the soul of the old Spiritual wells up to affirm its plaint, "Didn't my Lord deliver Daniel, so why not every man?" My brethren, children on the picket lines with their parents, children braving the mob to go to school, children laughing their way into jail -- they do this gladly and bravely. This is the first real answer they have received. They have, under God, the right to protest at last. They have the right to participate in bringing about solutions to their questions that have distorted their lives from the beginning. This is the first March of Freedom since Emancipation. This is the year of jubilee. Suffering? Hardship? Yes. But it is glorious, as every battle for freedom, however arduous, is glorious."

EPISCOPAL SCHOOL ASSOCIATION
REITERATES RACIAL STAND

Episcopal Church-related schools that practice racial discrimination will be barred from membership in the national Episcopal School Association.

This ruling was handed down by the organization's executive committee meeting at a September meeting. It reiterates and reflects the Church's unequivocal position on the question of integrated schools.

The governing board threw its weight behind Presiding Bishop Arthur Lichtenberger's Whitsuntide message in which he called racial discrimination within the body of the Church itself "an intolerable scandal" and summoned all diocesan and Church-related agencies, schools and other institutions "to bring their practices up to the standard of the clear position of the Church" on the racial issue.

In another resolution, the executive committee declared that member schools of the Association must re-examine their admission policies and, within six months, "give documentary evidence that they have brought their admission policies into conformity" with the Episcopal Church's anti-segregationist stand.

The committee also requested the Association's executive secretary, the Rev. Clarence Brickman, to obtain descriptions of current admission policies of the Association's 220 member schools across the nation.

The Episcopal School Association is an organization of Episcopal Church-related day and boarding schools below the college level. Its president is Dr. John W. Shank of Orlando, Fla.

The executive committee, in addition to Fr. Brickman and Dr. Shank, consists of Dr. Ruth Jenkins, Annie Wright Seminary, Tacoma, Wash; the Rev. John Verdery, Wooster School, Danbury, Conn; the Rev. E. Allison Grant, Grace Church School, New York City; and Robert H. Porter, headmaster, The Choir School of St. Thomas Church, New York City.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE EPISCOPAL SCHOOL ASSOCIATION

The Executive Committee of the Council of the Episcopal School Association, meeting in New York City, September 20, 1963, adopted the following resolution:

WHEREAS - The Presiding Bishop, the Right Reverend Arthur Lichtenberger, has called discrimination within the body of the Church itself an intolerable scandal and therefore summoned all diocesan and Church-related agencies, schools and other institutions to bring their practices up to the standard of the clear position of the Church on race, and

WHEREAS - Since 1952, the Episcopal School Association and its predecessors have consistently supported this position, be it therefore

RESOLVED - That any school applying for membership in the Episcopal School Association shall not be eligible for membership if its admission policies include discrimination based on race or color, and be it further

RESOLVED - That member schools be required to re-examine their admission policies and, within six month's time, give documentary evidence that they have brought their admission policies into conformity with the position of the Church and, be it finally

RESOLVED - That the Executive Secretary of the Unit of Parish and Preparatory Schools be respectfully requested to send out to all schools of the Church a form to be returned which clearly describes their current admission policies.

LEADERS OF THE RELIGIOUS COMMUNITY
IN CAPITAL FOLLOWING BIRMINGHAM BOMBING
ISSUE A CALL TO AMERICA

On September 18, eighteen religious leaders representing the major faiths met in Washington to call on members of Congress, and the Attorney General. They issued the following statement:

We came to Washington today to express the deep moral outrage which we as religious leaders feel over the hideous massacre which occured in a city of this nation last Sunday. We came to tell the members of Congress and the President, through his Attorney General, that we believe the nation is ready now as it has never been before for legislation which will insure that incidents such as happened last Sunday -- and such as have been happening over and over again in only slightly less monstrous forms throughout this land in recent times -- will not occur again. We came to declare that every citizen of this republic must at last have the full protection of the laws of the United States as they attempt to exercise their rights of citizenship.

We came to Washington to register our convictions as religious leaders. But we feel that the hour has now come when more than the leadership of the churches and synagogues must act. The whole religious community -- and that means each and every one of its members -- must make their presence felt in Washington, too.

It is our firm belief that Americans of every religious persuasion are yearning for a concrete way in which to express their moral outrage over the atrocities which have taken place. We therefore call upon every church and synagogue in America to observe this coming weekend as a special sabbath of prayer and petition. We are asking that during their services this Saturday and Sunday, pastors, priests and rabbis give opportunity for their congregations to respond to the tragic events of the past week in silence, even if this means foregoing their sermons.

Let us as a nation be still and, praying in our pews, seek the still, small voice of God, asking him for his mercy upon all who have suffered -- and upon those who have died. Let us pray for his guidance upon us all that from these present sufferings we might arise at last as one people who dwell together in love, brotherhood and peace. And then, toward the end of that period of silence, let each worshipper have the opportunity to take pen and paper and write to his congressman, urging the immediate passage of relevant and effective legislation.

The death of the six young Americans in Birmingham on Sunday which has led us to come here today is tragic and senseless. But it is not an isolated incident. Until a community puts out of its life all sanctioned forms of discrimination and segregation, demented men will find encouragement to commit racist-murder.

Our faith calls to us that the deaths of these young people must not be in vain. We can, and we must, mourn their dying, but our mourning will be empty unless out of this dark night of violence can come a new dawn of social and racial justice in our land.

And so, in the spirit of prayer and petition on this sabbath of silence, we believe it would be a most fitting tribute to the memory of these six children for worshippers everywhere to write their congressmen and to plead, in the priceless words of Lincoln, "That from these honored dead... this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom.

BISHOP REEVES ADDRESSES
U.N. COMMITTEE

The Rt. Rev. Ambrose Reeves, former Bishop of Johannesburg, Union of South Africa in a speech (of which an excerpt appears below) before the Special Political Committee of the General Assembly on October 18, said of the racial situation in South Africa:

"As I see it, the choice before the world is now a clear one. It is between effective international action and the probability of bloodshed on a vast scale in South Africa. And the choice cannot be evaded by maintaining that all that exists in South Africa is a particular form of government which many people find repugnant. That I suppose is true of most governments in the world. But in South Africa there is a situation which the majority of the inhabitants at this moment are living in a fully-fledged police state, under a tyranny which is a flagrant contradiction of the basic principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

"Even more serious, there is a possibility that within the next few years South Africa will become the cause of the focal point in a race war which even the United Nations might find it impossible to contain. Some will dismiss this as a widly exaggerated statement. But there are already signs of a new solidarity which is increasingly concerned with the fate of twelve million non-white people in South Africa in their desperate struggle for freedom, status, and dignity."

BISHOP CARPENTER NAMED CHAIRMAN OF NEW BI-RACIAL COMMITTEE

A twenty-five member committee of white and Negro leaders was recently established to seek easing of racial tensions in Birmingham, according to THE NEW YORK TIMES of October 2. The Rt. Rev. Charles C. J. Carpenter, Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Alabama, is chairman. Among the other religious leaders serving on the committee are the Most Rev. Joseph A. Durrick, Auxiliary Bishop of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Birmingham-Mobile, and Rabbi Milton Grafman of Temple Emanu-El.

The bi-racial group is a subcommittee of the larger Community Affairs Committee established earlier in the year by Mayor Albert Boutwell. The subcommittee's creation was authorized in the summer following Negro demonstrations and a negotiated settlement. Mayor Boutwell activated this new subcommittee upon the recommendation of President Kennedy's two special representatives, the Honorable Kenneth C. Royall and Col. Earl Blaik, who were dispatched to Birmingham to try to establish better communications between the white and Negro communities.

The committee includes nine members from among the leadership of the city's Negro community.

CHURCH LEADERS SEEK RACE RELATIONS COMMITTEE

"Declaring that relations between the races have 'deteriorated' here since the Fair Housing election in April, local Episcopal leaders today presented the Berkeley City Council with a resolution asking for the appointment of a civic committee to consider inter-group relations.

"The resolution which was referred by the Council Welfare Commission, was prepared and unanimously adopted by the Community Relations Committee of the Bishop Berkeley Presbytery, an association of the Episcopal Churches of Berkeley and Albany, and the two Episcopal schools, the Church Divinity School of the Pacific and St. Margaret's House.

"The Rev. Andrew Daughters, assistant rector at St. Mark's Episcopal Church, presented the resolution to the council."

From: BERKELEY DAILY GAZETTE,
October 1, 1963

The Community Relations Committee of the Bishop Berkeley Presbytery includes representatives from all member churches and is chaired by Mrs. Milton Farmer. The Committee has been organized to meet the "need for an investigatory and concilatory civic committee to deal with specific complaints of inequity in all areas of social inequality in our community."

AMERICUS,
GEORGIA

REPORT FROM AMERICUS, GA.

Long a favorite target of local segregationists, the interracial Christian community established by the Rev. Clarence Jordan at Koinonia Farm, Americus, Ga., is facing even more difficult days. In a recent report, Mr. Jordan writes: "The past year has been one of the deep searching as to whether or not to continue here." Frequent bombings and shooting frays at the farm's buildings and fruit and vegetable stands have caused several members to give up so that "our group is now so small that the burdens carried by the remaining few are very heavy," says Mr. Jordan. Support for the community comes exclusively from the nation-wide sale of shelled pecan nuts and homemade fruit cake. Following a crop failure last year, however, "the largest pecan crop in history" is expected this year, he reports.

Koinonia Farm made its facilities available to members of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) for some months, says Mr. Jordan, before they were finally arrested. Three whites and one Negro, now in Sumter County jail charged with insurrection, are being held without bond. The report continues: "Over 200 Negro young people have been arrested in this county and some accounts of their treatment are reminiscent of the infamous Civil War prison in Andersonville, also located in this country."

The Sumter County Movement, Americus, is seeking to help them, says Mr. Jordan, and "we have done what little we could to aid in the struggle for freedom for all."

DETROIT,

EPISCOPAL CLERGY WINS PRAISE
FOR COURAGE IN MISSISSIPPI

Praise for the courage of Episcopal ministers in Mississippi was voiced here by the dean of St. Paul's Episcopal Cathedral as he returned from conducting a seminar program in that state.

The Rev. John Weaver, an expert on urban church problems, led study sessions on urbanization and industrialization, but also observed racial problems faced by Mississippi clergymen.

"I've been more impressed with the Episcopal Church's stand on brotherhood in Mississippi than in any other diocese where I have been," Dean Weaver said.

He praised efforts of Episcopal clergymen to integrate congregations and told of a rector being subjected to egg-throwing attacks and community criticism for his anti-segregation stand.

The Detroit clergyman credited the system of authority under a bishop for giving a sense of security to Episcopal clergymen.

"In some Mississippi churches," he said, "if the citizens' committee feels you are 'imbued' with the idea of integration they go to work on you and your congregation and get you out quickly."

Dean Weaver is one of several Protestant Episcopal leaders heading a seminar program across the country to acquaint clergymen with the type of automation and urbanization problems they will face in the future.

In Mississippi, he said, the church needs ways to help rural members find ways to adjust to problems that will develop through automation in the cotton industry.

Another Detroit Episcopal clergyman, the Rev. Malcolm Boyd, chaplain at Wayne State University, has been appointed assistant rector of a predominantly Negro church.

The chaplain, widely known for his ministry to "beatniks" in their coffee-house haunts, was assigned to Grace Episcopal Church. In a joint statement with the Rev. Henri Stines, one of two Negro priests of the church, Mr. Boyd said: "The time has come for all Christians to consider the grievous sin of maintaining any kind of racial or ethnic distinctions...

"It is our hope that the witness of our interracial ministry... may by God's providence be a small but useful step in bringing closer the day when unChristian divisions between Christians may be obliterated."

Several Detroit churches -- Episcopal, Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian and Lutheran among them -- have interracial ministries.

RIVERDALE,
NEW YORK

CHURCHMAN JAILED,
FACES POSSIBLE DEATH PENALTY

Donald Harris, twenty-three year old son of Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel Harris, was arrested in Americus, Georgia, while participating in a peaceful Freedom Rally there last summer - 'no harm or damage being offered to persons of property at any time by the participants.'

The Rev. Gerald V. Barry, Rector of Christ Church, Riverdale, New York indicates that Donald Harris and his parents were active members of Christ Church for twelve years and moved just recently. Mr. Harris, Sr. served on the Vestry and in the choir with his wife and was also a member of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and Donald was a faithful Server for many years. Donald attended the Fieldston School in Riverdale and was graduated from Rutgers University where he had been captain of the football team.

Donald Harris is reported to have gone to Americus, Georgia to assist in voter registration and according to a letter written by the Director of Christ Church Chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, Eugene L. Staples, Donald was arrested, "For making a speech in behalf of the Negroes' right to vote. Mr. Harris was arrested on a fourteen-count indictment of inciting to riot, which, under the laws of Georgia, upon conviction, could result in a sentence of death. It also is the case that under Georgia law such an indictment can be presented in court, one count at a time, and that the accused may be held in prison for as long as ninety days between the presentation in court of any two counts. Thus, Donald Harris could spend more than three years in prison before his case was fully tried in court."

The Christ Church Chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew is presently raising funds to get Mr. Harris out of jail on bail, as bail has been set at a fantastic figure, and even so, under Georgia law he can still be held without bail. A local Riverdale committee for the Defense of Donald Harris has been formed as well as a similar group at Rutgers University. The NAACP LEGAL AND DEFENSE FUND has offered its services in defending young Mr. Harris.

DAYTON,
OHIO

CLERGY MUSTER FORCES TO AID NEGRO FAMILY

In the wake of two days of violent demonstrations set off by a Negro family's moving into all-white suburban Townview, ministers in Dayton, Ohio, and surrounding areas worked hard and fast to protect them and prevent more trouble. And as James Fuller, his wife and two daughters prepared to spend their fourth night in their new home on Sept. 28, they reported that the day had been "full of warmth and friendship."

Seven-year-old Judy had been accompanied on the eight-block walk to school by the Rev. Bruce Hilton, editor of Otterbein Press youth publications, the Rev. Robert Schurmann, also a pastor of the Evangical United Brethren Church, and the Rev. Robert Secrist and Irene Scheibel of Westwood Lutheran Church. On their arrival at the school, they were met by four Townview ministers.

When Mr. Hilton returned to pick up Judy for the trip home, he found her already making friends with the white pupils. Mrs. Fuller meanwhile could report that 5-year-old Theresa had had a good time in kindergarten and that several women had greeted her, one of whom bought her a bag of groceries and invited the Fullers to her home.

Quick action and the close cooperation of the ministers were credited by the Journal Herald of Dayton with averting a worse situation. On the night of the biggest riot, Dr. Willis Ford, executive secretary of the Church Federation of Greater Dayton, called together a group of ministers in time for the 11 p.m. TV newscast, on which they appealed for acceptance of the Fuller family in Townview. Mr. Hilton then wrote a Fact Sheet on the housing situation in order to prevent the panic selling which was developing from "scare" calls from real estate agents. The Townview pastors approved and signed it, and copies were distributed by local clergy to each of the 1,200 homes in the suburban areas involved -- all within three days.

The ministers continue to take turns being present at the Fuller home and at the school because of recurring threats, said the report, but the tension is easing. Mr. Hilton is author of the Home Mission study theme book, "My Brother Is A Stranger," published by the National Council of Churches' Friendship Press, of which Mr. Secrist wrote the 12th chapter, "The Church That Dared To Stay."

SEWANEE, TENNESSEE

OPPORTUNITY FOR ALL

Since summer a new opportunity has presented itself for us all to understand and practice Christianity at Sewanee.

On June 17-22 there was held at Otey Parish Church a Daily Vacation Bible School, a part of which was a children's mission conducted by Father Baldwin, O.H.C. As this was the only such opportunity offered by the Episcopal Church in Sewanee during the summer, boys and gilrs of the entire community, including the St. Mark's (Negro) portion, were invited. An excellent response resulted and a splendid Bible School and children's mission was experienced. Of the 121 pupils and 32 adults and youth workers, 42 pupils and 12 workers were from St. Mark's Church.

Later in the summer, the Rev. C. I. Vermilye, priest-in-charge of St. Mark's Mission accepted a call to Tifton, Ga., to be effective August 1st.

During July, twenty-one communicants of St. Mark's Church signed and sent a petition to the Rt. Rev. William E. Sanders, Bishop Coadjutor with jurisdiction over missions of the Diocese of Tennessee, asking that St. Mark's be closed and declaring their intention to transfer to Otey Parish Church. Bishop Sanders conferred with the congregation after a service at St. Mark's and consulted with the Rev. Chalres L. Winters, Jr., who was appointed to hold services at St. Mark's after Mr. Vermilye's departure, and the rector of Otey. It was agreed not to close St. Mark's, as some members of long standing were not ready to give up their connection with it, but that those wanting to transfer to Otey would be encouraged to do so.

During August various members of St. Mark's, mostly young people, attended services at Otey.

In mid-September, when new courses were to begin at Otey Church school and family service, an invitation to attend was sent by letter to parents and postcard to children of St. Mark's, as to Otey, families. This invitation to St. Mark's families was confirmed through personal visit by the rector of Otey. On Sundays since, an average of twenty-five to thirty members from St. Mark's, mostly boys and girls from kindegarten through high school, have been worshipping and learning happily at Otey with friends made at the summer Bible School.

This change brings Christian opportunity for all. St. Mark's members can enjoy at Otey many aids to Christian training that are lacking in the small building and congregation at St. Mark's. Among these are a separate room for each class, a class for each grade, a larger number of trained teachers, an adult class, a junior choir, organizations for youth, for women, and for men; above all, the Christian love of their brethren in Christ, from whom they are no longer separated.

There is no less real Christian opportunity for those who were already members of Otey. Besides sharing with our brothers and sisters the privileges given to us, we shall gain much in Christian growth, especailly through the new relationships and experiencing thereby a deeper understanding of each other, ourselves, and of God. We are seeing that our oneness in Christ as God's children is higher and deeper, far more important and satisfying, than the shallow differences that have been allowed to separate us. We are discovering anew the meaning of the Psalmist's saying, "Behold, how good and joyful a thing it is, for brethren to dwell together in unity," and hope this unity and joy will spread to include any who at present are unable to accept it.

When we sometimes find ourselves different in thus following the cross instead of the crowd, it is strengthening to know that this is the teaching of our Church,-and of other Christian bodies as well. The General Convention, the highest human authority in the Episcopal Church, in 1955 stated: "Resolved, that we make our own the statement of the Anglican Congress that 'in the work of the Church we should welcome people of any race at any service conducted by a priest or layman of any ethnic origin, and bring them into the full fellowship of the congregation and its organizations.'" Even more quieting and cleansing to the conscience are the words of Christ, "Thou shalt love they neighbor as thyself," and "Whatever you wish that men would do to you, do so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." St. Paul sums up the opportunity and obligation that have come to Christians as Sewanee: "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male or female; for you are all one in Christ Jesus."

A recent note from the rector, the Rev. David W. Yates, indicates that the story in Sewanee continues as told here.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS AND THE LAW

A lot of people are fussing about the public accommodations section in the civil rights bill currently before Congress. To hear them talk, this is a radical new invasion of private property rights. Not only do some 30 states have laws barring discrimination in public places, but these statutes are based on the old British Common Law which our forebear brought to this country from England.

Take this key English case, decided in 1701 and disclosed in the Congressional Record by Rep. John V. Lindsay (R., N.Y.):

"Whenever any subject takes upon himself a public trust for the benefit of the rest of his fellow subjects, he is eo ipso bound to serve the subject in all things that are within the reach and comprehension of such an office, under the pain of action against him. If on the road a shoe fall of my horse and I come to a Smith to have one put on, and the Smith refuse to do it, an action will lie against him because he has made profession of a trade which is for the publick good and has thereby exposed and vested an interest of himself in all of the king's subjects that will employ him in the which of his trade. If an innkeeper refuse to entertain a guest, when his house is not full, an action will lie against him; and so against a carrier if his horses not be loaded, and he refused to take a packet proper to be sent by a carrier."

MONTREAL LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE

Under the sponsorship of the Division of Christian Citizenship and the leadership of The Rev. Cornelius C. Tarplee, eight young people from the Peninsula attended the Montreal Leadership Conference in Canada this past August, along with a delegation of twenty-two other young people from South Carolina, Lynchburg, Va.; Louisville, Kentucky; Cambridge, Mass.; and California. The M.L.C. is a joint pilot project between the American Episcopal Church and the Anglican Church in Canada and is composed of thirty young people from the United States and a like number from Canada. The theme of the Conference was "Vocation" with emphasis on the building of a more Christian society through the practice of brotherhood.

Sixty youths representing two nations, several racial groups, and at least three cultures lived together as a Christian community for ten days of worship, study, discussion and recreation.

The American delegation was entertained and housed by Mrs. Salem Lewis in her summer home in Elberton, New Jersey while enroute to Montreal and on return home. The Americans were also guests for three nights in Canadian homes.

The ten day conference at Camp Farthing, sixty miles north of Montreal began each morning with Matins and the Holy Eucharist. There were presentations each morning on the Christian Faith and Practice and its implications in society. Afternoons were spent in swimming, boating, athletics, and relaxation. Several movies were shown in the afternoons including one of the Consecration and Enthronement of the present Bishop of Montreal. Evensong was said each afternoon prior to supper. Each evening there were small discussion groups which dealt with the questions and problems of teenagers and later in the evening there was recreation including dancing and games.

The Conference had the pleasure of a visit by the Bishop of Montreal as well as a visit from the Archdeacon of the Diocese of Kenya. The Archdeacon celebrated the Holy Eucharist one morning in his native tongue and later gave a background talk of the Church's work in Africa. All were impressed that the Anglican Communion is worldwide and composed of so many races and languages and that the Church is for the whole world and not any one nation or race.

'LETTER FROM BIRMINGHAM JAIL'

In the first issue of CHURCH AND RACE, copies of Dr. Martin Luther King's 'Letter From Birmingham Jail' were offered to any who wished them. The Bishop of Alabama has noted that the American Friends Service Committee version, which we distributed, incorrectly identified a statement prepared by eight Alabama clergymen, including two Episcopal bishops, as being "directed to Martin Luther King, Jr." The Statement, as the bishop points out, was a public statement given to the press and not directed to Dr. King or any other individual. It was this statement to which Dr. King made reply. At the same time, it may be noted that the preface of the pamphlet properly identified the statement of the eight religious leaders. The AFSC has assured the bishop that it will correct the error in subsequent printings. We are glad to note the correction.

Our supply of the pamphlet has been exhausted. Persons desiring copies may obtain them from the American Friends Service Committee, 160 North Fifteenth Street, Philadelphia 2, Pennsylvania.

Integration Impact

Desegregated Concerns In South Say Patronage Holds Up in Long Run

Some Hotels, Restaurants Do Better; Atlanta, Dallas Cite Larger Convention Market

New Rights Often Not Used

By JAMES C. TANNER
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

ATLANTA—Things are swinging these days at the Wit's End, a swank North Side night club which opened its doors last November. Though the Treasury's new expense account rules made things tough at first, the Wit's End is now packing in customers regularly.

In Memphis, the 126-room Downtowner Motel is doing so well its occupancy is even running ahead of last year's booming 95% rate. The Downtowner has been filled to capacity much of the time in recent weeks and all signs point to a record year.

The financial fortunes of these Southern establishments are of special interest because both are among those that have begun serving Negroes for the first time. Their experiences, plus those of scores of other businesses from Texas to the Carolinas, point up a significant and perhaps surprising fact: Among those restaurants, hotels, theaters and other places of public accommodation in the South that have begun serving or hiring Negroes, only a few report suffering any lasting economic consequences. A sizable number, in fact, declare that business has been better than ever.

"Couldn't Have Been Smoother"

"We were scared to death—we could just see all our white customers walking out the minute the first Negroes walked in," says Paul Stickney, manager of the Wit's End. 'But things couldn't have been any smoother. We know of only one white couple who walked out because we admitted Negroes and they came back within two weeks. As far as stirring things up around here, it's been one big zero." The Wit's End is one of only three Atlanta night clubs serving both whites and Negroes.

All this is not to suggest that desegregation would go smoothly for all Dixie establishments. At Ormond Beach, Fla., near Daytona Beach, motel operator George Thomas is still reeling from the financial punch delivered by boycotting whites when he decided it was the "right thing" to desegregate his 32-unit Star of the South Motel seven months ago. "My business at first dropped about 50%," he reports. But he adds that an influx of Negro guests quickly took up much of the slack, and he expresses confidence that many of his white customers eventually will return.

But most businessmen questioned by The Wall Street Journal report no grave economic dislocations from integration and they leave no doubt that desegregation of commercial facilities has been less painful than expected.

No Loss of Business

"Things have been going like clockwork—we're surprised and pleased," says Dallas hotel man Henry Rather of last summer's decision by the city's major hotels and motels to integrate. Mr. Rather says a recent check of the city's 35 largest hostelries failed to turn up a single instance of lost business because of desegregation. "There were a few letters and a crank call or two at first, but that's all," comments Mr. Rather.

Broader access to privately owned places of "public convenience," such as hotels, restaurants, amusement facilities and stores, has become a prime goal of Negroes lately. The recent riots in Birmingham, and subsequent disturbances in such cities as Savannah, Ga., Jackson, Miss., Danville, Va., and Tallahassee, Fla., primarily revolved around Negro demands that merchants open their facilities to Negroes—in some cases as customers and in others as employes.

The question has taken on added importance in recent weeks with the appeal to Congress by President Kennedy for Federal power to outlaw racial discrimination in all places of public accommodation. This is unquestionably the most controversial provision of the Kennedy civil rights program and seems likely to become the focal point of the coming Congressional battle over civil rights.

Negroes Making Major Strides

Southern businessmen generally express strong opposition to this section of the proposed civil rights legislation. But even without such a law, Negroes are making major strides in their push to break down segregation barriers. The Justice Department reports that some desegregation of commercial facilities occurred in 143 cities in Southern and border states in the four weeks ended June 18; others are joining the list daily.

Last week, for instance, a bi-racial committee in strongly segregationist Fort Worth announced that all of the city's public facilities, including hotels, restaurants, theaters, department stores and athletic contests, would be desegregated in September when the city's schools are scheduled for integration.

If the pattern emerging in other Southern cities holds true, Fort Worth merchants can expect some protests and loss of business when they first begin accepting Negroes. But experience shows that such adverse effects are rarely lasting.

Fred Harvey, president of Harvey's Department Store in Nashville, says that when his store desegregated its lunch counters in 1960 only 13 charge accounts were closed out of 60,000. "The greatest surprise I ever had was the apparent 'so-what' attitude of white customers," says Mr. Harvey.

Even where business losses occur, they usually are only temporary. At the 120-room Peachtree Manor Hotel in Atlanta, owner Irving H. Goldstein says his business dropped off 15% when the hotel desegregated a year ago. "But now we are only slightly behind a year ago and we can see we are beginning to recapture the business we initially lost," declares Mr. Goldstein.

William F. Davoren, owner of the Brownie Drug Co. in Huntsville, Ala., reports that though his business fell a bit for several weeks after lunch counters were desegregated, he's now picked up all that he lost. Says he: "I could name a dozen people who regarded it as a personal affront when I started serving Negroes, but have come back as if nothing had happened."

Memories Are Short

Even a segregation-minded businessman in Huntsville agrees that white customers frequently have short memories when it comes to the race question. W. T. Hutchens, general manager of three Walgreen stores there, says he held out when most lunch counter operators gave in to sit-in pressures last July. In one shopping center where his competition desegregated, Mr. Hutchens says his business shot up sharply and the store's lunch counter volume registered a 12% gain for the year. However, this year business has dropped back to pre-integration levels "because a lot of people have forgotten" the defiant role his stores played during the sit-ins, he adds.

Some Southern businessmen who have desegregated say they have picked up extra business as a result of the move.

At Raleigh, N.C., where Gino's Restaurant was desegregated this year, owner Jack Griffiths reports only eight whites have walked out after learning the establishment served Negroes, and he says "we're getting plenty of customers to replace the hard-headed ones."

In Dallas, integration of hotels and restaurants has "opened up an entirely new area of convention prospects," according to Ray Bennison, convention manager of the Chamber of Commerce. "This year we've probably added $8 million to $10 million of future bookings because we're integrated," Mr. Bennison says.

Conventions for Atlanta

Within a day after 14 Atlanta hotels announced on June 13 they would begin accepting Negro guests who come to the city with conventions, the Atlanta Convention Bureau had nailed down three organizations for 1964 and 1965 meetings, a total of 3,000 delegates who otherwise would not have visited Atlanta. Walter Crawford, executive vice president of the Convention Bureau, says the hotels' decision opens up "the remaining 40% of the convention market that we estimate we haven't even been able to talk to before."

One frequently expressed fear of Southern white businessmen, that their establishments would be overrun by Negroes if they integrated, apparently is not materializing. "The Negroes want the right to enter your place of business, but they're not so anxious to use the right," says a Nashville banker.

At Knoxville, Tenn., William Tiller, assistant manager of the city's largest hotel, the Andrew Johnson, reports that although the hotel has been integrated more than a month, "we've had only three Negro families and two couples."
